In the Afternoon I went to Diophantes to bid him adieu; he imbraced me very civilly; but ſince I found him within two paces of his own Gates, our Diſcourſe was not long; and I asked his permiſſion to bid adieu unto the reſt of his Family: He told me, that Taxile his Wife was not within; but although Teleſile was alone, and not well, yet he deſired I ſhould ſee her, and commanded one of her Women to conduct me unto her Chamber. Diophantes would have been ſo ceremonious, as to conduct me himſelf, but I would by no means ſuffer him. At laſt he left me, and I went, by his permiſſion, to bid adieu unto Teleſile. I was ſo happy as to find her alone without any Company, but two Women who waited upon her. As her Sickneſs was not great, ſo ſhe kept her Chamber, and not her Bed; a little heavineſs in her Eyes, methought, made her more Amiable; and I thought her ſo fair that day, as my ſorrows to leave her increaſed; though ſhe had been told I was coming into her Chamber, yet was ſhe much ſurprized at it. Thimocrates, (ſaid ſhe unto me) what's the reaſon you viſit me at ſuch a Time, when none ſees me? It is, Madam, (ſaid I, ſaluting her, and coming to her with all reverence) becauſe Diophantes thought it juſt to permit me ſo much honour as to ſee you, and bid you adieu, before I went unto Milete. As I had not ſeen her ſince I was choſen for that Negotiation, ſhe ſeemed to be very much joyed at the Honour which was done me, and commanded a Chair to be given me; ſhe expreſſed much Civility unto me concerning that Buſineſs. If my adored Teleſile had expreſſed ſo much Joy in her Eyes, for any good Fortune which had arrived unto me, without ſuch a diſmal ſeparation from her, I ſhould have received it with extream delight, and eſteemed my ſelf moſt happy; but ſince my Paſſion thought her ſomething cruel, in rejoicing at that which deprived me of her Preſence, I anſwered her Complements only with Sighs: Madam, ſaid I unto her, you are extreamly good to rejoice at any thing which is advantageous unto me; but I do not know whether you would be as ſenſible of my bad Fortune, as you ſeem to be of my Good. You ſuſpect my Generoſity (replied ſhe, ſmiling) ſince you think that I will intereſt my ſelf only in the good fortune of my Friends. Truly Thimocrates, (added ſhe, and ſweetly chiding me) you take my rejoicing at your good Fortune in ſo bad a ſenſe, that if any averſe Accident happen unto you, I think I may, without injuſtice, not be ſorry for it; and I am a little angry that it will be a long time before I can be revenged upon you after that manner; for you are going to a Place where you will have much Applauſe; you will return back hither, after you have acquitted your ſelf as worthy of that Emploiment which is conferred upon you with abundance of Honour. But ſince I cannot revenge my ſelf, by not taking any part in your Misfortunes, perhaps I ſhall do it, in not taking any part of your Joy. Since Revenge is ſecret, (replied I unto her) and ſince I ſee you would puniſh me, I will afford you a moſt fit Subject, and tell you, that I am at this preſent the moſt miſerable of all Men living. The moſt miſerable! (replied ſhe craftily) for ſhe perceived that I intended to ſpeak concerning my Paſſion, (which ſhe had formerly obſerved). If you be ſo, then do not acquaint me with your Misfortune; for I do not hate you enough to rejoice at it, nor can I at this time grieve at it without the hazard of my Health; which ſince you are very generous, I hope you will conſider it. I then ſaid, Truly, Madam, (replied I) when I told you that you would ſhare only in my good Fortunes, but not in my bad: But ſince I have not ſo much Vanity as to think that my moſt violent Sorrows, will move any other than ſlight Ones in you, I will diſcover ſome part of my Miſfortunes unto you. Then you are fuller of Revenge than I am, (replied ſhe) for I do preſently repent of my intentions to be revenged, and you do perſiſt to puniſh me for a thing which I did but one minute think upon. I do intend no Revenge or Puniſhment, Madam, (ſaid I unto her) but on the contrary, I endeavour to give you an account of it. No, Thimocrates, ſaid ſhe unto me, I would not have you acquaint me with any thing, which may be diſadvantagious unto you. Doubtleſs (ſaid I unto her) you do already know that which cauſeth my Miſfortune, and I have told it unto you ſince I came hither. If you did tell it unto me (ſaid ſhe, in great amazement) then I did not underſtand you. Pardon me, Madam, (replied I) for you gave me an anſwer unto it. Then ſurely I do not remember it, (ſaid ſhe) and certainly it is no great Misfortune, ſince it made no deeper impreſſion in my Memory. Hence it is, Madam, ſaid I unto her, that my departure is ſo indifferent unto you. You know, ſaid ſhe, that I uſed ſome expreſſions of joy at it. You would have done me a greater favour (ſaid I unto her, and bluſhed) if you had been troubled at it; and it were more equitable to lament the Ill you have cauſed, than to rejoice at the Good which you did not cauſe. O, Thimocrates, (ſaid ſhe unto me) I will not ſhare either in your Joys or Sorrows, for I perceive you ſpeak not ſeriouſly. Madam, (ſaid I unto her) you cannot, without doing me manifeſt wrong, think, but that I ſpeak with all poſſible ſincerity, when I do aſſure you, that I ſhall depart from you with ſuch exceſſive ſorrow, as cannot be compared unto any thing, but the ſame Paſſion which cauſed it.

Teleſile ſtood amazed at my Diſcourſe, but deſiring to turn it into a piece of Railery; Thimocrates, (ſaid ſhe unto me, laughing) I ſee you are in the faſhion, and as other young Gallants of your Age and Quality in Delphos, do uſe, you muſt make a ſhew as if you did not hate me. But know, I beſeech you, that I did never contribute any thing unto your Humour: and that I do know my ſelf too well to believe any ſuch things; and for your particular, I do eſteem you ſo much, that I will not believe you: for Thimocrates, if I ſhould once believe you were in earneſt, I ſhould then accord your Company, which yet is delightful unto me: therefore, if the ſight of me do give you any ſatisfaction, deſiſt from that which will be prejudicial unto you, and counterfeit Affection no longer. I do not counterfeit (ſaid I unto her) but tell you a moſt certain Truth, when I tell you, that my Soul loves you more than all the reſt of your Lovers, put them all together. Since my Father (replied Teleſile) did not give you any permiſſion to talk of any ſuch things, I think I may, without any incivility, deſire you, either to change your Diſcourſe, or elſe to make haſte, and take your leave. That is a moſt cruel Word (ſaid I unto her) and I will defer it as long as I can; if it be poſſible I can do it at all, and not die. As ſhe was about to anſwer me, and aſſumed a more ſerious Countenance, which made me tremble, Atalia, the Siſter of Androclides, came in: Siſter (ſaid Atalia unto her, for ſo they called one another) I did think that I only ſhould have enjoyed that priviledg which you were pleaſed to grant me, of ſeeing you whilſt you continued ill: and yet though I perceive that Thimocrates enjoys that happineſs as well as I, I will not be jealous. There is this difference betwixt you two, (anſwered Teleſile) that you are here by my own Conſent, and Thimocrates is here by the Conſent of my Father. Since it is ſo (replied Atalia) I am very well ſatisfied; So am not I, (replied I) but on the contrary, ſhall lament my departure from Delphos: You have no reaſon to do ſo, replied Atalia, ſince this Voyage will prefer you unto Honour. I do not value that at all, replied I. You have no reaſon to do ſo (anſwered Teleſile, who durſt hardly look upon me) ſince there is nothing which ought to be ſo dear unto you. After this, two of her Couſins entred, and I was obliged to go away. But when Teleſile, who would not be uncivil before thoſe Ladies, brought me to her Chamber-door, Madam, ſaid I unto her, in a low Voice, if I do not die with Sorrow, during my Journey, my Heart ſhall return full of the ſame Paſſion which at this departure it is poſſeſſed with. I wiſh your Voyage may be proſperous, (ſaid ſhe unto me, bluſhing); and I wiſh (ſaid ſhe, in a low Voice) you may return wiſer than you ſeem to be at parting, to the end Teleſile may for ever eſteem you, as according to your Merit ſhe ever did. She ſpoke with ſuch a modeſt Air, ſeeming to be neither ſerious nor in jeſt, that I knew not well how to reſent it: So that from the time of parting, I found my Heart ſo extreamly troubled, as that for many hours after I could not think upon any thing. But the next Morning I departed in ſuch deſpair, as is not expreſſible; for every ſtep being farther from Teleſile, I was ſenſible of ſo much ſorrow as none can imagine, who never had trial of the like Miſery; Queſtionleſs it was much advantagious unto me, that my Inſtructions were in writing, ſince certainly I ſhould have very ill acquitted my ſelf of my Commiſſion, if they had truſted unto my Memory. Teleſile was all my Thoughts. I conſidered how I left the Siſter of Androclides in her Chamber; how I had left an infinite number of her Lovers at Delphos: My Imagination did preſent every one of them unto me, both the Rich and the Poor Ones, the Handſom and Ill-favoured; not one of them, but ſometimes I did fear them; in ſuch a cruel manner does abſence make every thing appear. When I was in Delphos, my Soul found ſometimes ſome Tranquillity; for when I was with my amiable Teleſile, I was not unhappy; and when I was not with her, yet I knew where ſhe was, what ſhe ſaid, how ſhe did: So that, if Androclides ſhould not ſee her more than I did, I ſhould not have cared for any others; for he was the richeſt, and more welcome than all the reſt. But when I began to conſider, that it was abſolutely impoſſible for me to know how ſhe did, I was then moſt extreamly melancholy: I conceited her in the Mornings to be in the Temple, waited upon by Troops of Rivals; in the Afternoon I did imagine her to be diſcourſing with them, and they with her: at Night, methought I ſaw her talk of all the Paſſages in the Day: but of all the four and twenty Hours, I could not find one Minute wherein I could reaſonably hope ſhe ever thought upon me. Thus did I live, without any Conſolation, until I began to think that Meleſander was returned unto Delphos; for this, I confeſs, I began ſometimes to chear up my ſelf in the thought, that this officious Friend would ſometimes ſpeak unto her concerning me, ſince at my departure I left a Letter for him which deſired as much. But although this thought produced ſome ſweet Minutes, yet it was ſeconded by others of a more bitter Temper; for I had ſuch an extream deſire to know, how ſhe would ſpeak concerning me unto Meleſander, after I had diſcovered my Paſſion unto her, that it did make me moſt melancholy and reſtleſs: I could meet with nothing that was pleaſing or ſutable unto me; my Inclination was ſo diſpoſed unto choler, that the leaſt Fault of my Servant did at this time anger me more than the Greateſt would at another: and if Love had not ſomething tempered me, and told me that I muſt acquit my ſelf of my Imployment with ſome Honour, certainly I ſhould have rendred but a ſtrange Account of my Negotiation: but when I conſidered, that the Honour which might accrue unto me by it, might render me more in favour with Teleſile, I began to rouze up my Spirits, and no ſooner arrived at Melete, but began to tranſact with as much alacrity and diligence as was poſſible. I will not inſiſt upon the Paſſages of this great Buſineſs, ſince it would be too long to relate, and is not at all pertinent unto the Story of my Love, which is the only thing I aim at. Give me leave to tell you only thus much, that notwithſtanding all my Cares, I was two whole Months in Milete, and heard not any News from Delphos, becauſe the Winds were continually contrary for any Navigation; I thought at firſt that my Sorrows would diminiſh, but yet my Soul would not ſuffer them; for I found that time did more augment my Melancholy: and certainly thoſe Paſſions which leſſen by long abſence, are of a mean quality, and never knew extreams. Whenſoever the wiſe Thales, with whom I tranſacted againſt the oppoſite Faction, told me of any obſtacle in our Affairs, I appeared to be ſo extreamly troubled at it, that this wiſe Man, who could not dive into my Heart, did think me the moſt ambitious Man of Honour in the World, and the beſt Agent that ever could be choſen. When it pleaſed the Fates that I had happily finiſhed all my Buſineſs, I departed from Milete, and returned to Delphos: And if it become me to ſay it, I got Honour enough, by the Tranſaction of that important Affair; the wiſe Thales did me the Favour to write unto the Amphictions in my behalf, and in ſuch a manner as was very advantagious for me, ſo that I had very good cauſe of rejoycing; but my Soul was accuſtomed unto Melancholy, that it could not reliſh any manner of Joy; for amidſt my hopes of ſeeing Teleſile again, my fears to find ſome alteration in her Fortune, which might prove diſadvantageous unto me, did infinitely trouble me; notwithſtanding, when I did imagine I ſhould ſee her, and that mine Eyes ſhould again incorporate with hers, I was infinitely pleaſed. In ſhort, to abreviate my Diſcourſe, I arrived at Delphos, but it was ſo late, that my Father was in Bed; ſo that I went to lie with Meleſander, in hopes to hear ſome news of Teleſile: and ſince he kept no very good Hours, I went into his Chamber; this pleaſing ſurpriſe cauſed him to imbrace me with extream joy, and I him with no leſs: But yet not knowing what I ſhould hear concerning Teleſile, I durſt not much rejoice: I looked in his Eyes for that which was in mine own, and after I deſired him to bid his Servants retire; Well, Meleſander, (ſaid I unto him) is Teleſile the ſame ſhe was? Is ſhe as fair as ever? Has not my abſence been favourable unto ſome of my Rivals? I have ſo many Things to tell you (anſwered he) that I know not where to begin: And there has been ſuch Alterations in your Affairs, that you will much wonder at them.

Ah Meleſander (ſaid I unto him) tell me quickly in groſs what they are? But if Teleſile be either dead or married, tell me only that I muſt die, to the end my Deſpair may laſt no longer. Teleſile, replied he, is living, and as fair as ever, neither is ſhe yet married unto any of your Rivals. This Anſwer having calmed my Soul, and being now only inquiſitive to know what this alteration might be, I underſtood, that as ſoon as I departed all my Rivals rejoyced at my Abſence, tho the cauſe of it did trouble them, becauſe indeed I was the Rival they moſt feared: amongſt the reſt Androclides was well pleaſed at it; yet, ſaid Meleſander unto me, ſince his Mind is divided between the hoped-for Riches of Teleſile, and her Beauty, he deſired his Siſter to ſolicite as much as ſhe could againſt all his Rivals, and to prepare the Mind of Teleſile for him as well as ſhe could, and without telling her the true ground of his Affection, he did deſire her to protract the buſineſs as long as ſhe could. But the truth is, altho he was in love with Teleſile, yet he deſired not to marry her until Crantor had ſetled his Eſtate upon her; as he had hoped he would by the Solicitations of his Siſter, who was very frequently with him. But to make you better underſtand (O my equitable Judg!) all that Meleſander told me, be pleaſed to know that Atalia, who loved the Riches of Crantor, as well as her Brother, did make as if ſhe believed that Androclides deſired her to ſolicite for him only out of his Affection unto Teleſile, and that being ſo paſſionate as he was, he would marry her either poor or rich; ſo that ſhe having obſerved that Crantor was moſt ſenſibly moved at her Beauty (for indeed ſhe was very fair) ſhe omitted nothing that might win upon the Heart of a covetous Man; ſhe diſcourſed with him concerning nothing but Houſhold-Matters; ſhe would chide him for his ſuperfluous Expences, and ſeemed to affect all the Delectations which Men of his Age and Diſpoſition uſe; inſomuch as Crantor eſteemed her as ſhe deſired, and propounded Marriage unto her. Atalia, who was not very rich, being Siſter unto Androclides by the Mother's ſide, did hearken unto the Propoſition, and asked Counſel of none, but aſſuring Crantor of her Conſent; ſhe ſent unto Androclides in the Morning to come and ſpeak with her: Brother, ſaid ſhe unto him, as ſoon as he came into her Chamber, if it be really true that you love Teleſile, I have great News to tell you, for the truth is I know of an infallible way how you may marry her, if you pleaſe: Dear Siſter (ſaid he unto her) how infinitely ſhould I be obliged unto you, if by your frequent Converſation with Crantor, you could move him to do that which in all reaſon he ſhould. I ask your Pardon (ſaid he unto her) for cauſing you to keep company ſo much with a Man of his Years, whoſe Humours cannot be any thing agreeable or pleaſant unto you. Brother (ſaid ſhe) I perceive you do not underſtand the way how you may marry Teleſile, nor do you know what I would do to compaſs it; and therefore I will tell you, that it cannot be brought about, unleſs I ſacrifice my ſelf for you, and deprive my ſelf of all manner of Pleaſures in this World. I ſhould be moſt unhappy, replied Androclides, if my Felicity ſhould make you unfortunate; but yet what odd way is this, which I cannot imagine? It is (ſaid ſhe, bluſhing, and half laughing) that Crantor being perſwaded I am rich, would marry me. Androclides was ſo amazed at this, that he thought he had miſtaken her. Would Crantor (ſaid he) marry you? What does he intend by that? He intends, ſaid ſhe unto him, to marry Teleſile unto you, as ſoon as he hath married me; ſo that Brother, your good Fortune does at preſent abſolutely depend upon my Will; for if I do ſatisfy his Paſſion, he aſſures me he will ſatisfy yours; and he will move Diophantes to give Teleſile unto you: Brother (purſued ſhe) to marry a Man of his Age and Humour, is a thing which I can never do without great Repugnancy; yet my Love to you is ſo prevalent, that I will maſter my Averſion towards him, and I do aſſure you, that the Delight which you will receive by enjoying Teleſile, will comfort me much more than all the Treaſures of Crantor. Whilſt Atalia ſpoke thus unto him, he was ſo aſtoniſhed, that he knew not what to anſwer; and ſince he was much troubled to make his Siſter underſtand, that Avarice had as great poſſeſſion of his Soul as Love, he went very ſubtilly to work. Dear Siſter, ſaid he unto her, I ſhall never give my Conſent that you ſhould make your ſelf unhappy, all the days of your Life, for the Love of me; and altho I do paſſionately love Teleſile, yet I will never marry her upon ſuch Conditions as that you ſhall marry Crantor. Brother, ſaid ſhe unto him, if there were any other Remedy for your Diſeaſe, I ſhould never have recourſe unto this; but ſince there is none, I am reſolved to be generous, and oblige you whether you will or no; I know very well, ſaid ſhe further, that you wiſh in your Heart, that I were already the Wife of Crantor, ſo you might marry Teleſile, and that it is out of a Complement you are oppoſite to that which you think will not pleaſe me; for I cannot think you believe me ſo baſe, as to imagine more Satisfaction in the Riches of Crantor, than I expect Melancholy in his Diſpoſition; ſo that being perſwaded you cannot be happy but by my means, therefore I am reſolved to contribute unto your Happineſs without your Conſent. O dear Siſter, anſwered he, I will never ſuffer it; do you not conſider the extream old Age of Crantor, his Humours, and his covetous Diſpoſitions?

Brother, ſaid ſhe, I will never think upon any thing but the admirable Beauty of Teleſile, the enjoyment of whom, will make you eternally happy. Androclides even deſperate to hear Atalia talk ſo, told her, that ſince it was her own Intereſt which moved her unto this, he deſired her to conſider, how in marrying Crantor ſhe would infinitely diſpleaſe Teleſile, ſince ſhe prevented her from being the richeſt Match in all Phocides. For my part, Siſter, ſaid he unto her, I ſhould find Happineſs enough in the Beauty of Teleſile, but I knew not whether ſhe would find it without the Treaſures of Crantor, and whether ſhe will not be revenged upon me for the Prejudice you ſhould do her? No, no (replied Atalia) for ſince Teleſile has not a covetous Soul, ſhe will not care ſo much as you think for that loſs, but rather be glad to find ſuch a Fortune as yours. So that all the Evil in it will only reflect upon me; all the hope is, it will not continue long. Androclides uſed many Arguments to diſſwade, and Atalia to perſwade, whilſt neither of them expreſſed their real Thoughts, but both endeavouring to deceive each other; and thus they parted, Androclides conjuring his Siſter not to conſent unto the Marriage, and ſhe ſaying that ſhe was reſolved upon it. Afterwards, ſince ſhe was abſolute Miſtreſs of Crantor's Mind, ſhe ſent to deſire him that he would come unto her, and ſhe carried the matter ſo cunningly, that ſhe perſwaded him to marry her without any Ceremony, by reaſon of Diophantes; and ſince Androclides, her Brother, intended to marry his Neece, ſhe did not need to ask his Conſent: So that without any longer delay, he married her the next Morning in the preſence of five or ſix Perſons who had dependance upon himſelf, and the next day following carried her into the Country, to avoid all ſuch Talk as uſes to be of ſuch Marriages. Mean while Androclides was extreamly troubled at it, and the Star-like Eyes of Teleſile could not comfort him; but when he underſtood the buſineſs was paſt, he fell into an inconceivable Diſpair. Yet ſince he did not abſolutely believe it, he went unto a Friend of his, who often viſited Teleſile, to enquire the certainty of it; and found there more than he expected, for Teleſile was there alſo, being come to enquire of Crantor's Marriage: That which was moſt obſervable, was, that Androclides ſeemed more troubled at it than Teleſile, whoſe generous Soul ſtood unſhaken at the Accident; and whoſe Mind was ſo free as to obſerve, that the Sorrows of Androclides were grounded upon an Intereſt: he addreſſed himſelf unto her amazedly, and deſired her not to think that he was acceſſory unto his Siſter's deſign, but would have prevented it if he could. I believe it (anſwered Teleſile coldly) and I know you well enough to make any doubt of it. But Androclides, ſaid ſhe, ſince the fair Atalia your Siſter, is perhaps more joyed to have gotten the Wealth of Crantor, than I am ſorry for the loſs of it, I do conceive it more juſt for you to go and rejoyce with her, than to ſtay here and trouble your ſelf with me, who I aſſure you has Patience and Reaſon enough about me, to endure as great a Misfortune as this is. It ſeems, ſaid Androclides, that I am more ſenſible of your Misfortunes than you your ſelf is. It ſeems alſo, replied ſhe, that your Diſpoſition and mine is different, and therefore do not look upon things after the ſame manner. Teleſile did not intend any long Viſit, and therefore ſhe returned home, where ſhe found Diophantes and Taxale extreamly troubled at the News which they had heard of. This wiſe young Lady did comfort them as well as ſhe could; and tho ſhe was ſenſible enough of the loſs, yet ſhe deſired them not to reſent it ſo deeply, aſſuring them for her part, that ſhe had no ſuch kind of Ambition, ſhe would not be troubled at all for it, ſo they would chear up themſelves. In the mean time, all the Lovers of Teleſile were much ſurprized; thoſe who were not rich, durſt not think any more of marrying one who was not, leſt they ſhould make both her and themſelves miſerable; they imagined alſo that ſhe would not conſent unto it, there being greater Reaſon why a Woman which is rich ſhould marry a compleat Man who hath little, than that two Perſons of Quality who are both poor, ſhould marry together. But as for Androclides, tho he was very rich, yet ſince he found a great alteration in the Fortunes of Teleſile, he found an alteration in her alſo; yet he was aſhamed to make his appear unto the World at firſt, and truly he did affect her with as much Love as he was capable of, and therefore he did viſit her according to his uſual Cuſtom, and found all his Rivals there alſo; for never was any ſo much pitied as ſhe was upon this occaſion, and they could not have ſhared deeper in her Sorrows, if ſhe had loſt all that was dear unto her: But yet within a few days after, Viſits were not ſo frequent, and amongſt the reſt, Androclides did often balk the Houſe, and when he did ſtep in to ſee her, he ſpoke only concerning things indifferent; and one day, pumping for a handſom pretence to eſtrange himſelf the more, he told her, that he obſerved Diophantes her Father did of late ſalute him very coldly, and as he heard, he uſed to ſpeak very ill concerning Atalia, who was his Siſter, and it therefore reflected upon him.

Androclides (ſaid Teleſile unto him, who knew the real reaſon of this Exception) you need not trouble your ſelf ſo much as to ſeek for any pretence to cloak your Deſires of ſeeing me no more; it is free for every one to follow his own Inclination; and ſince I know you cannot love the faireſt Woman upon Earth unleſs ſhe be rich; ſo my Humour is ſomething contrary to yours, for I cannot love the richeſt Man in all Greece, if he be not owner of a Soul which ſoars higher than his Riches: So that I think it will be advantagious to us both, if you deſiſt from offering, out of a falſe kind of Generoſity, your Complements unto one who has loſt all that can make her amiable in your Eye. Androclides was ſo ſurprized at the freedom of Teleſile's Diſcourſe, that he began to proteſt, his Thoughts were all contrary to what ſhe ſaid, but it was with ſuch a forced Air, and in ſo many ambiguous words, as if he feared to ſpeak too much, or engage himſelf further than he had a Mind. Teleſile then looking upon him with a ſcornful kind of Smile; No, no, Androclides (ſaid ſhe unto him) diſſemble it no longer, and leave me at liberty to enjoy a Treaſure which I prefer before ſuch things as moſt moves your Diſpoſition, I mean a Liberty to enjoy my Thoughts alone. Androclides taking opportunity by the topping, made uſe of this occaſion, and quite left off his Viſits, as many others beſides did; ſo that within a ſhort time the Houſe of Diophantes was as ſolitary as before it was tumultuous, and full of People. Teleſile wondered at the weakneſs of Men; and when ſhe beheld her ſelf in a Glaſs, ſhe asked her ſelf whether or no her Beauty changed; but finding the ſame Eyes, the ſame Complexion, and the ſame in every thing ſhe was before, ſhe began to receive ſo great an Averſion againſt all Men, that ſhe was very glad to be rid of their Company. But ſince the noiſe of this Alteration was high in every quarter of the Town, Diophantes, to leſſen it, went into the Country. So that when I was returned unto Delphos, I found her not in it; and I was informed by Meleſander of all this I have related nnto you. This Abſence ſat ſadly upon my Soul, for I fancied ſuch hopes of my ſeeing Teleſile again, that the privation of ſuch a Happineſs made me not ſenſible of that Joy I might well apprehend, in underſtanding I was rid of all my Rivals, and in hopes that hereafter Teleſile would look upon me more than before; for certainly I did as much rejoyce at her Poverty, as Androclides did grieve at it, becauſe I thought it a fit occaſion, to let her know the greatneſs of my Love: But when I conſidered that ſhe was not in Delphos, Hopes extinguiſhed, and Fears revived in my Soul; I apprehended, that the buſineſs of ſome Men might make her hate all, and I could not find any ſatisfaction in any thing. The next Morning I rendred an account of my Imployment, and received all the Applauds from the Amphictions which could poſſibly be hoped for: My Father was ſo well pleaſed with me, that he expreſſed many marks of Affection: All my Friends did upon this occaſion viſit me. And had I not been in love, doubtleſs I had found Subjects of Joy enough; but Abſence from Teleſile did imbitter all my Joys, and the deſire I had to teſtify unto her, that I was not of the Humour of thoſe Men who had forſaken her, did trouble me much, as if ſome grand Misfortune had happened unto me. During all this time, I could not endure the Company of any but Meleſander, becauſe I could not freely diſcourſe of my Love with any elſe, and becauſe he was ſo complacential as to hear me favourably, which queſtionleſs is one of the moſt ſenſible Conſolations, one who is abſent from her he loves, can enjoy; but after I had ſighed away many a day, Diophantes returned, and brought Teleſile with him, who was fully reſolved to avoid the Converſation of Men, as much as Civility would permit her. I no ſooner heard ſhe was returned to Delphos, but I went unto Diophantes, who entertained me with much Generoſity; Taxile did the like, and ſo did her adored Daughter, yet with this alteration, her Civility was more ſerious and cold than formerly. Yet notwithſtanding I was ſo over-joyed to ſee her, and to find her without any of my old Rivals, that I made no Reflection upon it until after I was gone. This firſt Viſit laſted not long, for ſince they came in late, it was neither Diſcretion nor Manners to ſtay any longer with them. So that I told Teleſile only with my Eyes that I loved her, who would neither underſtand nor anſwer me in that Language which ſhe her ſelf firſt taught me. But when I was returned unto my Chamber, the faint

Coldneſs of Teleſile troubled me, and I imagined that perhaps ſhe was offended at my Diſcourſe with her at my departure; yet I hoped that my conſtant perſeverance might win upon her. The next Morning I did as I was accuſtomed, before I went unto Milett, which was, to go unto the Temple, where I knew ſhe would be. There I found Androclides, and the greateſt part of thoſe who loved her, before my departure; but they had all of them changed their places, for whereas they were wont to ſit cloſe unto certain Pillars of Marble, cloſe unto Teleſile, where I firſt ſaw her, they now diſperſed themſelves into ſeveral other Seats; yet I, who not like them, was no Changling, did ſeat my ſelf as I uſed, in a place where I might ſee her, and ſhe me: at the firſt ſhe took no notice of me, becauſe ſhe was intent upon her Devotions unto the Gods, but afterwards ſhe turned her Eyes towards me, and I ſaluted her with ſuch Reverence, as might make it appear I was in love with her. Teleſile returned my Complement with a bluſh; and me thought ſhe looked Androclides in the Eyes, as if ſhe would thereby tell that all the World had not rejected her; and indeed her Looks had ſuch an Influence, that tho her Action was without any deſign, yet Androclides changed both Colour and Place, and immediately went out of the Temple, as one that was aſhamed of his Baſeneſs, and would have been very glad if I had been as unworthy as himſelf. I underſtood afterwards that the conſtancy of my Affection, had almoſt made him renew his, and conquered his covetous Inclination.

But yet in Concluſion, he was contented to ſhun Teleſile, and me both. For my part I let ſlip no opportunity of ſeeing her I loved; and it had been very difficult for her not to do me ſo much favour, as to make a difference betwixt me and thoſe who had caſt her off; yet notwitſtanding, ſhe was ſo abſolutely reſolved to love none at all, that ſhe did treat me with much Indifferency. Thus did I live a long while, and could not find a fit opportunity to talk in private with her, becauſe ſhe her ſelf took away all occaſions of it: But at the laſt

I met her on the Banks of the River Cephiſts, which runs by Delphos, where all the Ladies of the Town uſed to walk, and left their Coaches at the end of a large Meadow, ſet round with Mirtles, moſt delectable; there ſhe was with two others of her Friends, who after they had taken a turn or two, did meet with ſome Men of their Acquaintance, who led them by the Hand, whilſt I did the like unto Teleſile, and could diſcourſe with her without being underſtood by any but her ſelf: for the Freedom is greater at Delphos than at Athens, or Corinth, by reaſon of the multitude of Strangers which reſort thither, and do inſenſibly introduce the Cuſtoms of their Country. But O Heavens, how was I gravelled when I offered to begin Diſcourſe! I no ſooner reſolved to ſpeak one thing, than I contradicted it, ſo that we walked a long while without a word between us both: but in Concluſion, my Paſſion ſpurring me up, I began with a Sigh, and ſaid; I wiſh the Gods were pleaſed, adored Teleſile, you underſtood the Thoughts of my Heart without my Tongue, and that you gueſs'd how much I adore you. I can eaſily ſatisfy your Wiſh, ſaid ſhe unto me, for I am ſo very well acquainted with the Hearts of all Men, that I muſt needs know yours.

O Madam, ſaid I, make no cruel Compariſons, nor, I beſeech you, confound Androclides and Thimocrates together. Androclides, ſaid ſhe, is thought to be very prudent; and Thimocrates, ſaid I, is very amorous. Thimocrates, replied ſhe, can perhaps diſſemble better than others, but for all that his Soul is ſubject to the ſame Imperfections that other Men are, who begin to love, and never think upon it; continue it through Cuſtom, and end it out of an Humour, doing every thing without any Reaſon. O Madam (ſaid I unto her) how ill do you interpret Thimocrates, if you ſhould think ſo of him? For indeed, I muſt confeſs, that I began to love you whether I would or no, but I continue it both out of mine own free Diſpoſition and Reaſon: I departed from you as full of Paſſion as ever Man did, I endured that cruel Abſence with unimaginable Sorrow, and I return with Affection infinitely augmented; altho I thought it a thing moſt impoſſible, that my Love of you could admit of any increaeſe ſince the firſt minute I began to fix it upon you. Thimocrates, ſaid ſhe unto me, Androclides within theſe three Months would have ſaid the ſame unto all the Men of Delphos, when he ſpoke unto them concerning me: Moreover the ſuppoſed Beauty of Teleſile has now loſt all its Charms, ſince Crantor has put her out of any hopes of his Riches. The reaſon why Androclides loved Teleſile (ſaid I unto her) was the Riches of another, but I adore her for her own Riches: No, no, Divine Lady, ſaid I, it is thoſe Eyes, it is that Mind which I regard, and indeed it is only your own Merit which I love, which I ſerve, and which I will adore as long as I live. Beauty, Thimocrates, ſaid ſhe unto me, tho I were Owner of it, yet it is a thing which is as ſoon loſt as any thing elſe; ſo that tho your Soul is not ſenſible of any ſuch ſordid Paſſion, as to prefer Riches before Honour and Vertue; yet I have no good aſſurance of your Affection, and I am perſwaded that you will do that hereafter out of Weakneſs and Inconſtancy, which Androclides has done out of Covetouſneſs. No, Divine Teleſile, anſwered I, you do not know me; yet to be ſincere unto you, I do confeſs that the loſs of your Beauty would be an inconceivable Grief unto me, but it would be in relation to your ſelf, not that it is abſolutely neceſſary to keep in the Fire of Affection which is throughly kindled in my Heart; but I look further, and I find ſo rich a Beauty in your Mind, moſt charming Lady, that altho thoſe glorious Flames in your Eyes were extinguiſhed, yet your Soul has Beauty enough to raviſh mine, altho you were not fair at all; but Teleſile has yet ſeen ſo little of the Springtime of her Beauty, that it is a long time till the Autumn. It is for want of Experience (ſaid ſhe, ſmiling) that I ought to diſtruſt my ſelf: And therefore Thimocrates, not to deceive you, I pray you know this, that how courſly ſoever Fortune has treated me, yet will I carry it as highly as ever, and will be much more hard to be perſwaded than before: I ſuſpect all Men, and my ſelf alſo; therefore give over your Deſign, if you will be ruled by me: and I conceive you may do it without any Diſhonour; for when one runs away with a croud, (ſaid ſhe laughing) he hides his flight amongſt the reſt: but if you ſhall perſiſt in your Courtſhip of me, and afterwards make a retreat, you will then be taxed with abſolute inconſtancy: Give over then, Thimocrates, go, and leave Teleſile at reſt: for ſhe will neither love, nor be loved; ſhe thinks her ſelf ſo Rich in her own Vertue, that ſhe deſires no more. You ſhall poſſeſs my Heart (ſaid I unto her) whether you will or no. I ſhall know that (ſaid ſhe ſmiling) whether you will or no. And ſo mixing with the reſt of the Company, we walked on, and I had not any opportunity to ſpeak any more in private with her; and my mind was ſo buſy with thinking whether I had cauſe of Hopes or Fears, that I knew not what any ſaid. But to ſhorten my diſcourſe, I ſhall in few Words tell you, that the hundred thouſand Services and Sollicitations which I rendred unto Teleſile, moved ſome acceptance of them; ſhe knew that her Father would not diſlike of my Affection; and ſhe her ſelf did ſo like of my Proceedings and Addreſſes to her, that ſhe entertained them with as much Acknowledgment, as ſhe ſcorned them that had forſaken her. In a word, I arrived unto ſuch a happy Condition with her, that ſhe believed I loved her, and gave me leave to tell her as much.

In the mean while, Androclides, ſince he could not endure the Sight, either of Teleſile or Me, went into the Country, and ſo in time many others of her former Lovers, ſo that I thought my ſelf in a very happy Condition: for I ſaw Teleſile every Day, and ſhe was ſo kind as to ſeem as if I were welcome: ſhe had not directly told me that ſhe loved me; but as I one Day took an occaſion to ſpeak with her, ſhe told me that there was News abroad which would make Androclides hate her more than he did; which was, that Atalia was like to bring forth a Succeſſor unto Crantor, and it was true, but ſhe looked ſo attentively upon me when ſhe told it, as if ſhe would find the bottom of my Heart by the colour in my Face. No, no, ſaid I unto her, ſubtile Teleſile, you cannot find any thing in my Face which does not ſpeak the real Thoughts of my Heart; and you ſhall never find any thing in my Heart, which ſhall make me unworthy of yours. I wiſh I may not, ſaid ſhe haſtily: She had no ſooner pronounced this laſt Word, but ſhe bluſhed as if ſhe had committed a Crime, and endeavoured to mitigate that obliging Interpretation which I might have made upon it, but it was with ſuch a pleaſing Confuſion, that I placed that minute in the Number of the moſt happy ones that ever I had in my Life. But Heaven knows it was ſeconded with as great a Misfortune, as I thought that a Happineſs: for I was no ſooner at my Lodging, but my Father ſent for me, and told me that he ſtood in great need of my company in a Journey which he intended in the Morning, and that I muſt prepare my ſelf for it. I endeavoured to excuſe it, but could not: but preſently after, I underſtood by Meleſander, that my Father did complain unto a Friend of his, of my love unto Teleſile, telling him, That he ſuffered it, as long as there was any Hopes of her being Rich; but that he would not ſuffer it now that Hope was taken away: ſo that when I had vanquiſhed the rigour of Teleſile, and was almoſt ſure of Diophantes his Conſent, unto whom I had made addreſſes by Meleſander, a new Obſtacle ſtarted up, and I muſt be ſenſible of all the horrid Rigors of a long Abſence: for, to depart from her one loves, is doubtleſs a great Miſery; but to depart from her one loves, who loves him again, is incomparably the moſt diſmal diſaſter that can poſſibly come unto a Man: yet notwithſtanding, I muſt prepare my ſelf for it, and go with my Father unto the furtheſt part of all Phocides, towards Megares. I knew not whether it were expedient to tell him that I took my leave of Teleſile: but depart we did, and during this Voyage, this misfortune happened, that the Commonwealth had given my Father ſuch an Imployment, as was exceedingly Beneficial, and augmented his Eſtate: ſo that I met with nothing but Obſtacle upon Obſtacle: and I was as much grieved at his good Fortune, as I could not be more, if the worſt had happened. During this time, my Father uſed all his

Arguments to avert my Love; and ſometimes alſo, I endeavoured as much as I could to perſwade him to prefer the Vertue of Teleſile before any thing elſe; but when I found that the more I teſtified my conſtancy, the more it retarded my return to Delphos; I diſſembled my Thoughts, and made him believe that abſence had wrought the cure upon my love-ſick Mind: But alas, how extreamly was he deceived in his belief, for I was never in my Life ſo deeply plunged in the gulf of Love, as when I knew that Teleſile loved me, and I underſtood by Meleſander, that my abſence much troubled her, and I fancied ſuch a Heaven of delight in ſeeing her again, that I thought upon nothing elſe. Yet I knew that my Father would not return to Delphos of a long time, if I did not very much think that I was abſolutely averted from Teleſile; Therefore I did vizard my Affection, and began to make frequent viſits, (for we were in a great and populous Town,) and I fixed upon one above the reſt who was indifferently fair: but yet I entertained not one thought of her which did leſſen my love of Teleſile: This Lady was of a moſt ſweet, but melancholy Compoſition, and by conſequence I could better think upon Teleſile when I was with her, than if ſhe had been ſprightly, and airy. Theſe Viſits produced thoſe Effects in the mind of my Father, which I expected; for now he thought I had quite forgotten Teleſile, ſince I was in love with Pheretime, for ſo was her Name. But ſince he did not approve of this ſecond Choice, no better than of the firſt, becauſe though Pheretime was of a noble Family, yet not ſo illuſtrious as he expected, therefore he reſolved to return unto Delphos: But although this harmleſs Diſſimulation wrought good Effects upon my Father, yet they produced bad ones upon Teleſile, (who as I came afterwards to know) was informed by the means of Androclides (ſhe not knowing it came from him) that I was deeply engaged with Pheretime: ſo that when I returned unto Delphos, I found an alteration in her Mind; and I underſtood by Meleſander, that for this fifteen Days ſhe could not endure to hear him talk of me as ſhe was accuſtomed: Diophantes alſo ſeemed to be changed as well as ſhe; for knowing that my Father was averſe to any Alliance with him, his mind was much troubled, ſo that for ſome certain Days, I was as miſerable as any Lover could be in the preſence of the Party loved: but at the laſt finding a fit opportunity to ſpeak unto her; What have I done Madam, (ſaid I unto her?) Has abſence removed me out of your Heart? are you culpable of the weakneſs which I have heard you condemn? Thimocrates, ſaid ſhe unto me, charge not me with your own Crimes, be contented that Teleſile does not complain of you, not but that ſhe hath ſufficient cauſe for it, but ſhe will not, becauſe ſhe is generous: Therefore, (ſaid ſhe with a forced ſigh) fear not, that my upbraidings of you ſhall moleſt that delight which you take in thinking upon Pheretime. Pheretime? (ſaid I in much amazement, and underſtanding then the cauſe of her Alteration.) Ah Madam! you do not know me, you do not know her, nor do you know your ſelf, if you can believe that I can think upon her when I ſee you: I ever thought upon you, Madam, when I ſaw Pheretime, nor did I ever think upon her ſince I came to Delphos: Oh Heavens, and moſt unjuſt Lady, ſaid I unto her, If he has wronged me, who muſt I require ſatisfaction from? for I never ſaw Pheretime, but only to that end I might the ſooner return unto Delphos, and ſee Teleſile! Then did I moſt ſincerely relate all the paſſage unto her; afterwards I beſeeched her to tell me who was her Informer of this falſe News: And after much praying, preſſing, conjuring, and importuning Teleſile, ſhe named the Perſon who informed her, and it appeared to be an eſpecial Friend unto Androclides. In the mean time, as my Heart was Innocent and Faithful, and all my Speeches unto her moſt true, I made my peace with Teleſile, inſomuch as ſhe did not at all ſuſpect my Conſtancy: but yet ſhe was very angry with her ſelf for ſeeming ſo jealous of me, which was the Reaſon that I did not find her Soul ſo free and quiet as it was wont to be, however I thought my ſelf extreamly happy, and I told Diophantes that I did not deſerve to be puniſhed for that Obſtacle which my Father did intend unto my Deſign. Now was there nothing which vexed me, but that againſt my Heart I muſt not viſit Teleſile ſo often, leſt my Father ſhould again ſend me away, as formerly he did; but although I did not go any more unto her Houſe, yet I did meet her in other Places, and ſaw her almoſt every Day. I did ſeveral times move her unto Marriage without the conſent of my Father; but ſhe was ſo Noble and Diſcreet, that ſhe would not permit it, and told that Diophantes her Father would be againſt it as well as ſhe, therefore ſhe thought it the beſt Courſe to wait patiently and quietly until the Heart of my Father altered. But I enjoyed not this Calm very long, for by ſome fantaſtical humour of Fate or other, we were almoſt continually ſeparated: one while a Friend of mine had a quarrel; and I in point of Honour muſt be his Second, which cauſed me to fly from Delphos: another while Diophantus was ſick in the Country, and Teleſile was with him: ſometimes Abſences did ariſe without any Reaſon or Ground in the World, as if Fortune had no other Deſign but to perſecute; ſome were long Abſences, ſome ſhort ones, ſome premeditated, ſome upon a ſudden: I no ſooner came unto Delphos, but went out of it; and ſhe no ſooner returned, but I went out: And it may be truly ſaid, that I never parted from her, but ſome Misfortune or other fell out: There was continually ſome little Quarrel or other between us, which Abſence was the cauſe of: and I remember one Day, I was ſo fantaſtical as to complain that I found her always too fair at my returns: for ſaid I unto her, My adored Teleſile, if my Abſence ſhould trouble you, as yours does me, I ſhould find the freſhneſs of your fair Complexion look more pale upon it, and ſhould ſee ſome Signs of Melancholy in your ſprightly Eyes, which would make me extreamly glad; whereas on the contrary I ſee a Joy which diſquiets me, fearing that my return is not the only cauſe of it. In a word, I had as much trial of Abſence in all its kinds, as ever Man had, and ſuffered as deeply as any Lover could do. But whether I was Abſent out of any advantageous Reaſon, or by reaſon of any angry accident, my Soul was never ſenſible either of Joy or Sorrow, which thoſe ſeveral

Cauſes might have moved: nor did I apprehend any other Motions in my Soul than ſuch as Love only was cauſe of: After more than a Months abſence, and a hundred thouſand Sorrows, I returned to Delphos, where I underſtood that Atalia the Siſter of Androclides, and Wife of Crantor, was Dead, in Child-bed of a Son, and that the Son alſo died a few Days after the Mother: ſo that Teleſile was in greater Hopes than ever, to be the richeſt Fortune in all Greece: for it ſeems that Crantor repented of his Marriage, and was not at all pleaſed with Atalia: ſo that now my Father could not upbraid me with the ſmall Portion of Teleſile any longer, but thought me moſt happy in my Choice: For my part I could never ſuſpect that ſhe would ſuffer the change of her Fortune to change her Mind, but I feared that Diophantes would to my prejudice take Exceptions againſt my Father; ſo that to make the more haſte, I went with poſt-ſpeed unto a houſe which my Father had, about two days Journey from Delphos, where then he was, with Intentions to acquaint him with my affection unto Teleſile; but as ill luck was, I could not find him there, but muſt wait eight Days before his return: for the Men he left at home, knew only when he would return, but not whither he was gone: At his return, I did acquaint him with my Buſineſs, and received an Anſwer according unto my Hopes, ſo that I returned unto Delphos the moſt ſatisfied Man in the World. I underſtood alſo when I came there, that Crantor was ſuddenly Dead; ſo that after I had firſt been at mine own Lodging, to put my ſelf in a Condition firſt to appear before Teleſile, I went unto her; but I was infinitely amazed to find almoſt all the Town there, and moſt eſpecially all my old Rivals, in the firſt rank of whom was Androclides: yet notwithſtanding ſince the Condition of Diophantes deſerved ſo much Civility, upon ſuch an occaſion of Mourning, I perſwaded my ſelf that it was their Buſineſs unto him, and not to her, who I thought they durſt never be ſo impudent as to ſpeak unto after ſo much ſlighting: but I was much deceived in my Conjectures, for as ſoon as the firſt Days of ceremonious Mourning were paſt, Teleſile was importuned by all thoſe who had before un-unworthily rejected her, and by ſome alſo who never thought upon her before.

Then did I engage Meleſander to ſpeak unto Diophantes, and tell him, That he might very well make a Difference between me and the reſt of Teleſile's Pretenders: But whether becauſe now the Choice being in him, he would not be too haſty, or becauſe he intended a Revenge upon my Father, he returned him a very cold anſwer, and would not give any conſent, but rather put me into deſpair: Yet had I ſo much Conſolation, as to find no alteration at all in Teleſile, but ſaw her ſcorn all thoſe whom her Fortunes, rather than her Beauty, had invited thither: Yet, as if Fortune would have it, there came at that Time to Delphos, a Man of great Quality, called Menecrates, who had been long in Travel, and at his return fell in Love with Teleſile; who having ſhare in the Crimes of the reſt, troubled me very much, for he was handſom, of an illuſtrious Family, and his Fortunes very Noble: Yet, notwithſtanding, Teleſile did behave her ſelf ſo wiſely, that the very ſight of her did diſſipate all my Fears, and gave me ſo much freedom of Spirit, as to laugh at the diſſembled Actions of all theſe unworthy Lovers, who were ſo much aſhamed, and whoſe Spirits were ſo dejected, that they durſt hardly ſpeak; but yet they waited upon her, and viſited her whether ſhe would or no. As for Androclides, he went more prudently to work, for he laboured more to gain Diophantes the Father, than to appeaſe the Diſpleaſure of the Daughter. I know not what Means he uſed, but I was told that he had ſo inſinuated himſelf into the favour of the Father, that there was great likelihood he ſhould ſhortly be the Husband of the Daughter. I went immediately unto her, in hopes to qualify my Fears, and to receive ſome freſh teſtimony of Affection from her, which might confirm me: but I found Androclides there; who being more confident, by reaſon of his hopes in Diophantes, did ſpeak unto her concerning his Paſſion, more openly than he did before the Death of Crantor. When I underſtood below, that he was alone with her, I went up in all haſte; and as ſoon as I came to the Chamber-door, ſtaid there, not well knowing whether I ſhould enter, or hearken; but the Door being open, and the

Hangings hiding me, I ſtaid to hear their Diſcourſe, and heard Teleſile ſay, in a ſharp Tone, No, Androclides, deceive not your ſelf, it is not I who ought to recompence you for all your Cares and Services; for it is not Teleſile whom you loved, nor who loves you, and therefore ſhe is not at all obliged unto you. When I heard this well-pleaſing Diſcourſe, I confeſs I reſolved not to enter ſo ſoon; and indeed I could never prefer any thing above the ſight of her I loved before this time. Then I heard Androclides tell her, that he valued not the Treaſures of Crantor, but only for the love of her. Rather ſay, for the love of your ſelf, replied Teleſile, and know, that though you ſhould imploy all your Life in perſwading me that you love me, I ſhould not believe it; No, no, Androclides, I value not my ſelf ſo low, as to accept of half a Heart; a Heart which has doted upon that which is unworthy to be put in the Ballance with Teleſile, and is the Object only of baſe Souls: Indeed, I ſhould ſooner pardon one that is unconſtant, who ſhould reject me for one that is fairer than my ſelf,than I would a covetous Wretch, who rejects me, becauſe I am not rich enough for his Deſire: For, confeſs the Truth, (ſaid ſhe unto him) if I ſhould be ſo fooliſh as to marry you, and ſhould afterwards, by any croſs Accidents, loſe all thoſe things which are the Baſis of your Affection; that I ſhould have neither any Lands, or Jewels, or Houſes, or Houſhold-ſtuff, but that Teleſile ſhould be without any of theſe Charms which you value moſt; confeſs the truth, I ſay, Androclides, would you love her ſtill? Doubtleſs I ſhould, anſwered he, in much amazement. I cannot believe it, (anſwered ſhe); but, Androclides, I will let you ſee that I am not guilty of that Crime with which you tax me, and that it is not the preſent condition of my Fortune, which moves me to ſpeak ſo violently; know therefore———

When Teleſile ſaid ſo, I confeſs my Heart began to beat, and I made ſuch a noiſe behind the Hangings, as I might well have been heard, if Teleſile had not been in paſſionate Choler, and Androclides amazed. But after I was quietly ſetled, I heard her purſue her Diſcourſe; Know therefore (ſaid ſhe) that it is not the alteration in my

Fortunes which moves me to treat you as I do; and though I were in the ſame Condition I was within this Month, yet ſhould I not pardon you for what you have done, for truly I can never marry any Man but ſuch an one as I eſteem; and I cannot eſteem that Man who loves me only for what I have, and for ſuch things as are below my ſelf. Teleſile had no ſooner ſaid this, but I fearing leſt Androclides ſhould by his Submiſſions molifie her, did haſtily enter into her Chamber; and ſo amazed my Rival, that he could not hanſomly recollect himſelf. Since what I had heard did fill my Heart with Joy, my Company, if I dare ſay it, was more pleaſant unto her than Androclides; for ſince he never loved her, but for by-Ends, his Reſentments of her Scorn were more groſs, and his Sorrows more apparent: his baſe behaviour before, alſo ſtruck him dumb, and did captivate his Spirits: for my part, I did imagin that I led him all that day in Triumph. Preſently after, there came in many Ladies, and in the general Diſcourſe, I ſpoke many ſtinging words concerning Androclides, and he anſwered me in ſuch a Language, in which he deſigned the like unto me, but knew not how, for he could not upbraid me with any thing, although I rubbed up a hundred ſeveral Truths which were very unpleaſant unto him. Teleſile took great delight to ſee me quip him in that manner; yet as ſhe was very prudent, ſo ſhe did divers times divert the Diſcourſe, fearing it might come to a ſharper Buſineſs: Not that ſhe thought I would be ſo uncivil as to quarrel with Androclides in that place; but becauſe ſhe imagined he would be eaſily nettled, ſince he was ſo culpable, and that the wittieſt and fineſt kind of Raillery, would incenſe him to become furious: and truly it was a difficult matter for me, in ſpite of all generoſity, not to inſult upon any unfortunate Rival that day. In going from Teleſile, he went to Diophantes, who was walking towards the Caſtalian Fountain: ſo that when I returned Home, I underſtood by Meleſander, that my Rivial was with the Father of my Miſtreſs, and I underſtood, the next Morning, that Diophantes, more valuing the great Eſtate of Androclides, than his rejecting of Teleſile, and perhaps excuſing his Inclination by his own, did abſolutely ly command his Daughter to look better upon Androclides; for indeed he was fully reſolved, ſhe ſhould either marry him or Menecrates. I came to know thus much, by one of her Women, which Meleſander helped me unto, who heard all the Diſcourſe between Diophantes and Teleſile: So that all the Hopes and Conſolation which I had, was only in Teleſile, who I knew very well did ſcorn Androclides, and did not love Menecrates, nor did ſhe hate me: All I feared was her great Vertue, which perhaps would not contradict the Commands of her Father; for that Woman which told me what Diophantes had ſaid unto his Daughter, did not tell me what Anſwer Teleſile returned, ſaying, that they ſpoke ſo low, ſhe could not underſtand it. I being then in this Condition, went one Evening unto Meleſander to conſult with him, What was the beſt Remedy againſt ſuch a Diſaſter. His Servants told me, that he was gone out to walk in a great Meadow behind the Temple of the Muſes: There I went alſo, but in lieu of finding my Friend, I found Androclides walking all alone: The Servants of Meleſander told me, ſo confidently, that their Maſter would be there: and it being ſomething dark, I alſo being prejudicated, miſtook him, and thought him to be Meleſander, ſo that coming cloſe to him, Muſt Teleſile, ſaid I unto him, be continually troubled with the covetous Androclides? Androclides (anſwered he, and knowing me by my Voice) will continually perſecute Teleſile, though it were to no other end but to perſecute Thimocrates: and Thimocrates (anſwered I, being extreamly ſurprized at my Miſtake) will quickly rid her, both of her Perſecutors and mine, when I ſhall pleaſe. In ſaying ſo, I laid my Hand on my Sword; and Androclides, without loſs of time, drawing his, and I mine after him, he fell fiercely upon me, pronouncing ſome words undiſtinctly which I could not underſtand. I ſhall not ſtand to particularize a Combate which was without Witneſſes, but leave you to judg by the Event, at what I did. Androclides was doubtleſs both gallant and well-skilled, ſo that if I had not been more fortunate then he, at this Bout doubtleſs I had been vanquiſhed: yet the Fight was not long, for being run through the Body, he fell, reeling as far as a little Gate of the Temple, which was never uſed, but upon certain Days of Sacrifice: I went unto him, thinking he was only wounded, and moving him to acknowledg the Advantage, I found he was without Motion, or any appearance of Life: yet in point of Generoſity, I would try whether there were any way of help unto him, whilſt Menecrates paſſed by, being waited upon by ſome Servants; and ſince the Moon ſhined very clear, he perceived the glittering of my Sword at the Gate of the Temple; and knowing it was no place for any ſuch Buſineſs, he came ſtraight unto me; but when I perceived ſeveral Men, I retired in all haſte, not being known by them, though Menecrates cauſed ſome of his Servants to follow me; but he remained with Androclides, whom he knew; and though he was his Rival, yet took care of him. Some Sacrificers hearing a noiſe, ran thither, and were much amazed at the Prophanation, for the Place where we fought was Sacred Ground; and the Gate of the Temple was all Blood. They carried his Corps unto the next Houſe, where he ſhewed ſome Signs of Life; inſomuch as, by virtue of ſome Spirits, he recovered Speech, and told all the Truth unto Menecrates; and ſo by conſequence my Act was made known unto all my Rivals by two malevolent Witneſſes.

Androclides knowing that now Thimocrates had ſpoiled his Hopes of Teleſile, would not beſmear him with a Lie. Menecrates thinking himſelf obliged unto me, for ridding him of a terrible Rival, whom Diophantes preferred before all the reſt, would make me a Recompence by his Sincerity. Yet however, the Combat cauſed a great Noiſe about the Town. The Place where he was wounded, did aggravate the Crime. The Bithian made loud Complaints; the People of Delphos ſaid it was an ill Paſſage: and ſince Androclides was dead, which was the next day, I knew there was no ſafety for me in the Town. Preſently after the Combate, I retired unto Meleſander, who the ſame Night conveyed me unto the Houſe of a Friend, where in all likelihood they would not ſearch for me. It is not an eaſy matter to relate unto you my Sorrows upon this Occaſion; for when I conſidered how I muſt leave Teleſile, in a time when Diophantes would infallibly marry her, and in a time when ſhe had a thouſand Servants: I wiſhed, with all my Heart, that Androclides were alive again; and if I had killed the deareſt Friend upon Earth, I could not have grieved more than I did for the killing of my Rival. Teleſile was extreamly ſad at it; and both by her natural Goodneſs, and many other Signs, ſhe teſtified as much.

In the mean while I am proſecuted and ſought after; and all the endeavours of my Father, to qualify the Matter, were in vain; all he could do, was to protract the Matter, and keep them from pronouncing ſpeedy Condemnation; ſince the Council of the Amphictions did not ſit, I had leſs protection than if they had. At the laſt, the Sentence was, That I ſhould be baniſhed for three Years, and not to return into any part of Phocides upon pain of Death. This Sentence of Grace, was indeed to me a Sentence of Death; for when I conſidered what Joy my Rivals would apprehend; how much my Baniſhment made for them, and how I had ruined my ſelf, my Reaſon was ſo confounded, that I was not maſter of my own thoughts; I told Meleſander, I would not go out of Delphos, but remain ſtill concealed: and indeed I ſtaid there above a Month after my Condemnation; during which time I underſtood that my Rivals were every day with Teleſile; nor could I blame her, ſince ſhe could not avoid them; and though I underſtood, by Meleſander, that ſhe was exceeding ſenſible of my Misfortune, which ſhe out of her Goodneſs was pleaſed to call hers, yet I could not endure to be deprived of her ſight. In the mean time, I was in danger to be taken three or four times, and I was forced to change the place of my retreat above ſix times, becauſe Meleſander and I were informed that it was diſcovered where I was: Nor was it either ſtrange or difficult, for all my Rivals were Spies unto them which proſecuted againſt me. So that Teleſile not liking that I ſhould expoſe my ſelf unto ſo much danger for her, did write a Letter unto me, by which ſhe abſolutely commanded me to depart, not only out of Delphos and Phocides, but alſo out of Greece. Since I did lie concealed, I had written very often unto her, but did receive no Anſwer: After I had read her Letter, I anſwered her, That ſince it was her pleaſure I ſhould depart, I beſeeched to permit me the ſight of her, and bid her Adieu. Meleſander did all he could to hinder me from asking ſuch a Favour as might ſo much endanger me, and which perhaps Teleſile would not conſent unto; but I did peremptorily tell him, That I would never go out of Delphos until I had ſpoken with her. This faithful Friend then went unto her, and told her my full Reſolution. She was extreamly angry; ſhe told Meleſander, That my Affection unto her was inconſiderate; that her Honour was not dear unto me; that I was not reaſonable; and that I asked ſuch a thing which ſhe ought not to conſent unto; and therefore ſhe proteſted that ſhe was reſolute, and would not, upon any terms, allow it. But, ſaid Meleſander unto her, Were it not better to ſuffer it, than to ſuffer them to find out Thimocrates, and put him to death? Ah, Meleſander, (ſaid ſhe unto him) you are no leſs unreaſonable than your Friend, to preſs me unto that which I cannot do, and to urge me unto it againſt my Mind. At the laſt, after a long Conteſt, ſhe told him, That ſo he would contrive a way, which would not any way expoſe me unto danger, and which would be convenient for her, ſhe would ſee me, though (ſaid ſhe) it be to ground me in my Obſtinacy. Meleſander then bethinking himſelf, propoſed unto her, to make a viſit unto one of his Couſins, as formerly ſhe uſed to do, who was one of great Merit and Vertue, unto whom he would bring me the Night before ſhe came thither. But (ſaid ſhe unto him) What will your Couſin think? What will your ſelf think? and what will Thimocrates think? No, no, Meleſander, I will not, I cannot conſent unto ſuch a Meeting; and indeed he could not that Day perſwade her. But the next Day I was in ſuch danger to be taken, that I was glad to take a new Sanctuary; and ſhe fearing to be the cauſe of my Death, it moved her to conſent to ſee me at Meleſander's Couſins, provided that ſhe and he would be preſent at our Diſcourſe. I cannot expreſs the Joy I then apprehended, when I heard I was to ſee Teleſile, though it was only to bid her Adieu. But, in ſhort, I was that Night carried unto Meleſander's Couſin, where my adored Teleſile ſhould meet me the next morning, waited upon only by that Woman who was my Confident. It is not eaſy for me to deſcribe, how this Viſit did go againſt the Hair of her Diſpoſition, and againſt that preciſe Vertue whereof ſhe made profeſſion. She came unto the Chamber, where I was alone with Meleſander, and her Couſin, as if ſhe had committed a great Crime in coming; and addreſſing her ſelf unto her, What will you think of me, (ſaid ſhe unto her) for coming to you, with reſolution to quarrel with your Friends? I ſhould think, (anſwered ſhe, for we had told her all the Buſineſs) that you would have been moſt inhumane, if you had expoſed ſo precious a Life as that of Thimocrates unto Danger. Madam, (ſaid I then, not giving her time to anſwer) I moſt humbly beſeech you pardon the trouble I have put you unto, and believe, that if I could poſſibly have done otherwiſe, I ſhould not have forced your Inclination ſo far. After this we all ſat down, and diſcourſed a long time of the Misfortune which had fallen upon me, and of the reſolute Obſtinacy of my Enemies in proſecuting againſt me, ſince Teleſile would not permit me any privacy with her. But ſome or other deſiring to ſpeak with Meleſander's Couſin about ſome important Buſineſs, ſhe deſired Teleſile to excuſe her a little while, and when ſhe had ſpoken with this Party in another Chamber, ſhe would return unto her again: So that, without neglecting this opportunity, whilſt Meleſander went unto the Window with a Woman which accompanied his Couſin: Madam, ſaid I, are you then reſolved upon my departure, and that I muſt abſent my ſelf from you, without any knowledg whether you will honour Thimocrates with any remembrance of him? But, Madam, he is not able to depart upon ſuch Conditions: The Affection he bears unto you, is too violent to endure it; and if you be not pleaſed, of your Goodneſs, to give him ſome obliging hopes, to comfort him in his abſence, he will not depart at all. I ſhall tell you, for your ſatisfaction, replied Teleſile, That I much lament your Misfortune, and am ſo ſorry that I ſhou'd be the Cauſe of it, as that your Abſence will much grieve me, and I ſhall heartily wiſh and long for your Return.

This is much, Madam, (ſaid I unto her in a moſt reſpectful Manner) but it is not enough to preſerve the Life of a Man who muſt be an Age from you. I know not (ſaid ſhe) whether this which I ſay unto you be enough for you, but I am perſwaded, Thimocrates, that it is a little too much for me; yet I do not repent of what I ſaid, (ſaid ſhe ſmiling) but if you pleaſe I will repeat it again. Not to trouble you with any Repetitions of what you ſaid already, Madam, (ſaid I unto her) I beſeech you ſpeak ſomething more than yet you have. What would you have me ſay (ſaid ſhe)? I deſire (replied I) that my adored Teleſile will aſſure me, that my Abſence ſhall not root me out of her Heart, and that neither Menecrates, or any other of my Rivals, ſhall ſupplant me, and take Poſſeſſion of it. I promiſe you, replied ſhe, to ſatisfy you in your firſt Scruple, and permit you to hope that none of the reſt ſhall prejudice you, without any Fears of being deceived: For indeed, Thimocrates, I have ſo bad an Opinion of all Men, that I wonder how you come to be ſo much in my Thoughts. You loaded me with Honours and Delight (ſaid I unto her); but Madam, notwithſtanding all theſe ſweet and gracious Favours you are pleaſed to conſent unto, I am afraid of your Vertue, I fear that when Diophantes moves you to marry Menecrates, I fear, I ſay, that abſent Thimocrates has no ſuch Prevalency in your Heart, as to hinder your Obedience. Thimocrates, ſaid ſhe then unto me, me-thinks you may be very well contented with what I have already ſaid, without forcing me as you do, to give a more rigid Anſwer. Ah Madam, (ſaid I unto her, being extreamly tranſported with Sorrow) I underſtand you too well, I ſee you will not chuſe Menecrates, but you will accept of him if it be the Pleaſure of Diophantes. If he will abſolutely have it ſo, replied ſhe, doubtleſs I ſhall obey him. Since it is ſo, ſaid I unto her, I need not think any more of my Departure from Delphos, but I will ſtay. Madam, I am reſolved upon it, and ſay what you will unto me, I will never leave you in ſuch a cruel Uncertainty: But Thimocrates, ſaid ſhe, you have loſt your Reaſon, in ſpeaking as you do. But, inhumane Teleſile, replied I, you have loſt your Goodneſs neſs in anſwering me as you do; for what would you have that Man who infinitely adores you do? who when he is gone, leaves you in a Mind to marry him, whom of all the reſt of my Rivals, Diophantes intends to propoſe unto you? from whence can I have any Conſolation, cruel Lady, during ſo long and rigid an Abſence? Can I ever contemplate your Beauty, without thinking, that perhaps it is the Felicity of Menecrates, not mine, to enjoy it? Can I with any Delight remember that Sweetneſs which has ſeveral times proceeded from you, ſince I am in Fears that you will be eternally ſevere unto me? Can I with any Satisfaction think upon theſe favourable Words which I hear, when I do imagine, that perhaps I ſhall never hear any more? Indeed Madam, is it poſſible I ſhould live at a Diſtance from you, in ſuch Incertainties? No, no, indeed I cannot; and I had much rather die before your Eyes, and by the Hands of mine Enemies, than to go upon any ſuch Terms. But, Thimocrates, ſaid ſhe unto me, what is it which you deſire? I do not deſire, Madam, ſaid I unto her, that you ſhould promiſe the unfortunate Thimocrates to marry him: I only deſire, that you would aſſure him not to marry either Menecrates, nor any elſe during my Abſence. You inſiſt upon good Security (ſaid ſhe unto me ſmiling, notwithſtanding the Melancholy of her Eyes;) But yet, Thimocrates, all that I can ſay unto you, is, That I will endeavour as far as my Duty will permit me, to break off my Father's Deſigns in marrying me to any other; but to promiſe you that I will ſo far diſhonour my ſelf as openly to diſobey my Father, is a thing which I cannot do: and perhaps (ſaid ſhe almoſt againſt her Intentions) if you ſhall render your ſelf worthy of it by your Obedience, I ſhall do more than I will promiſe you; but indeed Thimocrates, (ſaid this vertuous Lady) we muſt not merit our Misfortunes through our own Imbecilities, nor truſt too much unto humane Prudence, but leave ſomething unto the Conduct of the Gods, who in ſpite of all our Endeavours will bring us unto that paſs they would have us. I do confeſs that, conſidering the manner wherein Teleſile expreſſed her ſelf, I had good Reaſon to be contented, although I was not; but I did ſo violently preſs her farther, that ſhe was ready to leave me in an Anger, ſeeing I would not depart, unleſs ſhe promiſed me all that I deſired. She then called Meleſander to her Relief, and his Couſin alſo, who juſt then returned unto us; and do what I could, it was not poſſible for me to obtain any further from her: Then ſhe did command me ſo peremptorily to depart as ſoon as I could, that at laſt I reſolved upon it. Meleſander put me into ſome hope, that as ſoon as I was gone they would endeavour to procure a Revocation of the Sentence; but for all that, I was ſo diſmally deſperate at my Departure, that I was not capable of any Conſolation. Mean time Teleſile left me, before I could ſpeak one Word more unto her; for when I perceived by her Actions that ſhe intended to be gone, my Reaſon left me, and I neither knew what ſhe ſaid unto me, nor what I my ſelf did; I knew only that ſhe held out her Hand unto me, which I in all Humility and Reſpect did kiſs, and then ſhe immediately vaniſhed out of Sight; ſo that being in no hopes to ſee Teleſile any more, I thought upon nothing but my Departure. I had a good Mind firſt to fight with Menecrates, but Meleſander diſſwaded me, ſaying, that ſince Teleſile had ſo many Lovers, it would be an everlaſting fatal Piece of Work to kill them all. In concluſion, within two Days after this Interview I departed with Leontides, who is here at this preſent, whom the King of Cyprus had then ſent unto Delphos, and who returned at that time: Since all Countries where Teleſile was not, were indifferent unto me, I followed Leontides, and reſolved to wander through all the Iſlands of the Ægean Sea, as I did, until the King of Cyprus and the Prince Philoxipes, did me the Honour to give me the Command of their Troops with Philocles: You may very well imagine then, that this laſt Abſence was infinitely horrid unto me, becauſe it was to be a long one. Menecrates, as I underſtood, and an hundred other freſh Servants ſince I came from Delphos, are continually courting Teleſile; Diophantes perpetually moves her to make choice of an Husband; Menecrates is a moſt compleat Man; my Enemies are continually more and more hot againſt me, and all my Rivals ſolicit ſecretly, to prevent any Revocation of my Sentence; for Reports went that I only was the cauſe which moved Teleſile to deny them in their Suits; ſo that I have no Foundation to ground any Certainties upon; although Teleſile be not yet married, yet I know not what ſhe may do, ſince ſhe only afforded me ſome Hopes: and therefore I have great Reaſon to fear, that either her Weakneſs or her Vertue will render me moſt miſerable, either by her Obedience unto her Father, or by ſuffering her ſelf to be woo'd by Menecrates. See here, O my moſt equitable Judg, what Experience I have had of all thoſe horrid Rigours in being abſent from the Party loved: and it will be no Difficulty to make it appear unto you, by Reaſon as well as by Example, that Abſence is ſuch an Evil as comprehends all the reſt. Indeed, as Love has its beginning by Sight, and is continually kept alive by the ſame, ſo it muſt neceſſarily follow, that Abſence is that which is moſt oppoſite unto it. And as nothing is more delightful than the Sight of her own loves, ſo nothing is more cruel than not to ſee her; ſhort Abſences augment Love, but long ones turn it into Fury and Deſpair: When a determinate Time is limitted, then Impatiency until that time is expired will admit of no Reſt; and when there is no Certainty how long the Abſence ſhall continue, Melancholy does damp all the Sweets of any Hope: and indeed, whether it be long or ſhort, terminate or without Limits, I am moſt confident that whoſoever knows how to love, they are moſt inſupportable unto him, and will maintain, that Abſence comprehends all other Evils, and is moſt ſenſible of all Manner of Sorrows. He who does maintain, that not to be loved, is the greateſt Torment of Love, is much in the wrong, and cannot compare his Sufferings unto mine: ſince to ſpeak of things in general he who finds a Scorn upon all his Services, ought to uſe the like Scorn as a Remedy for it, and by a generous Reſentment may cure himſelf of his unaccepted Paſſion: But a Lover who is loved, and abſent from her he loves, he can do nothing elſe but ſuffer; for to think that Remembrance of paſt Favours is ſweet, is an Error in Love when one is abſent, ſince Sorrow is all the Felicity he can enjoy as long as he is abſent. He who mourns for the Death of his Miſtreſs, is doubtleſs worthy of Compaſſion: but yet there is a notable Difference betwixt him and a Lover that is abſent. The greateſt evil in Death, is only the Abſence of the beloved Object; and I dare boldly ſay, that after the firſt great Blow has wrought its firſt Effect, the Soul finding it ſelf in a Condition of neither any Hopes or Fears, does by little and little return unto it ſelf again, and will be in ſuch a Calm as ſhall inſenſibly appeaſe all the Tumults of his Paſſion, and ſweeten thoſe bitter Sorrows which at firſt he endured: But Abſence, when Hopes and Fears, and all other Paſſions, are tumultuouſly active, is a Puniſhment which every Day augments it ſelf, and can find no Remedy, but its own end, or the end of him that endures it. Yet perhaps it will be objected, That Jealouſie has an Horror above Abſence. But I anſwer by way of Queſtion unto thoſe that ſay ſo, Who is he that ever was long abſent, but he was jealous alſo? and what Effects can Jealouſy produce, which Abſence does not the like? Yet notwithſtanding, this Difference may be put between them, that a jealous Man who ſees his Miſtreſs, enjoys ſome happy Minutes which he who ſees her not cannot obtain: and alſo there is a great Diſtinction to be made, between a Sorrow which is bottomed only upon a Phantacy, and a Sorrow which Reaſon does uphold and authorize. A jealous Man who is with his Miſtreſs, although he be unfortunate, yet doubtleſs has ſome pleaſing Minutes, either in croſſing the Deſigns of his Rival, or contemplating upon Revenge, or in Diſcovery of ſome intricate Buſineſs which he deſires to know: and although theſe Delights are not full of Tranquillity, yet they are Delights; but an abſent Lover is ſo extreamly miſerable, that he cannot find a Delectation in any thing; and therefore, O my equitable Judg, ſince I have had ſuch Experimental Trials of all the Miſeries in Abſence, and am the moſt unfortunate of all Lovers, I deſerve the greateſt ſhare in your Compaſſion.

Thimocrates had no ſooner ended, but Marteſia turned towards Cyrus, and asking him what he thought of his Story and Reaſons; and Cyrus anſwering as he thought; In truth, (ſaid he ſighing) you were unjuſt if you ſhould deny Thimocrates that Compaſſion which he demands; for his Diſcourſe has ſo ſenſibly moved me, that I know not how to expreſs my ſelf. Sir, anſwered ſhe unto him, Thimocrates obtains from me what he deſires, for I could never know a gallant Man miſerable, but I did ſenſibly intereſt my ſelf in his Sorrows. Beſtow not all your Compaſſion upon him, I beſeech you, ſaid Philocles, but reſerve a ſhare for me. For my part, ſaid the Prince Artibies, I muſt only deſire to be lamented, ſince my Misfortune is ſo great, that whoſoever knows it muſt needs do ſo much for me. I know not, ſaid Leontidas, whether I ſhall lament or no; but I am ſure there is no Compariſons betwixt the Miſeries which I endure, and thoſe which Thimocrates complains of. You muſt give me leave to make a doubt of that, replied the abſent Lover. Before any Judgment can be given (ſaid Erenice) we muſt underſtand all your Misfortunes. And to underſtand them, ſaid Aglatidas, we muſt give over Diſcourſe, and hearken unto them. 'Tis true, replied Marteſia, but ſince Thimocrates ſpoke the firſt concerning Philocles, who maintains, that not to be loved is the greateſt Miſery in Love, and afterwards he anſwered unto what the Prince Artibies ſaid, who thinks the moſt ſevere Puniſhment of his Paſſion to be the Death of her he loves; and ſince he named Leontidas the laſt, who thinks Jealouſy the greateſt Torture of all. I think, Sir, ſaid ſhe, and looked upon Cyrus, that it is not amiſs to follow that order, and that Philocles ſpeak the firſt of theſe three which remain. Cyrus approving of her Opinion, and Philocles ſitting over againſt Marteſia, who was to be Judg, he began thus.

The ſecond Hiſtory of the Lover not loved.

SInce you do know the Concluſion of my Adventure, before I acquaint you with the beginning, or the Sequel; and ſince by Conſequence, that pleaſing Suſpenſion which makes a diſaſterous Story hearkened unto with Delight, is not to be found in my Story, I therefore conceive it fit not to abuſe your Patience with any long Relation: I will only acquaint you, that although I was born a Subject unto the King of Cyprus, yet my Family was originally from Corinth, and that I had the honour to be allied unto the wiſe Periander, who at this day is their Soveraign. I had no ſooner attained my ſixteenth Year, but my Father ſent me unto that Court, unto an Uncle I had there, and under the Tuition of a Governour, with intention I ſhould remain there; for ſince he had many Children, he was very deſirous to keep up his Name in his ancient Country, which was then ready to extinguiſh, there being none of that Name left but only my Uncle, who was very old. I will not go about to deſcribe famous Corinth unto you; for I ſpeak before ſo many underſtanding Auditors, who are ſo well informed of every thing which is worthy of Knowledg, that it would be in vain for me to diſcourſe of the Beauty, Magnificence and Splendor of it: There are none here I am ſure which hath not heard of that famous Iſthmos, which is ſo well known unto all the World; and of that ſtately Caſtle which commands that goodly Town, and defends it: alſo of that great and convenient Port, which does infinitely adorn it, and of the huge Commerce which continually does fill it, making it ſuperfluouſly rich in all abundance of Delights; and whatſoever can be imagined to render a place delectable, is to be found there. The Prince who governs it is a Man of a moſt high Soul; the Queen his Wife, called Meliſſa, is alſo admirable fair, and has a Daughter, who without all contradiction is the faireſt, and moſt accompliſhed Lady in the World. This was the State of the Houſe Royal when I came to Corinth. Periander alſo had a Son, but he was at Epidaurus with his Grandfather by the Mother's ſide, who was Prince there: ſo that all Court-Divertiſments did flow from Meliſſa, and the Princeſs Cleobuline her Daughter; and I muſt needs ſay, that if there were any Diſpoſition in me to Goodneſs, I was in ſuch a place as I muſt needs advantage my ſelf: For the Court of Periander was always full of the greateſt Men in all Greece, and it was his Generoſity to honour Strangers ſo much, that his Palace was continually full of Men of ſeveral Countries. But ſince I was not yet arrived unto ſuch an Age, as required the Converſation of the wiſeſt and moſt knowing Men; I betook my ſelf rather unto ſuch things as might divert me, than unto ſuch as might inſtruct me. The famous Arion, whoſe melodious Voice tuned to the raviſhing Airs of his Warbling Harp, which made him ſo famous throughout the World, was both my Maſter and my Friend: my Inclination was ſo intent upon Muſick, that in lieu of making it my Diverſion, it was almoſt my Profeſſion; and indeed my Governour would ſometimes chide me for being too ſerious upon it only, tho in it ſelf it was a commendable Quality. I then began to participate of other Divertiſments, and the famous Theſpis being come unto Corinth, I was charmed with his Poeſies, and witty Comedies. So that as I had learned to ſing a little with Arion, I became a Poet with Theſpis, there being a Genius in me which prompt me unto it: Pictures alſo moved my Diſpoſition, that I practiſed to limn, and without being excellent in any thing, I did almoſt know every thing. Thus did I recreate my ſelf until it pleaſed Love to diſturb my Delights, by the very ſame thing in which I ſo long time delighted; and ſee how the Misfortune came to paſs. Cleobulus, one of the wiſe Men of Greece, and Prince of Lindus, ſent unto Periander concerning ſome important Affair: but his Agent dying at Corinth, I was made choice of to go unto Cleobulus, (for I had now attained unto twenty Years of Age) and ſince this Prince had one Daughter called Eumetes, whom the People called Cleobuline, after her Father, tho her Name was not ſo, and ſince it was the ſame with the illuſtrious Daughter of Periander, I confeſs that I was much pleaſed with the Voyage, and becauſe I had a great deſire to be known unto the Princeſs of Lindus, of whom I had heard ſpoken ſo much, both of Vertue and Spirit, and ſince I had no buſineſs at Corinth, I was very glad to depart: and ſince the Princeſs Cleobuline did eſteem me much above my Deſerts, and held a great Correſpondency with that excellent Lady unto whom I went, by reaſon of their ſutableneſs in their Spirits and Humour, ſhe did me the Honour to ſend a Letter unto her by me, to the end I might be the more acceptable unto her; and ſince this flattering and obliging Letter was the cauſe of my Love; and I have ſo perfectly remembred it, that I believe I ſhall not alter a word in relating it unto you; tho I muſt needs bluſh in telling it, to make you the better underſtand the beginning of my Paſſion. And thus it was.

The Princeſs Cleobuline unto the Princeſs Eumetis.

WHat ſhare ſoever I ſhall participate in that Joy which Philocles goes to receive in ſeeing you, and in that Happineſs which his Acquaintance will bring unto you; I know very well that I am neither Friend nor Couſin to prefer the Intereſt of another before my own, ſince I cannot (me thinks) ſufficiently rejoyce at the Delight you will take in the Perſon of Philocles, to know all that is admirable in Corinth, and that he will find in you all that is illuſtrious in Greece. This petty Jealouſie moves me to tell you that which his Modeſty will queſtionleſs conceal; how that beſides thoſe eſſential Qualities, which of themſelves are enough to make a moſt compleat Man, he is one of Apollo's beſt Diſciples, and greateſt Favourite of the Muſes, eſpecially of thoſe Muſes which are your Friends: Move him therefore to impart thoſe Qualities, which he uſes to hide from all but ſuch as are like you: Make him ſhew you his Verſes, his Pictures, and his Aires, all of his own compoſing. I have charged him to bring me back a Character both of your Mind and Face; and if you pleaſe, let him not ſteal it againſt your Will, but afford him ſuch convenient time, as he may worthily acquit himſelf of the Commiſſion which he has received from me: Make an exchange with him, ſome of his Verſes for ſome of your ingenious Riddles which you have compoſed, and which troubles all them that would unfold them. But after all this, remember that I do but lend, not give, this Treaſure unto you: Send him therefore generouſly back, and do not ruin Corinth by retaining Philocles with you, ſince I have diſcourſed that, which perhaps he would have concealed. Tell me at his return what Progreſs he hath made in your Opinion of him; what ingenious Pieces he hath written of you, and how many Conqueſts he hath made amongſt your Ladies; for I know know him too modeſt to tell any thing advantagious concerning himſelf; and too judicious to talk of any thing but you, at his Return. I could tell you much more concerning him; I will leave it unto you to diſcover ſome Vertues of his Soul, which are more excellent than his Wit. After all this, be pleaſed to conſider him as my Kinſman, and that you have promiſed to eſteem every thing that is dear unto me. And laſtly, know that I am your

CLEOBULINE.

This Letter ſo full of Flattery being written, the Princeſs, as I came to take my Leave of her, told me with as much Gallantry as Civility, that ſhe had engaged me deeply in many things by her Letter unto the illuſtrious Eumetis, but that ſhe was not ſorry for it, ſince ſhe knew I would not paſs for one of a prejudicated Opinion. Madam, ſaid I unto her, what you tell me, makes me afraid, leſt intending to favour me, you ruin me. See, ſaid ſhe unto me (ſhewing me her Letter which was yet unſealed) whether you will not gallantly perform what I have promiſed on your behalf. I would then have excuſed my ſelf, and not have ſeen it; yet ſince ſhe abſolutely commanded me, I obeyed her: But as ſoon as I had read ſeven or eight Lines I bluſhed for very Shame, and not daring to read any further, O Madam, ſaid I unto her, what have you done? and what have I done, that you ſhould in ſuch an ingenious manner do me ſo bad an Office? No, no, Madam (ſaid I, and would have given it back unto her) I muſt not carry that which would diſhonour me. Yet you may ſee it at the leaſt (ſaid ſhe, laughing) tho it be only to teach you what you ought to do, if you do not agree to do as I ſay; and ſince I refuſed, ſhe took the Letter and read it aloud. I confeſs I was ſo confounded at it, that I could not chuſe but interrupt her; and altho Praiſes be ſweet, eſpecially unto young Men; yet I was extreamly fearful, I could not be able by my Preſence to make good what the Princeſs Cleobuline had ſaid of me: But ſince I did abſolutely refuſe it, ſhe made uſe of her abſolute Authority to make me take it, and after her Commands to ſeal it, I muſt take it and promiſe her to deliver it, altho I knew it might much prejudice me, ſince certainly all exceſſive Commendations in new Acquaintances are very dangerous, eſpecially unto Perſons the moſt accompliſhed, altho it be not an eaſy matter to reſiſt Flattery: So, not well knowing what I ſhould do with this Letter, I took it and departed with a Man of good Quality, called Antigenes, of the ſame Age with my ſelf, who intended the ſame Voyage, and certainly he was as pleaſant Company as any in Corinth: we were at that time two intimate Friends; we were of the ſame Height, of the ſame Air, the ſame Garb, and loved the very ſame things, and he had a Genius as well as I unto Poetry, Limning, and Muſick. If the Princeſs Cleobuline had known of his Journey, doubtleſs ſhe would have mentioned him in her Letter, for ſhe highly eſteemed him; but he concealed his Intentions from all the World, not deſiring that his Father ſhould know whither he went, fearing ſome Conſiderations of his Family ſhould obſtruct his Curioſity: But Antigenes and I embarqued together, and arrived at Jaliſſa, a Town where the Prince Cleobulas did commonly reſide. I preſented the Pacquet which I brought from Periander; I rendred him an account of the buſineſs between them, and I preſented Antigenes unto him, who received him very nobly, and whoſe Name he knew; but ſo it happened that the Princeſs his Daughter was in the Country, two days Journey from thence, recreating her ſelf in the Company of ſeveral Ladies, and intending to continue her Divertiſements for ſome certain days yet longer. I deſired then to take hold of that opportunity, and making it therefore known unto Cleobulas, that I had a Letter unto the Princeſs Eumetis, and that I was very glad I durſt not offer to depart from him, and carry it unto her: He returned me an Anſwer according to my Deſires, That it were not juſt he ſhould deprive his Daughter of ſo much Happineſs as to receive News from a Princeſs whom ſhe honoured ſo much; and that he would not deprive himſelf (as he ſaid moſt civilly) of the Delight he took in my Company by permitting me to go unto her; and therefore he ordered one to take the Letter from my hand, and to give it unto her; and alſo by the ſame Meſſenger he appointed the Princeſs his Daughter to return, being deſirous that I ſhould ſee his Court in all its Glory, for he had been a Widower many Years. Thus was the buſineſs ordered; one came and took the Letter which I had for the Princeſs, and ſo ſhe received it by another hand, and not mine; commanding him who carried it, to let her know that I preſented it in that manner unto her, by the Command of the Prince her Father. Mean while be pleaſed to know, that there was a Corinthian Family of Men in high Repute which dwelt there, the prime Man of which Houſe was called Alaſis, who had one Daughter, whoſe Name was Philiſta, whom the Princeſs of Lindus had carried with her. This Lady was indeed a moſt admirable Beauty; not that the Figure of her Face was ſo regularly compoſed, but ſhe was yonng, flaxen-haired, fair, of an handſom Height, and a good Garb; ſhe was, as I ſaid before, a moſt admirable and ſurprizing Beauty; ſhe had a tranſcendent Mind, and her Wit was very agreeable unto all Company; ſhe then being with Eumtis, when this Letter was preſented, after ſhe had read it, ſhe turned towards Philiſta, and ſhewing it unto her, See, ſaid ſhe unto her, what the Princeſs Cleobuline ſays concerning one of her Couſins.

Philiſta having read the Letter, In truth, Madam, ſaid ſhe unto her, if Philocles be as the Princeſs Cleobuline has deſcribed him, ſhe has good reaſon to call him a Treaſure, and to deſire his return quickly. True, ſaid ſhe, but the ſooner to reſtore him unto her, the fair Philiſta muſt cloud ſome part of her Charms, as it is likely ſhe will, if it be true that Reſemblance is a Cauſe of Love. Your Diſcourſe, Madam (anſwered Philiſta) is very obliging and full of Flattery; but it is not altogether ill grounded; for if Philocles have as great a deſire to ſee me, as I have to know it, it would be a great ſtep unto Love, and I do aſſure you, that if you do not return ſpeedily unto Aliſſa, my Curioſity to ſee him will much diſquiet me: and indeed (ſaid ſhe laughing, for ſhe was of a gay and jocund Humour) if he reſemble his Picture according to the Deſcription of him, he is ſuch a Man as I could wiſh either in the way of a ſutable Friend, or an accompliſhed Gallant, or an agreeable Husband; and queſtionleſs, replied the Princeſs, Philiſta has all the Accompliſhments requiſite to conquer the Heart of as gallant a Man as Philocles ſeems to be, by the Relation of the Corinthian Princeſs: Yet, replied ſhe unto her, it would not be an Act of Juſtice, ſince he came hither free, to make him return a Captive; and therefore I have a kind of deſire not to obey the Prince my Father, who has commanded me to return to morrow. O Madam, ſaid Philiſta then, I beſeech you, not drive me into Deſpair; for I am certain that I ſhall not ſtay with you, if you do not return, ſo high is my Impatience to be acquainted with ſuch a Man as this. Thus did theſe two Ladies divert themſelves in diſcourſing of me, as the Princeſs of Lindus did tell me afterwards. But to keep my ſelf within the Limits which I preſcribed at the beginning of my Diſcourſe, I ſhall only tell you, how that ſame day, and the next day following, I was the Subject of Philiſta's Mirth, who talked of nothing but of me, and my Name was up continually amongſt them, as long as their Journy laſted. The Women which waited upon the Princeſs waged War with Philiſta about me, and all of them had ſo great longing to ſee me, that I verily believe, if I had known of the Paſſages, I ſhould have returned unto Corinth before I ſaw the Princeſs of Lindus: at the laſt ſhe came to Aliſſa, but it was ſo very late, by reaſon of ſome Accident which befel the Coach, that coming firſt unto Philiſta's Lodging, ſhe would not be ſet down at it do what the Princeſs could, but continued the Conteſt concerning me. Philiſta, ſaid ſhe unto her at parting, remember that I have entreated you, to hide half your attracting Charms to morrow when you come unto the Palace. Then, without giving Philiſta any time to reply, the Coach went on, and Eumetis went unto the Prince her Father in his Cloſet, whither he was retired, ſo that I was not then with him, but it was the next day before Antigenes and I had the honour to ſalute her; But the greateſt Wonder was, that when the Prince Cleobulus did us the Grace to preſent us to her the next Morning as ſhe was going unto the Temple, and as ſhe paſſed through a Garden where we were, with the Prince her Father, ſhe found ſuch a Similitude, and ſo much Conformity between Antigenes and me, that not yet knowing our Names very perfectly, ſhe doubted which of us two was he, of whom the Princeſs Cleobuline had ſpoke in her Letter: So that addreſſing her ſelf unto us with a Complement which obliged us both, ſhe asked me, Whether I was him of whom the Princeſs Cleobuline had ſpoke unto her in her Letter? Yes, Madam (ſaid I unto her) I believe it is, for ſhe knew not that Antigenes was to come thither: then did ſhe redouble her Civilities. And Antigenes making it known by his Garb, that he was not one of a mean Quality, we both waited upon her unto the Temple; and in the Afternoon we went unto her, and ſhe talked a long time of the Princeſs Cleobuline, with all Teſtimonies of Eſteem and Amity poſſible; ſhe asked me, Whether ſhe was not the moſt perfect Beauty in the World? She inquired of her Recreations, and of her Imployments; and ſhe was pleaſed to be ſo civil, as to tell me, whilſt Antigenes was in diſcourſe with other Ladies, that now ſhe began to know me, and that ſhe was much puzzled before, to diſtinguiſh which of us two, Antigenes or I, was Philocles. But, ſaid ſhe unto me, to puniſh my ſelf for this Fault, I would have him go and viſit a fair Corinthian we have here amongſt us, and try whether ſhe can diſtinguiſh you, before ſhe be informed; if ſhe can, I ſhall then confeſs I deſerve Puniſhment for my Error; if not, I ſhall at leaſt be comforted. I anſwered unto this, according unto my Duty, but ſhe not hearing me, ſent to know how Philiſta did, and why ſhe came not thither that day? He who had this Order, having done his Meſſage, returned, and told her in a low Voice, yet not ſo low but any might well underſtand him, that Philiſta did moſt humbly thank her for that Favour, and that if ſhe had not found her ſelf ſomething ill, ſhe would have honoured her ſelf and waited upon her; but ſince her Glaſs had that Morning perſwaded her ſhe was not in a Condition to make any Conqueſt, ſhe would therefore try if ſhe could ſtrengthen her ſelf by Sleep. The Princeſs laughing at the Anſwer; Certainly, ſaid ſhe (ſpeaking unto a Lady named Steſilea who was next her) Philiſta is of a moſt admirable Wit; and (in a low Voice) ſhe told me what her Anſwer was, and what was the cauſe of it. It is requiſite, Madam, ſaid Steſilea unto her, that you honour her ſo far as to go and viſit her, and to ſurprize her the more, to carry with you theſe two Strangers. The Princeſs who thought upon nothing but how to divert her, and knew not that there was any Envy between Steſilea and Philiſta (which made her deſire ſhe might be ſeen in her careleſs Dreſs) conſented unto the Motion, and they carried Antigenes and my ſelf unto this fair Corinthian. But firſt ſhe ſpoke much good unto us of her, and we were no leſs deſirous to ſee her than ſhe was to ſee us. As for Antigenes ſhe had never ſo much as heard him named ſince he came unto Iliſſa, nor had ever ſeen him; for, as I ſaid before, ſhe was not born at Corinth, tho her Father was, but ſhe was born at Iliſſa: We followed then the Coach in which the Princeſs was, in another, and when we came to the Gate, ſhe gave her Hand unto Antigenes, the more to deceive her, and obliging me to lead Steſilea, and follow her; we found Philiſta in a Dreſs as if ſhe had been ill indeed, tho her Complexion and Eyes ſpoke her to be in perfect Health. This fair Lady was alone in her Chamber, in ſetting forth her Jewels, as if ſhe intended that Night or the next Day to go unto ſome Ball. What, Philiſta, ſaid the Princeſs unto her, I thought to have found you in Bed, and I find you ready to go unto ſome publick Feaſt? Pardon me, Madam (ſaid ſhe unto her, ſmiling) you rather find me preparing my ſelf for a War; for you know very well (ſaid ſhe unto her in a low Voice, and ſhewing her all her Diamonds and Pearls which were upon the Table) that theſe are the Arms which thoſe who have no Beauty, muſt truſt unto upon any important occaſion: And behold a good one (ſaid the Princeſs, anſwering her alone) for I have brought you two in lieu of one Philocles; in ſaying ſo, ſhe cauſed Antigenes and me to advance together. But Philiſta wondring, Madam, ſaid ſhe, that is not poſſible, ſince I have much ado to believe one ſuch can be found in all the World: No, no, ſaid the Princeſs (who had forbidden us to let Philiſta know which was the true Philocles) I muſt not be ſo ſatisfied; I will ſee whether you who were ſo much taken with the Deſcription, can know which is the Subſtance; and therefore I will give you two hours time to find out which of theſe two illuſtrious Strangers do moſt reſemble the Character which the Princeſs Cleobuline gave in her Letter to me; you are as well acquainted with the Deſcription as I am, and therefore you cannot fail in your Judgment. But, Madam, anſwered Philiſta, you which would have me find him out, did you do it your ſelf? You ſhall know that afterwards, replied ſhe; and then ſitting between Philiſta's Bed and the Fire, ſhe would needs have this Beauty placed between Antigenes and my ſelf: I do confeſs, that this Lady did at the firſt inchant me both with the Splendor of her Beauty, and by her Diſcourſe: I already knew, that ſhe deſired to ſee me, and the Meſſage which ſhe had ſent did flatter me, and diſpoſe my Heart to deſire very earneſtly that ſhe would not take Antigenes for me; and it ſeems alſo that Antigenes deſired to be miſtaken, for whom he was not, and we were both of us ſo mute upon the matter, that to ſpeak truly we did neither of us reſemble that Philocles in Cleobuline's Letter: But yet (ſaid the Princeſs then) what think you Philiſta? which of theſe two take you to be the Man ſo accompliſhed, and univerſally knowing in all delectable things, and for whoſe Acquaintance your Curioſity did ſo trouble you? Do you think, Madam, replied ſhe, that I dare name him after you? and why would you have me procure an Enemy of him, I name not? You do not well conſider what you ſay, (replied the Princeſs); for if you name neither, you will offend them both, and the other way you will offend but one. For my part (ſaid Antigenes with a troubled Spirit) I am certain, that tho you ſhould not name me, yet I ſhould not be your Enemy: for though I be Philocles, yet I am ſure I am not ſuch a one as is characterized in the Princeſs of Corinth's Letter; and if I be not Philocles, I ſhould be very injurious to complain, not to be taken for another. No, no, ſaid the Princeſs, I will not ſuffer you to ſpeak any more, you ſhall not help Philiſta to know you, for ſhe has ſuch a diſcerning Wit as vaunts to diſcover the moſt cloſe Thoughts of a Heart: ſhe has ſeen you, ſhe has heard you ſpeak, and there needs no more: Anſwer me, ſaid ſhe unto her, by pointing with your Hand, which is Philocles. I do not know Madam (ſaid Philiſta unto her with a moſt pleaſing Melancholy) which is the true Philocles, but I know well, ſaid ſhe, (and turned from me towards Antigenes) whom I wiſh were he. You do well to wiſh, replied the Princeſs, (raviſhed that ſhe could not gueſs right) ſince you cannot really make him ſo; and all that he can be for your ſatisfaction is, that indeed he is worthy to be ſo: I wiſh the Gods, Madam, replied Antigenes with extream Joy, that what you ſay were true: and I wiſh the Gods, replied Philocles very ſadly, that I were not Philocles, but in the room of Antigenes: never was ſeen ſuch a medly of Opinions as was in every one in the Company. The Princeſs of Lindus was glad that Philiſta, had not gueſſed right, and by conſequence was ſorry to perceive ſome Melancholy in my Eyes. Philiſta, ſhe was vexed that the Name of Antigenes was not Philocles, and that ſhe might be twitted for being miſtaken. Steſilea was very well ſatisfied that Philiſta was in the wrong. Antigenes was raviſhed with Joy, though in reſpect of me, he would not expreſs it; but for my part I was all Confuſion and Anger: in the mean while theſe two laſt named Paſſions, which do not uſe to contribute any thing to the cauſes of Love, did yet quicken that Paſſion in me: I did not at the firſt intend to let Philiſta know, that I was not altogether unworthy to be Philocles, but only in point of Honour: yet the truth is, that was too tender a Reaſon to reſtrain me. Fair Philiſta (ſaid I unto her with a ſerious look) you are only miſtaken in the Name, ſince moſt certainly, Antigenes is owner of all thoſe qualities ties mentioned to be in that Philocles, in the Princeſs of Corinth's Letter.

Antigenes, replied my Friend, who was now become my Rival, is not ſo much obliged unto this fair Lady, as you imagine: Why ſo, replied the Princeſs? The reaſon is, Madam, replied he, becauſe ſhe does not poſitively ſay, that ſhe thinks me to be Philocles, ſhe is only pleaſed to wiſh I were ſo. That ſeems unto me the more obliging (ſaid Steſilea;) for if ſhe had only ſaid, ſhe thought you to be him, it had been barely a mark of her eſteem; but ſince ſhe beſtows an advantagious wiſh upon you, it is an evident ſign of her inclination towards him. You need not take ſo much pains (ſaid Philiſta, ſmiling) as to interpret my thoughts in my preſence; for if any do make any doubt of them, I ſhall my ſelf expound them. No Madam, ſaid I unto her, I beſeech you interpret them no further, leſt Antigenes die for Joy, and I for Sorrow, if you ſhould expreſs more Marks of your inclination to him, and if I ſhould perceive any further averſion in you towards the true Philocles. Philiſta, hearing me ſay ſo, would have expreſſed her ſelf unto me in ſome civil Language, thereby to make her peace with me: but the more ſhe deſired to ſpeak, the more ſhe was gravelled. For ſeeing how much ſhe had already obliged Antigenes, ſhe had no mind to diſingage him, ſo that ſince ſhe could not handſomly deliver her ſelf, nor keep within that juſt Mediocrity ſhe endeavoured, the Princeſs and Steſilea laughed, and were exceedingly delighted in obſerving her diſorder: and ſhe perceiving it; I ſee Madam, ſaid ſhe unto her, that you jeer me, becauſe I would engage Two in lieu of One. But yet be pleaſed to know (ſaid ſhe very angerly) that though Antigenes is not Philocles unto all the reſt of the World, yet he ſhall be ſo unto Philiſta. And I am very much deceived, if (though he ſhould not have all thoſe qualities which the Princeſs of Corinth's Letter does attribute unto the right Philocles) my Converſation with him, do not in a little time infuſe them all into him. I ſtand in great need of it then Madam, (ſaid Antigenes unto her,) and that it is the greateſt Honour I can pretend unto. You are already ſo cloſe, ſaid ſhe unto him, that I ſhall hardly know you aſſunder. But not to abuſe your Patience any longer, thus did that Day paſs away, and after we had waited upon the Princeſs unto her Chamber, Antigenes and I went into ours, for they joined cloſe together, but both of us retired, and not a word paſſed betwixt us at parting: and afterwards he coming into my Chamber, and ſilently ſitting down; Doubtleſs, Antigenes, ſaid I unto him, you are muſing upon your own Honour. I am thinking, ſaid he, what I ſhall do to ſupport that great Name which the fair Philiſta has beſtowed upon me. And do not you, (ſaid he unto me laughing) pity me, to ſee me thus charged, and will not you infuſe ſome of your excellent Qualities into me, that I may thereby ſave the Honour of Philiſta? Philiſta! ſaid I unto him, does know your Merits ſo well, and perhaps has made a Conqueſt upon your Heart, that I know not why I ſhould pity you: and Philocles ſtands more in need of the help of Antigenes, than Antigenes of his. I would by this Diſcourſe have moved my Friend to have diſcovered his Thoughts unto me, but he would not: ſo that I making him my Example, I ſpoke no more unto him concerning Philiſta. In the mean time, I beſeech you take notice, and admire at the phantaſtical Humour of my Fate.

As Philiſta was a Lady of Honour, and a little Humouriſh, ſhe was ſo vexed to be ſo miſtaken, that ſhe did really entertain an averſion to me, and reſolved to ſet ſuch a value upon the qualities of Antigenes, that if he had been one of her ancienteſt Friends, ſhe could not more deeply intereſt her ſelf in his Honour than ſhe did: and I believe alſo that her own natural inclination did biaſs that way. That which was the greateſt cauſe of her ſpight, was, that when ſhe turned towards Antigenes, and named him, ſhe was verily perſwaded out of her ſubtilty that it was Philocles, and therefore ſhe did confidently fix upon him: for ſince ſhe underſtood I did ſing well; ſhe ſet her ſelf to obſerve both our Voices as we ſpake, and finding that the tone of Antigenes was more ſweet than mine, ſhe thought he had been Philocles, though what both of us ſpoke were the very ſame Words: yet for all this, I did oftentimes applaud this Beauty. And ſince all the Court was acquainted with this accident, every one did contend againſt her, which did ſo much exaſperate her phantaſtical Reſolution, that ſhe could not endure to hear any ſpeak well of me; not but that ſhe made a ſhew, as if what ſhe did was only out of her Gallantry; but the truth is, I am fully perſwaded that from the very firſt time of ſeeing us, her Genius was averſe towards me, and inclinable towards Antigenes. Obſerve now how we imployed our ſelves; he endeavouring to anſwer the Princeſs of Corinth's Character of Philocles, better than my ſelf; and I alſo to ſhew that I was not abſolutely unworthy of her Applauds. Then, it is moſt certain, that the Princeſs of Lindus, either in reſpect of the Princeſs Cleobuline, or my good Fortune, did me the Honour to take my part: and all the Court after her Example, did put ſome difference between Philocles and Antigenes, and the fair Philiſta did put as great a difference between Antigenes and Philocles; for in any Company, or in walking, or at Balls, I found that Lady who of all the World did beſt pleaſe me, and my Fancy, every day doing a thouſand Things with intention to diſpleaſe me, and yet whether I would or no, I was pleaſed: Whether I would or no, I ſay; for certainly, I did all I could not to love her, but all in vain, and impoſſible; for there was ſuch of I know not what kind of gallant and pleaſant Air in her, which I could not reſiſt: ſo that from the firſt minute of my Paſſion I was moſt unfortunate, and much more than they who are made ſo by an hundred thouſand Accidents which may chance in Love: ſince certainly, a natural Antipathy and Averſion cannot poſſibly be overcome by any Wiſdom. Whatſoever Cruelty is qualified by Tears, Fury is allayed by ſubmiſſion; an Imperious Mind is mitigated by Obedience; an inconſtant Perſon recollects himſelf ſometimes by the Example of an unparalled conſtancy; in all theſe Cares there are ſome Remedies to be found: but all the humane Wiſdom upon Earth knows not how to vanquiſh a natural Antipathy, ſince it is the thing will change all Objects, as well as Jealouſy. In the mean while I could not find ſo much Conſolation as to complain againſt Philiſta: for, argued I with my ſelf, what would I have her do? for her Opinion is rooted in her Heart with her conſent unto it, nor did her Reaſon contribute any thing unto her Averſion: and ſince there are ſome Men who do hate Roſes, which almoſt all Men love; Why ſhould I blame Philiſta for her ſecret hatred of me? By this Argument would I have diſſwaded my ſelf from loving Philiſta: but the Buſineſs came unto that height, that though Philiſta would not be uncivil, yet ſhe could not diſſemble, but her inclination to Antigenes, and averſion unto me, was apparent. When he ſpake any thing, ſhe applauded it to the Skies; if I ſpoke never ſo well, I was puſt at: If at any Meeting, ſhe danced with Antigenes, it was with ſuch an Air, as made it apparent that ſhe was taken out by a Hand that pleaſed her: ſhe carried her ſelf with a finer Grace, her Eyes were more ſprightly and gay, ſhe danced more lightly, and with a more complaſant Behaviour; ſhe would then attract the looks of all the Company, and delight all the Company as much as ſhe dulled me: But on the contrary, when I did take her out ſometimes againſt her Mind, ſhe ſeemed as if ſhe were not the ſame Perſon: and I believe were it not that Antigenes would have ſeen her dance ill, ſhe would not have ſo much as minded the Tune, ſo negligent and careleſs was her Action; and that ſo apparent, that the Princeſs did tell her of it. Philiſta (ſaid ſhe unto her) I once intreated you to hide half of your charms from Philocles, but I intended not that you ſhould ſhew him all your Incivilities; and methinks you would not do ill, if you did a little more equally impart your Favours. But Madam, (anſwered ſhe, and laughed) did not you tell me, that it would be unjuſt that Philocles ſhould return a Captive unto Corinth? Yes, replied the Princeſs, but I would not have him go from Aliſſa diſcontented, therefore if you love Philiſta, be not ſo partial in your Civilities. Philiſta bluſhed at this Diſcourſe, for ſhe underſtood her well enough that the Princeſs did accuſe her of too much complacency with Antigenes; yet ſeeming to take no notice of it, ſhe told her that ſhe would correct her ſelf for it; and indeed I found her for a while much more Civil: and ſince I was ignorant of the Princeſs's Diſcourſe unto her, I was infinitely joyed at the Alteration; and Antigenes who was no leſs in love with Philiſta, than I was, ſeemed to be ſenſibly diſpleaſed at it. As he had ſeveral Opportunities of ſpeaking with her, ſo had he ſeveral private diſcourſes alſo, wherein, as I believe, he acquainted her with part of his Thoughts. But as for me, it was a thing impoſſible to do ſo.

Whilſt this happy Interval, wherein ſhe was grown more complacential, continued: I met with a fit opportunity to ſpeak with her, as ſhe was walking, and I reſolved to cloſe with that bleſſed Time; ſo that upon the firſt occaſion which ſhe gave me, to alter our general diſcourſe into more particular. Is it poſſible (ſaid I unto her) fair Philiſta, that you ſhould not oppoſe this good Fortune which I now enjoy? Can you at the laſt reſolve to know Philocles to be the ſame he is; that he is (ſaid I, without giving her time to anſwer) the moſt faithful and paſſionate of all your Servants. Ha, Philocles! ſaid ſhe, I know you better by the Princeſs of Corinth's Letter, than I do by your Diſcourſe. That Character of me whereof you ſpeak, Madam, (ſaid I unto her) was full of flattery, and I do not think it ſtrange, you ſhould not believe it was made for me: but my diſcourſe, Madam, is moſt ſincere, and true. I ſhould be very angry it ſhould, (ſaid ſhe interrupting me) both in reſpect of your intereſt, and my own. Why then you muſt, (ſaid I unto her) for it is not more true, that you are the faireſt Lady upon Earth, than it is certain, that I am the moſt— Stop there, Philocles (ſaid ſhe) leſt you force me to anſwer you more ſharply; and know, if I could not know you when I would, I will not know you when I could. You might have known me Madam, (ſaid I unto her) in knowing your ſelf, ſince it is not poſſible you can be ignorant of the force which is in thoſe inevitable Charms of your Beauty, your Mind, your Wit, and how they have charmed me every way unto your Service.

No, Philocles, ſaid ſhe unto me, deceive not your ſelf, I never knew any thing, but what I had a deſire to know: my Eyes do never ſhew me any thing but what pleaſes me, and my Reaſon does ſometimes comply with my Deſires, becauſe they are not unjuſt, and alſo yield ſomething unto my Will. It would be more advantagious for me, (ſaid I unto her coldly,) if your Will did yield ſomething unto your Reaſon. What would you have me do? (ſaid ſhe, and laughed) and why do you not take the ſame Counſel which you give me, ſince you have need of it? If my Reaſon (ſaid I unto her) ſhould tell me that it were a Crime to love you, I believe I ſhould endeavour not to commit it. And though mine would perſwade me, replied ſhe, that Philocles were the moſt amiable Man alive, yet Philiſta would not love him. By what way then is it poſſible to come unto your Heart, ſaid I unto her? I know not that my ſelf, anſwered ſhe; and if there be any blind parts, which may conduct any one unto it hereafter, it muſt be chance that makes him find it out. Since it is ſo, anſwered I, I am reſolved to ſeek it all my Life. But not find it for all that, (ſaid ſhe); therefore Philocles trouble your ſelf no further in it.

I did intend to ſpeak further unto her, but divers others came and joyned with us, ſo that our diſcourſe altered, and ever ſince ſhe carefully avoided all manner of private conference with me. In the mean while Antigenes and I did live together, as it were by conſtraint, for we never diſcourſed but of things indifferent. The Name of Philiſta, which was ſo dear unto us Both, was never ſo much as pronounced amongſt us when we were alone together. Antigenes obſerving that the Civilities of Philiſta unto me, did not continue, his diſpleaſure at it did vaniſh: ſo that ſeeing there was nothing to be feared from me, in lieu of hating me as his Rival, he pitied me as his Friend, and reſolved ſome time or other to ſpeak ſincerely unto me concerning it: and coming one Morning unto my Chamber, he ſaid unto me, That he thought himſelf the moſt unfortunate Man in the World, becauſe he imagined that I was in love with Philiſta, as well as he; and proteſted unto me, that if he had obſerved any inclination in her to love me, he would rather die than be any Obſtacle to my Felicity: but ſince he ſaw her Mind was ſo far from any advantagious Thoughts of me, he thought he was not injurious unto me, in falling in love with one whom I could not love before him, ſince we ſaw her both together the firſt time, and ſince the firſt minute of her ſight was the firſt beginning of his Paſſion: Indeed he ſpoke unto me with as much Generoſity as I (a Lover who would not quit his Miſtreſs) could do: and I anſwered him with as much Diſcretion, as a deſperate Man, and one who had ſome Vertue, was capable of, ſpeaking unto a Rival that was more happy than himſelf, and one who he eſteemed as his Friend. I confeſſed ſo ingenuouſly unto him, that I had no lawful cauſe to complain againſt him; but I told him further, that for all that, it was impoſſible for me but to be infinitely angry at his good Fortune; That it was but a piece of raillery to think that two Rivals could ever be true Friends, and that all which Generoſity and Prudence could do in ſuch Caſes, was, to prevent them from being mortal Enemies. Moreover, ſince I was too juſt to deſire him to give over his Deſign, ſo I deſired him not to take it ill I continued mine, and told him, he might well enough agree unto ſo much Liberty, ſince there was very ſmall appearance it would any thing advantage me.

In Concluſion, after a long Conference, we agreed to diſcourſe no more together concerning Philiſta, but both of us to endeavour all we could to obtain her Love: and that he who of us two could arrive at that Honour, ſhould move that fair Lady to pronounce a Sentence of Death againſt him ſhe loved not. After this, Antigenes and I lived better together, and was as civil one to another as any Men could be, who endeavoured all they could to ruine one another. Since the Prince Cleobulus would retain me a long time with him, and ſince I had received new Orders from Periander, which would imploy me longer there, I had the leiſure to put in practice ſuch Expedients, as are uſually advantagious in Matters of Love. I followed Philiſta whitherſoever ſhe went: I was perpetually in Conference with her, I ſpoke of her eternally unto all my Acquaintance, and I applauded no other Beauty but hers, but was continually, whenſoever I had any occaſion, extolling her to the Heavens: I compoſed Verſes in her Honour, which were better reliſhed by all the Court than thoſe of Antigenes, though perhaps his were more ingenious: I added Muſick unto my Poetry; I compoſed Airs as well as Words, and ſung them my ſelf with all the Art I had, ſo joining the Charms of Harmony unto my Expreſſions; I ſighed as I ſang, and endeavoured to enchant her Heart by her Ears; I was at vaſt Expences in Clothes, in Balls, in Collations, and Banquets, and in all manner of Liberalities; I got the Friendſhip both of all her Friends, and all her Lovers: Alaſis her Father loved me very well; a Brother ſhe had did not hate me; her Women, and all her Domeſticks, were all won by my Gifts; I ſpoke unto her with as much Reverence as he who approaches unto the Gods; I expreſſed my Paſſion both in Verſe and Proſe; my Tears alſo did often plead in my behalf: The violence of my Love did ſometimes, whether I would or no, blow fury in my Eyes, and deſpair into my Diſcourſe: I ſaw I was vexed, jealous, my Face changed; and to ſay all in few Words, the moſt miſerable Man in the World; yet I could not alter her Heart from that ſtubborn averſion which ſhe had towards me. I remember that one of her intimate Friends, who afterwards became mine alſo, asked her one day, Whether it was poſſible ſhe ſhould not eſteem me, ſince I had the good Fortune to get ſome ſhare in the eſteem of all the World beſides? She did then acknowledg unto him, that ſhe knew very well I did not deſerve thoſe rigid treatments I received from her: yet for all that, ſhe could not help it: and that ſince ſome Men do fall in Love, when they know no reaſon for it; ſo it was no wonder if there were ſome which hated, when they had no cauſe. But (ſaid that Friend unto her) thoſe who love, as you ſay, do ordinarily reſiſt againſt their Paſſion. It is true, replied ſhe, but it is only becauſe that Paſſion might move them unto ſome diſhonourable Actions. And do not you (replied her Friend) act ſome unjuſt ones? No, anſwered Philiſta, for I am not bound to love all the gallant Men which are in the World; but eſteem my ſelf very happy, that I have ſo good a Remedy againſt ſo terrible an Enemy. But (ſaid this charitable Confident further unto her) why do you not defend your ſelf with the ſame Arms againſt Antigenes, which you uſe againſt Philocles, ſince you do only fight for your own Liberty? Cruel Friend (ſaid ſhe unto him) urge me not ſo far, I conjure you, and force me not to tell you that which I dare not think upon without a Bluſh: Content your ſelf with this Conſideration only, that Love and Hatred are two tyrannical Paſſions, which oftentimes do mock both at Reaſon and Prudence: all that I can ſay unto you, is, that I have not reſiſted that ſtrong Averſion which I have unto Philocles, becauſe it can never do me any harm, and that I have much reſiſted againſt that Sympathy and Inclination I have towards Antigenes, becauſe it may be prejudicial unto me.

Thus did this Conference paſs, whilſt we were every Day with the Princeſs, unto whom all the Ladies reſorted, but amongſt the reſt, Steſilea, who indeed was a very paſſable Beauty, was moſt frequent: This Lady had a good Wit, but ſuch a jealous and envious Mind, that ſhe wiſhed her ſelf the only fair one in all the World; yet was my Heart ſo altogether taken up with Philiſta, that I perceived not things moſt viſible. So that I, not knowing ſhe abhorred her Rival in Beauty, did ſometimes diſcourſe with her: ſhe was ſo crafty, and full of Spirit, or at leaſt made many believe ſo, that indeed ſhe ſuited her ſelf with my Humour: ſhe began to diſſwade me from my Paſſion; afterwards to pity me, and complain of the Incivilities of Philiſta towards me, and of her Indulgence towards Antigines, and carried the matter with ſo much Art, that her Company was more agreeable unto me, and requiſite to comfort me. Then did I diſcover the Bottom of my Heart unto her, I laid open all my Imbecility before her, and conjured her to become my Friend; I asked her Advice; I moved her to ſuffer me that I might relate late all my Misfortunes unto her, beſeeching her to have Thoughts of Pity towards me, ſince Philiſta had none. She hearkned to all this, as if ſhe had been all Goodneſs; ſhe was much moved at my Miſery, and made me value her at ſo high a Rate, that I eſteemed her as a moſt ſincere Friend: I had not one jealous Thought, but I imparted it unto her: As ſoon as Philiſta had looked upon me with any Diſreſpect, or any Roughneſs, I made my Complaint unto Steſilea. So that ſince Philiſta did avoid all Occaſions of ſpeaking with me, and ſince Steſilea on the contrary, gave me all poſſible Freedom, all the Court in a ſhort time did obſerve my ſecret Conference with this Lady; and ſince they knew, there was a ſecret Hatred between thoſe two Ladies, they could not imagine I would chuſe the Enemy of Philiſta for my Confident, but believed that I had altered my Mind, and that the Continuation of my Addreſſes unto Philiſta were only to hide my new Paſſion unto Steſilea the better. Antigenes was extreamly joyed at it, and all the Court was glad I had cured one Paſſion by another. Steſilea, when I was not with her, was joyed to ſee her Deſign had ſo proſperous Event: Philiſta only in Point of Honour, which reflected not upon me, but Steſilea was moved with much Spite; this fiery and inflexible Spirit was not at all mollified towards me, but her Deſign only was to make me hate Steſilea, if ſhe could, by any kind of crabbed Courſe ſhe could invent.

But to compleat up the Sum of my Misfortunes, ſince I could not be in any Favour with her of whom I would be loved, I was loved by another unto whom I could grant no further than Friendſhip: I muſt therefore tell you, that Steſilea did find ſomething ſo noble, ſo pure, ſo great, and ſo vertuous in my Paſſion unto Philiſta, and ſhe deſired that from me which I could give unto any but the other; ſo that tranſacting for her own Intereſt, ſhe gave me an hundred crafty Counſels which I followed, becauſe they ſeemed to be good, although they did much diſadvantage me concerning Philiſta. This being the State of things, Antigenes came one Morning unto my Chamber; and coming unto me with open Arms; My dear Philocles, ſaid he unto me, what Pleaſure do you take in in concealing your good Fortune, and my own from me? Antigenes, ſaid I unto him, not anſwering coldly unto ſuch Signs of Tenderneſs as he expreſſed; If it be true that I am happy, I am afraid you would not be ſo glad. I proteſt unto you (ſaid he unto me) that your Contentment is as dear unto me, as my own; and I could not be more joyed if the fair Philiſta ſhould love me, than I am that you do not love her any longer. I love the fair Philiſta no longer, ſaid I unto him all amazed! Ah Antigenes, do not deceive your ſelf, for that is ſo rooted a Paſſion in me, that it and I muſt die together. But (replied he, more amazed than I) all the Court, and Philiſta her ſelf, think you are in love with Steſilea. Does Philiſta (ſaid I all ſurprized) think I am in love with Steſilea? Yes, anſwered he, and I, like all the World, believe it alſo. This Diſcourſe did ſo much aſtoniſh me, that I was never more troubled in all my Life than at that time, fearing this might make worſe for me in the Opinion of Philiſta, and grieved that I muſt now be deprived of the Conſolation which I found in the Society of Steſilea; ſo that without any longer Conference with Antigenes, I parted from him, proteſting, that I was never more in love with Steſilea than at that time, and that I would take ſuch Order as ſhould undeceive the World in their Opinion, that I was in love with Steſilea; yet ſince I was upon Terms of Friendſhip with that Lady, and thought my ſelf obliged unto her, and had received Conſolation from her, therefore I conceived it not fit to change my Courſe of Familiarity with her, before I acquainted her with the Reaſon. Going then unto her by a blind way, taking all heed that I ſhould not be perceived, I found her alone in her Chamber only with two of her Women: As ſoon as ſhe ſaw me, ſhe eaſily perceived, that there was ſome new Croſs accident in the Wind. What's the matter Philocles? (ſaid ſhe unto me) Has Philiſta given you ſome freſh Affront? Philiſta (ſaid I unto her) has not much contributed unto the Diſaſter whereof I now complain; but Steſilea againſt her Will is a greater Cauſe than ſhe. She bluſhed at this Diſconrſe, I cannot eaſily gueſs (ſaid ſhe) what harm I can poſſibly have done uuto you, nor know I any but one Remedy which I could wiſh, which is, to remove that Paſſion out of your Heart which torments you, though I know you will not think that which would cure you, to be a Remedy. But Philocles, ſaid ſhe, leave me no longer in Suſpenſe, but tell me I beſeech you, how I have contributed unto that Sorrow which I ſee in your Eyes. Your Beauty ſaid I unto her, is the true cauſe of it. Philocles, ſaid ſhe ſmiling, think well what you ſay unto Steſilea. I do ſo, ſaid I unto her, for if ſhe were not ſo fair as ſhe is, all the Court would not report it that I am in love with her: Philiſta would not have thought it, and Antigenes would not have believed it: but becauſe the Truth is, her Beauty is extream, and becauſe ſhe cannot imagine why I ſhould ſo frequently viſit her, unleſs I give her my whole Heart, therefore they do believe it; all the Court does eſteem me happy in changing my Chains: Antigenes rejoiceth, and Philiſta is angry, and this I have gotten by coming ſo often unto Steſilea. The Truth is, things are brought into ſuch a Condition, that I am forced to deprive my ſelf of the greateſt Comfort I have, which was, to be often with you. Why Philocles, (replied ſhe in a great Amaze) becauſe fond Rumours run that you love me, will you therefore hate me? Heavens guard me, ſaid I unto her, from a Thought ſo unjuſt; for I ſhall eſteem you as long as I live, and my Friendſhip unto you ſhall be as conſtant as my Love is unto Philiſta. But ſweet Steſilea, ſince you are pleaſed to admit of my Confidence only in Relation to my own Intereſt, I hope you will permit me to withdraw my ſelf from ſeeing you upon the ſame Reaſon, to the end I may undeceive Philiſta. The Gods do know, ſaid I further, how difficult it is, to reſolve upon ſuch a Deſign. And the Gods do know, (anſwered ſhe with a Sigh) you have no Reaſon to take ſuch a Reſolution. What then would you have me do? (ſaid I unto her) for if Philiſta continue in a Belief that I love you, ſhe will never love me; and your Beauty is ſo admirable, that as long as I continue my Viſits unto you, ſhe cannot be convinced of the contrary, and therefore I beſeech you, permit me (amiable Steſilea,) to deprive my ſelf of the Happineſs in ſeeing you, eſpecially ſince your Intereſt is not concerned in it: for ſince it is not the Pleaſure of the Deſtinies that my Heart can be yours, I would not contribute any thing unto the Belief which the World aſſumes, whilſt in the mean I am the moſt miſerable Man upon Earth, who out of Fear to diſpleaſe her who loves me not, am forced to quit another, which hath given me ſo many Teſtimonies of her Goodneſs, and who doubtleſs pities me for this laſt Misfortune: Indeed I do (replied ſhe, bluſhing) and perhaps more than I ought. But I am to be lamented as well as you: for if it be ſo that the Court believes you be in love with me, what ſtrange Tales will be told unto my Diſadvantage if you leave off your ſeeing me upon a ſudden? will they not ſuppoſe that you have either fooled Steſilea, or that it is carried ſo out of Subtilty? No, no, Philocles, the Alteration muſt not be ſo ſuddenly; or, if you will needs have it ſo, you muſt in regard of my Honour, make it ſeem as if I treated you ill: but, if ſo, ſaid I, I ſhall not juſtify my ſelf in the Opinion of Philiſta, ſince ſhe will have ſome cauſe to think, that I quitted you, only becauſe you chaſed me away. And indeed, it was the Plot of Steſilea, to make Philiſta think ſo. But Philocles, replied ſhe, do you think that Jealouſy is a bad Procurer of Love: for my part, I think it an excellent good one; and am fully perſuaded that if you were really in love with any other Lady, than Philiſta, ſhe would love you the better for it; Yes, ſaid I unto her, but you muſt imagine that her Affection would be then very indifferent unto me, if I ſhould love her no longer. It's true, replied ſhe, but if this way were leſs unjuſt than Philiſta her ſelf is, you would be for ever happy.

Steſilea pronounced theſe Words in ſuch a manner, that the Tenderneſs of her Friendſhip was of another Nature than mine: and it troubled me ſo much, that the reſt of our Conference was in very ambiguous Phraſes from both Parties, which I believe perſuaded us, that both of us underſtood one another: But ſince I could not alter my Heart, and would not deceive a Lady unto whom I had profeſſed ſo much Amity, I parted from her, complaining againſt my ſelf, and as I believe, giving her ſome Reaſon to complain againſt her ſelf, for the cruel Reſolution I had taken to diſcourſe no more in private, nor to ſpeak with her but very ſeldom. Mean time, ſince this Viſit laſted very long, and was known unto Antigenes, this change in my courſe of living with Steſilea, did not work thoſe Effects I hoped, and the Rumour went, that this Separation was a Compact only 'twixt her and me: inſomuch as Philiſta was not at all undeceived: and Steſilea made high Complaints whenſoever ſhe found Opportunity for it: Saying, it was ſtrange I ſhould have ſo little care of her Reputation, as to ſacrifice it for one who loved me not. During all this while, Philiſta, though ſhe would love me her ſelf, did what ſhe could to make me hate Steſilea; yet, do what ſhe could, I ſtill retained a friendly Opinion of her: It is very true, that it did conduce to my greater Perſecution; for I was even deſperate, to ſee that I was the cauſe of her Diſquiets. Thus ſtood the State of things, when I received an expreſs Order to return unto Corinth: you may imagine into what a damp this drove my Soul. I was to leave a Lady whom I loved, but who loved not me: I forſook another Lady, who did a little love me, and whom I doubted not but ſhould ruin me, as much as ſhe could in the Opinion of Philiſta, during my Abſence: But for one Piece of good Fortune to me, the Father of Antigenes hearing where he was, did peremptorily command him to return, ſo that this was no ſmall Conſolation unto me, nor was the News I heard of Alaſis his returning unto his own Country very ſhortly, leſs joyful to me; but I kept it very cloſe from Antigenes; becauſe I had the Intelligence by an indirect way. The Prince Cleobulus did embrace me at parting, and the Princeſs his Daughter, who indeed was a moſt admirable Lady, gave me a Letter to the Princeſs of Corinth, which was writ no leſs in my Advantage than that I brought. But when I was to bid adieu unto the Princeſs, and afterwards unto Philiſta, that was a doleful Story to me: Antigenes and I met both there together, and I had ſo much Satisfaction by it, that I hindred him from ſpeaking in private unto Philiſta; but yet I found ſo much Diſſatisfaction alſo, as to ſee a notable Difference in the Adieus of this Beauty. Every time ſhe looked upon Antigenes in this laſt Conference, I ſaw in her Eyes a melancholy Cloud, which without any dim unto her Beauty, did augment her Sweetneſs; and when by chance ſhe looked upon me, I could find nothing but Indifferency, or Diſdain; ſhe bid me adieu, and hardly looked upon me; but her Eyes followed the happy Antigenes, as far as they could poſſibly ſee. To tell you how Antigenes and I lived together, during our Navigation, would be ſuperfluous, it being eaſy to be imagined we muſed continually upon the matter; and hardly ſpoke a Word, but thought the more. I was ſomething comforted, in that I brought my Rival away with me. As for Steſilea, I took no leave of her, though I endeavoured it: Deſpight and Sorrow, and Honour, would not let her diſcover her Weakneſs. At the laſt we arrived at Corinth, where Periander, and the Princeſs Cleobuline received me with Joy: but yet there were no Delights to be found in it for me: I ſhunned all ſuch Company, as formerly I was wont to court: Arion only was he who did a little comfort me, for he was of a great Spirit, and paſſionate Soul: I found in his Diſcourſe and Songs, I knew not what kind of charming Power, which did allay my Sorrows, and keep me alive. Mean time, I was even deſperate to ſee Antigenes would not engage himſelf unto any freſh Beauty: and thus did I live for almoſt a whole Year. But in the end, it was known that Alaſis Father of Philiſta would come with his Daughter (for he had not a Wife) to inhabit in his ancient Country. Oh Heavens! how this News rejoyced me! But this Joy was qualified when I underſtood, that the elder Brother of Philiſta had married Steſilea, a little before their Departure from Jaliſſa, and that ſhe came alſo with them: Indeed this Marriage did much augment my Sorrows, yet did I hope, that ſince Steſilea was vertuous, the Change in her Condition would work upon her Soul, and that it would be more advantagious unto me to have a Friend ſo neer allied unto Philiſta. Antigenes was ſo glad of this News, that his Joy appeared in all his Actions, which did not a little trouble me. But in Concluſion, this long'd-for Company arrived: You may very well imagine, that I prepared the Mind of Periander, of Meliſſa, and of the Princeſs Cleobuline, to receive that Lady who was ſo infinitely dear unto me, very favourably: and I was ſo happy as to underſtand that Philiſta knew how I had done her that good Office: But though ſhe did acknowledg her ſelf obliged unto me for it, yet did ſhe love me not a whit the better, but came unto Corinth the very ſame I left her at Jaliſſa, which was, very bitter againſt me, and very ſweet unto Antigenes: As for Steſilea, I found a notable Alteration in her; for her Beauty was a little impaired, and ſhe had a Mask of ſo ſad a Melancholy on her Face, that I durſt never ask her the Cauſe; and ſince I did not ſeek for any Occaſions to ſpeak in private with her, ſhe alſo did avoid them as well as I. In the mean while, there was nothing which I did not, that might divert Philiſta, for ſhe durſt not openly refuſe my Civilities, becauſe her Father, having ſome Obligations upon him towards me, would have took it ill from her. I ſhewed her then all that was delightful in Corinth: Poor Arion did ſing ſo often to her for love of me, as I was aſtoniſhed, that a Voice and a Harp, which charmed the Dolphins, could not ſweeten the Fierceneſs of her obdurate Soul. But ſhe was all this while immoveable. Steſilea for her part, was not only reſolute never to expreſs any Teſtimonies of her Affection to me, but intended to cheriſh that Averſion which Philiſta had unto me: and indeed this unjuſt Lady, ſince their new Alliance, had perſuaded Philiſta, that I was in love with her. So that Philiſta did treat me worſe at Corinth, than at Jaliſſa. I could never go unto Philiſta, but I found Steſilea in her Chamber, or elſe Philiſta was in hers, which angred me to the Heart; for I think there is nothing more irkſome, than every day to ſee together one whom I love, which loves not me, and another who loves me, and I love not her; though her whom I do love, thinks that I do love her whom I do not love. Yet did I endure this Torment a long time, without finding any Conſolation in any thing, and not obtaining one favourable Word from Philiſta. I remember one day, when I came unto this hard-hearted Lady, one deſired to ſpeak with Steſilea: I took hold of that Opportunity, and beſeeched her to tell me, if ſhe could poſſibly remember all the Sorrows which I ſuffered at Jaliſſa, and not have ſome Thoughts of Repentance? Then did I repeat the Original of my Love, and a hundred Thouſand petty things, which had taken ſo deep a Root in my Heart, that I reſented them as if they were yet to come: But Philiſta hardly hearing me, did anſwer me far from the purpoſe, and in ſuch a ſlighting manner, as would have cauſed any other than my ſelf, to have out-run his Patience. Since I did complain in moſt reſpective manner; Truly Philocles (ſaid ſhe unto me, ſmiling) you muſt pardon me, for I do not remember what you ſaid unto me; I know very well, that I had the Honour to ſee you at Jaliſſa; but to imagine, that I ſhould here remember either what you ſaid, or what you did there, would be to abuſe your ſelf; for I uſe to charge my Memory with very few things; Time paſt, and time to come, are two things I never think on. What, moſt unjuſt Lady (ſaid I unto her) do you not remember how oft I have told you how paſſionately I loved you! Although I ſhould remember ſuch a thing (replied ſhe) yet ſhould you be never the better for it. Then repeating the Places where I expreſſed my Paſſion, ſometime in the Garden, other times at the Princeſs of Lindus's Lodgings, and ſeveral times at her own, I perceived that ſhe did not remember one quarter of thoſe things I told her; which vexed me more than if ſhe had given me the worſt Language, there being nothing ſo offenſive, nor a greater Sign of Scorn or Indifference, than Oblivion. Is it poſſible (ſaid I unto her, being much moved and grieved at it) that I ſhould remember all the Actions of Philiſta, all her Words, and even all her Looks, and that ſhe would not remember one of the hundred thouſand Torments which I endured, and which ſhe cauſed? Oh moſt obdurate and cruel Woman! muſt I be more unhappy than ever? What do you think, ſaid ſhe (laughing at my Anger and Complaints)? I thought to be only hated (ſaid I unto her) but by this cruel Oblivion, I ſee I am in a more deplorable Condition than I thought: ſince I am moſt certainly ſcorned: I ſee now you have a Soul which is not only inſenſible of me, but (if it may be permitted me to ſay it) it is a moſt dead Soul; you look upon me, and will not ſee me; you hear me, and will not underſtand me, nor am I certain whether or no you hear me now. Yes, anſwered ſhe, and I underſtand very well that you tell me of one of the moſt fantaſtical things in the World, but I will not promiſe you to remember it when you are out of my ſight. In the Name of the Gods (ſaid I unto her) treat me not thus: hate me, if you cannot love me; but do not forget all that I do and ſay. Why, Philocles, (ſaid ſhe unto me) had you rather be hated than forgotten? Without all queſtion I had, anſwered I. But in the mean time, (replied ſhe) there is nothing more contrary to Love, than Hatred. Pardon me (ſaid I unto her) for there is at the leaſt ſome thought in a Soul which hates; nor is it abſolutely impoſſible, but Love may kindle amongſt the Sparks of Anger; but a cold and inſenſible Soul, which retains no memory of all one does to move it, what hopes is there of any Tenderneſs or Acknowledgment? How can it ever love thoſe it never thinks on? But yet (replied ſhe) I cannot conceive it better to be hated than forgotten. Alas, fair Philiſta, ſaid I unto her, you were never either hated, or forgotten: But I, whom you have cauſed to know both too experimentally, do really profeſs I had rather you would remember me, and hate me, than not remember me at all. Yet hatred, in my Opinion, is a very great obſtacle unto Love, ſaid ſhe. Yes, ſaid I, but Oblivion is a greater, ſince it is an abſolute impoſſibility any Love ſhould ariſe out of it, as it poſſibly may out of Anger or Hatred.

In one word, Madam, I think it ſo inhumane an Act to baniſh an unfortunate Lover out of remembrance, that I think it leſs cruelty to put him unto Death: Baniſh me out of your Heart therefore, Madam, if you cannot endure me, but leave me I beſeech you a little room in your Memory: forget if you pleaſe to ſpeak ill of me, and to complain of me for loving you ſo obſtinately againſt your will, but I beſeech you forget not how my Love has importuned you: Is this Philiſta (ſaid I unto her) of which I now beg too much? Yes, replied ſhe, for Hatred is a turbulent Paſſion, which diſturbs the reſt of all thoſe who have it; whereas Oblivion, on the contrary, is a dull ſleepy Spirit, which has nothing of Choler in it, and which makes one paſs away their time with pleaſure. Then (ſaid I unto her, not being Maſter of my own Reſentments, ſo much was I incenſed) I beſeech you forget the Delights, which the Converſation of Antigenes affords you, as well as the perplexity which the Company of Philocles does cauſe: No, (replied ſhe in a ſcoffing raillery) I have a better way than ſo, for I always remember what pleaſes me, and forget what perplexeth me. As I was beginning to anſwer, the Princeſs Cleobuline entred, and I immediately went out, it being impoſſible for me to ſtay any longer with her who denied me every thing but her Hatred. It ſeemed after this, that Fortune began to ſmile a little upon me, but it was only to make me more ſenſible of her Frowns, as afterwards you ſhall know It fell out ſo, that Antigenes was forced to go unto Thebes upon ſome urgent Occaſions; ſo that I enjoyed ſo much happineſs as to be quit of my beloved Rival, and in his abſence to ſpeak with more liberty unto Philiſta: but the more I entertained her, the more did it augment her Averſion, and to that extremity, as ſhe could not endure me: Yet did I ſollicite, as if I were not out of all hopes: I courted the Friendſhip of her Brother, and of Alaſis, very diligently, and I ſo obtained it, that both of them did openly teſtify they ſhould be very glad to have Philiſta marry me. My Uncle, who liked of this Alliance, and knew I was in love with this Lady, did ſpeak to them concerning me, after he had firſt written unto my Father about it, but ſpoke not a word to me, until after they had given him favourable Anſwers. So that I ſaw no Obſtacles at all, but only Philiſta her ſelf; but that was ſo great a one, as it was invincible. Her Father had no ſooner commanded her to look upon me as one who was to be her Husband, and expreſſed himſelf ſo peremptorily that he expected an abſolute Obedience, without any reſiſtance, but ſhe fell into extream deſpair: ſhe imployed Steſilea to her Brother, but in vain, and indeed ſhe found all her Tears, her Complaints, and her Prayers to no purpoſe. In the mean time, the Rumour of this Marriage ran all about, and all the Court rejoiced for the love of me; and every one came unto her to tender their complemental Service: but, to avoid ſuch Perſecutions, ſhe feigned to be ill, and by this cunning Device ſhe deprived me, as well as the reſt, of her ſight. Steſilea was with her all this while, doing me as ill Offices as ſhe could; and aſſiſting Antigenes to my prejudice. The Melancholy of Philiſta was ſo extream, that ſhe became ſick in earneſt in feigning to be ſo, and ſo ſick too, that Phyſicians thought ſhe would die; but afterwards, ſhe recovered, and was able to endure Company, but yet ſhe continued in a languiſhing manner, and ſo very melancholy, that her Humour could not be known. I, among the reſt, came to ſee her, and ſhe durſt not deny me: yet did I ſee her almoſt without any ſatisfaction, out of any Opinion I was the cauſe of all her Ill.

During this time, many did ſpeak unto her in my behalf; and the Princeſs Cleobuline would needs know of her why ſhe carried the Matter ſo violently againſt me? but ſhe could not poſſibly get any other anſwer from her, but that ſhe did not know the Cauſe her ſelf; ſhe agreed with the Princeſs, that I was of ſuch a Family, as that Alliance with me would be an Houour unto hers; that I had a better Eſtate than ever ſhe could hope for; that I had a fair Eſteem in the World; and doubtleſs I loved infinitely, ſince I continued it notwithſtanding her extream Diſdain: but yet for all this, ſhe would always ſay that ſhe could never love me: and that there was ſomething in her Heart which ſhe could not maſter, and which was oppoſite unto any thing that would be advantagious unto me. But, ſaid the Princeſs unto her, Is it not your Secret choice of Antigenes, which denies Philocles any entrance into your Heart? No, (ſaid ſhe unto her) for though I had no liking at all unto Antigenes, and though my Heart were abſolutely free, yet ſhould I ever have an averſion to Philocles: for indeed, ſince I do not hate him out of any Reaſon, but out of a Secret Cauſe, which I underſtand not, I need ſeek no further.

The Princeſs who did me the honour to favour me, ſeeing the Fancy of Philiſta, endeavoured to withdraw my Affection; but ſince there was ſo great a ſympathy in me to love her, as there was antipathy in her to hate me; ſhe could not prevail. I did acknowledg, againſt my mind, that there was in Corinth as excellent Beauties as Philiſta every whit, as ſprightly and noble; but yet for all that I could not chuſe but love her above them all: ſo that finding as great an impoſſibility to make me forget her, as there was to move her to love me, ſo we continued both moſt miſerable. Steſilea only found in her Heart ſome malignant ſatisfaction at our Misfortunes, taking much pleaſure, doubtleſs, to ſee that Man whom ſhe had loved, to be hated by her he loved: and alſo to ſee her whom ſhe imagined to be the Cauſe why ſhe was not loved again, to be miſerable, both by my paſſion, and her own. In the mean while Alcaſis was much incenſed again Philiſta, ſo much as he ſent her word, he was reſolved to ſee her no more until ſhe reſolved to marry me, and live complacentially towards me: her Brother was in the ſame Humour: ſo that ſhe having no hopes in her, but all deſpair, ſhe lived ſo melancholy a Life, that all the Court diſcourſed of it. Yet ſhe ſuffered not alone, for I did participate of her Miſeries in a moſt cruel manner: ſometime I would needs reſolve to love her no longer, and almoſt imagigined my ſelf able to do it: But alas, I had no ſooner took up that Reſolution, but my walk carried me unto her, whether I would or no. Antigenes was all this while abſent, and there was none to cauſe all my Miſeries, but Philiſta. One day when I was with her, when it fortuned, Steſilea, contrary to her Cuſtom, was abſent; after ſome Ladies which were with her were gone away; we both of us did ſit mute, and ſpoke not a word to one another. Philiſta deeply muſing, and never looking at me, and I continually gazing upon her, and durſt not begin Diſcourſe: I found ſo great an alteration in her Face, that I wondred at it. But when ſhe looked up, and I perceived her Eyes ſo full of Tears, which ſhe could not reſtrain, tho ſhe did endeavour it as much as poſſible; I was ſo ſenſibly moved at it, that it was impoſſible any ſhould be more.

Madam, ſaid I unto her, May I take ſo much liberty, as to ask, Whether thoſe Tears which I ſee, proceed from any Cauſe which is known unto me? Yes, ſaid ſhe, in a languiſhing manner; and more than that, you may cauſe them to ceaſe. I, Madam, (ſaid I unto her). Yes, replied ſhe; for if you were as generous as you ſhould be, I ſhould be at more quiet, and you alſo: and indeed, Why cannot you hate me? The ſame Queſtion may be asked, Madam, (replied I) Why cannot you love me? The Reaſon is, ſaid ſhe, Becauſe I cannot. The ſame Reaſon is for me, Madam, ſaid I unto her, for I can no more ceaſe from loving you, than you ceaſe from hating me. Know then, however, ſaid ſhe, that by reaſon of this Impoſſibility, I am not in any Fault. Be pleaſed to know alſo, by the ſame Reaſon, (anſwered I) that I am moſt unfortunate, ſince I cannot live without you, nor you live with me: But I better underſtand upon what Reaſon I love you, than I do what Reaſon you have not to endure my Love. Look for neither any Reaſons, nor Excuſes, for what I do, ſaid ſhe, for I look not for any my ſelf. Perhaps, ſaid I unto her, that Time, and my Services, may at length alter your Mind. No, Philocles, replied ſhe, deceive not your ſelf: I have hitherto carried the matter as well as I could; I have invented Pretences and Excuſes to defer the Marriage, which my Father will needs make up with you: I have counterfeited my ſelf Sick, and that ſo long until I was really ſo; but for all this, if my Father, or you, or both, do not alter your Reſolutions, I am fully reſolved to diſobey him openly, and by Conſequence be blamed by all the World; yet I cannot do otherwiſe. Alas, Madam, ſaid I unto her, Are you abſolutely determined to oppoſe my good Fortune? Call not that Marriage good Fortune, ſaid ſhe, which would be ſo diſadvantagious both for you and me; for what pleaſure can you find in ſeeing me perpetually Melancholy, and receiving an hundred Signs of indifferency from me? No, Philocles, you would not find any Happineſs in it, and therefore fore if you be wiſe, think upon ſome other Courſe: and I am ſo generous, ſaid ſhe, as that I would not puniſh a Man who loves me (as you do) ſo cruelly; nor is your own Intereſt in this Buſineſs, leſs concerned than mine: And I am moſt certain, ſaid ſhe, that I ſhould never marry you, although the whole Earth would be given to purchaſe my Conſent. I do conſider alſo, that affecting Honour, as I do, I ſhould think my ſelf infinitely obliged unto you, if you would not force me to an urgent neceſſity to reſiſt my Father, but of your ſelf reſolve to forſake me. To forſake you, Madam! (ſaid I unto her, with extream ſorrow) O Heavens! how can I obey you? Had you rather (ſaid ſhe) that I ſhould look upon you as my Perſecutor, and that I ſhould turn my Indifference into Fury againſt you, and Deſpair againſt my ſelf? And have you a mind to make me as miſerable, as you are unfortunate? You may very well think, that if I could love you, I would obey my Father: But ſince I am not able to do it, what grand Injuſtice is it to wiſh me unto things above my Power? No Dominion was ever ſo Tyrannical, as that which one pretends unto over the Soul. Think well with your ſelf, Philocles, conſider it, and if there be any Reaſon remaining in you, make uſe of it in qualifying your own Misfortunes, and making mine to ceaſe. Madam, ſaid I unto her, do you intend that I ſhould leave you the liberty to marry Antigenes? O no, no, I love you too well ever to conſent to it. If I were perſwaded that your diſdain of me, proceeded from a natural antipathy, which you could not overcome, I ſhould then be ſo reſpective of you, as that I would reſolve to die, in reſolving never to expreſs any more ſymptoms of my Love, or perſecuting you any longer: But, unjuſt Lady that you are, ſince your averſion to me is cauſed only by your Inclination unto Antigenes, and that you would not caſt off Philocles, but only to give him room in your Affection; be pleaſed to know, that I cannot brook it, nor will ever ſuffer it. Antigenes, ſaid I, has been my Friend, 'tis true; but ſince he is become my Rival, he muſt prepare himſelf to unlooſe the Bands of Friendſhip. I have hitherto reſtrained my Reſentments, I have ſeen him favoured and loved; but I can never ſee him the Husband of Philiſta: And therefore, to make all Parties Happy, alter your Deſign, Philiſta. It muſt be the Gods muſt alter it, anſwered ſhe; and ſince I cannot think they ever will, all that I can ſay unto you is, That although Antigenes were not in the World, though I had never known him, yet ſhould I be the ſame unto you I am. But however, Madam, ſaid I unto her, confeſs the Truth, Antigenes ſhould have the Honour to be the fair Philiſta's Choice, if Alaſis would conſent unto it. I am too ſincere, replied ſhe, to deny what you ſay. O moſt cruel Lady, ſaid I unto her, will you make me abſolutely deſpair? But, Philocles, ſaid ſhe, would you have me loſe my Reaſon? What right have you to any part of my Will? Did I ever give you any hopes, ſince the firſt time I ſaw you? No, ſaid I unto her, but you have procured in me abundance of Love. Am I to blame, replied ſhe? Have I not an hundred times deſired you to ceaſe from loving me? 'Tis true, all that ever you ſaid unto me was in vain, for Philocles ſhall never enjoy me. And I ſwear by the Heavens, ſaid I, Antigenes ſhall never enjoy Philiſta, as long as Philocles lives. I had rather chuſe that Misfortune than the other, (replied ſhe). Would you ſo? (ſaid I, with a Mind full of Anger, Jealouſy, and Love). I have already told you ſo, anſwered ſhe. Since it is ſo, (purſued I) be pleaſed to know, that if you will, you may be rid of the unfortunate Philocles; he ſhall not perſecute you any more; nor unleſs you pleaſe, ſhall ever ſee you again. Which way (ſaid ſhe) can I obtain ſo great a happineſs? By breaking off with Antigenes, ſaid I unto her, and ſolemnly promiſing never to ſee him no ofter than me: for to imagine, that you ſhould caſt me off, and I ſuffer you to enjoy a thouſand happy days with my Rival, is a thing impoſſible. I know very well, Madam, that I do in ſome ſort tranſgreſs againſt the reſpect which I owe you; but whoſoever has no more reaſon than I have, is not ſubject to any Law of Complacency. Speak then, Madam, I beſeech you, Is it your pleaſure, Philocles ſhall ſee you no more? It is in your Power, and you may do it preſently. If I were your Wife, replied ſhe, what would you then do? If I ſhould enjoy that Honour, ſaid I unto her, I ſhould then truſt my ſelf with your Vertue; but ſince I am only the object of your Averſion and Diſdain, I muſt truſt unto my ſelf: Therefore, Madam, if you would not have me move Alaſis to compel you unto what he has promiſed me, write a Letter unto Antigenes, which ſhall abſolutely forbid him to ſee you at his return; and I ſhall immediately leave you in Peace, upon condition that the Promiſe which you ſhall make, be ſincere; which is, that you will never marry Antigenes. You tell me of ſuch horrid things, (anſwered ſhe) that I cannot poſſibly endure them. You alſo have given me ſuch diſmal Anſwers, replied I, that I wonder I can hear them and live; but however Antigenes ſhall never thrive by my diſgrace. Yet ſince I can never be yours, replied ſhe, Why ſhould you care whoſe I be? Why, Madam? (ſaid I unto her) alas, you do not know the Fury of that Paſſion which rules in me, to think there is no difference between a Rival that is loved, and another which is not. I know, that to loſe the poſſeſſion of her one loves, is a cruel Fate; but to ſee her enjoy the Rival which ſhe loves, is infinitely more terrible; therefore never imagine that I can ever change my Thoughts: Allow me then ſome time to conſider upon ſuch a fatal Propoſition. I am contented, Madam, (ſaid I unto her, ſighing); and afterwards aſſuming more calmneſs of Mind, I would to the Gods, Madam, ſaid I, that during this time of conſideration, you would change your Thoughts of me. And thus in a moſt unquiet Mind did I leave Philiſta; for ſhe ſaw I had given her an occaſion to be delivered of all my Importunities; yet it was upon condition, to quit her ſelf from Antigenes whom ſhe loved. On the other ſide, ſhe fear'd that if ſhe perſiſted any longer in her Obſtinacy, her Father would either force her to marry me, as there was great likelihood he would, or elſe I would kill Antigenes: for my part I was in no leſs perplexity than ſhe, for I had ſeen Philiſta ſo ſick, or altered, and ſo melancholy, that I feared it might prove the cauſe of her Death. Moreover, I thought ſuch an angry piece of Buſineſs, to force her Inclination in marrying me againſt her Will, by the Authority of her Father, that I could hardly reſolve upon it: Sometimes a generous Diſdain made me aſhamed of my unworthy Perſeverance; but preſently after Love became predominant, and took up its firſt place, chaſing all other Thoughts from my Heart: Sometimes Anger would ſo tranſport me, that I would not marry her, but only to take her from Antigenes, and treat her ill afterwards, this ſeeming the ſweet way of all: Sometimes again, when my Mind was more ſerene, I would win her no way but by my Submiſſions: But the reſult of all my thoughts was, That Antigenes ſhould never marry her. Mean while Alaſis was angry at the proceeding of his Daughter, and began to haſten on the Marriage, ſending her word by her Brother, That it was his peremptory Pleaſure ſhe ſhould conſent unto it. Seeing her ſelf then in ſuch a narrow and deſperate Condition, ſhe ſent for me; and with Tears in her Eyes, Philocles, (ſaid ſhe to me) you have overcome me. Ah, Madam, ſaid I unto her, is it poſſible? Yes, ſaid ſhe, and upon condition you will break off with my Father, I promiſe you to break off with Antigenes. O Heavens, Madam, ſaid I unto her, how diſmal is this Victory? and how dear do I buy thoſe Tears? But, Madam, ſaid I, can you caſt off Antigenes, purpoſely to caſt off Philocles? Keep, ſaid ſhe, within the limits of your Propoſition, unleſs you intend to drive me into ſome deſperate Reſolution. Philiſta pronounced theſe words in ſuch a manner, that notwithſtanding my choler, I did pity her. Madam, ſaid I unto her, what aſſurance can I have that you will caſt off Antigenes? This Letter, ſaid ſhe, which you ſhall give, or ſend unto him. I beſeech you, added ſhe, ſince I do for you all that I can, do for me what you ought, and ſee me no more I conjure you. In ſaying ſo, ſhe left me, and went into her Cloſet; but ſo pale, ſo changed, and ſo much ſorrow in her Eyes, that I ſaw Antigenes was more in her favour than I had thought. It is not eaſy for me to tell you the ſtate of my Soul at that time: I quitted her, and her Chamber, and went unto my own, where opening Philiſta's Letter, I read theſe words.

PHILISTA unto ANTIGENES.

SInce Philocles hath promiſed me to ſee me no more, I do conjure you, by that Power which you have given me over you, to do the ſame. This is the only way which can keep me from becoming his; and it is by his Will only, that mine is not tyrannized over by my Father. To prevent my marrying of him, whom I love not, I muſt deprive my ſelf of him, whom doubtleſs I would have loved, if it had been permitted me. But what ſhould I do? the Fates will have it ſo, and there's an end: Mean time remember, that I expect Obedience from you, and that I never ſee you; alſo that you neither quarrel with Philocles, nor he with you, concerning me: for ſince he deprives himſelf of all he loves, (which is my ſelf) for the love of me: It is but juſt that you do as much for him, ſince it conduceth to the Tranquillity of

PHILISTA.

O Heavens, what variety of Thoughts did this Letter beget in me! One while I was pleaſed in thinking Antigenes ſhould ſee Philiſta no more; immediately after I was all Sorrow to ſee how ill I ſtood in her Fancy. I thought an hundred times, and an hundred, to alter my Reſolution; and as oft again to follow thoſe Reſolutions I had taken. I deſired a Friend of mine to go unto Alaſis, and to beſeech him moſt humbly that he would not uſe any forcings upon the Inclination of Philiſta, but at the leaſt to give her ſome time to conſider upon it. It ſo fell out, that I was to take a Journy upon ſome important buſineſs, and was within a few days to leave Corinth; Alaſis began preſently to ſuſpect the truth, and would needs have it ſo, that notwithſtanding the averſion of his Daughter I muſt marry her; but I departed, without bidding adieu unto any, and went unto Antigenes; you may eaſily imagine that I undertook this Journy with extream Sorrow. As ſoon as I came to Thebes, I enquired where Antigenes lodged, and found the place, but they told me, that he was gone into the Gardens, which are beyond the Caſtle of Cadmus; being

ing ſhewed the way, I went thither, and found him there, with many Beauties, walking in the Walks which were very large: As I eſpied him at the end of one Walk, I paſſed into another, not deſiring to ſpeak unto him before ſo many; and coming unto the end of a Walk juſt oppoſite to that where he was, I ſaw the Converſation of thoſe Ladies and him was very high, gallant, and pleaſant; and me thought, for a Man that was in love at Corinth, he was a little too jocund and merry at Thebes; but ſince I was not in the ſame Humour wherein I ſaw him, I would not mingle into the Company of ſuch who were all unknown unto me but my Rival, but returned and waited for him at his Lodging; ſince it was late before he returned that Night, my Patience would hardly hold out, yet I had ſo great a deſire to give him this cooling News, that I ſtaid ſtill: He was no ſooner come in, but going into the Chamber, where his Men had placed me, I went towards him in a cold kind of manner, but I was much ſurprized to ſee him come unto me with a freer Countenance than ever he did ſince we were Rivals. Is Philocles (ſaid he unto me) at Thebes? O Heavens, is it poſſible! Yes, anſwered I unto him, and he came hither purpoſely to Antigenes, by order from Philiſta. Are you upon ſuch good terms with her (ſaid he unto me) that ſhe ſhould give you any ſuch Commiſſion? You ſhall ſee by her Letter, ſaid I unto him, and gave it him. Antigenes bluſhed in taking of it, and going unto the Table whereon there was a Candle: I confeſs, ſaid he, I cannot gueſs at the buſineſs, but after he had read the Letter, without any ſuch great Reſentment as I expected: No, no, Philocles (ſaid he unto me, repeating ſome words of Philiſta's Letter) Antigenes ſhall not quarrel with you; and though you would quarrel with him, yet he will not ſuffer it to be ſo. I confeſs this Diſcourſe of Antigenes did much ſurprize me; but after he had imbraced me, he told me how the Gods had cured him of his Paſſion: And tho I cannot confeſs it (ſaid he) without ſhame, yet for your Tranquillity, I will acknowledg my Mutability, and tell you that I am now in Love at Thebes, as I was at Corinth. How, ſaid I unto him, is Antigenes, whom Philiſta loves, inconſtant? and is Philocles, whom ſhe hates and ſcorns, faithful? So it is, replied he, and I can give no other reaſon for it, unleſs this, That the Gods would not have me any longer continue a Rival unto one of my deareſt Friends. I did not at the firſt give any Credit unto the Words of Antigenes, but the next Morning he ſhewed me the Lady whom he then loved, who indeed was a Miracle of Beauty. I enquired farther in the Town, and found that ever ſince he came to Thebes, he ſeemed to be in love with her. Then did we renew our ancient Friendſhip; and I returned unto Corinth, with permiſſion from him to make Philiſta acquainted with his Inconſtancy, hoping that perhaps it would conduce unto my advantage: But alas, this Hope was ill bottom'd; for ſhe, not being able to revenge her ſelf upon Antigenes for his Infidelity, would needs caſt all her Revenge upon me, and treated me more cruelly than ever.

At that time her Father died; ſo that now fearing none, but having the Staff in her own hand, ſhe did beat me with it, and not ſee me any more; and, to compleat my Misfortune, this cruel Lady, being well recovered in her Health, and fairer than ever, returned unto Jaliſſa, unto an Aunt of hers there, and a little while after was alſo married there; never ſhewing any thing but ſigns of extream Averſion unto me, or at the beſt, Indifferency: ſo that by Conſequence I may well ſay, that I have not only been deprived of all the Sweets of Love, but have alſo had Experience of all its Bitters, there never being any, without doubt, could equal this. I could not endure the place where I had been ſo long tormented; and notwithſtanding any thing that any could ſay unto me, I left Corinth, and returned unto Cyprus, where I continued adoring that obdurate Lady; ſo that without hopes of being loved I perſiſted ſtill, and ever ſhall do in Love; and by Conſequence muſt be the moſt unfortunate Man that ever loved or lived. Abſence is doubtleſs a moſt ſenſible Evil, but to be abſolutely caſheered out of the Heart of her one loves, is much more cruel than to be only out of her Eyes: this Evil has a thouſand Remedies, which may cure, at the leaſt, comfort it. The remembrance of pleaſing Paſſages joyned unto the hopes of Return, does ſweeten many an hour, whatſoever Thimocrates is pleaſed to ſay; nor do I know whether the Joy and Pleaſure which one takes to ſee his Miſtreſs again after a long abſence from her, be not greater than all the Miſeries that Abſence can cauſe. But to imagine that one is not loved, nor ever ſhall be, this is an incomprehenſible Miſery, at the leaſt to one that hath had Experience of it: for this grand Abſence comprehends all other ſorts of Abſences, ſince in the very preſence of Her one loves, he is abſent from her Heart and Mind, unto which no other Abſence can be comparable. I do confeſs, that doubtleſs the Death of a Miſtriſs is more rigorous than Abſence; but I cannot endure any ſhould ſay, that he who is not loved ſhould be leſs miſerable, than he who loſeth that which he loves. This laſt Evil is certainly a moſt violent one; yet notwithſtanding, according to the intention of Nature, it loſeth ſomething of its Force as ſoon as it is come unto its Limit; but this which I endure, contrary to the order of all the Univerſe, is more violent and durable; the longer it laſts the more it augments, whereas the other on the contrary, does at length diminiſh. That impoſſibility which there is to raiſe one from the dead, makes a Soul reſt it ſelf whether it will or no, in its own Sorrow; it ſhuts it ſelf, as one may ſay, within the Tomb of her he loves, and lulling it ſelf aſleep in the Coffin with her, its Sorrows by degrees does there languiſh, and he has ſome Conſolation there, that he can bedew with Tears the Aſhes of his Miſtreſs. But a ſcorned Lover, who ſees himſelf dead in the Heart of his Miſtreſs, enjoys no Reſt; for being perſwaded that it is not abſolutely impoſſible, but ſome alteration or other may happen in his buſineſs, he plots a hundred ſeveral Devices, which none of them hitting the Mark he aimed at, does continually drive him into Deſpair: all his hope is to be unquiet and not to be comforted; and doing every thing which others uſe to do which may make themſelves loved, he does them all in vain, the more he loves, the more he is ſcorned; or without any power to cure himſelf, or ever deſiring it, he endures an incredible Torment. Jealouſie indeed is a very dangerous Poyſon, but it ſpits not all its Malignity on the Heart of that Lover, who thinks himſelf ſometimes loved; and if Jealouſie can ever be ranked amongſt the greateſt Miſeries, doubtleſs it muſt be, when he who is jealous is perſwaded that the Lady whom he loves, had never one good thought of him. Yet it comes not near that Torment which I endure; for I am perſwaded, that if I had only one ſingle Thought, I ſhould hereafter be loved by Philiſta but one poor Day, the very thoughts of that one Day would ſweeten all my Miſeries, and fortify my hopes as long as I lived. A jealous Man may himſelf imagine that perhaps, what he thinks is not ſo; for that Paſſion does commonly inſpire only incertain Thoughts, and ill-grounded Fancies. But when one finds by a long and a ſad Experience, that there is an abſolute unalterable Averſion in the Heart of Her he loves; what more pleaſant Thought can he have than the deſire of Death? For truly, all the Cares, the Services, the Sighs, the Tears, and every thing elſe which the moſt faithful Lovers do, are all done, that by them they may obtain the Happineſs to be loved; that is all the Recompence of Love, the Prize which is only aimed at, and without it all other things are nothing; and to obtain it, they will willingly ſuffer whole Years of Miſery: He then that is deprived of that which is the End, the Aim, and Wiſh of all Lovers, who ever did love, do love, or ever ſhall love, muſt needs be the moſt lamentable; and I dare affirm, that I ſuffer more than any one in the Word can, and by conſequence, it would be extream Injuſtice not to lament me the more, than any unfortunate Man who ſuffer leſs.

Thus did Philocles relate and end his Story, with his Reaſons, which ſeemed ſo ſtrong unto Marteſia, that ſhe could not forbear her bitter Invectives againſt Philiſta, in ſo much as Philocles was forced to take her part and excuſe her: For my part, ſaid Cyrus, as I muſt needs blame her, ſo I muſt needs pity Philocles: for the Gods it ſeems are much incenſed againſt her, for making her to look upon that as a Misfortune, which would have made her infinitely happy: But ſince ſhe her ſelf, replied Erenice, is the cauſe of her Misfortune, me thinks, Sir, that ſhe deſerves it. Philocles, ſaid Aglatidas, is queſtionleſs, much to be lamented: for if Fortune had only croſſed his Deſigns, he would more eaſily have endured it, than to ſee Philiſta do it. This Miſery is great indeed, replied Thimocrates, but when I think upon what I ſuffer, I think it little. But I conceive it more inſupportable than yours, replied the Prince Artibies, though a thouſand Degrees ſhort of mine: O I wiſh to the Gods, that the adored Lady whoſe loſs I mourn for, were in ſuch a Condition, that I might ſuffer the ſame for her. This is a very ſtrange Wiſh, added Leontidas, yet I do not know whether thoſe which I have often made in my jealous fits, would not ſeem more ſtrange unto you. It is not your time to ſpeak yet, ſaid Marteſia, but if you be pleaſed to think well of it, Sir, ſaid ſhe, and looked upon Cyrus, the Prince Artibies, according unto the Order which you approved of, ſhall tell his ſtory before Leontidas. You are their Judg, replied Cyrus, and it is only you, unto whom they all muſt be obedient, and I believe the Prince Artibies is well pleaſed with it. Then after he had called to mind, all the diſmal Ideas, of his dead Miſtreſs, his Countenance altered, his Eyes were more Melancholy than before, and after he had ſighed two or three times, he began his Story thus.

The Lover in Mourning. The third Hiſtory.

THe remembrance of Misfortunes is doubtleſs very pleaſing unto thoſe who do not endure them any longer, and who like Men eſcaped from Ship-wrack, and out of all Fears, do tell the Dangers they have avoided: But the Miſery which I endure, being eternal, or at the ſooneſt, muſt not end but with Life, it is hard for me to have a Soul ſo free, as to tell you exactly, the original and progreſs of my Paſſion; And though it were poſſible to find ſome ſweetneſs in complaining againſt ſuch Evils, yet would there be none in the remembrance of ſuch paſt Pleaſures, which can never be enjoyed. Pardon me therefore, I conjure you, if I deſcant upon nothing but what is fatally diſmal; and think not ill of me, if my Soul, which is uſed unto no thoughts but Death, does entertain you with dull and melancholy Relations, and fill your Imaginations with nothing but Urns, Coffins, and Tombs. I ſhall not inſiſt to tell you the Reaſons, why the Prince of Sicily my Brother, ſent me unto Thebes, ſince it is not pertinent unto your knowledg, that it was my Paſſion brought me thither: it will be ſufficient to inform you that I was two whole Years there; But perhaps it is not altogether impertinent to let you know that the Princeſs my Mother, was deſcended from the race of Cadmus Son of Agenor, who was ſo illuſtrious amongſt the Thebeans. I went then to Thebes in an equipage befitting my Birth; I was received there with much Honour; and within a few Days I was acquainted with all that were great and noble there. He who then was Poetarch, that is, Captain-General of Poetia, had a Son called Polimnis, near of my Age, with whom I contracted a moſt intimate Friendſhip, and who ſhewed me all the Ladies of Quality in Thebes, amongſt which I found abundance of rare Beauties. But in all the Companies wherein I was, I heard no diſcourſe but of the Sickneſs of one in the Town, whom all Reports made to be the faireſt in the World; and I asked Polimnis whether it was true, that this Perſon whom they ſaid was in danger to die, was fairer than any I had ſeen in Thebes? He aſſured, that ſhe had more Beauty than all the reſt, put them all together; afterwards I underſtood ſhe was his Couſin, and deſcended from Etocles Nephew of Creon, and Son of Jocaſtus, who wore the Crown with ſo many Misfortunes, and that this Lady had all the rare Qualities which could render one moſt perfectly accompliſhed. I began then upon theſe Reports, to intereſt my ſelf in her Condition; and every Day asked Polimnis how this fair ſick

Lady did? not yet being more ſenſible of any Sorrow, as you may well ſuppoſe, than the love of any beautiful things in general might cauſe, and ſuch as natural compaſſion might infuſe into a Man, who had a tender Soul and quick Imagination. However, it was an eaſy Matter to diſcover her Lovers, for they were all of them ſo Melancholy, that the moſt diſcreet amongſt them did ſhew their Paſſions by their Tears, or at leaſt by their Sighs. Upon a day when Polimnis and I paſſed by the Door of Leontina (ſo was this fair Lady called) and the ſame who had cured Antigenes of his love to Philiſta, we ſaw many Men go haſtily in, and ſaw others come out, with Eyes and Faces all Tears. Polimnis ſtayed one of Leontina's Women, whom he ſaw grieving very much, and ſhe told him, that her Miſtreſs was dying, and that ſhe was going to fetch one of her Friends whom ſhe deſired to ſpeak with, before ſhe loſt her Speech. Polimnis, who was of Kin to this ſick Lady, and loved her very well, deſired for me permiſſion to go unto her. I was ſo far from denying him, that I ſaid I would go with him. We entred into the Houſe, where the Condition of Leontina had cauſed ſuch diſorder, that much Ceremony was not to be obſerved: all the Doors were open; all the Domeſtiques in Tears; ſeveral Chambers through which we paſſed were full of People, and when we came near her Chamber, Polimnis having not yet met with any who could exactly tell him the ſtate of his Couſin, left me at the Door, and entred himſelf into her Chamber, which he found full of Men, who had no more Reaſon to enter than he had; and coming near the Canopy of Cloth of Gold, I ſaw upon a Bed which was under it, the incomparable Leontina in a Sound. But O Heavens! how this ſight did ſurprize and trouble me? The ſight of ſo great a Beauty, in ſo pitiful a Caſe, did deeply penetrate my Soul! She lay negligently, on one ſide, with her Head a little turned; her Hair half looſe, her right Arm out of Bed; her Neck a little open, her Eyes ſhut, her Mouth half open, without any ſign of Life; only a weak kind of breathing, which was hardly diſcernible; yet although the paleneſs of Death was upon her Face, I who entred after Polimnis, could ſay, that I never in all my life ſaw any ſo fair. You may well imagine how ſad I was to ſee her in that Condition: and to obſerve, that all Remedies and Phyſick would do her no good, which in an Hour after, I thought, I ſaw her ready to expire. Polimnis, who ſaw me near him, would divers times move me to go out, and avert our Eyes from ſo ſad an Object: but ſeeing none took any notice of us, but that without any offence we might remain there, I held him, and would not let him go out; for I was ſo much moved to ſee Leontina in that Condition, though I had never ſeen it in any othet, that indeed I was turned a very ſtock, and could not ſtir. But at laſt, when I was almoſt paſt all Hopes, I preſently perceived, I ſaw a freſh Colour appear upon the paleneſs of her Cheek, and as it were drive away that Mortal paleneſs which had ſpread it ſelf over all her Face; Preſently after, ſhe opened her Eyes, but though ſhe did immediately ſhut them again, I ſaw ſomething ſo ſplendid in them, that I was dazled: A little after that, ſhe ſighed, and turned her ſelf with ſo much ſtrength, that ſhe gave evident Signs and Hopes of her Amendment; ſo that the Phyſicians being put in ſome Hopes, they cauſed all to go out of the Chamber, but ſuch as might be uſeful, that ſhe might have no more Air, and they better help her. It is impoſſible for me to tell you, how half-dead Leontina did raiſe an immortal Paſſion in my Heart; Let it ſuffice, O my equitable Judg! that you know I loved her, though dying as ſhe was, and compaſſion did ſo moliſy my Heart, that Love wounded it without Reſiſtance.

After this, I was more careful than Polimnis was, to enquire every Day how ſhe did; and alſo more diligent than all the reſt of her ancient Lovers. Mean while it was the pleaſure of the Gods to reſtore her unto the Earth: ſhe recovered, and ſhe lived in perfect Health, and that ſo fair, ſo charming, and ſo admirable in all Things, that I eſteemed my ſelf infinitely happy in being her Slave. Polimnis carried me unto her, as ſoon as ſhe was in a Condition to be ſeen, and I was received with much Civility; I found alſo ſo many Graces in her Mind, that there was no need of any Beauty to captivate mine, if it had not been ſo already. I ſhall tell you, (but follow that rule which I propoſed) how I did all ſuch things, as a ſpringing Love does uſually produce; how I endeavoured to pleaſe her, to divert her, and to get my ſelf into her eſteem: But I ſhall only tell you, that though I was not very unproſperous in theſe three things, yet was it very long before I could receive any Signs of Complacency in her towards my Paſſion. Leontina was very civil, it is true, but ſo ſhe was unto all the World, yet my Love was not at all ſatisfied, but though I thought ſhe did not love me at all, yet did I continue to love her infinitely, as after her recovery it appeared: for ſhe being gone into the Country with ſome of her Friends, there ran a rumour about all Thebes, that ſhe was drowned in going over the River Iſmenes, the Coach being overturned in the midſt of the Water. This ſad Accident was related with all manner of Circumſtances; how Leontina was found Dead, ſome five or ſix paces from the Place where the Coach was broke, and there was no queſtion made of the truth in this tragick News. It is hard for me to tell you how I received it, I loſt my Speech, and almoſt my Life, I cannot tell you what I then ſaid or did, my Reaſon was ſo confounded, and my Sorrows told all the World, that I had much ado to hide my Paſſion, becauſe the humour of Leontina was not to affect thoſe publick Adorers, who make a vanity of their Paſſion: ſince it was two days Journy from Thebes unto the place where they ſaid this diſmal Misfortune happened, it was long before we could be informed of the certainty. But O Heavens! every Hour was an Age, and I paſſed them all without any hopes; and if Polimnis who was acquainted with my Love, had not prevented me, I had gone my ſelf unto the place, where they ſaid Leontina was drowned: But my impatience was ſo high, that I took Horſe, and went out of Town, though it were but to go into the way through which the Corps of Leontina was to come: Polimnis knowing of it, followed me, and deſiring to comfort me, he told me that I was happy his Couſin had been no more favourable unto me, ſince if ſhe had loved me, I ſhould have been much more unfortunate than I was: Ah unjuſt Friend, ſaid I unto him, you know not how to love; do you think it poſſible I ſhould be more grieved than I am? No, no, ſaid I unto him once again, you do not know what are the effects of Love. Alas, (ſaid I, never thinking Polimnis ſtood by) Leontina is dead: Leontina the Beauty of the World is moſt miſerably loſt; ſhe did not love me, it is true, but perhaps ſhe might have loved me hereafter, and becauſe ſhe did not at the preſent love me, muſt I therefore leave lamenting her? And was not my love of her ſufficient to make me eternally bewail her loſs? Yes, yes, (ſaid I, and turning towards Polimnis) there needs no more to prove unto you, that I muſt be for ever joyleſs, I loved Leontina, and I have loſt her, what needs more to make me deſperate? We do never uſe to mourn for them who love us when we do not love them; and we do always mourn for them we love, though they love not us. Lament, lament eternally, and weep for the incomparable Leontina. As I was thus condoling, Polimnis not hearkening unto me, but looking towards a great Plain, (for Boetia is a very flat and open Country) I ſtopped and looked as he did, and caſting my Eyes the ſame way, I ſaw a Coach appear, guarded and coveyed by ſome Horſe: After Polimnis and I had looked a while, whilſt the Coach drew near us, we knew it to belong unto that ſame fair one, whoſe loſs I ſo lamented: Ah Polimnis, (ſaid I diſtractedly) look where they bring the Corps of Leontina: in ſaying ſo, this ſad Object did ſo work upon my Spirits, that my Soul was too weak to ſupport ſo great a Grief: I would have put my Horſe on towards the Coach, which was coming towards us, but not knowing what I did, but having abſolutely loſt my Reaſon, I went backward in lieu of forward; Polimnis coming towards me, ſeeing my Countenance change, my Eyes twinkle, and I holding him by the Hand, ſaid in an undiſtinguiſhable tone, [I ſhall ſee her dead, Polimnis] and after this, he ſaw I let the Bridle of my Horſe fall, and if he had not held me up, I had fallen my ſelf; he then took me by the Arm, and one of my Men helping him, they took me off my Horſe very gently, and ſet me upon the ground ſome two paces from the way, where I lay in a ſound: Polimnis was then in a pityful Caſe, to ſee his Friend dying, and his Couſin dead: but as he was very buſy about me, and the Coach came nearer, he was extreamly ſurpriſed to hear Ladies in it Laughing and Singing; then did he riſe up to look who they were, and he ſaw Leontina in the Boot of the Coach, who knowing him, cauſed it to ſtay, that ſhe might ask him what he was doing there: but caſting her Eyes at the ſame time upon me, Oh Heavens! ſaid ſhe, is not that the Prince Artibius which I ſee? Yes, replied he, it is the ſame, and he is in great need of your help; but ſaid he unto her, How did you riſe from the Dead? for all in Thebes think you ſo. It is not now a time to tell you, (replied ſhe,) but rather to help your Friend: In ſaying ſo, ſhe came out of the Coach, as all the reſt of her Friends did, and commanding one of her Men to go in all haſte unto the next Houſe for ſome Water to fetch me out of my Sound; Leontina did moſt charitably come to me, and laid her Hand upon my Arm, to try how my Pulſe did beat. Mean while he who went for Water, returning, they threw ſome in my Face, and by little and little I revived. But O Heavens! how was I ſurprized to find my ſelf in that Condition, and to ſee my admired Leontina living, though my imagination during this long Sound, was filled with her Death. When Polimnis ſaw that I would revive, he came towards Leontina, who turned towards him, asked what was the cauſe of this Accident: Your ſelf, inhumane Couſin, ſaid he unto her: and then in few Words he told her, the news of her falſe Death was the cauſe of his true and real Sorrow: but though ſhe ſeemed not to believe it, yet ſhe afterwards told me, that ſhe was fully perſwaded of it, eſpecially by my manner of looking upon her, when I returned unto my ſelf, by the Confuſion I was in, to find my ſelf in that Condition, and by an hundred other things which I did and ſaid upon that occaſion.

But in Concluſion, after I was fully aſſured that Leontina was living, and had thanked her for her charitable help, ſhe would not ſuffer me to take horſe, but deſiring her Friends to make room for me, ſhe took me into her Coach, which I was conſtrained to accept of, for I had not yet recovered out of my Weakneſs and Sorrows. In our return to Thebes, I underſtood, how that which raiſed the Reports of her Death, was that indeed ſhe found the River of Iſmenes very high, and being likely to be put to ſwim, ſhe thought of no way but periſhing, yet by good Fortune they turned the Coach back again to the ſide, and it did not overturn until they were near the Banks, ſo that ſhe and all her Friends were eaſily relieved, and rid out of their Fears to be drowned; but they ſtayed a day to refreſh themſelves after this Fright, and reſolved not to continue on their Journey, until the River was lower: ſo it is to be imagined, that ſome or other ſeeing only the Coach overturned, had raiſed this Report. However, this Accident was very favourable unto me; and the mute eloquence of my Sounding had more Rhetorick in it to perſwade Leontina, than all my Words: I found her, me-thought, nothing ſo rigid unto me as ſhe uſed; and if it were pertinent at this time to remember delightful Paſſages, I ſhould tell you that for two Months together, I fully taſted of all the Sweets, which hopes of being loved could feaſt me withal; but ſince it is not at all pertinent, I ſhall only tell you, that after ſo many happy days Antigenes (as you heard from Philocles) arrived at Thebes, and there, as many others did, fell in love with Leontina. As he was a Man of a very pleaſant Converſation, of an agreeable Diſpoſition, quick-witted, and gallant, he moved ſo much jealouſy in me, as maugre all my endeavours, I could not hide it, and I think once I made it too apparent unto Leontina, in ſo much as ſhe was more offended with me for my jealouſy, than ſhe was for my Love, when I had made it known unto her; ſo that both to correct and puniſh me, ſhe treated Antigenes more civilly than ordinary. In concluſion, the matter was ſo carried, that though Leontina knew well enough, ſhe did not love Antigenes, yet to be revenged on me, ſhe reſolved to treat him more favourably than any. And ſince her Heart was not placed in her Forehead, every one believed that ſhe preferred Antigenes before all the reſt of her Servants: and all my Friends at Thebes came to comfort me; in ſo much as my Sorrows and my Spite, made me reſolve to overcome my Paſſion: I contended with it, and I vanquiſhed, at leaſt thought ſo, for I could never look upon Leontina without Anger; I ſhunned her with care, and I thought that I paſſed from one extremity unto another, and hated her. Then did I deſire Polimnis, that we might go and hunt for a certain time at a ſtately Houſe his Father had, about an hundred Leagues from Thebes, beyond Mount Helicon; thither then we went, and my Soul, as I thought, was in much Tranquillity, and ſufficiently diſingaged from Leontina.

Upon a day, a Friend of Polimnis's invited us to a Feaſt, where we were all in our altitudes of Merriment and Joy, with divers other Perſons of Quality in that Neighbourhood. That ſame Day, unjuſt Man that I was, in my height of raillery I mocked two or three Times, at the complacency of Leontina towards Antigenes, my Heart being, as I thought, never better pleaſed, than when I had handſomly twitted the Perſon whom I hated, or thought I had hated: Then it happened that a Man came in, and addreſſed himſelf unto me, who had heard all the Paſſages of our Diſcourſe concerning her; Sir, ſaid he, Artibies will be ſufficiently revenged, for Antigenes ſhall never enjoy Leontina: How, (ſaid I unto the Man) has ſhe quitted him for another, as ſhe did me for him? No, ſaid he, but Death has done it for you both. Is Leontina dead? (ſaid I unto him.) Yes, replied he, ſhe died at Chalcos, whither her Father had carried her: Indeed I underſtood that ſhe had been in the Iſle of Eubeus, for ſince it is ſeparated from Boetia only by a little Arm of the Sea, the Families of Quality do make Alliances one with another, and Leontina had an Aunt at Chalcos. This Man then told me that there came certain news unto Thebes, that Leontina was dead, and that one of his Friends aſſured him in the Iſmenian Temple of Apollo, that he ſaw her Funeral at Chalcos: I looked upon him then, and ſpoke not a word, and afterwards I left the Company very abruptly with an extreamly troubled Mind, and knew not what to think on't. I loſt my ſelf in a Wood, not far from the Houſe, purpoſely becauſe Polimnis ſhould not find me; my Soul was ſadly troubled, my Heart was ſobbing out my Sorrows, and my Reaſon was not againſt the troubles of my Spirit: I would have perſwaded my ſelf, that to loſe her who had treated me ill, and one whom I hated, was rather a good than a bad Fortune. But alas, my imagination no ſooner fancied this adored Lady in her Tomb, but my Hatred vaniſhed, and my Love revived: I did not any longer conſider her as inconſtant, or unjuſt, but did look upon her as the faireſt in the World, and as Her whom above all upon Earth I loved: I made ſome ſlight Attempts to quell my Sorrow, but it was impoſſible for me to do it: and Love, ſince I became paſt all Hopes, returned into my Soul with all its vigour: as ſoon as I apprehended Leontina gone, all other Cogitations vaniſhed out of my Mind; and deſpair was ſo predominant, that I was not a Maſter of my own Actions; I walked ſometimes faſt, ſometimes ſlow; ſometimes I ſtopt, and ſpoke aloud, though I was alone; and ſometimes ſhed Tears in abundance of bitterneſs; and ſometimes again my Heart was ſo full, that I could neither cry, nor ſigh, nor ſpeak: but Polimnis afterwards knowing this news of Leontina's Death from the ſame Man, he ſought me out, and having found me in a moſt deplorable Condition, and, as he told me afterwards, more altered in my Face than ever he ſaw Man in his life; What, ſaid he unto me, can the Prince Artibies lament the Death of her he hated? and is he more troubled at it than I am, who have more Reaſon to grieve than he? My Hatred (ſaid I unto him, ſighing) is dead with Leontina, and my Love is revived to puniſh me for hating her. Indeed, my Grief did cauſe ſuch a prodigious reſentment in my Soul, that I never was more deeply plunged in the gulf of Love than now, and by conſequence never more unfortunate. Two Days together was I in this condition, at the end of which a violent feaver ſeized upon me, but for my cure and comfort, I afterwards underſtood that this news of Leontina's Death was falſe: and that it was true there was an admirable Beauty whoſe Name was alſo Leontina, was dead at Chalcos, but that ſhe was only a Kinſwoman to that Leontina at Thebes; I underſtood alſo, that their conformity in Name and Beauty, had deceived thoſe who had ſpread abroad the rumour of my dear Leontina's Death. Polimnis no ſooner knew this, but coming unto me with open Arms; courage Artibies, (ſaid he unto me, embracing me, and ſmiling) you muſt now begin to hate Leontina again, ſince ſhe is not dead; and then he told me the original of the Errour, which cauſed ſo great a Confuſion in me, that paſſing from extream ſorrow, into the contrary extremity of Joy, my feaver increaſed, and it was thought I would have died that Night following, but the Gods reſerved me for a further Miſery, and reſtored my health; bringing me alſo unto Thebes, where I found Leontina alive; I had a deſire to hate her ſtill, but it was impoſſible. Why (ſaid I ſometimes unto my ſelf) has this falſe Report, which has wrought no alteration in the Heart of Leontina, ſo much changed mine? yet muſt I ſubmit, whether I will or no, unto this new revived Paſſion, which has got the dominion of my Mind: ſometimes I was aſhamed, and ſometimes again I rejoyced at it; ſuppoſing, that to be in the World, and not to love Leontina, was the moſt high injuſtice upon Earth. Yet when ſhe was informed by Polimnis, that my love of her was the cauſe of my Feaver (as indeed ſhe did not hate me) ſhe changed her way of living both with Antigenes and my ſelf: and conferred thoſe Favours upon me, which ſhe withdrew from him, and if he had not gone out of Thebes preſently after, he had found by experience how ſad a thing it was to ſee another better loved than himſelf.

I did then mollify the Heart of Leontina; ſhe permitted me to expreſs my Love unto her, and indeed acknowledged unto me, that if her Parents would conſent unto it, ſhe would like better to live in Sicily, than in Greece, though there was a great Difference, in the

Goodneſs of the Countries: yet was I not without great Croſſes; for the Father of Leontina, would not conſent to marry his Daughter out of his own Country: This Obſtacle was extreamly tormentive, and ſeemed invincible, for ſince the Father of Leontina would not marry his Daughter unto a Stranger; the Prince of Sicily my Brother, would not permit me to dwell there as a bare Citizen of Thebes. I was then grieved to ſee Leontina perſecuted by her Parents for the love of me, for I underſtood that the Reſiſtance which they made unto my Deſign, did moſt ſenſibly grieve her: But yet after ten thouſand Croſſes and Thwartings Polimnis did ſo earneſtly ſolicite the matter, as he removed this Remora, and won the Parents of Leontina, to give her unto me, provided the Prince of Sicily conſented unto my Marriage: I immediately ſent unto him, and by the Mediation of the Princeſs my Mother, who was a Theban, I obtained his Conſent. Now you may imagine me the happieſt Man alive. Leontina was never ſo fair as then; and ſince ſhe now lived with me more freely than uſual, and expreſſed ſuch Thoughts of her Soul as were advantagious unto me, I thought that never was Felicity comparable unto mine. Nothing was thought upon but Feaſts and Pleaſures: All Preparations for our Marriage were in Readineſs; as a magnificent Feaſt, as all rich Marriage Cloths; a Mask alſo was prepared, and a general Ball was to be kept three Days together. In Concluſion, that day, which I thought the happieſt that ever dawned, did come, and in the Morning I ſaw Leontina in a moſt glorious Dreſs, who notwithſtanding her Modeſty was pleaſed to make it appear in her Eyes, that ſhe did participate in my Joy: She was conducted unto the Temple by her Father, and waited upon by all the Ladies in the Town: I alſo waited upon her, according unto the Cuſtom, and was accompanied by all my Friends: But as ſoon as ſhe came to the Altar, ſhe was ſuddenly taken, as ſhe ſaid, with an extream Pain, and terrible beating at her Heart, ſhe was forced to ſit down, not being able to kneel any longer: and finding her ſelf very ill, ſhe was forced to complain unto ſome of her Couſins which were next her: As my Eye was always upon her, I ſaw ſhe grew high coloured, and was very ſick. But alas, why ſhould I inſiſt ſo long upon vain Circumſtances? Leontina could not accompliſh the Ceremony: ſhe was ſo good as to excuſe it unto me, and they carried her home in a Chair, where a Feaver ſeized ſuddenly upon her: and notwithſtanding her Youth, and all the Art of Phyſicians, and notwithſtanding all my Prayers, the ſeventh Day her Diſeaſe was at the Height. You may ſuppoſe that as Terms ſtood then betwixt us, I had the Liberty to ſee her, during her Sickneſs, at all Hours, which Civility would permit: I ſaw her then endure it with admirable Patience, and ſhe ſeemed to be ſorry for nothing, but that ſhe was to leave me: She did hide a great part of her Pain from me, leſt it ſhould too much grieve me: and though ſhe thought to die, ever ſince the firſt Minute of her falling ſick, yet would ſhe not ſpeak a Word of her Death unto me, until the laſt Day of her Life: Oh moſt diſmal and unhappy Day! I ſaw her then endure, and hardly complain, and I received from her own dear Mouth, a thouſand Aſſurances of a moſt innocent, and pure Affection: She deſired me to continue mine unto her Memory, after her Death; and after ſhe had invoked the Gods, ſhe commanded me to ſubmit, as ſhe her ſelf did unto their Will: Her Speech failed, yet She ſtill looked upon me; and after her Sight was alſo gone, yet She held her Hand out, and, weak as She was, She gave it unto me; then breathing out a deep Sigh, She expired, not loſing one Jot of her Beauty, nor ſtrugling into any unſeemly Poſture. Ask me not, O my juſt Judg, what I did or what I thought, ſince you may well imagine, that a Man who grieved for her when he was not loved, and wept for her when he thought he hated her, would be abſolutely deſperate, when he ſaw her dying before his Eyes, at ſuch a time when he was beloved, and ready to enjoy her. I apprehended it ſo ſadly, that if Polimnis had not been, I had killed my ſelf at the firſt Minute of my Sorrow; but his Care of me was ſo great, that I may almoſt call him the cauſe of all my Sorrows I have ſuffered ſince that time, and of all thoſe

I ſhall ſuffer hereafter: I thought the Face of the whole Univerſe was altered: I looked not upon any thing as I was wont, or to ſay better, I ſaw nothing but Leontina either dead or dying: when they took me away by force from that fair Corps, her Image did follow me in all Places: and, drooping as I was, it appeared to my Phancy in a hundred different manners: her Tomb was more ſacred unto me, than the Temple: her Name as Holy as Angels; and my Sorrows were ſo ſweet unto me, that I hated all them that would comfort me: Although the Places where I had been with her, did augment my Grief, yet did I frequently viſit them: Thoſe whom ſhe did tenderly love were they only whom I could endure, and although I had been alone in the World, I could not have been more ſadly ſolitary, and whoſoever has not tried what it is to ſee her whom he loves, die, doubtleſs do not know the moſt ſupream Misfortune. I do confeſs Abſence to be a great Miſery, but what kind of Abſence can be comparable unto that eternal and terrible Abſence, which is never to return, which carries the Party beloved into ſuch obſure and dark Cells as humane Spirits cannot enter: and into ſuch ſad and doleful Places, from whence no News of her is ever to be hoped for: Truly my Apprehenſions are ſo ſtrange, as oft as I imagine, that the moſt fair and perfect Leontina ſhould be no more than an Heap of Aſhes; that I am aſtoniſhed, any ſhould offer to contend with me for the firſt Place amongſt unfortunate Men. I know very well, that not to be loved is a grand Misfortnne, but to loſe her whom one loves, and to loſe her for ever, is a far greater: for he who is not loved, does wiſh and deſire a Happineſs which he never had any Trial of, nor does he know the Sweets belonging unto Love; whereas to ſee her (who honoured a Man with her Affection) to die, is to loſe a Treaſure which he poſſeſſed, and whoſe Riches he knew how to value: Moreover, the worſt treated Lover in the World may yet comfort up his Heart with ſome Hopes, which he, whoſe Miſtreſs is in her Tomb, can never have: his Soul is abandoned of all Comforts, and remains in ſuch a horrid Deſpair, as certainly is inconceiveable by any but ſuch as had had Experience of it: nor am I ignorant that Jealouſie is a terrible Torment; yet whoſoever ſhall well conſider the cauſe of Jealouſie, ſhall find, that fear to loſe Her he loves, is it which cauſeth his Diſquiet: for if he were aſſured he ſhould never loſe his Miſtreſs, his Soul would be ſerene, nor would he care a pin for having an hundred Rivals. Moreover, a jealous Lover may find out an hundred ways to buſy himſelf in, out of which he may find out ſome Comfort; but to ſee Her one loves in her Coffin, is ſuch a miſerable Object as leaves the Soul in ſo ſad an Unquietneſs, as is a thouſand times worſe than all the Pains in the World: he knows not whither to go, nor what to do; all the Univerſe is indifferent unto him: The more pleaſant the time paſt was unto him, the more inſupportable it makes the preſent; and all the time of his Life which is to come, has nothing ſweet, but his Hopes of Death. Moreover, Jealouſie being a Paſſion, which of its own Nature is mutable, various, changing, and uncertain; it produces Fear and Hope an hundred times in a Day, and by Conſequence admits of ſome Relaxation of Mind; but the Death of the Party loved is a Torment continually rigorous, which no time can ever remove: for indeed, though I ſhould live out an hundred Ages, yet would Leontina be the ſame unto me, as now ſhe is, dead. Slight petty Sorrows may be leſſened by Habit, Cuſtom, and Time; but grand and violent Afflictions, the longer they laſt, the more inſupportable they are, and more augment: Let me further tell you, that the Impoſſibility to find a Remedy for ſuch a Sorrow, is only a cauſe of Conſolation in the Mouths of Philoſophers; but in the Soul of a Lover, it is the greateſt Torment of all others: Yes, yes, that horrid Thought, that all the Kings upon Earth, that all the Valour of Heroes, that all humane Prudence, cannot revive a dead beloved Miſtreſs, is that which properly can be called an Abridgment of all the Sorrows which Love can cauſe: Pronounce the Sentence then, O my moſt juſt Judg, that I am the moſt worthy of your Pity, by reaſon of great Misfortune; and I ſhall confeſs that the Miſeries of Thimocrates, of Philocles, and of Leontidas, do more deſerve your Pity, than mine does, in reſpect of their own perſonal Merits, ſo that rendring Juſtice both unto the Misfortune, and the Miſfortunate, I ſhall have leſs cauſe to complain of your Equity, than I have to complain of my Deſtiny.

The Prince Artibies ended his Diſcourſe with ſo much Sadneſs of Heart, that he had much ado to pronounce the laſt Words diſtinctly, ſo extreamly did the Remembrance of Leontina's Death perplex his Mind; his Melancholy did participate it ſelf unto all the Souls of that Illuſtrious Company; and he forced Compaſſion, even from them that contended with him, for the firſt Rank amongſt the Unfortunate. Notice was taken of his ingenuous and paſſionate Silence, by which he concealed the reſt of his Adventures, ſince the Death of the fair one whom he loved; as if he would tacitely intimate unto them, that ſince her Death he did not value his own Life. After that melancholy Humour, which this fatal Story had cauſed in their Minds, was a little diſſipated, every one maintained his own Opinion, and that with obſtinate Heat. But Cyrus, ſeeing it was late, told Marteſia, that it was time Leontidas related his Adventure and Reaſons, if ſhe intended to pronounce Judgment that day, ſo that as a Judg impoſing Silence, ſhe appointed Leontidas to begin: which accordingly he did in this Manner.

The jealous Lover. The fourth Story.

SInce Sorrow has its different Operations, according to the ſeveral Tempers of thoſe who are poſſeſſed with it; ſince it is ſometimes mute, and ſometimes eloquent, you muſt not wonder, if it work not in me, as it does in the Prince Artibies, who by reaſon of his Exceſs of Sorrow, has ſhortned his Relation: But I, who am none of thoſe whom Sorrow makes dumb, and who on the contrary never ſpeaks but when I have great cauſe of Complaint, cannot do ſo; nor can I, as I conceive, in few Words expreſs the Greatneſs of my Sufferings. I ſhall be as little impertinent as I can, and therefore in ſhort, give me leave to tell you, that the Iſle of Cyprus is my Country, and that I have the Honour to be of a Family ſufficiently illuſtrious; I ſhall hereafter tell you, that I went out of this famous Iſle which is conſecrated unto the Mother of Love, ſo young, that I had not time to fall in love with any; for the War which was then between the People of Samos, of Priennes, and of Miletes, moving me to learn there that Myſtery, which the drowſy Peace of my Country could not teach me, I left it; and in my choice of theſe three Countries, the Fame of the valiant Policrates, who was made Soveraign in the Iſle of Samos, did invite me into his, though perhaps his Cauſe was not the moſt juſt, unleſs you will allow the Right of Conquerours to be the moſt ancient of all others. So then, it was in this famous Iſle, and in the Court of this illuſtrious Prince, where my Love took firſt beginning, and where my Jealouſie has treated me cruelly. The Reputation of the happy Policrates is ſo great, that I need not characterize him unto you; yet notwithſtanding, ſhall in few Words tell you, that Juſtice would have much ado to find a Man in all Greece more accompliſhed than he, nor more fit to diſtribute his Favours with more Equity, rendring himſelf moſt perfectly happy, without giving cauſe of Murmur unto any. He is, as never Man before was; for he was born only a Citizen of Samos, and yet is become Soveraign of the ſame without hate; he has all the Authority of a moſt abſolute Tyrant, yet he enjoys the Love of his People as much as if he were their Father: All Deſigns of War are proſperous under his Hands; he is become terrible, not only in the Jonean, but through all the Ægean Sea; The greateſt Kings think it an Honour to be his Allies, and all his Neighbours both love and fear him: he is very handſom, of a good Preſence, and great Spirit, of a Diſpoſition, as ſweet in time of Peace, as it is furious in time of War. You may well ſuppoſe then, that the Court of Policrates muſt be very delightful and gallant; ſince it is commonly, like as the Prince, ſo is his Court. When I arrived at Samos, he was ready to imbarque, and to go and fight with the Prince of the Mileſians; ſo that after I was preſented unto him, by a Man of Quality, named Theanor, whom I knew at Paphos, I imbarked the next day with him, before I had ſeen any in Samos, but only Officers of Gallies, with one of which, called Timeſias, I had a Quarrel at my imbarking, and two other ſmall Squabbles during the Voyage. This Expedition was not long, but very proſperous; and we returned Conquerors over thoſe we fought againſt. Policrates at his return unto Samos, was entertained with high Magnificence; and ſince I had ſo much happy Honour to get ſome part of his Love during our Navigation, ſo had I alſo ſome ſhare in thoſe Delights which he was pleaſed to take at his Return. The ſame Night I came to Samos, after all the Magnificence which was prepared for the Entry of Policrates was paſt, Theanor, whom I affected as much as I was averſe unto Timaſias, would needs ſhew me, as a Stranger, all the Rarieties of the Town. He carried me into the Temple of Juno, unto whom that Iſland was conſecrated, which doubtleſs is one of the greateſt and faireſt in the World, and which they more eſteemed at Samos, becauſe the Architect who built it was a Samion: from thence we walked towards a famous Water-courſe, which ſurpaſſeth the greateſt Wonder that ever I ſaw in the World; for it runs through a Mountain which is an hundred Fathom high, upon the top of which is a Way made, which is above ſeven Furlongs in length, and eight Foot wide: at the End of this Way is digged a Pond about twenty Cubits deep, and from this moſt clear and abundant Fountain they conduct Water into the Town. After I had well admired at this prodigious Work of Pupalina, (for the Undertaker of this Water-courſe who was of Magares, was ſo called) we came into the Town, and went to walk upon a Hill, ſome twenty Fathom high, and two Furlongs in length and above, which extends towards the Sea, and railed on both Sides with Balaſters of Corinthian Copper, which makes the goodlieſt Object in the World when one comes to Samos. As it was then the beginning of Autumn, and the ſeaſon of the Year moſt pleaſant, a great Number of Ladies reſorted thither to walk towards the Evening, as it was the Cuſtom of the Country; at this time they came in greater Numbers than ordinary, for ſince we had taken four Gallies from the Enemy, it was a kind of Honour unto Policrates to be deſirous of ſeeing thoſe Marks of his Victory.

Victory: All the Ladies therefore of Samos came thither where we were; all the Men of Quality, as well thoſe that had been the Voyage, as thoſe which ſtayed behind, came thither alſo. The Prince Policrates himſelf did take a turn or two, and indeed I never ſaw ſo glorious a Sight, as this walk, and thoſe in it: The Sea was all ſerenity, and though the Sun was ſet, yet was there Day and Light enough to diſcern the Beauty of all the Ladies: ſince I knew none of them as yet, I looked upon them all with indifferency; I was much pleaſed to ſee ſome leaning over theſe ſtately Balliſters, and beholding the Galleys gained from the Enemy; and others leſs curious, but more ſolitary, looking only upon the open Sea. Some complement which ſuch Captains as they had not ſeen ſince their return; Others in more ſerious and private Conference; Others again without any Deſign but to ſee, and be ſeen, walked by Troops, and the general Deſign of all was to walk, and talk, and take the pleaſure of the Evening. Theanor was not a little troubled in telling me the Names of all the Beauties; for as for all the reſt, I ſpared him the labour of Information: ſince this divertiſement was new unto me, and that it was long ſince I ſaw any Ladies, I made it late before I could reſolve upon Departure, yet the Night drawing on by little and little, we could hardly diſtinguiſh one another; but yet many Men came ſtill in, becauſe the Moon began to riſe.

Theanor having left me to ſpeak unto ſome Lady; I walked a while alone, and after ſeveral turns, walking behind two Men, whom I did not think I had known, I ſaw ſomething white fall from the Pocket of one of them; my firſt Thought was to tell him, but not knowing any Reaſon why, my ſecond was to take up that which I ſaw fall, and afterwards to give it him, after I had ſeen what it was; ſtooping then preſently, and finding what I ſought for, I looked, and ſaw as well as the obſcurity of the Night would permit, that it was a Caſe of a Picture; The time while I took it up, and looking what it was, alſo conſidering whether I ſhould look in it, or reſtore it before I looked, was ſo long, that he who had loſt it, did mingle among other Company; ſo that in lieu of ſeeing two Men before me, I ſaw a Troop of Ladies, and found it impoſſible to reſtore that which I had found unto the right Owner: After this I looked for Theanor, to tell him my adventure, but the darkneſs of the Night had ſo ſeparated us, that we could not meet; but ſtaying no longer, I went unto the Houſe where I lodged at my firſt coming to Samos, my Servants according to my Orders ſtaying there for me; I went in all haſte with a longing Curioſity to ſee what I had found: I was no ſooner come into my Chamber, but going unto the Table, and the Candle, I began to look upon this Picture which I had pulled out of my Pocket, as I came up the Stairs, that I might ſooner ſee it; and I found that it was Gold with a Circle of Rubies and Diamonds round about it; and I did not ſtand any longer looking upon it, though it was very Curious and Rich, but opening the Lid haſtily, I was more dazled at the ſplendent Beauty of what I found within it, than I was at the luſtre of thoſe Jewels which adorned this Caſe; I found there the Picture of a Young and a fair Woman, but ſo freſh and lively, that I did not conceive it a flattering Piece; and one might eaſily ſee by the excellency of the Art, that the Limner took delight in drawing after ſo fair a Model. It muſt be confeſſed, that nothing upon Earth could be more beautiful than this Picture; I looked upon it therefore with Admiration; and calling to mind the Ideas of all which I had ſeen fair in the Walk, I could not remember I had ſeen that Lady whom this Picture reſembled, and indeed ſhe was not there. I opened, and ſhut this Caſe ſeveral times, being not able to forbear looking, and admiring at ſo fair a thing; afterwards I began to pity him who loſt it, and ſometimes alſo I envied him; for I imagined that it was given unto him, and I eſteemed him ſo infinitely happy in being loved by ſo fair a Lady, that I was troubled at it; yet at the laſt I went to bed and ſlept, but it was not without a dream of this Picture which I found. I roſe the next Morning very early, but with ſo hot a Curioſity to know the Lady whoſe ſhadow this was, and him who had this ſo conſiderable loſs, that my Curioſity might almoſt be termed Jealouſy: I dreſſed my ſelf in all haſte, and I went unto Theanor, who was ready to go out of his Lodging; he excuſed himſelf for loſing me laſt Night in the Croud, but giving him no time to continue his Complement, and not taking any notice of his Melancholy, I told him that our ſeparation was ſo happy unto me, as I had rather cauſe to thank, than complain againſt him; for, ſaid I (ſhewing him the Caſe and Picture) ſee what I found laſt Night, and help me, I conjure you, to diſcover who that happy Lover is, who has been ſo unhappy, as to loſe ſo precious a Jewel, and tell me afterwards the Name of this Beauty, if you know it. Theanor bluſh'd at the ſight of the Picture, and after he had taken it in his Hand, he was a long time looking upon it, as if he had not known the Party it reſembled, but urging him to ſpeak; As for the Name of this fair Lady, ſaid he unto me, if you were not a Stranger in Samos, you would not be ignorant of it; for the fair Alcidamia has rendered it too Famous, to be unknown unto all that have any reaſonable Souls in our Iſland: but as for that happy Lover, as you call him, who loſt it, I know him not, but perhaps, ſaid he, this Picture was beſtowed upon ſome of her Friends. But ſaid I unto him, it was a Man who let it fall, and not a Lady. That may be alſo, replied he, for ſhe has ſeveral Couſins, whom ſhe might beſtow a Picture upon, without any ſcandal unto her Honour: But if you will follow my Advice, ſaid he, you ſhall not ſhew this Picture unto any, leſt you ſhould make ſo fair a Lady your Enemy. It is not my intention (ſaid I unto him) to provoke her, but I have a very great deſire to know this Lady whom this Picture repreſents. I ſhall better inform my ſelf, ſaid he unto me, and then I ſhall render you an Account, but in the mean while, ſpeak not a word of this Picture, but if you pleaſe leave it in my Hands, for I believe it will be as ſafe in mine as yours: for, ſaid he, I have a kind of fear you cannot forbear ſhewing it unto ſome or other. I promiſe you, ſaid I unto him, neither to ſpeak of it, or ſhew it unto any; but pardon me if I do not render it unto any but him who loſt it; and that too but unwillingly, for it does infinitely pleaſe me. Theanor uſed all his Arguments, that he might keep it, but I did ſo obſtinately deny it, that he was forced to be contented. After which we went unto Policrates at Court, and with him unto the Temple. After dinner, this Prince did me the Honour to preſent me unto the Princeſs Herſilea his Siſter, who was a Lady moſt admirably accompliſhed, with whom there was then many Ladies, and amongſt the reſt, one named Meneclida, with whom it was ſaid Policrates was in Love. There alſo did I ſee the wonder of the World Alcidamia, ſo admirably fair, that I never ſaw any ſo amiable. The Princeſs Herſilea willing to grace a new Favorite of the Kings, did place me next this glorious Beauty, whoſe Soul did ſo powerfully ſecond the Charms of her Face, that I could no longer preſerve my freedom. Theanor coming into the Company, and ſeeing me next Alcidamia, ſeemed unto me, as if he were troubled at it, yet did not then take any notice of it; and my Mind was alſo ſo much diſordered, that Alcidamia had not any Reaſon to think my Converſation very agreeable. Which of all theſe (ſaid I in my ſelf, in looking upon all the Men which followed Policrates to his Siſter) is that both happy and unfortunate Lover who has loſt this Picture which I have found?

Afterwards I began to think how much this Lady would be aſtoniſhed, if I ſhould ſhew her this Picture which I had about me: afterwards I bethought my ſelf, how unfortunate that Man would be, who ſhould fall in Love with ſo fair a Lady as this, whoſe Heart might perhaps be already engaged; and indeed I had a thouſand ſeveral Thoughts in a ſhort time, and it may be almoſt ſaid, that Jealouſy, which uſes to follow Love in others, did precede it in me, ſince it is certain that I found all the ſymptomes of Jealouſy in me, before ever I gave her any Teſtimony of my Love any manner of way: I enquired very diligently of all the Lovers of Alcidamia, hoping to find out him unto whom this Picture belonged; but thoſe of whom I enquired told me; That there was not a Man of Quality in all Samos which loved her not, ſo that all my Conjectures finding no Foundation: but (ſaid I unto them) has ſhe not made choice of any? That is a thing (ſaid they) not eaſily to be diſcovered, for Alcidamia is wiſe, and able to diſguiſe her Thoughts if ſhe pleaſe; all we can ſay is, That if ſhe have any Favorite, her Diſcretion conceals him, ſince it is certain there goes no rumour of any about the Court. Thus did two or three Days paſs away, during which time I often ſaw Alcidamia either with the Princeſs, or in the Temple, or walking, or at her own Houſe, for I urged Theanor to carry me thither; I ſay, I urged him, for he excuſed it as much as he could: Mean while, I was continually conjuring him to tell me if he could, to whom the Picture of Alcidamia belonged? and he always anſwered me, that this unprofitable Curioſity ought at the leaſt to be well intended; and that though he did know whoſe it was, yet would he never tell me, unleſs I would promiſe him before-hand to make good uſe of that knowledg, and not incenſe Alcidamia by it. Since I did not yet think I ſhould be fettered in the Chains of Love, I promiſed him what he deſired; ſo that a few Days after, he came one Morning unto my Chamber, and ſeeming to be very joyful, Leontidas, ſaid he unto me, I have at laſt diſcovered him, unto whom the Picture which you found belongs, and he is a Perſon of ſo high a Quality as you have Reaſon to rejoyce that it is in your Power to do him ſo great a favour as to reſtore it. I bluſhed at this diſcourſe of Theanor, who ſeeing me change my Colour, changed himſelf alſo, and asked me why I did not thank him, and ſatisfy his Curioſity and Deſire? It is Theanor, anſwered I, becauſe I have altered my Mind, and now do fear as much to know who is the owner, as I deſired it before; and my Reaſon is, becauſe I cannot yet reſolve to reſtore it; But I am engaged that you ſhall, (anſwered Theanor, much ſurprized) for I did not think you deſired to know the Owner, with any Intention to do him ſo much injuſtice. But yet Theanor, (ſaid I unto him) I beſeech you who is the Owner? I muſt not tell you, replied he, ſince you will not reſtore it; The Party who permitted me to truſt you with this ſecret, did not allow me to acquaint you, but upon Condition you will reſtore it, for otherwiſe it is not juſt to acquaint you with ſuch a ſecret as this. But ſaid I unto him, is he who owes this Picture in love with Alcidamia? Deſperately, replied he. And was this Picture given him by that fair Lady? When you have reſtored it me, replied he, you ſhall know that, but until then, I have no commiſſion to tell you any thing. Cruel Friend, replied I unto him, I had rather have this Picture than your Secret, and if I reſtore it unto any, it ſhall be rather to the Party who gave it, than to him who loſt it. O Leontidas, ſaid Theanor, I beſeech you do not as you ſay, unleſs you intend moſt abſolutely to diſoblige me. As we were thus talking, one came and told me, that Policrates asked for me, ſo that I was conſtrained to leave Theanor: but, O Heavens, how Melancholy was I all that Day! for indeed after this which Theanor told me, I doubted not but my Conjectures were well grounded, and that this Picture was not given by Alcidamia unto him that loſt it. I began to perceive alſo that I was not right Maſter of my Reaſon; and I reſolved to love Alcidamia notwithſtanding all Wit, or Reaſon, or any thing elſe. Am I not very inconſiderate (ſaid I unto my ſelf) to ſuffer ſuch a growing Paſſion without any oppoſite, which moſt apparently will coſt me abundance of Sorrow? I know that Alcidamia had fixed her Love, and what would I obtain of her? Shall Leontidas ſuffer a Rival to reſt in the Heart of this Beauty? or ſhall he drive him out? But who is the Rival, ſaid I? alas, alas! I know him not at all; perhaps it is ſome Man, who is unworthy of ſuch an Honour; perhaps it is Theanor himſelf, and whoſoever it be, ſaid I, he is not over paſſionate a Lover, ſince he does not make himſelf known by his Death, after ſuch a loſs: All this while Theanor was no more at reſt than I, for, to diſcover the truth unto you, he was in love with Alcidamia, and it was himſelf who loſt this Picture, though he durſt not confeſs it unto me: for ſince I was very Young, he durſt not truſt too much unto my Diſcretion, but thought to ſcrue this Picture out of my Hands by craft, and under the Name of another; and obſerving indeed that I was become his Rival, he knew not what Courſe to take, ſo that both of us were much perplexed, for Theanor knew that Alcidamia would extreamly hate him, if ſhe ſhould know he had loſt this Picture, and I alſo feared as extreamly that it was his. Then did I enquire of ſeveral Perſons, whether Theanor was in love with Alcidamia, and to my ſorrow I found he was: you may then imagine how much I was troubled at it, for I was obliged to love him, both by my own Inclination, by Reaſon, and indeed by Duty; ſince indeed he had done me many great Favours towards Policrates, and had taken my part with much zeal againſt Timaſias, of whom I ſpoke before, ſo that I found it againſt the Law of Generoſity, not to reſiſt my Paſſion; and I ſtrived with all my Power to give a check unto my ſelf, but all in vain, for Love did ſo much, and ſo abſolutely command my Soul, and ſo much withdrew my Affection from Theanor, that I was often in a wonderful Confuſion. Alcidamia was then ever predominate in my Heart, and it was more eaſy for me to quit my Friend, than her whom without any compariſon I loved more than he: All my Buſineſs was then to colour this Infidelity, and to that end I thought it beſt to acquaint him firſt with my Paſſion, feigning to be ignorant of his. I went unto him, and found him in his Chamber more unquiet than my ſelf, for he began to ſuſpect me for his Rival. Theanor, for ought I ſee (ſaid I unto him) is as Melancholy as Leontidas, though doubtleſs he be not ſo amorous. Since we have been almoſt always in the Wars together, ever ſince we were acquainted (anſwered he very coldly) we never diſcourſed but of gallant Matters, and I do not know, why you ſhould now ſuppoſe that you are more amorous than I, or that I cannot be ſo much as you. My meaning is (ſaid I unto him, a little dampt, for I knew that what I did was not very generous) that if it be as true you love any Lady violently, as it is certain I do moſt deſperately love the incomparable Alcidamia, I ſhall extreamly treamly pity you, as I deſire you to pity me. I thought (replied Theanor with ſuch a Coldneſs as much ſurprized me) that your Heart could not avoid the Charms of that Beauty: But Leontidas, ſaid he (after a little Study) you are not he alone who loves that inchanting Lady, and that Picture which you found, ought (me-thinks) to have nipt your growing Paſſion in the bud. But quite contrary, (ſaid I unto him) it is that which makes it grow the faſter; for when I do not ſee Alcidamia, then I do look upon it, and it preſerves the Memory of her Beauty ſo freſh in my Soul, that I can never forget it. After this, Theanor was a while ſilent; afterwards aſſuming a more ſerious Countenance, he told me, that loving me as he did, he was very ſorry to ſee me engaged in a Love which would coſt me much Sorrow, and that if it were permitted him to name the Rival unto whom that Picture belonged, he ſhould make me acknowledg, that I ought not any longer to continue loving Alcidamia: Though you ſhould make me acknowledg it, ſaid I unto him, yet all would be in vain, becauſe my Paſſion does not depend upon my Will: though it ſhould be your ſelf which is that happy Rival you ſpeak of, or though it ſhould be Policrates himſelf, yet muſt I continue loving Alcidamia. Love then Alcidamia, ſaid he unto me bluſhing, but never hope to be ſo ſoon loved again, and do not perſuade your ſelf that ſhe will ever give you her Picture; for I can aſſure you, that he who is Owner of that which you have, did not obtain it without Abundance of Sorrow and Trouble, although ſhe do not hate him unto whom ſhe gave it.

Cruel Friend, ſaid I unto him, why do you infuſe as much Jealouſie as Love in me? Becauſe, replied he, I would cure your Love by your Jealouſie. No, no, ſaid I unto him, that's not the way to deſtroy it, and the more you make me know that Alcidamia does favour that happy Rival, the greater Envy and Deſire ſhall I have no diſturb his Felicity, and the more reſolutely ſhall I continue loving Alcidamia. Let me tell you once again, ſaid he unto me, you mav continue loving Alcidamia, but let me alſo tell you once again, that you ſhall not be ſo ſoon loved.

ved. I confeſs that this Coldneſs of Theanor made me almoſt deſpair; for after I had conſulted with my Reaſon, I concluded that this Coldneſs of his proceeded from his confident Aſſurance of the Affection of Alcidamia, ſo that not looking upon Theanor any longer as an officious Friend, with whom I ſhould keep any good Correſpondence, but I looked upon him as a Rival in Favour, and by Conſequence as a mortal Enemy: ſo that changing my Deſign, my Countenance, and my Voice, In the Name of the Gods, Theanor, ſaid I unto him, tell me the Name of him who is Owner of this Picture, that I may exactly know whom to hate. I cannot, replied he, until you have reſtored the Picture of Alcidamia: The Picture of Alcidamia, ſaid I, (not knowing almoſt what I ſaid, ſince Jealouſie had ſo troubled all my Senſes,) No, no, I cannot do it at the Price of that Secret, which I deſire to know; for not deſiring to know the Name of my Rival, but with Intentions to remove him out of the Heart of Alcidamia, I ſhall not reſtore him this Picture. However (ſaid Theanor) I beſeech you promiſe one juſt Deſire, which is, not to ſhew this Picture unto any; ſince thereby you do more wrong unto Alcidamia, than to your Rival, who I believe will not become your Enemy, until he ſee, that you find more Favour than himſelf. I confeſs then, that I thought to have laid aſide all Patience; but ſeveral People coming in, we parted at that time, and I went from Theanor, the moſt ſad and melancholy Man alive. Certainly ſaid I, this cruel Friend thinks himſelf ſo ſure of Alcidamia's Heart, that he is in no Fear to loſe it; or elſe he ſcorns Leontidas ſo much, that he cares not for his being a Rival. But it may be, ſaid I, that my Conjectures may deceive me, and thoſe who told me that Theanor loved Alcidamia, may be deceived themſelves. At the laſt I concluded, that either Theanor did not love Alcidamia, or elſe that he was loved. I wiſhed the Gods, that it might prove the firſt of theſe. I being in theſe Uncertainties, I reſolved to ſatisfie my ſelf a little better, and to talk unto this fair Lady, and to diſcourſe of ſeveral things concerning Theanor, thereby, if poſſible, to diſcover the Truth, ſo that not thinking to make my own

Paſſion known unto her, I endeavoured only to diſcourſe concerning my Rival: I went then unto the Princeſs Hirſilea, where I knew ſhe would be; and after that ſeveral People were come in, and gone out again, at the laſt I addreſſed my ſelf unto Alcidamia, who according to her uſual Cuſtom, entertained me with much Civility; preſently after, Policrates came in, and almoſt all the Men of Quality in Samos followed him, except Theanor, whom melancholy had retained at home: After a little time of general Diſcourſe, Policrates having ſome private Buſineſs with the Princeſs his Siſter, took her to the Window which opened unto the main Sea, and left me an Opportunity to execute my Deſign; me-thought alſo that Alcidamia did contribute her Willingneſs unto it, though truly, it was in ſuch a manner as did add unto my Unquietneſs. As it was but a little while that I had been at Samos, ſhe had no reaſon to ſpeak unto me concerning any thing, but general things; and as ſhe had obſerved that Theanor was more friendly unto me than any other, ſo ſhe was readier to entertain Diſcourſe with me, than thoſe with whom I had yet no particular Acquaintance. After then we two had been a while together, and ſaid nothing one to another; What have you done with your Friend, ſaid ſhe unto me, and how comes it to paſs Theanor is not here, now all the Court is preſent? This unexpected Queſtion ſurprized me; and I could not hear the Name of my Rival from the Mouth of Alcidamia without a Bluſh: for truly, though I intended to ſpeak concerning Theanor, yet did I not think ſhe would begin the firſt. Madam, ſaid I unto her, I have left him in his Chamber ſo melancholy, that at the preſent I did not think his Humour fit for Company. You are then a very ill Friend, (ſaid ſhe unto me, ſmiling) to leave your Friend in ſuch a caſe. It was becauſe his Humour was ſo ſullen (ſaid I unto her) that my Preſence was troubleſome unto him, and perhaps alſo more than anothers would be. In truth, Leontidas, replied ſhe, you vex me, for Theanor is a very compleat gallant Man, and if any great Misfortune ſhould befal him, I ſhould be extreamly ſorry. Madam (ſaid I, more unquiet, more curions, and more jealous than ever,)

ever,) Since I have been but a while at Samos, I cannot be well acquainted with the News of the Place; but you, who knows all, I ſuppoſe you are not ignorant, that Theanor's Diſeaſe, as I think, proceeds from a violent Paſſion. Alcidamia thinking then, that I would ſpeak in behalf of Theanor, changed her Colour, and looking upon me more ſeriouſly than before; I knew not, ſaid ſhe, that your Friend was in Love, neither do I think he is; but indeed Leontidas, if there be no other cauſe of his Melancholy, but that, I ſhould not pity him ſo much as I do: It is becauſe perhaps, (ſaid I, and looked more attentively upon her) you know he is not to be pitied, but that he is loved by the Party whom he loves. I know not, anſwered ſhe, whether he be loved or hated, for I am neither his Miſtreſs, nor his Confident. I wiſh the Gods that half you ſay were true, (ſaid I, interrupting her very ſharply) for Leontidas would then be much more happy than he is. Leontidas (ſaid ſhe, ſmiling) was born in that Iſle which was conſecrated unto the Mother of Love, where Gallantry is Law; where they never ſpeak of any thing but Love; and where the Ladies are never entertained with any Diſcourſe but ſuch as is obliging, ſweet, and flattering: but we who reverence another Deity, are leſs gallant than they, and alſo, if you pleaſe to have it ſo, ſomething more ſevere: I muſt tell you as a Stranger, that you muſt not mention any ſuch thing unto our Ladies, who would perhaps be more offended at you than I am, becauſe they do not know how to excuſe the Cuſtom of your Country as I do. All your Ladies! (replied I haſtily) Ah Divine Alcidamia, you do not know Leontidas, if you think he will ever ſay unto any other but you, that he is deſperately in Love. Seriouſly Leontidas, ſaid ſhe, either correct this ill Habit which you have brought over with you, or I ſhall complain unto your Friend, and deſire him to break you off it, if it be poſſible. He cannot, anſwered I, though he ſhould attempt it. Then muſt I fly your Company, replied ſhe, until ſuch time as you have better learned our Cuſtoms. It is the Cuſtom, Madam, for all that, replied I, to adore ſuch Beauties as you. And it is alſo the general Cuſtom of all Places, replied ſhe, except Cyprus, that thoſe Beauties of whom you ſpeak are glorious, noble, and ſevere, and will not ſuffer any Diſcourſe of ſuch things. But is it poſſible, replied I, that all the Beauties in Samos ſhould be inexorable? Was there never any that would ſuffer themſelves to be loved, and have permitted hopes that they themſelves would hereafter love? and have beſtowed their Pictures upon their Servants, and have been complacential many other ways unto ſuch as they have accepted on? I know not, (ſaid ſhe, wondering why I ſhould uſe this odd Diſcourſe;) or if I did, their Example ſhall never be followed by Alcidamia. But however, Leontidas, let me once more intreat you to leave off this ill Cuſtom, if you have a Mind to enjoy any of my Company. Alcidamia ſpoke this in ſuch a manner, as I was afraid ſhe would baniſh me her Converſation: and ſince my Jealouſie perſwaded me that ſhe was ſo ſevere unto me, only becauſe ſhe would be more faithful unto my Rival, even very ſpite made me entertain Love ſtill in my Heart, ſo that beginning to ſpeak again; If it be only an ill habit, ſaid I unto her, you would be unjuſt to think it poſſible I can lay it off upon a ſudden; therefore Madam, I conjure you to allow me ſome certain Days to unaccuſtom my ſelf. Alcidamia, who was very glad to turn the Diſcourſe into Raillery, ſaid, that ſhe would allow me the reſt of the Day; but I uſed ſo many Arguments, and urged her ſo much, that I obtained eight Days, after which I was not to ſpeak a Word of my Paſſion, or Love, ſhe telling and laughing, that ſhe would complain unto Theanor, if I broke my Word. Thus in lieu of ſpeaking of my Rival, Alcidamia ſpoke firſt unto me; and in lieu of diſcovering her Thoughts of him, I declared my Love unto her. In my going out from the Princeſs, I thought my ſelf for a while to be very happy, in that I had let her know I loved her; but when I called to mind all that Alcidamia ſaid unto me, I obſerved that ſhe changed Colour as oft as ſhe heard, Theanor named, and that I had no cauſe to doubt but that ſhe loved him: then did I become extreamly reſtleſs in my Mind, and if I had not had ſome Obligations upon me towards Theanor, I believe I ſhould have found out more violent ways to ſatisfie my ſelf, than thoſe I took; yet not well knowing what courſe to take, I was moſt reſtleſly miſerable. What will it advantage me, ſaid I, to have the Picture of Alcidamia, if Theanor have her Heart? Give over then that Deſign, which may bring into an hundred Inconveniencies. But perhaps, ſaid I afterwards, this Picture was ſtoln from her: yet if it was ſo, certainly it was ſtoln by ſome that were in Love with her; and though it were happy for me if it were ſo, yet it is a great Miſfortune to be Rival unto a Man who hath obliged me: All this while the Soul of Theanor was no more quiet than mine; for, as I told you before, he was paſſionately in love with Alcidamia: from whom, as I underſtood afterwards, he had not obtained any thing; not but that the Picture which I found was his, but it was not given him by Alcidamia, who knew not that he had it: for be pleaſed to know that ſhe cauſed it to be made, and gave it unto a Friend of hers named Acaſta; and indeed, it was ſhe who was the Owner of it. But within a little while after, Policrates being ready to imbarque for a freſh War, every one went to take leave of their Acquaintance, and a great Number of Quality went unto Acaſta, to bid her adieu; and amongſt others, Theanor came, as ſhe was newly gone out to make a Viſit; and when he found none below, he went into her Chamber, and found upon the Table the Picture of Alcidamia, which ſhe had forgot to take with her; ſo that loving her, as he did, and being ready to depart out of Samos, he did, as I think my ſelf ſhould have done, if I had been in his room; that is, he took this Picture, and not the Caſe, which indeed was too much to be taken, and went out ſo happily, that he was not ſeen by any. Preſently after, Timaſias, who was a Couſin to Acaſta, came unto the Houſe, and found none in it alſo; he went into his Couſin's, and found it as Theanor left it, that was, all open, and the Caſe of the Picture upon the Table, which he had forgot to ſhut: ſo that Timaſias, who was alſo in Love with Alcidamia, and had ſeen it often in the Hands of his Couſin, wondred why the Picture was not in it: ſo that knocking, to cauſe ſome to come unto him, he asked how it came to paſs that the Caſe ſhould lie upon the Table without the Picture? The Women, much ſurprized at it, told him that they knew not, but ſaid, They ſaw it there ſince their Miſtreſs went out: afterwards they accuſed Timaſias, (being a Lover of Alcidamia,) for taking it, and began to deſire him that he would put it in again: he denied very hotly, and in the mean while Acaſta returned, and heard of the Buſineſs. At the firſt, ſhe believed as her Women did, and imagined that her Couſin, whom ſhe knew to be much in Love with Alcidamia, had taken it, and ſay what he could, ſhe would believe no other; inſomuch as ſhe was extreamly angry with him: yet ſince he ſwore ſo deeply, that he took it not, that ſhe enquired who elſe came into the Houſe. But her Women, to excuſe themſelves of their Negligence, did ſwear, and proteſt, as alſo all the reſt of the Domeſticks, that there came none thither but Timaſias. Yet Theanor, to take away all ſuſpicion of him, returned unto Acaſta to bid her adieu; and not mentioning his being there before, ſhe complained unto him of her loſs, but he gave a crafty, in lieu of a comforting Anſwer, That if he had loſt it, he ſhould die for ſorrow: In concluſion, he departed with his concealed Treaſure, and making another Caſe which he had to ſerve for that Picture, (for all thoſe Pictures are made almoſt of one ſize,) he imbarked as well pleaſed, as Timaſias was angry; for he imagined that it was ſome of his Rivals who had ſtoln this Picture.

In the mean while Alcidamia hearing of it, did at the firſt ſuſpect that Acaſta had given it unto her Couſin: But Acaſta made it appear that it was otherwiſe, for being perſwaded that it was he who took it, ſhe quite fell out with him at his return. Alcidamia, for her part, took it extreamly ill he ſhould be ſo bold as to commit ſuch a theft, and treated him very ill every time he ſpoke unto her after his return. As ſhe was upon very Civil terms with Theanor, though ſhe did not much favour him, ſo ſhe complained unto him, as ſhe did unto others, and ſeemed to be ſo extreamly offended at the Preſumption of Timaſias, that he durſt never tell her that was himſelf the Thief,fearing to incur that hatred which ſhe bore unto his Rival, who was the ſame Man that became my Enemy the firſt day I arrived at Samos. You ſee then, how Theanor, not being any extraordinary Favourite, came unto the Picture of Alcidamia, for I came to know of all theſe Paſſages moſt exactly afterwards: and you ſee alſo the Reaſon why he would not tell me the Picture was his, which was, becauſe he certainly knew Alcidamia would hate him as ſoon as ſhe knew it. At the firſt, my young Years only did reſtrain him, but afterwards, when he found that I was in love with Alcidamia, then he thought good to poſſeſs me with an imagination that ſhe was in love, and that ſhe had given this Picture unto ſome one, hoping thereby to avert me from my Paſſion: he perceived, that though he had confeſſed unto me he loved her, yet that I would not give over loving her ſince I told him of it; ſo that, having no mind to fight with me, nor to ruine himſelf in the Opinion of Alcidamia, by confeſſing it was he who ſtole the Picture, or by telling me a lie that ſhe did give it unto him, he was as far from knowing what Reſolution to pitch upon as I was: and for ſome days we ſhunned one another with as much care as we ſought for one another before. During which time, I ſaw Alcidamia, as oft as I could poſſible; and preſuming upon that priviledg which ſhe had given me, I diſcourſed of my paſſionate Love unto her, and ſhe ſeemed always to think, that it was only a habit of ſpeaking which moved me to expreſs my ſelf ſo unto her, bidding me to remember that I reckoned the Days aright, which ſhe had alloted me. Yet being a whole day, and not ſeeing her, I went to walk by my ſelf in the publick Gardens of the Town, which are as full of Beauty as thoſe of Policrates: and to contemplate with more freedom, I took a cloſe Walk, where having a deſire to look upon the Picture of Alcidamia, I took it out of my Pocket, and finding a convenient Seat, I began to conſider it with much Delight; but preſently after I looked upon it with much melancholy, conſidering the cruel Doom ſhe had pronounced againſt him who loſt it; and I think my Jealouſy moved me to pronounce ſome words, which moved Timaſias, who unknown to me was walking in another Walk cloſe by mine, to look who it was which ſpoke; for ſince I ſpoke but with a half Voice, and had uttered but three or four words, he did not know me by my Voice: he came then cloſe up to the Walk where I was, and looking through the thick Leaves, he ſaw the Picture, and knew it to be of Alcidamia, and the ſame which ſhe had heretofore given unto Acaſta, and the very ſame that he took away; for he knew that Alcidamia had never ſuffered her Picture to be taken but that once. Since it was but a little time that I had been in Samos, and ſince I had never any familiarity with Timaſias ſince our laſt difference, he never perceived that I was in Love with Alcidamia, ſo that he was extreamly ſurprized to ſee the Picture of her he loved in the Hands of his Enemy, and a Picture alſo which had cauſed Alcidamia to hate him, and the ſame which every one thought he ſtole: That which did moſt amaze him, was, becauſe he thought I was not acquainted with either Alcidamia, or Acaſta, and ſince it was loſt before I came unto Samos, ſo that he could not tell what to think of this Adventure: yet being reſolved to be further ſatisfied, he went haſtily unto the end of that Walk where I was, and found me ſo attentive in looking upon that Picture which I held in my hand, as all I could do was to ſhut the Caſe before he was cloſe at me: ſince we were upon terms of Civility, though there was no great love betwixt us, I roſe up when he came near me, and after a cold ſalute, I offered to continue on my walk without ſtaying with him, when he accoſting me with a troubled aſpect, Leontidas, (ſaid he unto me) although you are none of my intimate Friends, yet ſince you are a Man of Honour, I hope you will tell me one Truth, which much imports me, and which I much deſire to know from you. I know not, replied I, whether I ſhall tel you that Truth which you deſire to know, but I am certain, I ſhall not tell you a Lie. Tell me then, ſaid he who gave you the Picture of Alcidamia, which by chance I ſaw in your hands, as I was walking in the Walk joyning unto this. Tho ſo much curioſity, ſaid I unto him, as you have to obſerve my Actions, does not perhaps deſerve ſo much ſincerity, yet I ſhall tell you, that Fortune only gave it unto me, and that I am not beholden unto any for it. Timaſias hearing this Anſwer, did think I would not tell him what I knew; ſo that being angry, I knew very well (anſwered he) that you have more cauſe to thank Fortune for it, than the incomparable Alcidamia, who queſtionleſs would not give it you; but I ask, by what Accident did blind Fortune put it into your Hands? Since I am not obliged (anſwered I with a much incenſed Spirit, becauſe I had ſome ſuſpicion Timaſias was my Rival) to tell you all the Truths I know, and that in the quality of a Man of Honour, I am only engaged to tell you no Lie; I will not tell you any more, think what you pleaſe. But you ſhall tell me (replied he roughly) of whom you had that Picture. Leontidas (anſwered I, and looked fiercely upon him) was never uſed to tell that which he has not any mind to have known, eſpecially unto Men who are not in the Catalogue of my Friends. Then, as your Enemy (replied he, and laid his Hand upon his Sword) I will make you acknowledg who gave you that Picture, and alſo compel you to reſtore it. No ſooner had he ſaid ſo, but without any return, I drew my Sword, and we began to fight: As he was very nimble, and I very lucky, we fought a good while without any hurt, but I coming cloſe unto him, after I had given him a ſlight touch in the left Arm, we diſputed the Victory very ſtiffly; when we were in the heat of Fight, and I had got ſo much advantage, as to preſent my Sword unto his Breaſt, to make him acknowledg my Victory, Policrates coming to walk there, entred; and followed by abundance of others, amongſt the reſt Theanor, who was the firſt who came in to part us. The Fury wherein then I was to ſee that my old Enemy, and new Rival, ſhould be pulled out of my Hands, made me begin to quarrel with Theanor; But Policrates coming in, I was forced to change my courſe, and to ask him pardon, for, contrary to his Orders, quarrelling with Timaſias. Since then he loved me more than my Enemy, and ſince I was a Stranger, and the other his Subject, all the blame did light upon Timaſias: but he, deſiring to juſtify himſelf, Sir, ſaid he, if you did know the cauſe of our Quarrel, doubtleſs you would excuſe me, and ſay that I have done no more than I ought. I cannot believe, replied Policrates, that you had any reaſon to Quarrel with Leontidas, and therefore, I would underſtand all the particulars of the Buſineſs. Sir, (ſaid I, even deſperate that it muſt be known, I had this Picture in my Hands, and fearing that Policrates ſhould move me to reſtore it) you will ſpend a great deal of time, which would be better imployed in many other things than this, and it will ſuffice, if you be only perſwaded, that both of us have done nothing but what Men of Courage and Honour ought to do: but ſay what I could, Policrates was ſo ſollicited by Timaſias, who deſired to be juſtified concerning the Theft of this Picture, and to be ſatisfied concerning it, began to relate the Buſineſs. Then Timaſias putting them in mind of the loſs of Alcidamia's Picture (for all the Court knew it was taken away) and alſo puting them in mind how he, as a Lover of Alcidamia, was accuſed for it, and how ill ſhe had treated him concerning it; he afterwards told them that he ſaw the ſame Picture in my Hands, and that he only deſired to know of whom I had it, that he might thereby juſtify himſelf; knowing well that it was not I who took it, ſince I was not then at Samos when it was ſtoln from Acaſta.

During this Diſcourſe with Timaſias, I had variety of Apprehenſions in my Mind, for I was extreamly joyed to know certainly, by what he ſaid, that this Picture was not given unto him who loſt it; and ſometimes my Jealouſy diminiſhed, as much as my Love encreaſed; but ſeeing afterwards with what fervency my Enemy ſpoke, and that I did contribute unto his juſtification, and perhaps unto his admiſſion into Alcidamia's Favour, I was than even abſolutely deſperate. Yet as ſoon as Timaſias had done ſpeaking, Policratas, who had a piercing ing Wit, not yet imagining the Truth of the Buſineſs, and thinking only that I had a deſire to conceal the Name of him who gave me this Picture, told me, That he would not move me to tell before all the World who it was, but deſired me to tell him in private; which if I would do, it ſhould ſuffice for the juſtification of Timaſias, that I did publiquely acknowledg, ſome one who likely did take it from Acaſta, had given it unto me. I leave you to imagine how much I was joyed that I was not able to juſtify my Enemy and my Rival: ſo that I began to relate, with all ingenuity which Truth could have, how I found it as I was walking: concealing to my ſelf the ſuſpicions which I had that it was Theanor who loſt it; for ſince they were only bare Suſpicions, I could not reſolve in my Mind, which of theſe two Rivals I had better ruin. At the firſt, my Diſcourſe did a little ſurprize Policrates, ſo that to confirm him better, I told him that Theanor, who was there by him, knew well I did not lie, ſince I went unto him, and told him the Adventure which I had the firſt night I came unto Samos, and ſhewed him this Picture, and out of my curioſity deſired him to inform me who he might be who had loſt it, and to tell me the Name of her whom it repreſented. So Theanor was conſtrained to be my Witneſs, and Policrates doubted not of the Truth of what I ſaid. So that it appearing I told no lie unto Timaſias, and that he had no reaſon to think I ſpoke not ſincerely unto him, he commanded us to embrace one another: bnt firſt Timaſias beſeeched Policrates that I ſhould reſtore unto Alcidamia the Picture which I found. You make me believe, (ſaid I then unto Timaſias) that perhaps it was your ſelf which loſt this Picture, and that repenting your ſelf of that Theft which wounded your Reputation, you would have it reſtored. Timaſias grew red in the Face with anger at this Diſcourſe, and returned no Anſwer; and that which did moſt vex him, was, that every one believed it ſo, and publickly talked of it, and I believe Theanor did contribute all he could to make it paſs ſo: For my part, I was even raviſhed to ſee Policrates laugh at what I ſaid, and addreſſing my Speech unto him, ſaid, That it would be an odd thing, that ſince I took nothing from any one, they ſhould oblige me to reſtore that which Fortune gave me; or that I ſhould be puniſhed, before I committed a Crime, or looked upon, like him who was the real Robber, if he were known. Timaſias would have anſwered, but Policrates beginning to ſpeak, and deſiring to take up this Quarrel, told me, That as my puniſhment, I ſhould ſhew him this Picture. Sir, ſaid I unto him, it conduceth ſo much unto the Honour of Alcidamia to be ſeen, that I do it without any Difficulty at all, upon Condition you will promiſe me to do me ſo much Honour as to reſtore it. Then, after that promiſe, I did ſhew it unto him. He no ſooner ſaw it, but looking upon the Caſe, Leontidas, ſaid he unto me, you need not wonder at the anger of Timaſias, for by the richneſs of theſe precious Stones wherewith it is ſet, it was to be imagined that perhaps you were his Rival, ſince it is not uſual to be at much charges for an indifferent Perſon. Sir (replied I) it was my Fortune to find that Picture in that Caſe: yet to ſhew I am not covetous, I am ready to reſtore it without the Picture, unto Timaſias, if it was he who loſt it. Pollcrates, fearing that this Diſcourſe might breed worſe Blood, commanded us peremptorily to embrace one another; which without any incivility we did, though very coldly. After which, reſtoring me the Picture, when he had contemplated it with ſuch a ſeriouſneſs as if he had never ſeen the Perſon it repreſented, he told me, ſmiling, That a Lover of Alcidamia would be very happy in having that Honour which I had in it, and in obtaining that by Fortune which would not have been ſo eaſily obtained from her ſelf. After this, he went unto the Princeſs his Siſter, and would have me wait upon him. But as for Timaſias, he retired himſelf, being much grieved that his Combate had no better ſucceſs, but yet very glad in his Imagination that what he had done might perhaps undeceive Alcidamia: but for all that, he himſelf was deceived, for ſhe ſtill did think that it was he who took it, and afterwards loſt it in walking, and to recover it again, he fought with me. You may imagine what a noiſe this Accident did make in the Court: and had publiſhed it, before we came unto the Princeſs, whither Theanor came not. Alcidamia, who by chance was there, no ſooner ſaw me but ſhe bluſh'd, and was aſhamed to know I ſhould have her Picture. As ſoon as Policrates entred, he cauſed me to come near the Princeſs Herſilea, by whom Alcidamia ſtood: and relating unto them what they knew already; There needs no more, ſaid he, to compleat this Adventure, if Leontidas were really in love with Alcidamia, as well as Theanor and Timaſias are, the one of which is his Friend, and the other his Enemy; then might we ſee how one that is born in the Iſle of Cyprus would carry himſelf amidſt all theſe Circumſtances. Sir, ſaid I unto him, bluſhing and ſmiling, if there need no more than that to make an adventure handſome, you need wiſh no more. Hearken not, Sir, unto Leontidas (ſaid Alcidamia) as if he ſpoke ſeriouſly: for Sir, you know it is the cuſtom of his Country to treat all Ladies thus: There are ſix days yet, ſaid ſhe, which I have to correct him in, and he hath promiſed me that afterwards he will ſpeak no more in that manner unto me. How, ſaid Policrates (ſpeaking unto Alcidamia) have you given him leave to ſpeak in that manner unto you for ſix Days? Yes, Sir, replied ſhe, and bluſh'd, but it is upon Condition to ſpeak no more ſo unto me afterwards. And we will believe him (ſaid the Princeſs Herſilea, ſmiling.) Indeed I cannot (replied Policrates, looking upon Alcidamia) for I am perſwaded that ſince Leontidas has once told you that he loves, he will always tell you ſo. But it ſhall be in vain (replied Alcidamia) ſince I ſhall not hearken unto him: Yet Sir, ſaid ſhe, if it were fit, I could complain of a piece of injuſtice which you have done me, in not appointing Leontidas to reſtore my Picture unto me.

Policrates, having a pleaſing Phancy (as I underſtood afterwards) to ſee me vexed, anſwered, That his Reaſon was, becauſe he would not conſent unto a thing of that Nature at the requeſt of Timaſias, but at hers. If that be all, ſaid ſhe, I humbly beſeech you, command him to reſtore it unto me preſently. I can only intreat him (ſaid Policrates) for I am not his Maſter. You may command me, Sir, in all things, ſaid I unto him; but as for this, I conceive it would be ſo unjuſt to do it, that I cannot believe you will. And what injuſtice is there in it, replied Alcidamia, ſince it is but to render me my own? In truth, ſaid the Princeſs, you have leſs right unto it than Leontidas; for did you not give it unto Acaſta? Yes, replied ſhe, but though I did, yet Leontidas has no right unto it. For my part, ſaid Policrates, I find that Alcidamia is not to blame. And I find, ſaid the Princeſs Herſilea, that ſhe has no reaſon to have it from him: for ſince Acaſta was ſo careleſs in loſing it, and Leontidas ſo careful in keeping it, it is better in his Hands than hers. Oh Madam, ſaid I unto her, how infinitely am I obliged unto you, and what ſufficient thanks can I poſſibly render you? Whilſt I was thanking her, and ſhewing ſuch Reaſons as might more convince them in my Favour, I ſaw Policrates ſpeak low unto Alcidamia, and ſhe laugh as well as he: and methought afterwards, I ſaw them ſmile once or twice privately at one another; and indeed Policrates was diſpleaſed at Alcidamia, ſince ſhe confeſſed ſhe ſuffered me to ſpeak unto her concerning my Love, and the more to oblige me, told her that he believed I was really in love with her: but for further ſatiſfaction, he ſaid unto her, Will you continue obſtinate all this day in deſiring him to reſtore your Picture? How, Sir, ſaid ſhe, all this Day? ſpeaking in a low Voice to him: Yes, and all my Life long, or at the leaſt until he do reſtore it. Yet ſince I did not hear what he ſaid, and ſince I ſaw Policrates ſmile very often whilſt Alcidamia preſſed me to reſtore the Picture, I was much unquiet in my Mind. But as the Princeſs took my part, and was glad that the Affection of Policrates heretofore towards Timaſias whom ſhe loved not, did leſſen towards him, and increaſe towards me; ſhe ſaid, that abſolutely ſhe would never ſuffer me to reſtore this Picture; for (ſaid ſhe to Alcidamia, in my behalf) you have no more right unto it ſince you gave it unto Acaſta, and ſhe has no more right unto it than you, ſince ſhe loſt it ſo negligently; but Leontidas has more right than either of

You, ſince he found it ſo fortunately: ſince he has won it by his Valour; ſince he has prevented him who ſtole it from enjoying it; and ſince indeed he deſerves it. Then Policrates, to divert himſelf a little longer, ſaid unto Herſilea, that it were more juſt that the Picture remained in his Hands. But without giving him ſo much time as to tell his Reaſons, the Sentence of the Princeſs was followed; Alcidamia always declaring that ſhe would never conſent unto it. In Concluſion the Prince retired, and I alſo. Then after I had examined my Memory concerning all the Accidents of that Day, I found more bad than good Fortune in them: indeed I was extreamly joyed that this Picture which I had, was not given, and that I might almoſt ſay it was my own; and might look upon it without any circumſtance of Secreſy: But I was extreamly troubled when I found my Friend and my Enemy were both my Rivals: for I might very well imagine, that Theanor would never have perſwaded me that this Picture was given unto him who loſt it, but in Hopes thereby to make me alter my Deſign; nor could I be ignorant, conſidering the manner of Timaſias his Action, that he was deeply in love with Alcidamia: and afterwards calling to Memory the ſeriouſneſs of Policrates in looking upon the Picture, how he whiſpered with her, and divers times ſmiled at her: remembring, I ſay, all theſe trivial Circumſtances, I imagined that this Prince was in love with her alſo; ſo that, to ſpeak ſincerely unto you, I was no leſs jealous of him, than I was of my Friend, and my Enemy. I might have had ſo much Conſolation (if I had known how to have taken it rightly) as to have thought that Alcidamia did neither love him, nor Theanor, nor Timaſias. But I apprehended it with ſo many tormenting Fears, as if I had known that certainly ſhe was in love with them all; for if I had apprehended it ſo, then all my Jealouſy would have had but one Object, whereas now I ſuffered as many torments as if Alcidamia had loved them all one after another. On which ſide ſoever her ſenſible Soul inclines, (ſaid I) I have great cauſe to fear that every one of theſe three terrible Rivals may move her Heart. Theanor is a very compleat Man, wiſe, complacential, diſcreet, and witty, able to act all that a paſſionate Love can inſpire, and ruin me before I know where I am: ſo that if Alcidamia do affect the Courtſhip of ſuch a Man, I have great reaſon to fear him.

Again, If ſhe be affected unto Fame, Valour, and Liberality, Timaſias is a brave and gallant Man, who may eaſily attract her Inclination. But O Heavens, ſaid I, If ſhe be ambitious, what ſatisfaction may ſhe not find in Policrates? if ſhe affect Glory, there it is to be had; if ſhe loves Riches, ſince he is Maſter of the Seas, he can fetch her more; if his own will not content her: and thus repeating in my Mind, all the good qualities of Policrates, I endured unimaginable Torments, eſpecially when I conſidered the good Fortune of this Prince, which always was waited upon with ſucceſs in all his Enterprizes. No, no, ſaid I, all I have to do, is to inform my ſelf whether Policrates loves Alcidamia; for if he do, certainly ſhe will love him. Afterwards, when I conſidered that of all my three Rivals, there was only Timaſias, againſt whom I could vent all my Reſentments, for the other two, one of them was my Friend, and the other my Maſter; then did I almoſt loſe all my Reaſon, ſo that I paſſed away that Night moſt unquietly: yet was I not fully reſolved in my Mind, that Policrates was in love with Alcidamia, I did but only ſuſpect it, not believe it; for commonly, I began with fear; afterwards, I ſuſpected; and after that to believe what I feared, and ſuſpected to be really true. After then a tedious and vexatious Night, Theanor came unto my Chamber in the Morning, who being ſtill reſolved to conceal the truth, and to take my Love off from Alcidamia, if he could, came now to tell me how glad he was of the advantage which I got the day before over my Enemy; but yet he was very ſorry to obſerve me every day more and more inclined to love Alcidamia; yet if I would permit him to deliver his diſſwading Reaſons, he believed that I would think no more of it. The moſt prevalent Reaſon that can be, ſaid I unto him, I heard yeſterday from Policrates, which was, that you and Timaſias both are in love as well as I with her: But Theanor, I cannot help it, I muſt, whether I will or no, be your Rival; and ſince it is permitted Timaſias to love Alcidamia, me-thinks, you may allow Leontidas the ſame Liberty. When I began firſt to love her, I knew not that you did ſo alſo, but now at this Day, ſince Love has got the Maſtery, and abſolute dominion of my Heart, it is in vain for me to ſtrive againſt it. Theanor perceiving that I knew he was in Love, did not abſolutely deny it; but he told me then, that it was true, he loved Alcidamia, as all the reſt of the Court did; yet it was as true, that for ſome Reaſons which he wiſhed I knew, he endeavoured with all his Power to overcome his Paſſion.

In Concluſion, he uſed ſuch obſcure and ambiguous Expreſſions, as made me plainly perceive that the only Reaſon why he would withdraw his Affection from Alcidamia, was, becauſe Policrates had a ſecret mind unto her. Ah, my dear Theanor, (ſaid I unto him, though he was my Rival) though Policrates be more to be feared than he is, I do already know as much as you tell me. Theanor, who only had invented what he told me, purpoſely to diſſwade me from the Service of Alcidamia, was much ſurpriſed to hear me ſay ſo; and fearing that he had ſpoken a Truth, when he thought he had told me a Lie, he preſſed me to tell him what I knew concerning the Love of Policrates, which (as he ſaid) was ſuch a Secret as he thought none had known it but himſelf. But I, who was no leſs inquiſitive than he, did ſwear unto him he ſhould never know what I knew, unleſs he did firſt expound unto me all that he had formerly told me concerning Alcidamia's Picture, which he aſſured me was given unto him that loſt it. Theanor ſeeing himſelf ſo preſſed, and being extreamly deſirous to be ſatisfied of what I had ſaid unto him concerning Policrates his love unto Alcidamia, and being aſhamed of telling me a Lie, reſolved to tell me another which ſhould make good the firſt, and perhaps his own Deſign: he told me then, (after he had pauſed a while, as if he were half doubtful whether he ſhould impart the ſecret unto me, and after he had made me ſolemnly ſwear that I would never ſpeak of it how) Policrates was in love with Alcidamia, and had been long: for that the Buſineſs was managed by a Lady in the Court, called Meneclida, whom every one thought Policrates loved, though ſhe was only a Confident unto Alcidamia. How Alcidamia, though ſhe was very vertuous, yet anſwered his Affection with reciprocal complacency; and how this Picture about which ſo much ſtir hath been, was given, though it ſeemed to be ſtolen. Is it poſſible, ſaid I unto him, that this can be? Yes, ſaid he unto me, for Policrates a little before his Voyage, deſired Alcidamia to give him her Picture, and ſhe conſented; yet ſince ſhe would not ſuffer it to be taken in ſecret, for fear of diſcovery; ſhe ſeemed as if ſhe would give her Picture unto Acaſta, intending to have two drawn at a time, but the Painter falling ſick, as ſoon as he had finiſhed one for Acaſta, Alcidamia durſt do no other but give it unto her, becauſe ſhe had promiſed. But the Prince, going unto Acaſta to bid her adieu, and ſeeing ſhe had left this Picture upon her Table, whilſt ſhe went upon a viſit unto the Princeſs Herſilea, he commanded me to go and ſteal it for him, which I did accordingly; for at that time Alcidamia and I were not kind at all, and I cared not though Policrates loved her. How Theanor, ſaid I unto him, did you ſteal Alcidamia's Picture, and do you aſſure me, that ſhe promiſed it unto the Prince? Yes, replied he; But, ſaid I unto him, it was not Policrates who loſt it that Night I found it: for when that Accident happened, the Prince was gone into his Chamber long before. Theanor was non-pluſt at this anſwer; but upon ſecond thoughts; No, no, ſaid he, deceive not your ſelf; for the Prince Policrates does uſe to walk in the Night, and come privately without any Company with him into that Walk, ſo that doubtleſs it was he, though you did not know him, who let that Picture fall that Night you found it. But I remember, that I found you very Melancholy the next Morning: what was then in your Mind? Nothing but Sorrow, replied he, to find that abſence had not altered the Heart of Policrates; for as ſoon as ever he landed, he ſent to ſee how Alcidamia did. What did that concern you, ſaid

I, ſince you were not then in love with her? and why did you trouble your ſelf with any Sorrow, ſince ſhe was ſo indifferent unto you? I told you, anſwered he, that indeed ſhe was ſo when I firſt imbarqued, but I did not tell you, ſhe was ſo at my ſecond return. It was no wonder then, ſaid I unto him, that Policrates was ſo deſirous to have me reſtore it unto Alcidamia. Then, to ſatisfy his Curioſity, I told him how this Prince continued ſtill his earneſt deſires unto me, to reſtore it unto her; how he was continually whiſpering with her, and winking at her, whilſt ſhe was importuning me for it; and indeed I told him ſo exactly all my Obſervations of every petty Circumſtance, which then did ſeem ſuch ſtrong Arguments unto me of Policrates his Love, that I made no doubt at all of the truth. As for Theanor, he was even raviſhed with Joy to underſtand that I knew nothing which could diſquiet him, for he was not of ſo jealous an Apprehenſion as I was. But Theanor, ſaid I unto him; What do you your ſelf reſolve upon? To overcome my Paſſion, (ſaid he unto me, hoping that I would follow his Example) for, to be a Rival unto a Soveraign, is an odd preſumption. I am very glad you are ſo wiſe, ſaid I unto him, and that my Friend ceaſes from being my Rival. Being a Stranger as you are, replied he, you do expoſe your ſelf unto an angry adventure in loving her that Policrates loves, unto whom you are obliged. Being his Rival (ſaid I unto him, half angry) as you are, me-thinks, you take a great deal of pains for him; but yet if you will admit of any Lover of Alcidamia, it ſhould be my ſelf before any other, unleſs Ambition have a greater influence upon your Soul than Friendſhip. Theanor ſuffered this diſcourſe without any ſharp reply, as well becauſe he had no mind to fall out with me, as becauſe he was guilty of doing me wrong in deceiving me: but we parted in this Manner; he left me leſs jealous of him, but much more of Policrates, who being ſo amiable and handſom as he was, became intolerable unto me. As ſoon as Theanor was gone out, I went unto Alcidamia, where I found Timaſias, whom Acaſta had brought thither, to tell her how ſhe had wronged him in accuſing him for ſtealing her Picture: and though Alcidamia could not be driven from that belief, yet at the importunity of Acaſta, ſhe permitted him to ſee her, and that he might hereafter take the Honour to viſit her: ſo that when I came in, Timaſias was ready to go out, and thanked her for this great Honour which ſhe had done him. When I had heard theſe laſt Words of his Complement, I imagined the Matter, and was ſo very angry at it, that all the Company perceived it. As ſoon as he was gone, Alcidamia turning towards me, It is to you, ſaid ſhe, that Timaſias is beholden, for the permiſſion to ſee me ſometimes, which now I conſented unto, ſince if you had not quarrelled, I ſhould have ſtill believed, that it was he who took my Picture. If it be the intention (ſaid I unto him) which ſets a Price upon all good Offices, Timaſias has no reaſon to thank me for it, ſince I did never intend him any Service in it. Preſently after, Policrates came in, Theanor, and ſeveral others followed him; Timaſias, alſo proud of his new-obtained Favour, came in with Policrates almoſt as ſoon as he was gone out. Imagine me now in the midſt of three Rivals, the leaſt of which I was in great jealouſy of; which ſide ſoever I turned, mine Eye did meet with angry Objects: for ſince it was very hard for Alcidamia, but ſhe muſt often look upon either Policrates, or Theanor, or Timaſias, though ſhe had no deſign at all in her looks; I ſuffered more than I am able to expreſs: I would gladly ſhe had fixed her Eyes upon me, and none elſe; but alas, I was not ſo happy as to have my Wiſh: for you muſt know, that Alcidamia, whoſe equal and impartial Humour would drive all her Servants into deſpair, ſhe uſed ſuch a certain kind of indifferent Civility, without any Choice at all, as if ſhe knew no diſtinction of the Men which viſited her, though one were of the moſt delicate Spirit in the World: and ſhe had a phantaſy to gain and win upon every one by this innocent way, ſo that by conſequence ſhe was very civil and ſweet, and complacential unto all that came near her, and uſed an univerſal kindneſs unto all; ſhe never ſeemed to be troubled at them who did moſt importune her: ſhe was ſo abſolute Miſtreſs of her ſelf, that ſhe could change and vary when ſhe pleaſed, and was ſo witty, that ſhe knew how to turn diſcourſe as ſeemed good unto her: you may imagine therefore how I was tormented that day. When Policrates talked with her, I could not endure it, and I thought that her Joy, which ſhe appprehended in it, made her ſeem fairer. If ſhe looked upon Timaſias, I imagined it was only to engage him deeper than before; and if ſhe turned towards Theanor, I feared that her looks would not cure him of his Paſſion, as he told me he deſigned. When Policrates ſpoke unto Meneclida, who was then with Alcidamia, I ſuppoſed it to be out of Subtilty, and as unto his Confident of his Paſſion; and if Alcidamia did me any Civility, or held me in any general Diſcourſe, I looked upon her as one who would deceive me, and returned her a peeviſh Anſwer. I confeſs unto you, that I could have wiſhed Alcidamia fair only in my Eye, or elſe that ſhe were unto all the World inviſible: I wiſhed they would eſteem her, and her Honour was not indifferent unto me; but for all that, I would not have them love her, and I think, I ſhould have rather wiſhed them to hate her. The Diſcourſe of all this Day was very agreeable unto all the Company, except me. The Prince Policrates, chiding me for my Melancholy, told me, that I was ſurely a very diſcreet Lover, and that he could not gueſs at any cauſe of Melancholy I ſhould have, ſince I had the Picture of the faireſt Perſon upon Earth. Sir, ſaid I unto him haſtily, it is not ſo great a happineſs to have the Picture of the fair Alcidamia only from the Hands of Fortune: but if I ſhould have ſo much happy Honour as to receive it from her fair Hand, I ſhould then eſteem it much more precious than I do, although I do eſteem it at a high rate already. Before you receive it from her Hands, ſaid Policrates, ſmiling, ſhe muſt get it out of yours; and therefore your beſt way will be to reſtore it unto her, as I deſired you yeſterday; And as I deſire to day, ſaid Alcidamia. If I were ſure you would give it me again to Morrow, replied I, I ſhould doubtleſs reſtore it to Day;

but I ſhould be very unhappy to deprive my ſelf of that Honour which I do already enjoy, in hopes of a greater Good, which perhaps you will never honour me with. Afterwards Meneclida ſeemed as if ſhe were very jealous that I ſhould have Alcidamia's Picture, and not ſhe, and becauſe the excellent and only Picture-drawer which drew it at Samos was gone unto Epheſus. This pleaſing conteſt between theſe two Beauties was ſo hot, that Alcidamia to appeaſe Meneclida, gave her a Seal of a very rare Emerauld, her name Engraven upon it, which ſhe wore about her Arm in a flame coloured Ribbon; the Gift was ſo magnificent, both for the Luſtre of the Stone, and for the Art of the Engraver, who was the famous Theodorus, that Meneclida would not accept it, but upon Condition that ſhe would take another Bracelet which ſhe wore, the Claſp whereof was Rubies, and in the midſt thereof a very fair Diamond. This exchange paſſing in my preſence, I was ſo bold as to ſay, that I preferred Alcidamia's Picture before them both, as Magnificent as they were. Then did Theanor make Signs at me, as who would ſay I muſt not declare my ſelf ſo openly before Policrates. But I, who was not Maſter of my Paſſion, would needs chear up my Jealouſy, by thoſe Signs of my Love which I expreſſed, before my two Rivals. In the mean while I muſt tell you that the eighth Day being come, after which Alcidamia would not hear me ſpeak any more concerning my Love, I diſcourſed ſo long, and ſo ſeriouſly unto her, that ſhe perceived ſhe muſt prepare her ſelf for a long Perſecution: all that I had ſaid unto her until then, might have been interpreted, as Gallantry only, but ſo it could not be at this time; for it was impoſſible for me to hide my Jealouſy from her, when I was expreſſing my ſelf in Love: and I think verily, that I thought more of conjuring her not to love my Rivals, than I did of intreating her to permit me leave to love her. After this, I lived in perpetual vexation and anguiſh of Mind, though I did, if I durſt ſay it, ſometimes find ſome glimps of Goodneſs towards me in the Heart of Alcidamia, but yet I durſt not put any truſt in her: and I think that unleſs I lived alone with her in an uninhabited Iſland, where never any Ship came, I could not have fancied ſufficient Security from my Rivals. Therefore was I extreamly miſerable, for I muſt whether I would or no, find Policrates every day with her, and endure the frequent Viſits of Theanor, who could not hide his Thoughts ſo cloſe but I could eaſily diſcover he was in Love with Alcidamia: and I was forced alſo, unleſs I would quit Samos, to ſuffer Timaſias, who was my mortal Enemy.

And to ſpeak truth, whoſoever hath not had Trial of all theſe three kinds of Jealouſies, does not know what it is to be rightly jealous; but mine reſted not here: for be pleaſed to know that there was a Man in the Court, of a very baſe Condition, who had been a Slave unto Xanthus the Philoſopher, the ſame time that famous Eſope was with him, and who was infranchized by their Maſter the ſame day that excellent Author of thoſe witty Fables which are ſo famous every where, was ſet at Liberty. The pleaſant and merry-making Humour of this Man brought him into the Court, and procured him the Liberty to feaſt without any Exception, upon all the World. Since Alcidamia, as I told you before, was ſo complacential as to ſuffer thoſe who were even troubleſome unto her, you may eaſily imagine that ſhe would not baniſh thoſe from her, who diverted her: ſo that this old Friend of Eſope was continually with her; then ſince he knew all the News of the Court, and could tell it handſomely, he had always ſomething or other to tell her in ſecret, and ſhe had always ſomething to ask him in private, ſo that there paſſed not a Day but I ſaw them whiſper long together, and ſometimes laugh, although I knew not at what: And I ſaw this, I tell you, ſo frequent, that maugre my Jealouſie of Timaſias, of Theanor, and of Policrates, I was alſo jealous of Hiparchus, (for that was his Name) who was as much below me, as Policrates was above me. This poor Piece of Jealouſie troubled me more than all the others, becauſe it brought me ſometimes even to ſcorn Alcidamia. After this Hiparchus could never move me unto any Laughter, how pleaſant and witty ſoever his Raillery was, for it is not poſſible for one to be both a good Buffoon and a Rival unto any. This was the manner of my Life, when Policrates (who indeed was in love with Meneclida, though for ſome State-Reaſons, he did not then make it appear openly) intended a Recreation upon the Sea, or rather a great Fiſhing, at which all the Court-Ladies were to be. The Princeſs Herſilia invited them all unto this Sea-Feaſt; and though doubtleſs it was intended only for Meneclida, yet I ſuppoſed it to be for Alcidamia, with whom ſhe held a great Privacy and Familiarity at that time: for ſince the Accident of the Picture, Acaſta, who before that was her prime Confident, was now no longer ſo, but Meneclida had the higheſt Place in her Heart. All things being prepared for this grand Fiſhing, and the Day being ſet down; they were conſtrained to defer it, becauſe there arrived an Embaſſador from Amaſis King of Egypt, who loved Policrates very well, and who ſent to tell him, that his good Fortune would procure him ſome Unquietneſs of Mind, for it was the ſaying of a very wiſe Man, It was abſolutely impoſſible to be always happy: he did therefore adviſe him to prepare himſelf for ſome Misfortune, by ſome voluntary Loſs, to the end, that if any angry and croſs Accident fell out, his Soul ſhould not be ſurprized with it. Policrates received this Counſel by many Teſtimonies of Gratitude for the Care which ſo great a King did take of him, and he went into a Galley with this Egyptian Embaſſador, and as it was reported, he threw into the Sea, upon a premeditated Deſign, a Jewel of an ineſtimable Value, to the end it might cauſe him ſufficient Grief: Yet it was not ſo; but ſee what was the ground of this Report, which was rumoured not only throughout all Aſia, but all the World. The Morning that this Embaſſador came, and had been treated with all poſſible Magnificency, Policrates deſired to recreate himſelf at this great Fiſhing. This being in the end of Autumn, which commonly is the moſt pleaſant time of the Year at Samos, the Sea was ſo calm, that it was moſt delectable being upon it, yet not ſo good for Fiſhing, for the great Calm is not the moſt proper for it.

Twelve gilded Gallies were provided for this glorious Company; all of them had moſt magnificent Tents upon the Deck; and a thouſand waving Flags of divers Colours, in ſeveral Places of the Galleys; but above the reſt, that which was appointed to carry the Prince Policrates, the Princeſs Herſilea, the Egyptian Embaſſador, the fair Meneclida, the incomparable Alcidamia, and other Principal Ladies of the Court, was the moſt glorious and gallant Galley in the World. Yet I who thought all this Magnificency was only an effect of Policrates his Love of Alcidamia, did obſerve it more than any other, though without any Delight: I got into this Galley where ſhe was, and that day was ſhe fairer than ever Galathia, Thetis, or Venus, could by the Art of any Hand be drawn: All the Nets which were uſed were of Silk; all the Fiſhers were dreſſed in Triton's Habit, and all the Ladies like the Nereides. As we were in ſuch a Place of the Sea, as was full of Fiſh, Policrates preſented unto all the Ladies, Lines, and Angle-Rods of Ebonie, and blue Silk Lines with Hooks of Gold. This Prince, who naturally was civil unto all, did as much as he could hide his Affection unto Meneclida, and taking one of thoſe Angle-Rods, gave it unto Alcidamia, before he gave one unto Meneclida, which Paſſage you may well imagine did extreamly trouble me; ſo that whileſt every one was taken up with Delights, I was toſſed in a turbulent Sea of Jealouſie.

Theanor and Timaſias, who were in another Galley, did ſo fix their looks upon that wherein Alcidamia was, that I believe they did not think their Fiſhing good Sport in theirs: for my part, all my Imployment was to obſerve what Policrates did; and to my great Miſery, I was no leſs unquiet, when he ſpoke unto Meneclida, than when he diſcourſed with Alcidamia, becauſe I conceived her to be only a Confident of his Love. I obſerved that whileſt the Egyptian Embaſſador was entertaining the Princeſs Herſilea, and whileſt many Ladies were buſie in their Sport, ſome Fiſhing, and others looking on, Policrates preſenting a Rod and Line unto Alcidamia before Meneclida, ſaid unto her out of his Gallantry, That if ſhe were as happy in taking of Fiſh, as ſhe was of Hearts, ſhe would catch Fiſh enough. Then I know not how Meneclida, taking her Angle-Rod in her Hand, did ſo entangle it in that Ribon which ſhe wore about her Arm, and which Alcidamia had given her; but I am ſure ſhe let it fall, and gave a great Cry upon it, and that if Policrates had not ſtooped haſtily, and catched it, it had certainly fallen into the Sea: Then holding it in his Hands, he expreſſed many Signs of Joy, as well as Meneclida, who infinitely eſteemed it, as well for its own Value, as for the hand which gave it: But as for Policrates, who only valued it as coming from the Arm of Meneclida, he told her, that in lieu of reſtoring it unto her, he would keep it unto the end of the Fiſhing, for fear ſhe ſhould loſe it again: Then calling me unto him, have not I more Right unto this Seal, Leontidas, ſaid he, than you have unto the Picture of Alcidamia? And may I not keep it if I will from the fair Meneclida, as well as you the Picture from Alcidamia, ſince you found yours in a Place where it would not have been for ever loſt, as this which I happily preſerved would have been? Sir, ſaid I unto him very angrily, becauſe I ſuppoſed he only loved the Seal becauſe it was Alcidamia's, you were ſo oppoſite unto me concerning this Picture whereof you ſpeak, that for all the Reſpect I owe you, I have much ado to judg favourably in your Behalf. Then muſt the fair Alcidamia aſſiſt me, ſaid he, in perſwading the fair Meneclida that I may enjoy that which ſhe loſt? Sir, replied ſhe, (moſt cruelly as I thought) I ſhall never be oppoſite unto any thing which may be advantagious unto you; and I find that Meneclida has made this Seal which I gave her ſo precious by her wearing it, that you have great reaſon to deſire the Preſervation of it. If the Prince, replied Meneclida, be of my Mind, he will value it upon the ſame Score as I did; that is, becauſe it was yours.

In Concluſion, after this Conteſt, Meneclida did conſent that Policrates ſhould wear her Seal the reſt of the Day, ſo that he putting it on his Arm, ſeemed to be as pleaſant and glorious as if he had got ſome great Conqueſt: Indeed, he was as glad as I was ſad, for as the Paſſage ſeemed unto my Apprehenſion, it was never given unto Meneclida, clida, but under a private Deſign to be given unto Policrates. I imagined that Meneclida did purpoſely put it off, and let it fall, and indeed I imagined all that could torment my Mind. After they had taken all the Delight that Fiſhing could afford, and had divers times ſeen them draw their Nets, ſo loaded with Fiſh that they broke, and gave Liberty unto all thoſe pretty Priſoners, which they only took for the Pleaſure of taking them, and to look upon their ſilver Armour: and after the Ladies had tired themſelves with taking many Dares, and other Fiſhes, there was in every Galley a magnificent Collation prepared, and moſt harmonious Muſick; afterwards, the Sun not being towards Evening any thing offenſive unto the Ladies, the Tents were all taken away, and this illuſtrious Company enjoyed as pleaſant a ſeaſon as ever was. All the Ladies took off their Hoods. The Beauty appeared in full Luſtre, every one was entertaining themſelves with thoſe that were moſt agreeable unto their Fancy, and I was the only Man who was ſolitary, and held Converſation with none but my ſelf: I ſaw Policrates ſit between Alcidamia and Meneclida, ſpeaking ſometimes to one, and ſometimes to another. Meneclida, becauſe the Day grew old, and Night came on, asked for her Seal: and as he ſeemed unwilling to reſtore, ſhe preſſed the more to have it, but ſtill this Prince denied it, as ſeeming extream unwilling to part with it. Sir, (ſaid ſhe ſmiling, as afterwards I knew, for then I ſaw only by their Action, and did not underſtand their Words) If any but the Prince Policrates ſhould ask this Seal as a Favour, he would be ſuſpected a Paſſion, little leſs gallant than Love. To ſhew you, ſaid he, that I am not very covetous, I will reſtore the Seal upon condition you will only give me the Ribbon which is tied unto it; in ſaying ſo he began to unty it notwithſtanding her Reſiſtance; and as ſhe ſtill denied it, ſaying, to excuſe her ſelf, that ſhe ſhould loſe it if ſhe had not the Ribbon alſo, the Seal fell out of the Hands of Policrates into the Sea, and he not able to catch it, for they leaned over a gilded Rail, which was by the ſides of the Galley; Policrates was even deſperate at the Accident: Meneclida very angry, and when the Loſs was divulged, every one ſhared in the Prince's Sorrows, for being the cauſe of ſuch a Loſs unto Menelida: I only rejoiced, and was raviſhed that he could not enjoy ſuch a Favour as came from Alcidamia; for I did not underſtand that he intended to reſtore it when he let it fall: See, ſaid he, the great Misfortune of Policrates, ſince the firſt that befals him is without a Remedy. But the more he appeared troubled, the more did I alſo, becauſe my Jealouſy was augmented by it. The Egyptian Embaſſador, to comfort him, wiſhed that never greater Misfortune might befal him: and as long as the Day laſted, either at Sea, or in the Palace, after our return to Court, nothing but this Accident was talked on.

The next Morning, Theanor, the more to afflict me, did craftily tell me, that Policrates, to repair the Loſs of Meneclida, had in the Evening ſent two other Seals unto her and Alcidamia, the faireſt and richeſt in the World, beſeeching her to keep the one, and give the other unto Meneclida. This piece of Gallantry drove me into abſolute Deſpair; and though I underſtood at the ſame time by another beſides Theanor, that Alcidamia did make very nice in accepting what the Prince had ſent her, and that Policrates was glad to uſe the Authority of the Princeſs his Siſter to beg Acceptance, yet was I not leſs jealous, for I conſidered that Alcidamia had a Seal which came from Policrates, and I imagined that the other which was given unto Meneclida, was but a Colour for giving the other, and as a kind of Recompence for the good Offices ſhe had done him: Moreover this Ribbon which remained in the Hands of Policrates, and which he kept ſo carefully, did infinitely augment my Pangs of Jealouſy, ſo that I enjoyed not a Minute's Reſt. There happened the next Morning another Accident, which did extraordinarily trouble me, and which every one looked upon as one of the moſt miraculous Chances, and as the greateſt ſign of good Fortune that ever happened unto any one; for Policrates, ſome two Days after this grand Entertainment, having riſen betimes in the Morning, with Intentions to go and hunt, and being in a Marble Walk in the midſt of the Caſtle, ready to take Horſe, he ſaw two old Fiſher-men approaching him with humble Reſpect, and preſented a Fiſh unto him which they had taken, of a monſtrous Bigneſs, which two other Fiſhers carried upon a Bundle of Sea-Reeds. This Fiſh being an extraordinary fine one, and wonderful large, Policrates looked upon it with much Delight; and cauſing him who brought it to be well rewarded, he took Horſe, and went to hunt as he intended: but at his return, one of his Officers coming unto him as he was entring into the Caſtle, preſented unto him the ſame Seal, which Meneclida and he let fall into the Sea the laſt great fiſhing Day, which they found in this miraculous Fiſh which was preſented unto him, who doubtleſs had ſwallowed it at the very ſame Inſtant that it fell into the Water. I was then cloſe by Policrates, ſo that I could eaſily obſerve how pleaſingly he was ſurprized at this prodigious Accident, and to get that again which he thought to be for ever abſolutely loſt: And indeed, this Piece of good Fortune was ſo extraordinary, that though Policrates had not been at all in Love, yet muſt it needs rejoyce him: and ſince Meneclida was ſo much raviſhed to regain that into her Poſſeſſion which was ſo very dear unto her, Policrates alſo did teſtify his in ſuch Exceſs, that it made me more jealous than ever, imagining that whatſoever I ſaw him do, was always for Alcidamia: he gave unto that Officer which preſented it unto him as much as enriched him for his Life: he redoubled his Liberality to the Fiſher-men who preſented the Fiſh; and making choice of me unluckily amongſt the reſt, he appointed me to carry this welcome News unto Alcidamia, and Meneclida, until he could come himſelf to ſee them. Mean while, all the Court admired at this ſtrange Accident, and could not chuſe but talk of it. After this, ſaid the Egyptian Embaſſador unto Policrates, You may truſt Fortune, or defy her, ſince the faireſt of Fiſhes did ſwallow it; aud afterwards ſuffered himſelf to be taken by ſuch a Fiſher as was ſo honeſt as to preſent you with it; and after all this, to find an Officer ſo truſty and faithful, as to reſtore a Jewel of that Value; is a piece of as great good Fortune as is imaginable, and ought to perſwade you, that you ſhall be ever happy. If ſo (anſwered Policrates very civilly) you your ſelf muſt rejoyce alſo, as at a thing which ſpeaks the proſperity of the King your Maſter, ſince I my ſelf can never be happy, unleſs he be ſo alſo. Mean while I went againſt my Mind, to diſcharge my ſelf of my Commiſſion, but it was after ſuch a faint Manner, as let Alcidamia and Meneclida ſee very well that my Mind was much perplexed: I found unto my greater Grief, that Hiparchus, who had not been hunting, was with them, and that Timaſthes and Theanor both, whom we left at the Gates of the Town, were there alſo: I related my Buſineſs then in ſuch a manner, as was a fit ſubject for the raillery of Hiparchus: for ſeeing in what a melancholy Tone I told this news of Joy and Delight, he vented a hundred of his Flaſhes, which were bitter unto me, and pleaſant unto them, in ſo much as if Meneclida had not handſomly turned the diſcourſe, my Melancholy would perhaps have appeared more than I would have it. After this, I muſt go and render an account unto Policrates of what the Ladies ſaid unto me; but though they did both of them load me with a hundred Civilities towards him, yet I paſſed them over in a ſlight Manner, and told a ſhort Story, that Meneclida was very glad there was any Hopes to have her Seal ſoon again.

Policrates was then in his Cloſet, and no Body with him, but my ſelf; and he asked with extream Curioſity, what Meneclida and Alcidamia had ſaid unto me? and ſince I returned him no manner of pertinent Anſwer, he came upon me with Queſtion upon Queſtion, and put my Soul into ſuch an horrid torment, that I was divers times ready to caſt off all reſpect unto him; but the Prince obſerving the diſcompoſure of my Mind, did ask what it was which troubled me, ſince I anſwered with a bow, he begun to muze, and afterwards looking earneſtly upon me; Leontidas, ſaid he unto me, you are either in love, or elſe I am the moſt miſtaken Man in the World: But if it be ſo, ſaid he, I wiſh for your own quiet ſake it be not with Alcidamia, for ſhe is one of ſuch an indifferent humour as will much trouble the tranquillity of your Mind in obtaining your deſired End. When I heard

Policrates ſpeak in this manner, and perceived his deſire to know my Thoughts, I was at ſuch a Non-plus, that I could not anſwer him. The Prince obſerving my diſorder, ſmiled, and embracing me with abundance of Sweetneſs, Leontidas, ſaid he unto me, fear not to diſcover your Imperfections unto me, for I am reſolved to diſcover mine unto you, and the more to oblige you, I pray you know, that the ſame Policrates who every one conceives ſo happy, is oftentimes tormented with a ſecret which troubles the goodneſs of his Fortunes. Sir, (ſaid I then unto him, being extreamly tranſported) it ſeems to me, that Alcidamia is not very averſe unto you. Alcidamia indeed, ſaid he unto me, does ſometimes qualify the ſeverity of Meneclida, but yet for all that, all that ſhe does in my behalf is to prevent her Friend from treating me ill, but truly ſhe is very favourable unto me. I confeſs, when I heard Policrates expreſs himſelf thus, I thought at the firſt it was only to deceive me. Yet this Prince perceiving my miſtruſt of him, and gueſſing at a great part of my Thoughts, he was ſo kind as to deſire me, that I would utter them unto him, and I was ſo bold as to obey him. And after I had in ſome ſort acknowledged, that I had been deceived, Policrates then underſtanding my Error, did diſſipate it in ſuch a manner, that there remained not any more ſuſpition in my Soul, and I perfectly knew, how all that Theanor had ſaid unto me was falſe, which put me into ſuch a cholerick fume againſt him, that I was not maſter of my own Reſentments. I told not then Policrates all I knew, and I conceived it more noble to be revenged upon him my ſelf, than to make uſe of the Authority of the Prince for it. Now did Policrates really love me, and to cure me of my Jealouſy, he made me that confident of his Paſſion unto Meneclida, and to oblige me the more, he offered me all his aſſiſtance to Alcidamia; and indeed he ſpoke ſo much to my Advantage, when he went the next Morning to carry Meneclida her Seal, that the fair Alcidamia did look much more favourably upon me. In the mean time, going to look out Theanor, that I might acquaint him with my Reſentments, I underſtood how he was gone into the Country for ſome Days. I heard alſo that Timaſias was faln ſick, and ſtirred not out of his Chamber; So that I found my jealouſy of Policrates vaniſhed, and rid of two Rivals for a while, and finding alſo the favour of this Prince, I entred into a very great league of Friendſhip with Alcidamia, and was for almoſt a Week a moſt happy Man. But alas, the beginning of my good Fortune was the beginning of my greater Torment. For as long as I thought my ſelf not at all loved by Alcidamia, my Jealouſy, though great then, yet was not comparable to what afterwards, ſince ſhe favoured me ſo far as to tolerate my Affection, and permit me ſome Hopes of hers hereafter; for regarding her then as one in whom I had ſome right, I was therefore much more tormented in thoughts of the loſs. I muſt now augment my Train, thereby to have more Spies to obſerve what ſhe and all my Rivals did: when Toeanor returns we muſt Fight. I had alſo many ruffles with Timaſias, and many Suſpicions of Hiparchios, and indeed I was at that paſs as I wiſhed Alcidamia might ſee no Body. I followed her every where,or cauſed her to be followed; I was always Melancholy, and Muſing, for though Alcidamia did out of her goodneſs unto me create much hope in me, yet ſhe did not leave off her complacential Humour unto all People, but was ſo generally civil unto all, as made me abſolutely deſpair, and perſecuted me beyond Imagination; and truly it was abſolutely impoſſible for me, not to be perpetually giving her ſome Marks of my Suſpicion, though I did never intend as much: if ſhe had hereupon been ſo indulgent as to cure me, perhaps ſhe might have done it: but on the contrary,my Jealouſy incenſed her, and made her uſe all the means ſhe could to add Fire unto my Jealouſy,for ſhe took every opportunity of converſing with one of my Rivals: ſhe let ſlip no occaſion of walking abroad, and recreating her ſelf, and lived as beſt pleaſed her ſelf, as if I were not jealous of her; not that I could ever find ſhe did any thing which was not fit, or what other Ladies of her Quality did; but me-thought ſhe was bound to pity my weakneſs, to yield a little unto my capricious Phantaſy, and to reſtrain her ſelf ſomething more than ſhe did; yet for all that, this inhumane Lady looked upon me as her Perſecutor, and treated me ſo cruelly, that I underſtood ſhe railed againſt my Suſpicions and Fears unto Policrates, and unto Hiparchus alſo; inſomuch as all my Jealouſies revived even of the very Prince: So that with an angry Mind, I went one Day to viſit her, when ſhe was all alone; yet when I was with her, the one half of my Fury vaniſhed, and I ſpoke unto her with much Reſpect. This Diſcourſe began at the firſt with things indifferent, though it was not my Cuſtom to do ſo when I was alone with her: But not knowing how to begin handſomely, for fear I ſhould too much incenſe her, I ſtammered, and was wandered ſo impertinently from the purpoſe, that Alcidamia could not chuſe but laugh; when I ſaw that, I grew red with Choler, and no longer able to hide my Thoughts; You are obliged unto me, ſaid I unto her, for giving you ſo often a ſubject to divert the Prince Policrates, and to laugh with Hiparchus. They two are of ſuch different Diſpoſitions (ſaid ſhe) that I cannot think one thing is able to divert them equally. It is much harder for me to comprehend (ſaid I unto her) how they can both be poſſibly in one Heart. They eaſily may (anſwered ſhe very ſharply) and many others beſides, for certainly Leontidas, there is often in one Heart, both Love and Hatred, Scorn and Friendſhip, Indifferency and Averſion. I know it well (ſaid I unto her) and I know very well alſo which of all theſe I ought moſt to pretend unto. Since doubtleſs you are not ignorant (replied ſhe in a more malicious Tone) of the price of thoſe Services which you render, it is eaſy for you to gueſs it. I gueſs it better, replied I, by the capricious Humour of another, than by my ſelf. But you may gueſs at it more exactly, replied ſhe, by your own capricious Humour, than by any thing elſe, if it were poſſible for you to know it. Call you that capricious, Madam (ſaid I unto her) to adore you only of all the People in the World, to look upon you only, and to wiſh nothing upon Earth but to be loved? I know very well, ſaid ſhe, that you look upon none but me, and perhaps if you looked upon me leſs, you would be looked upon more favourably. Why Madam, replied I, do you think it poſſible to love perfectly, and not endeavour, as much as may be, to ſee the Perſon loved? I think, ſaid ſhe, that the way to make ones ſelf to be loved, is to pleaſe, and not to be always buſy in depriving the Party who is loved of all things ſhe delights in. But if the Perſon who one loves, (anſwered I) do love again, ſhe will take no delight in perſecuting him whom ſhe thinks worthy of her Affection; but would find much more pleaſure in pitying his Weakneſs, and deſiring to cure him. For my part (ſaid ſhe) indeed I am not ſo full of Goodneſs; for I know not how to pity thoſe Evils in any one, which they voluntarily cauſe in themſelves. Ah Madam, ſaid I unto her, how little do you know him of whom you ſpeak, if you think that he does voluntarily cauſe his Evils? No, no, deceive not your ſelf I beſeech you, Jealouſy is a tyrannical Paſſion, as well as Love, which begins in our Hearts whether we will or no; which augments alſo in ſpite of all reſiſtance, and in the end, do what we can, will ruin us. Since it is ſuch an incurable Diſeaſe, ſaid ſhe, it is in vain to go about the Cure: and the beſt Diſcretion is to hide it ſo that others ſhall not perceive it. I would I could, ſaid I unto her; but how is it poſſible, Madam, to ſee you continually invironed with Perſons who are agreeable unto you, and not to expreſs ſome glimpſe of perplexity? What, ſaid ſhe, would you never have me look upon any but ugly Perſons? that I ſhould be always in ſolitary and melancholy Places? that I ſhould hate Muſick and Mirth? that I ſhould never walk Abroad? that Converſation ſhould diſpleaſe me? and that I ſhould drone away all my life in ſolitude? I wiſh not ſo much, Madam, ſaid I unto her, but I confeſs I deſire with all my Heart, if it were poſſible, that the Prince Policrates, Theanor, Timaſius, and Hiparchus, were none of them ſo much in your favour as Leontidas. Alcidamia bluſhed at this Diſcourſe, and after a while of pawſing, ſhe began to tell me, what rank all theſe Perſons held in her Heart: and firſt for Policrates, ſhe told me that ſhe eſteemed him as a great Prince, who was paſſionately in love with Menteclida her Friend. That as for Thtanor, ſhe neither had any Hatred nor Friendſhip towards him. As for Timaſias, ſhe had a greater Diſpoſition to hate him, than to love him: and as for Hiparchus, ſhe ever loved his Company, but never his Perſon. When I heard Alcidamia ſay ſo, I was even raviſhed with Joy, and would have returned her thanks, but ſhe prevented me; and ſaid, No, no, Leontidas, make no ſuch haſte, I tell you not all this for your Satisfaction, but my own. It is for my own particular Honour, that I aſſure you all theſe Perſons whom I have named have no ſecret Place in my Heart; But it is for your tranquillity, that I tell you ingenuouſly, becauſe you ſhall not be deceived, that you have no more place in my Heart than they have. Why, Madam, ſaid I unto her, will you never love Leontidas? No, not the leaſt thought, replied ſhe, as long as he continues jealous, and ſince I cannot think but he will be always ſo, I cannot think, that I ſhall ever entertain any Affection to him. But conſider, cruel Lady, ſaid I unto her, that this Jealouſy is only an effect of Love. If you loved me then a little leſs, replied ſhe, I ſhould love you a little more; for indeed, Leontidas, I had rather marry a Man that hates me, than one that loves me with any ingredient of Jealouſy in his Love: therefore deſiſt from courting me any more, ſince all will be in vain. But, ſaid I unto her, were I once aſſured, that I were the happy Man you mean to make choice of, my Jealouſy would ceaſe. No, ſaid ſhe, I will not expoſe my ſelf unto ſuch a Danger: for there are many Lovers who are not jealous at all whilſt they are Servants, yet are ſo when they come to be Husbands. But I can never think that he who is jealous, when he has yet no right unto the Perſon whom he loves, will ever ceaſe to be ſo when he has married her. Therefore Leontidas, you have put an unremoveable obſtacle between your Pretenſions unto me, and your ſelf. And how much ſoever I may eſteem you, I ſhall tell you once again, that I ſhall never marry you. When I heard Alcidamia thus expreſs her ſelf, I would have proteſted unto her, that I would never be jealous any more; but in very ſpeaking unto her, I do confeſs, that I found ſuch certains ſymptoms in my ſelf, as told me, that I was not yet in a Condition to be abſolutely cured of that Malady which tormented me. In the mean time, I could not move Alcidamia, to alter her Reſolution, nor get any other anſwer from her. I made ſeveral Attempts upon my ſelf ſeveral Days, not to appear jealous, but ſeemed to be pleaſant, and agreeable to all Societies? I ſpoke unto Theanor, I ſaluted Timaſias with more civility than formerly: I would ſometimes jeſt and quibble with Hiparchus; but to tell you truly, I did all theſe ſo ill-favouredly, and in ſuch a forced Manner, that I made Alcidamia laugh more heartily, than if I had ſpoke the moſt pleaſant things in the World. This put me into ſuch an inward chafe, that I did ſilently blame her. What would you have me do, ſaid ſhe, you counterfeit it ſo ſcurvily, that I cannot for my life but laugh. This her carriage towards me, did extreamly offend me, but yet ſhe continued her conſtant courſe of Sweetneſs, Civility, and Complacency unto every one, whilſt I continued my accuſtomed vexation of Mind, and was always reſtleſs and miſerable. Not knowing then what courſe to take, but knowing well that Alcidamia was fully reſolved upon what ſhe told me, I went to conſult with the Philoſopher Lanthas, whom I was well acquainted with, and conjured him to preſcribe me his beſt Phyſick, to cure my Jealouſy; for knowing him to be a Man of profound knowledg in every thing, and one that all his Life had ſtudied the Nature of Paſſions; I had great Hopes in his Documents, and ſapient Advices to find a Remedy. The Evil whereof you complain (anſwered he) is not ſo eaſily cured as you imagine, nor know I any Remedy but one; yet it is moſt infallible to thoſe that will obſerve it. Let me hear it quickly, I beſeech you, ſaid I unto him, for let it be as difficult as it will, I am fully reſolved to apply it. There is no way, replied he, but to leave of loving; and without this, thoſe whoſe Souls are tainted with that dangerous Paſſion, can never be abſolutely delivered from it. But, replied I, all in Anger, you muſt teach me at the ſame time how to leave loving: By leaving the ſight of her you love, anſwered he. Your Remedies are very harſh, ſaid I unto him. Your Diſeaſe is great, replied he; and the Maladies of the Mind, as well as thoſe of the Body, when they are grown to Extremities, they muſt have extream Remedies. Is there no poſſibility, ſaid I unto him, to cure Jealouſy ſome other way? No, not when it is violent, replied he, and ſtronger than the Love which firſt gave Life unto it; for truly this Paſſion is ſo bereft of Reaſon, that it can never judg of any thing rightly. A Man that is jealous in the exceſs, is like a Remedy unto which Nature lends no help, and unto whom all Remedies are uſeleſs. In other Paſſions, Reaſon cauſes the Owner ſometimes to receive the Remedies preſcribed; but a jealous Man will find no help from any Advice: for being accuſtomed to be often deceived, he can never diſcern the truth. So that after a long Diſcourſe, the reſult of all my Philoſophical advice was; That if I would ceaſe being jealous, I muſt ceaſe loving; and if I would ceaſe loving, I muſt ceaſe ſeeing the Party whom I loved. Then did I quit her, and went to walk alone, and very buſy I was with my ſelf, to reſolve what Courſe to undertake: but I could not that day fix upon any thing, and I believe, if the merciless Alcidamia had not ſo infinitely augmented my Jealouſy by her manner of proceeding with me, it would have been long before I had determined with my ſelf. But the great Feaſt of Juno being now come, and all the Iſle of Samos in publick Jolity; ſhe gave me ſuch freſh Cauſes of complaint, in all the Aſſemblies where ever I ſaw her; and ſhe had ſo fully perſwaded me, that ſo long as I was jealous, ſo long ſhould I be hated; that in Concluſion, I reſolved, ſince I could not ceaſe from being ſo, I would ceaſe from loving if I could, and to depart from Samos. I was inventing an handſom Pretence for my Departure, yet not telling the truth unto any but Policrates, of whom I was then leſs jealous, I quit his Iſle, notwithſtanding all his Perſwaſions to the contrary, and I did quit it without bidding adieu unto any: But that I might go out compleatly unhappy, as I paſſed by Alcidamia's Lodging, I ſaw Timaſias and Hiparchus enter, and I knew by Theanor's Servants who were at the Door, that he was there before.

Then I had ſo ſtrong a phancy of that Joy, which my Rivals would reſent in my Abſence, that I was in a mind not to depart, yet wreſtling with my Mind with all my Power, I at the laſt imbarqued, and returned to Cyprus, a little before the Prince Philoxipes fell in Love with the fair Policrita; ſince that, I have lived a moſt unquiet and unhappy Life: for indeed, abſence has done no good at all upon me, but I ſtill continue more amorous and more jealous, and by conſequence more unfortunate than any Lover. Since my ſeparation from Alcidamia, I am not only jealous of my Prince, my Friend, my Enemy, and another of an inferiour quality unto me, but I am jealous alſo of every one whom I do imagine ſees her; and when you ſee me ſometimes ſtand in dull dumpiſh ſtudy, and melancholy muſing Poſture, then am I calling them all into my Memory one after another, and imagining that Alcidamia is treating them better than ſhe did me. Let not Thimocrates then pretend, that Abſence comes near the rigour of Jealouſy, ſince there is no compariſon between them.

The remembrance of what is paſt, the hopes of what is to come, (as the Prince Artibies hath very well obſerved) does bring a thouſand Conſolations unto an abſent Lover, that is beloved: But a jealous Lover cannot find any thing either in his remembrance of the time paſt, or in his hopes of the time to come, which can afford him any quietneſs of Mind. An abſent Lover never looks for any things but ſuch as are agreeable, and delightful, the Hopes of which are ſweet unto him, as the ſight of his Miſtreſs, her Company, and many ſuch Advantages; whereas Jealouſy is ſo irregular from all rules of Reaſon, that he does often wiſh not to ſee his Miſtreſs. I know very well, that not to be loved, is a grand Miſery: yet not ſo great by far as his who imagins himſelf not only not loved, but imagins that the Perſon whom he loves, does love an hundred thouſand others better than himſelf. Neither is the Death of the Party loved with all its Terrors, ſo tormentive as Jealouſy. A Lover who laments the Death of his Miſtreſs, has this Conſolation at the leaſt, that he is pitied by every one,

it moves Compaſſion in his moſt mortal Enemies: whereas on the contrary, a jealous Lover moves not the leaſt jot of pity from his deareſt Friends: thoſe that are the moſt diſcreet amongſt them, can do no more, than not to ſpeak againſt him: but the ordinary ſort do moſt commonly openly jeer, and mock at him for it: and yet though he ſee it in them all, he knows no Remedy: Moreover, that kind of Sorrow which is cauſed by Death, hath ſome limits; there can come nothing new nor worſe unto him who reſents it: But a jealous Lover does every day endure an hundred thouſand freſh and worſe Puniſhments than ever he could forſee; and does ſo invent them himſelf, that he is his own Puniſher. When Death hath raviſhed that which is deareſt unto him away, there is yet this advantage remaining, that all the Paſſions of his Soul, except that of Love, do reſt in Peace, and ſuffers one to weep in a kind of tranquillity. But there is perpetual Trouble and Confuſion in that Heart which is poſſeſſed with Jealouſy: Hatred diſputes with love for the Empire; Fear drives out all hopes; Fear takes place of Tenderneſs; Deſpair often follows; one repents an hundred times in a day of his own Wiſhes: and deſires Death not only upon himſelf, but his Miſtreſs alſo: He cannot ſee things as they are; for whereas according to the order of Nature, the Senſes do commonly delude the Imagination; Here on the contrary, the imagination deludes the Senſes, and afterwards does force the Ears, and the Eyes, to think, (if it may be properly ſaid ſo) that they hear and ſee that which they do not: and yet for all this, the knowledg of theſe Errours cannot cure the Mind of thoſe who know them; and Jealouſy indeed may more fitly be phraſed Witchcraft, Inchantment, or Magick, rather than a bare Paſſion. Pronounce Judgment then in my Favour, O my moſt ingenuous and juſt Judg; and deny not your pity unto the moſt unfortunate Lover in the World.

Leontidas having finiſhed his Diſcourſe, Marteſia deſired Cyrus to pronounce Sentence upon theſe four famous Lovers: But he denying it with moſt ſweet and obliging Civility, ty, and alſo refuſing to give her any Counſel: ſhe was forced to uſe her own ingenious Apprehenſions. After that ſhe had pauſed, and ſtudied a while to recal into her Memory, what ſhe intended to utter, ſhe pronounced her Sentence with a very handſome Grace, though not without a bluſh, in theſe Terms.

The Judgment of Marteſia.

I Know very well, it was my own Curioſity to know the Adventures of theſe four illuſtrious Perſons, which moved me unto ſo much injuſtice, as to accept of the quality of being their Judg: But I know alſo that all of you have ſo excellently expreſſed your ſelves, and your Reaſons, and ſo perfectly deſcribed your Sufferings, that it is almoſt impoſſible I ſhould be erronious in my Opinion; I declare then with audacity, that Thimocrates, though abſent, yet ſince he is loved, is the leaſt unfortunate of the four: That Philocles, though not loved, yet is he not the moſt unfortunate of all, ſince that which cauſeth his Miſery, may perhaps, hereafter, cauſe his Cure. And as for Leontidas, I affirm that he is the leaſt to be pitied, though I am perſwaded he has endured more Miſery than all the reſt. And to conclude, I declare, that the Prince Artibies, in lamenting his dead Miſtreſs, is moſt worthy of Compaſſion, and him whom I moſt pity; though I am ſenſible of the Miſeries of all the reſt, except the jealous Liontidas, for whom, I reſerve much eſteem, but little pity.

Marteſia had no ſooner pronounced Sentence, but Leontidas began to ſpeak: Did I not tell you, replied he, that it is one of my Misfortunes not to be pitied by any? However, replied Cyrus, I conceive that Marteſia is moſt juſt in her Judgment. The reſpects which I owe her, ſaid Thimocrates, prevent my Complaints. I am not ſo reaſonable as you are, ſaid Philocles, for I confeſs that I do complain a little. For my part, ſaid Artibies, I do much commend her, ſince truly the pity of this illuſtrious Lady, is the greateſt Conſolation that I have received ſince my loſs.

Since now it was very late, Cyrus did riſe up after many applauds of Marteſia. Aglatidas and Eremot did the ſame: and after Cyrus had diſcourſed a while in private with Marteſia, concerning his dear Princeſs, he went out, accompanied with all thoſe illuſtrious, but unfortunate Lovers, and went unto Ciaxares, with a mind wholly poſſeſſed with his own Paſſion, and with the Idea of Mandana in it, which no ſerene thought could remove out of his Heart.

The End of the firſt Book.

ARTA-

OR THE GRAND CYRUS.

Part III. Book II.

THE thoughts of Cyrus were wholly imployed concerning the Delivery of his Princeſs; and therefore he diſcourſed with Ciaxares, whom he found in his Cloſet, thinking upon nothing but preparations for the Armenian War. That which did moſt impede the Expedition in both their Fancies, was the Town of Pteria, which yet being in the Hands of Artaxes, there was no likelihood of the Armenian Progreſs before it was taken. Yet to engage themſelves in a Siege, amidſt their great impatience to deliver Mandana, was ſo harſh a Thought, that they could hardly reſolve upon it. But yet notwithſtanding, ſince they had good intelligence, that very ſmall Forces were within it, being moſt of them diſperſed ſince the King of Aſſyria's departure: and underſtanding alſo, that the two thouſand Men which Metrobates ſent for the laſt time, were alſo diſperſed by the way, and never returned back. When they heard that the Army of Ciaxares had entred Sinope, by Scalado, it was reſolved upon, that Cyrus, with ſome Regiments ſhould attempt to take it: But the next morning, intelligence was brought, that the Inhabitants of Pteria, hearing that Artamenes was delivered, and that he was Cyrus, conſulted ſecretly amongſt themſelves, and reſolved to return as ſoon as they could under the Obedience of their lawful Prince; and to prevent the Puniſhment which they deſerved by a generous repentance. So that having plotted the Deſign, they killed Artaxes, and all the Souldiers in the Gariſon; that they had taken the Caſtle, and were abſolute Maſters of the Town, and ſent the Keys thereof unto Cyrus, by ſix of the Chief Inhabitants of the Town, beſeeching him to preſent them unto the King. This News did extreamly rejoice theſe two Princes, who did very graciouſly receive theſe repentant Rebels; as generouſly pardoning them, as they did generouſly execute their Deſign. Nothing was now thought upon, but an haſty March with the Army into Armenia: and indeed, after a general Muſter of all their Regiments, it was reſolved that the Vanguard ſhould be drawn forth within ſix days, and ſhould advance as far as the Frontiers, whither all the reſt ſhould preſently follow. The Mind of Cyrus was then high with Hope; for ſeeing ſo great and gallant an Army, and ſo many Kings, Princes, and illuſtrious Men engaged in his Quarrel, he had a good Foundation for ſo much confidence, as to think the Victory almoſt certain. It was alſo to be thought that if the King of Armenia would not reſtore the Princeſs, nor acknowledg that ſhe was within his Dominions, it was becauſe he deſired that they ſhould offer to Diſcharge him of that Tribute which he owed unto the Kings of Media. Yet Cyrus, for all this, was much troubled to imagine what was become of the King of Pontus, of whom Megabiſes did not ſpeak, and of whom he heard no Speech at Artaxates. But hoping to be ere long cleared of all his Doubts and Fears, by delivering Mandana, he was as gay, and pleaſant as any abſent Lover could be, who was in hopes 'ere long to ſee his Miſtreſs, and vanquiſh his Enemies. Never was he more ſweet and civil to all the Officers and Soldiers than now: he was perpetually imployed in obtaining ſomething from Ciaxares for them, who having renewed in his Heart all the old Affection which he had heretofore towards him, when he thought him to be only Artamenes, was pleaſed to conſent unto whatſoever he required from him, now he was known to be Cyrus. Aglatidas, who was none of thoſe whom Cyrus leaſt eſteemed, came unto him one Morning, and importuned him to obtain for Otamus the Government of the Ariſantines Province, which was now vacant by the Death of him who formerly enjoyed it. For Otamus! (ſaid Cyrus unto him, with much wonder:) Yes, Sir, (ſaid he) it is for Otamus that I beg this Favor; or indeed, to ſay better, it is for the Fair Ameſtris; for be pleaſed to know, that I am informed, by a Letter from Artaban, that there is a Man, who is a mortal Enemy unto Artambares, her Father, labours to obtain it from Ciaxares; therefore, Sir, I moſt humbly beſeech you be pleaſed to prevent him, ſo that the incomparable Ameſtris, whom they ſay is extreamly melancholy and ſolitary, may not receive this addition unto her Sorrows: for ſince all her Eſtate is in that Province, it would be a great diſcomfort unto her, to ſee the grand Enemy of her Family a Governour over her.

It is very right, anſwered Cyrus; but were it not more juſt if I ſhould obtain it for your ſelf, rather than for Otamus? ſince thereby the King would be better ſerved, and the Eſtate of Ameſtris no leſs protected. Your Goodneſs is abundant, Sir, replied Aglatidas, to offer ſuch an Honour unto me. Yes, Sir, if you will be pleaſed to oblige me, do not think of doing any thing for a Man whoſe Love ſurmounts his Ambition, who courts nothing but Death to finiſh all the Sorrows he endures; therefore ſince I cannot accept of this Government, I conjure you, Sir, once more, to obtain it for Otamus. I ſhall do it, ſaid Cyrus unto him, but it ſhall be upon condition that you let Ameſtris know, it is your ſelf who has done her this good Office. Aglatidas would not conſent unto that; and Cyrus was forced to conſent unto his Deſire without any Conditions: Since Ciaxares was not able to deny any thing unto him to whom he was a Debtor for all, Cyrus no ſooner asked but obtained this Government, and the very ſame hour, ſent unto Ecbatan with Orders accordingly for it: Yet did Ciaxares wonder what Reaſon Cyrus had for this Requeſt, knowing that Otanus was a ſtranger unto him, and though he did know, yet could he never love him. This made ſuch a noiſe in the Court, that every one was inquiſitive, by what Motives Cyrus did it: and Megabiſes, who knew how the Intereſt of Ameſtris was concerned in it, was he who firſt hit upon the Buſineſs, and who imagined that Cyrus was moved unto it at the requeſt of Aglatidas: ſo that every one did preſently after know it, and admired his generoſity. The ſame day, there arrived an Envoy or Meſſenger from the King of Aſſyria, who hearing by the publick Voice at the place where he was retired ſince his departure from Pteria, that the principal Reaſon why they retained Cyrus a Priſoner, was, becauſe he was accuſed for ſuffering him to eſcape, and for holding intelligence with him, he reſolved to pay that Debt which was due to Generoſity, and to acquit and juſtify him, from that unjuſt Accuſation. Cyrus no ſooner knew that this Meſſenger was arrived at Sinope, but he went immediately unto Ciaxares, ſaying he would not ſee him, but in his preſence. Ciaxares told him very obligingly, That to remember his paſt Errors was ſomething injurious unto him: but yet for all that, Cyrus prevailed, and the King of Aſſyria's Meſſenger was brought before Ciaxares. After he had preſented his Letters of Credence, Ciaxares was willing to hear him; Sir, (ſaid he unto him) I have Orders from the King my Maſter to tell you, for the juſtification of Artamenes, who in my coming hither I underſtand to be Cyrus, that it was not he who helped the King my Maſter to eſcape out of Priſon, and that Cyrus never held any intelligence with him which was repugnant unto that Service which he owes you; But ſince I find him at liberty, I conceive it impertinent to inſiſt any longer, as my Orders enjoined me, to clear his Innocency therein. I had it in charge alſo to tell you, that if you would ſet him at liberty, as my Commiſſion was moſt humbly to deſire you, then to declare unto you afterwards, that he intended to make no War any longer againſt you, nor againſt any elſe, but thoſe only that were Protectors unto the Raviſher of the Princeſs Mandana: That therefore he offers unto you all thoſe Forces which he is now levying within that little part of his Dominions, which your powerful Army has yet left him: He offers alſo his own Perſon, if you will be pleaſed to promiſe him ſecurity from Danger: and in concluſion aſſures you, he will never attempt any thing againſt you. He commanded me alſo to make it known, if it were poſſible, unto the illuſtrious Artamenes, that he thought it to be Artaxes, who ſent the Letter unto Metrobates, becauſe it was from the Hand of Artaxes he had received a Copy, which he would have made paſs for an Original; and to find it out, he had brought with him the Writing which the King his Maſter had given him, as if it were the Hand of Artamenes, which indeed was found to be the Hand of Artaxes, who durſt not reveal unto the King of Aſſyria that Plot which he had laid to ruin Cyrus. Ciaxares, comparing the relation of Paſſages which Chriſantes had made unto him, the ſame day he was ſet at liberty, unto the relation of this Envoy, was much joyed at it: So that treating him very civilly, he told him, he ſhould receive his Anſwer in the Morning; for he had no mind to give him his Diſpatch then, becauſe he would honour Cyrus by taking his Advice in the Buſineſs. After then this Meſſenger was retired, and that they might talk with Freedom, Cyrus did exactly relate unto Ciaxares what he had promiſed the King of Aſſyria, in the top of the Tower in Sinope, when the Prince Mazares was carrying away Mandana. And being now in no ſuch Conditions as needed any diſguizement, he ingenuouſly told him, that he had paſſed his Word unto the King of Aſſyria, as that whenſoever Fortune ſhould be ſo favourable unto him, as that he had delivered the Princeſs Mandana, and removed all thoſe Obſtacles which did oppoſe his good Fortune, he would never marry her, until he had fought with him. But why (ſaid Ciaxares) did you make him that unjuſt promiſe? Becauſe, Sir, (replied he) when the King of Aſſyria did unjuſtly deſire me to ſet him at liberty, and I being faithful unto you, would not conſent unto it, I then thought that this Prince might ſuſpect, that I retained him for my own particular Intereſt, as if I were glad to be eaſed of ſuch a terrible Enemy: So to let him ſee I had no thought in me ſo unworthy, I made that promiſe: And to ſpeak ſincerely unto you, Sir, if I had not promiſed the ſame unto him then, I ſhould do it now; nor can I ever live happy, unleſs I make the King of Aſſyria confeſs, that if Fortune favour me in any thing, ſhe ſhall not do as one that is blind, who diſpenſeth all her Favours without Choice: and therefore I conjure you, Sir, by all the prevalency of my earneſt Prayers, to let me keep within the limits of our Conditions, ſince for my part I ſhall never break them. Ciaxares at the firſt would not conſent, but after he had conſidered the Buſineſs every manner of way, he reſolved to follow himſelf the Conditions of Cyrus, conceiving it would confirm thoſe Conqueſts which he had already made, to have the Conquered King of Aſſyria in his Army; for he knew very well, that thoſe Forces which the King of Aſſyria could bring with him, would not be conſiderable, nor able to make any attempt againſt him. Then in the morning he told the Meſſenger of that Prince, How ſince at the preſent the Intereſts of Cyrus were his own, he ſhould obſerve and perform all his Promiſes; and that he might aſſure the King his Maſter, his Perſon and his Forces ſhould be ſafe in his Army whenſoever he would come into it, though the firſt taking away of Mandana might move him to treat him ill, and that Cyrus ſhould punctually keep his Word with him. That which principally induced Ciaxares to do thus, was, becauſe he thought he ſhould be better able to prevent the Combat of Cyrus, and the King of Aſſyria, when that Prince was in his Army, than when he was in his own, and his declared Enemy. Alſo by this way he was put out of all Fears, that the Princeſs Mandana ſhould fall the ſecond time into the King of Aſſyria's Power, nor ſhould he need to divide his Forces, one part to make Head againſt him, and the other to go into Armenia. He conſidered further alſo, that though ill Fortune ſhould needs contrive it ſo, that Cyrus muſt fight with this Prince, and be overcome, yet he ſhould not be thereby engaged to give the Princeſs his Daughter unto him, ſince Cyrus was engaged no further than his own Intereſt, and not to cauſe her to marry him.

In the mean while, all things being in a readineſs for a march, Cyrus deſired permiſſion to command the Van-guard, and deſired that half of the Perſian Regiments might follow him. As Ciaxares could not deny him any thing, he obtained his Deſire, and reſolved to depart only with twenty thouſand Men; that all the Voluntiers ſhould follow; that the King ſhould alſo march preſently after with the Body of the Army; and that the Rear-guard ſhould be commanded by the King of Hircania, and the King of Phrygia to be with Ciaxares. Never was ſeen ſo much Jollity as was amongſt thoſe Regiments which were choſen for this Van-guard; nor was ever more ſenſible Sorrow, than was amongſt thoſe Officers and Souldiers which were not firſt commanded out, as who ſhould ſay they apprehended that Cyrus would conquer all without them, and that they ſhould have nothing to do, nor any ſhare in the Victory when they came up. Whilſt every one was preparing for departure of this illuſtrious Heroe, remembring his Promiſe to the Inhabitants of Sinope, he beſeeched Ciaxares to make good his Word, and to imploy ſome of his good Deeds in the repairing of that Town. Ciaxares was pleaſed it ſhould be rebuilt out of the publick Stock, and appointed Ariobantes, who ſtayed in Cappadocia, to keep all in order there, to get Architectors out of Greece, to repair the Ruins of fire-conſumed Sinope; commanding further, that as there was the Statue of that famous Milesian, called Autolicus, who was the firſt Founder of the Town; ſo there ſhould be another made for Cyrus, as the ſecond Founder, which was done accordingly. Mean while this renowned Prince went to bid adieu unto Martesia, who grieved for his departure; ſhe deſired him to reſtore the Picture which ſhe lent him, upon condition to reſtore it, when he firſt went unto the Ar- menian War. But he looking earneſtly upon her, Cruel Woman, ſaid he unto her, How would you have me conquer, if you take that from me, which muſt render me invincible? You have brought home ſo many Victories without this help, replied ſhe, that I believe you have no need of it. Cyrus hearing her ſay ſo, thought that ſhe would needs have him reſtore it, and therefore he grew extreamly ſad, his Countenance changed, his Eyes became melancholy, and all ſo diſordered, that Marteſia having pity upon him, ſaid, Sir, I am contented to prolong the time, ſo you will promiſe to reſtore this Picture of my Princeſs unto me, when you have delivered her. Cyrus returned thanks with all poſſible Joy, and asking her, whether he could ſerve her in any thing? ſhe told him, ſhe had a deſign to be a little nearer Mandana, that ſhe might the ſooner ſee her, when he had ſet her at Liberty, and that ſhe deſigned to go with one of her Couſins, who within this three days would return unto the Frontiers of Armenia, where ſhe dwelt, and therefore ſhe deſired him to give her a Convoy thither. Feraulas, who was quick to hear this, did what he could to obtain that Commiſſion; but Cyrus obligingly excuſed it, becauſe he could not be ſo long without his only confident, unto whom he could freely diſcourſe of his Love, and told him, that it was unjuſt in him to deſire his being ſo near Martiſia, whilſt he himſelf was ſo far from Mandana; and therefore he gave Ortalgues orders to wait upon her, as a Convoy in her Voyage, with two hundred Horſe. Martiſia beſeeched him further, to give Orſamus leave to return unto the King and Queen of Saces, conceiving it juſt, that ſince they did him the Honour to truſt their Son the Prince Mazares with him, that he ſhould go and give them a particular Account of his Loſs. Cyrus remembring how much his dear Princeſs was obliged unto him, and how careful he had been of Martiſia, and becauſe he had been one of thoſe who had helped to deliver her, would let him ſee, and told him himſelf, that he ſhould find him very thankful. After that, rewarding him, whether he would or no, with a very rich Recompence, he diſmiſſed him, and then he bid adieu unto Marteſia. He aſked alſo the Prince Thraſibulus, Whether he deſired the reſtoration of ſome Ships in lieu of thoſe he had loſt? But that generous Prince anſwered him, He ſhould be aſhamed to accept of them at this Time; but he would firſt go unto the Armenian War, and there render himſelf worthy of that glorious Protection which he had promiſed him. Cyrus having now nothing to do at Sinope, went to take his leave of Ciaxares, who did imbrace him with unparallel'd kindneſs. Thoſe Commanders which went not with him, came to bid him adieu, and teſtified freſh Sorrows, that it was not their good hap to follow him. Cyrus had in his Eyes that day ſuch a kind of noble and ſprightly Fury, as preſaged a happy Victory; and to ſpeak truth, his Phiſiognomy did ſpeak him ſo great and Happy, that whoſoever ſaw him, could not imagin it poſſible he ſhould be overcome. This Prince was of a very aſpiring and advantageous Talneſs, and alſo moſt exactly made; his Head was moſt admirable handſom; all the Art which the Medians uſed to their Hair, was not comparable unto that becomingneſs which Nature only uſed unto his; the Colour, which was as lovely brown as ever Eye beheld, it was wreathed with a hundred thouſand pleaſing and delightful Curls, negligently hanging down, and lying upon his Shoulders; his Complexion was moſt pure and clear; his ſprightly Eyes were black, full of Sweetneſs and Majeſty; his Mouth was delicious and ſmiling; his Noſe ſomething like an Eagle's; the Symetry of his whole Face was of a moſt admirable compoſure, his Countenance moſt noble, and all his Features ſo high and gallant, that certainly it may be truly ſaid, never Man upon Earth was in every particular by themſelves, and all Parts together, better compoſed than Cyrus; ſo that whoſoever ſaw him upon the Day of his departure from Sinope, mounted upon as fine a Horſe as ever Eye beheld, in his moſt magnificent and rich ſuit of Arms, and that day wearing the glorious Scarf of Mandana over it, it was no wonder if all the People in Sinope did follow him out of the Town, with a million of Benedictions and Wiſhes of Victory, and alſo with Tears at his departure; he was followed by all the Officers and Voluntiers, ſo that this great number of Men of Quality, all in rich Habits, and admirably mounted, did make a moſt glorious ſhew; the Prince Thraſibulus, the Prince Artibies, Hidaſpes, Gobrias, Gadates, Chriſantes, Aglatidas, Megabiſes, Aduſius, Themocrates, Leontidas, Philocles, Feraulas, and a thouſand others, were in this illuſtrious Number; yet in the midſt of all this glorious Army, and in ſpite of all the Cares which Cyrus had upon himſelf, Mandana was continually in his Heart and Mind; and during all the long March, without neglecting any thing that did become the General of an Army, he failed not in the leaſt Circumſtance, to do what did become a moſt faithful Lover; but every Hour that he could ſteal from his neceſſary Cares, he dedicated to the memory of Mandana; yet did it not at all prejudice his admirable and providential Forecaſt, but he gave out ſuch Orders for the Marches and Quarters of his Army, that the Places of his Paſſages had no cauſe to complain againſt his Souldiers. After they had marched ſeveral Days, and at laſt came within 100 Furlongs of the River Licus, which parts the leſſer Armenia from Cappadocia, ſome Scouts of the Army brought unto Cyrus (who was refreſhing his Men and Horſes in a Forreſt) a Man, whom they imagined to be a Spy, yet one who asked to ſpeak with their General; but Cyrus was pleaſingly ſurprized, to ſee it was Araſpes, diſguiſed in the Habit of an Armenian Merchant, who was unknown unto the Sicilians, who took him; he imbraced him then with Joy, and drawing him aſide; Well my dear Araſpes, (ſaid he unto him) have you been more happy in your Expedition than Megabiſes was? and can you tell us more News of the Princeſs Mandana, and the King of Pontus than he did? I know, Sir, anſwered he, as much almoſt as could be known, unleſs I had ſeen the Princeſs Mandana, or heard her named. But to relate what I have learned, I muſt tell you, how in the habit wherein you ſee me, and knowing the Armenian Language very well, I have been taken for an Armenian, even in Artaxates it ſelf, where the Court does now reſide; there did I converſe with divers Perſons, and underſtand that the King of Armenia does ſtill give out, that the Princeſs Mandana is not in his Dominions; and that he hath publiſhed, the King of Media does demand her, only as a pretence to make a new War upon him, becauſe of the Tribute which he would not pay him: The People alſo, as I underſtand, did a long time believe it ſo, but of late the People have altered their Opinions, and every one does think, that the Princeſs Mandana is at this preſent in a Caſtle, not above fifty Furlongs from Artaxates towards the Caldeans, and which is built upon the Bank of a little River, which empties it ſelf into Atraxes at that place: That which begets this Conceit, is, becauſe they hear there were two Ladies brought thither, about the ſame time that it was reported the Princeſs Mandana came thither; theſe two Ladies are kept in the Caſtle, guarded very carefully, and uſed with great reſpect: One who ſaw them, reports, that one of thoſe Ladies is admirably fair, and very melancholy. I enquired as exactly as I could, without danger of Diſcovery, of every particular concerning that Lady, and I find, by all Circumſtances, it muſt be the Princeſs, for they aſſured me ſhe was very Fair, yellow-hair'd, of a good Stature, and of a modeſt Aſpect: Beſides all this, I my ſelf obſerved, that the young Prince Phraartes, Brother unto the Prince Tigranes, who now is Sick in the high Armenia, and he comes thither often very privately, ſo that it is eaſily to be imagined, there is ſome Perſon of great importance in that place. Moreover I muſt tell you, that going one day into this Caſtle with a Merchant of Artaxates, whoſe friendſhip I had purchaſed by ſome trivial Preſents, in hopes by his means to get entrance, under a colour of Curioſity; I did at laſt get in as far as the firſt Court, and had certainly ſeen all the Caſtle, and all the Gardens, and by conſequence the Princeſs, if by ill luck the Prince Phraartes had not at that time come in. They no ſooner knew of his coming, but they endeavoured to conceal us, becauſe they had received an expreſs Command to let none enter: As he came in, they cauſed us to go out in all haſte, yet as I went through a Paſſage in the Baſe-Court, I ſaw that Prince in a Balcony courting a Lady, which ſeemed unto me to be the Princeſs Mandana, as I could gueſs ſo far off, and in a Moments paſſing, and ſeeing only but one ſide of her Head, not being able to ſee any thing perfectly, but her Stature, and the Colour of her Hair.

This, Sir, is all I can tell you concerning the Princeſs, and all I could poſſibly gather; for ſince that time they would not upon any terms permit me to come again into the Caſtle, nor can I hear any thing concerning the King of Pontus: It is not to be doubted (ſaid Cyrus) but that it was the Princeſs Mandana which you ſaw, the Viſits of the Prince Phraartes are infallible Teſtimonies of it: But Araſpes, (added Cyrus,) is this Prince as handſom as his Brother Tigranes? I know not Sir, (replied he, ſmiling, for he was uſed always to be very free with Cyrus) for I never had the Honour to ſee the Prince Tigranes, yet I know that Phraartes is not ſo handſom as the illuſtrious Artamenes. Cyrus laughed at the Diſcourſe of Araſpes, and imbracing him again, I have done ill, I confeſs (ſaid he unto him) to ask you ſuch a Queſtion, and I deſerve your Raillery for not asking firſt, whether the Caſtle be well fortified, whether the Paſſage over that River be guarded, and whether you think, according to all Appearance, the reducing it unto our Power will coſt us dear? But, Araſpes, Love is ſuch an imperious Paſſion, that its Intereſt will be firſt conſidered, and therefore you muſt excuſe me. After this, Araſpes told him, that the Caſtle ſtood in a great Town, yet 'twas but weak, and its Fortifications very irregular, in reſpect of its exceſſive length, that unleſs it had ſix thouſand reſolute Men to guard it, it is not impoſſible to be taken: The Difficulty of the Buſineſs was, becauſe it was within fifty Furlongs of the Town of Artaxates, which is the greateſt Town of both Armenia's, and all the Forces which the King of Armenia had, were quartered in the Suburbs of it. Moreover, ſince there are not many great Towns in this Kingdom, becauſe of the Abundance of Paſturage, which makes all the Country infinitely populous, and that ſo prodigiouſly full, as when the Inhabitants only do muſter into Battalia, they make a terrible ſhew; therefore he beſeeched him not to take it ill, if he ſhould adviſe according to his Opinion, not to attempt any thing, until all his Army was come up, and to content himſelf till then, with ſeizing upon a Paſſage over the River, which was ſlenderly guarded, becauſe that what Intelligence ſoever the King of Armenia received, concerning the March of Ciaxares his Army, he could not believe that he would make War upon him in good earneſt, but imagined always, that it was only to fright him unto the Payment of that Tribute which was demanded. Cyrus then gave Araſpes Thanks for the Pains he had taken, and the Danger he adventured in his behalf; and cauſing him to put off his Merchant's Habit, and to take a Horſe of his; he purſued his March, after he had held a Council of War concerning the aſſaulting of the Paſſage over the River, only to honour the Officers which were with him; for in all Councils, his own Opinion was the Reſolution of them all. He diſpatched a Meſſenger immediately to Ciaxares, to acquaint him with the Intelligence of Araſpes, and deſire of vanquiſhing reviving in his Heart, he haſted forward the March, and prepared to force the Paſſage over the River preſently, omitting nothing that a moſt prudent and couragious Captain could do, upon ſuch an occaſion: his Deſign was preſently executed, and eaſily effected. Thoſe Trenches which the Armenians kept, being forced with in one quarter of an Hour, he became Maſter of the River, and in his Enemies Country; and with the Loſs of not above fifteen or twenty Men, he cut in pieces all that made Reſiſtance, and entirely defeated them. When he came from Sinope, his Intention was to ſtay at that Place with the Army; but ſince his Power was abſolute, he altered his firſt Reſolution, and reſolved to deliver Mandana, if it were poſſible, before the King came up; conceiving that the fewer Men he had to participate in the Danger, the more would the Princeſs be obliged unto him, and alſo the more glorious would the Action be: That which did moſt prompt him unto this Deſign, was News late come, that Ciaxares finding himſelf not very well, would defer his advance three Days longer; and in Reſpect of that Accident, his March would be the ſlower: but that which did moſt of all incite him unto this quick Expedition, and dangerous Attempt, was his Conſideration of the King of Aſſyria's coming, and it was odious unto him to think that his Rival ſhould ſhare with him in the Glory of delivering his Princeſs; reſolving then to ſtay no longer, he left two thouſand Men to keep that paſs over the River, and went ſtraight unto the great Town of Artaxates, which is ſcituated in a moſt fertile Plain upon the River Araxes, and near that Place, where, by the Counſels of Hannibal, another King of Armenia, did a long time after cauſe the new Artaxates to be built. This Town had but few Avenues, yet were the Walls ſo weak, and in many Places ſo ruined, that all its Strength did conſiſt in the Multitude of the Inhabitants, and truly it was ſo prodigiouſly vaſt, that no other Heart, but that of Cyrus, durſt ever have attempted it. Since he was come ſo near this huge Town, (where the King of Armenia was ſtaying until his Army, which already conſiſted of ten thouſand Men, was ſtrong enough to come into the Field) he would himſelf needs go, and diſcover the Scituation of the Town and Caſtle, which he deſired to take; and after he had circumſpectly viewed and obſerved all Places round, the Enemy never daring to appear but afar off, ſay what Chriſantes and his moſt faithful Servants could unto him, he would hazard all to deliver his Princeſs. Then he cauſed 12000 Men to march in the Night unto that Place, and he left ſix thouſand at ſeveral Places to ſecure his Retreat, if need ſhould be, and to guard the Paſſage over Araxes; beſides two thouſand which he left to make good the Paſs over the River, which runs between Armenia and Cappadocia. Then after he had drawn up his Forces near a little Wood, and drawn out thoſe who were to make an Aſſault upon the Town and Caſtle, although he had Intelligence that all Artaxates was up in Arms, and all the Townſmen ready to come out againſt him, yet did not his great Heart faint, but on the contrary, the Greatneſs of the Danger infuſing a new Spirit into him, he made choice of a litttle riſing Ground, which was between the Town and the Caſtle; and after he had drawn ſix thouſand Men into Battalia upon this Hill, (and had placed ſix terrible Engines, which ſhot great huge Stones) to oppoſe any Relief which the King of Armenia expected; he went with four thouſand others to aſſault the Town, in which they had placed three thouſand Souldiers, entrenched ſome few days before Cyrus came within Sight of Artaxates.

This Aſſault was given in four ſeveral Places at once, after that four Rams had battered the Barricadoes, and Walls: and that with ſo much Fury, that the Enemies were at the firſt afrighted: Any who had ſeen Cyrus beſtir himſelf, would have ſaid he was invulnerable, conſidering how he expoſed himſelf unto the Clouds of his Enemies Arrows. The firſt Aſſault was commanded by the Prince Thraſibulus: The ſecond by Hidaſpes: The third by Aglatidas: as for Cyrus, he would reſerve himſelf to fight within the Town, againſt any that durſt relieve the Caſtle. The firſt Breach was on that ſide where Cyrus ſtood, and thoſe which defended it, flying with all haſte unto another Barricado, were there killed, and helped to enforce others by their own Defeat: Mean while, both Thraſibulus and Aglatidas, were happy in their Attempts, and the Souldiers alſo, animated by the Example of their valiant Commanders, planted Ladders againſt the Walls, ſo that when the Inhabitants ſaw themſelves aſſaulted on all ſides, they fled to ſave their Lives; ſome threw down their Arms and ſubmitted, others in a tumultuous Diſorder ran away; ſome to avoid the Sword of their Enemy, finding the Bridg too narrow for ſuch a Throng, fell into the River, and were miſerably drowned: ſome would have defended the Bridg, but the Valour of Cyrus, who never ſits down after a Victory, did enforce them away, and purſued them: he killed all that reſiſted, and pardoned all that ſubmitted. He who commanded the Men at that paſs, was a Man of great Heart, and was there killed becauſe he would never ask Quarter: and of thoſe three thouſand which were placed in that Quarter, there were very few which were not either wounded, or taken Priſoners. The Prince Artibies, who would needs fight that Day as a Voluntier, received two mortal Wounds, which did moſt extreamly trouble Cyrus. Mean while, thoſe within the Caſtle ſeeing themſelves not able to hold out againſt ſuch valiant Enemies, and the Princeſs which was in it, promiſing them great Recompences, if they would render themſelves unto this invincible Conqueror, they began to beat a Parley, which did ſo infinitely rejoyce Cyrus, in hopes to ſee his dear Mandana preſently, that he was never in his Life more ſenſible of any Paſſion than at that time: yet did he much wonder, that the King of Pontus, whom he knew to be ſo gallant and brave, did not appear: How comes it to paſs, ſaid he to himſelf, that I do not ſee him upon ſuch an occaſion as this, with Arms in his Hands? If he do well remember himſelf of ſome good Offices which I have done him, why does he not reſtore unto me my Princeſs? If he will not reſtore her, why does he not come out and fight with me? Certainly, ſaid he, he muſt be either dead, or elſe ſome odd Policy which I cannot underſtand, cauſes the King of Armenia to keep him Priſoner in this Caſtle; but all theſe Reflections did quickly vaniſh out of his Mind: his almoſt certain hopes that he ſhould immediately deliver Mandana, turned all into Joy: He parlied then with the Captain of the Caſtle; he promiſed him all his Deſires, provided he would preſently render him the Princeſs whom he there guarded: and the Captain obeying him, and truſting unto his Word, (which Cyrus did always keep even with his moſt mortal Enemies) he ſet open the Gates, let all enter that would, and cauſed thoſe few Arms which were in it to be laid down. As ſoon as Cyrus was in the firſt Court, Where is the Princeſs? (ſaid he unto the Captain,) She is yonder Sir, (replied he, ſhewing him a Walk) where indeed he ſaw two Ladies coming towards him: his Imagination being wholly upon Mandana, he went in all haſte unto theſe Ladies; but coming near, the firſt Lady lifted up her Cyprus, and preſently ſtopping, as if ſhe were ſurprized at the Sight of Cyrus, he ſaw one of the faireſt Objects, doubtleſs in the World, yet at this time moſt unſutable unto his Phancy; ſince he ſaw ſhe was not his Princeſs: he then turned towards the Captain, to accuſe him for ſo deceiving him: but the Lady addreſſing her ſelf with a ſomething diſordered Countenance; Sir, ſaid ſhe unto him, the King of Pontus my Brother, was ſo gallantly treated by you, when he was your Priſoner, that I muſt needs hope for the like Favour from you, ſince you are too generous to deny Protection unto one of the moſt unfortunate Princeſſes upon Earth. Cyrus was ſo troubled, that he had not delivered Mandana, and ſo ſurprized to hear that this Lady was Siſter unto the King of Pontus, that for a while he was not able to anſwer; yet clearing up his Mind, You are not deceived Madam, (ſaid he moſt civilly unto her) when you believe I ſhall treat you with all the reſpect due unto one of your Quality: for though the King your Brother, be him I aim at, and came to ſeek in Arminia, yet ſhall I render unto you all the Services that are in my Power. As this fair Princeſs was about to anſwer, Intelligence came unto Cyrus, that there was ſuch a prodigious Multitude of People coming out of Artaxates, that his Preſence was requiſite in the Army: Permit me then Madam (ſaid he unto her, and taking her by the Hand) that I wait upon you unto your Chamber, and there leave you Miſtreſs of the Caſtle, till I have finiſhed the Victory. In ſaying ſo, he conducted her unto her Lodging, where after a ſhort Complement, and leaving Chriſantes within, to ſee ſhe wanted nothing; he went down into the Court, where he met ſome Souldiers and Captains bringing in the Prince Artibies wounded, that he might be there dreſſed with more Conveniency. When Cyrus ſaw him in that condition, and obſerving how thoſe which bore him were very weary and weak, and troubled in the Carriage of him; yet notwithſtanding all the Croud, and all the Sorrows of his Soul, this Prince did with his own Hands help to carry him unto his Chamber, and laid him upon a Bed, commanding all poſſible Care to be taken of him: After this, Cyrus took Horſe, and ſeeing he could not ſatisfy his Love by the Delivery of his Princeſs, he would however ſatisfy his Glory, by doing the boldeſt Act in the World; every ſtep he made, he received Intelligence upon Intelligence concerning the Troops that were coming out of Artaxates: but how great ſoever they made the Danger, yet he went to draw up his Forces, and reſolved to fight them, though they were an hundred thouſand Men, if they did begin the Aſſault; and indeed they were no leſs, for from the little Valley under the Hill, where Cyrus ſtood, unto Artaxates, all the Country was covered with Multitudes of Enemies, who ſeemed as if they intended to fight: for the King of Armenia held a Council of War about it without the Walls of the Town, and advanced unto a little Village, which was cloſe by the Valley that ſeparated the two Armies, and there he made a halt; yet the Great Cyrus kept his Station ſtill, continually facing this innumerable Multitude of Enemies, who ſtood and durſt not fall on: This great Buſineſs was carried with ſo much good Fortune and Prudence together, that it was ſix Hours after the Caſtle was taken, before it was known to them of Artaxates.

In Concluſion, after much Conſultation, the King of Armenia concluded that it was not expedient to fall upon ſuch a Prince, as uſed to fight like a Lion, and overcome all that came near him. The Prince Phraartes who was pretty gallant, would have put it to the Hazard, what ere came on it: but his advice being not followed, becauſe an old experienced Captain maintained, That it was not Wiſdom with freſh new Troops of Townſmen, untrained in War, to aſſault Souldiers died in Blood, and a General the greateſt in the World, eſpecially he having the Advantage of Ground. Cyrus was well ſatisfied with the ſight of his Enemies; he faced them from Morning until Night, and would have preſented them Battel if they durſt have accepted it, though they were above twenty to one. The Night came on apace, and covered the ſhame of the Inhabitants of Artaxates, in re-entring their Town, after they had only ſeen that Caſtle taken, which was ſo very conſiderable unto them, in Reſpect of the River Araxes, which runs by it. Yet was the Soul of Cyrus far from Satisfaction, and this great and bold Act produced nothing but Sorrow unto him; for his Hopes were ſo high to deliver the Princeſs Mandana, that nothing elſe could anſwer them. As ſoon as he ſaw all the Armenian Troops were entred into their Town, and after he had placed good Guards, he went to take his Reſt that Night in the Caſtle which he took: After he had enquired concerning the State of the Prince Artibies, whom they ſaid was very ill, and after he underſtood the Princeſs of Pontus was retired; he went into his Chamber only with Feraulas: Well Feraulas, (ſaid he unto him extreamly melancholy) what do you now think of my Fortune? Do you not confeſs me to be the moſt unhappy Prince upon Earth? I think, Sir, replied Feraulas, that it is the part of the conquered to complain, and of the Conquerors to rejoyce. No, no, Feraulas, ſaid he: It is not Glory and Honour, which is the predominant Aim of my Heart: and though I had defeated this huge Multitude of Enemies, which I only looked upon, I ſhould have been ſtill as melancholy as I am: neither Conqueſts, nor Reputation, nor Honour is the Mark I now aim at: It is only Mandana, I look after, and ſince I find her not, I think my ſelf as unfortunate as if I had been vanquiſhed. Araſpes lied not (ſaid he) when he told me he had ſeen a Lady of Quality in the Caſtle; that ſhe was fair, yellow-hair'd, and of a good Stature; but alas, this Princeſs, as fair as ſhe is, yields me no Satisfaction by her Sight. I conceive, Sir, ſaid Feraulas, that it is conſiderable, to have got the Siſter of the King of Pontus into your Hands, a Lady of whom I have heard a good Report when I was in the Bythinian War: ſo that in all Probability, it will keep that Prince in ſome Fears. Ah Feraulas, anſwered he, and ſighed, how dear ſoever the Princeſs of Pontus is to him, Mandana is much more: he will eaſily diſpenſe with a Siſter for a Miſtreſs: If he ſhould have my Brother, (if I had one) or my Father in his Power, it would make me to do any thing to releaſe them, but never upon ſuch Conditions as to quit Mandana: Alſo knowing me ſo well as he does, he will not fear mine ill Entertainment of his Siſter, although he do not reſtore Mandana, he knows me too well that 'tis not my Genius to do ſo baſe, ſo unjuſt, and cruel Act; and ſo ſince he conceives no Danger, he will keep Mandana ſtill.

But, Sir, ſaid Feraulas, are you fully aſſured that this Lady is the Princeſs of Pontus? Yes, replied he, for now I call to Memory a Picture which the Wife of Arſamones cauſed the Princeſs her Daughter to ſhew me, to the end ſhe might diſcover whether or no I was Spitridates; I do very well ſee that it is ſhe, for that Picture reſembles her extreamly. But, replied Feraulas, if it be ſhe, I wonder ſhe does not take you for Spitridates, as the Bythinian Princeſs did? becauſe, doubtleſs, replied Cyrus, the King her Brother has formerly acquainted her with our extream Reſemblance. But however, Feraulas, ſuch things as theſe we muſt not diſcourſe of: Let Mandana, only Mandana be the only Object of my Thoughts, and the Subject of our Diſcourſe: Did I but know where ſhe was, my Soul would be at ſome Reſt: for though ſhe were in Artaxates, I would without ſtaying for Ciaxares, attempt her Delivery. Doubtleſs you might, replied Feraulas, for after this which we have ſeen, if you do not enforce it, it may well be ſaid, The Reaſon is becauſe you would not; and the Inhabitants owe you Thanks, for all thoſe Miſeries which you will not do them, when it is in your Power. After they had thus diſcourſed a good while, Cyrus did lie down upon the Bed, more to reſt himſelf than to ſleep: but he had not leiſure to do that, for one came to tell him, that the Prince Artibies was at the laſt Gaſp, and deſired to ſee him: He did riſe immediately, and went unto him: alſo he found him at the very point of Death, but in ſo free a Mind, and quiet Soul, that Cyrus was ſurprized at him: I am deſperately ſorry, (ſaid he unto him, coming near him) that I ſhould be partly a cauſe of your deplorable Condition. No, (moſt generouſly did this dying Prince anſwer) Rather rejoyce with me, who ſince the Death of Leontina, looked for nothing from the Wars but Death: I could never in any Place have died with more Honour, than near you; nor ſhall I deſire Life, but ſhall die with more Joy than I can expreſs, if you will promiſe me to cauſe my Aſhes to be incloſed within the Tomb of Leontina: In pronouncing this Name, which was ſo dear unto him, he expired without the leaſt Motion, by reaſon of his great Loſs of Blood; yet had he this Satisfaction before he died, to hear Cyrus promiſe what he deſired, for he weakly held out his Hands, and caſt his Eyes towards him, by way of Thanks: That which was moſt admirable in this ſad Accident was, that Death did not afright out of his Countenance thoſe pleaſing Signs of Deſire to die, which he ever wore ſince the Death of his Miſtreſs. The Heart of Cyrus was exceedingly tendered at the Loſs of this young Prince, who doubtleſs did own all the accompliſhed Qualities that might merit his Eſteem and Friendſhip: he teſtified his Sorrow by moſt apparent Signs: and though his Tomb was covered with the Spoils of vanquiſhed Enemies, and hung about with Trophies of broken Arms, yet was it further honoured, in that his Aſhes were watred with the Tears of the greateſt Prince in the World. In the mean while, Day did begin to break, and Intelligence was brought that there was ſo great a Tumult within Artaxatus, and ſuch an univerſal Amazement, that the King of Armenia was gone out of it with his whole Court, and a great part of his Forces, retreating unto certain inacceſſable Mountains, where he had ſome Caſtles very well fortified: he underſtood alſo that the King had carried the Queen his Wife, and the Princeſſes his Daughters with him: and he imagined that perhaps Mandana might be there alſo. His deſire was to go after them immediately: but he was confidently told that before he could be in Readineſs to ſet forward, the King of Armenia would be got within his Sanctuary, where he had nothing to fear but Famine. Yet ſince Cyrus would not truſt unto what was told him, he took Horſe, after he had commanded an Egyptian Chirurgion which was in the Cyprian Brigado, to imbalm the Corps of the Prince Artibies, after ſuch an excellent manner as was uſed in his Country, and which would keep the Corps a long while incorruptable: he gave Orders alſo to preſent a complimentive Excuſe unto the Princeſs of Pontus, that he could not ſee her until his Return, and theſe Orders being given, he went with two hundred Horſe only, to be ſhewed theſe Mountains, and indeed he perceived it impoſſible to arrive thither in any time: he then reſolved to go and poſſeſs himſelf of ſome advantagious Place betwixt thoſe Mountains and the Town, to prevent any Communication between them: But no ſooner did thoſe which were appointed for that Deſign under Hidaſpes begin to march, but the Inhabitants of Artaxates multiplying their Fears, had held a tumultuous Council, and conceived it more ſafe for themſelves, to ſubmit unto ſuch a Conqueror as Cyrus, than any longer to reſiſt ſuch an invincible Prince: They ſent then Deputies unto him, to beg his Favour, and that in ſuch ſubmiſſive Terms, as if his whole Army had been at their Gates. As he was the ſweeteſt Prince upon Earth unto all ſuch as reſiſted him not, ſo he deſired no more from them, but a bare Oath of Fidelity: he did not conceive it expedient, with ſo few Forces as he had, to engage himſelf within that Town, but was contented to poſſeſs himſelf of both the Ends of Artaxates, and ſome Caſtles which were indifferent ſtrong, in divers Entrances into the City, to the end he might thereby take all Relief away from the King of Armenia, and all manner of Communication between the Town, and the Mountains where he was: He ſtill continued his Deſign of ſending Hidaſpes with twelve hundred Men only to the Foot of the Mountains, thereby to prevent the Country from carrying in of Proviſions; after all which, he reſolved to wait until Ciaxares came up, before he would make any other Attempts; and after he had given out all expedient and neceſſary Orders, he returned unto the Caſtle from whence he came, with much Impatience to diſcourſe with the Princeſs of Pontus, imagining, that perhaps ſhe could tell where the King her Brother was, and by Conſequence where the Princeſs Mandana was.

Having then reſted himſelf awhile, and put himſelf into a fit and handſom Garb to appear before her, he ſent to ask whether he might be permitted the Honour to ſee her? As ſhe did no leſs deſire it than he, though for different Reaſons, ſo ſhe ſent word back, that ſhe ſhould be very glad to entertain his viſit; ſo that going immediately unto her, he was received with all poſſible Civility, and he rendred her all the Submiſſion and Reverence, as if ſhe were in Heraclea. After the firſt complemental Ceremonies were performed; Sir, ſaid ſhe unto him, if Fortune had been as favourable unto the King my Brother, as you were unto him in procuring his Releaſe, he would not have loſt thoſe Kingdoms which he once poſſeſſed. I know not Madam (replied Cyrus) whether the King of Pontus has not been a greater Gainer by the loſs of his Kingdoms, than he would have been in keeping them. But I am moſt certain, that I prefer that favour which Fortune has beſtowed upon him ſince he loſt them, before all he had before ſhe deprived him of them; and I wiſh unto the Gods with all my Heart, that he were reinveſted, and ſet upon thoſe Thrones again which he has right unto, upon Condition he would reſtore that,unto which he has no right at all. This Diſcourſe is ſo obſcure unto me, (ſaid the Princeſs of Pontus) that I am not able to return a pertinent Anſwer: for indeed I know very well, that the King my Brother has loſt the Kingdom of Pontus, and Bithynia alſo; that he was forced to depart from the laſt Town that was left him, and to fly away in a Ship to ſeek ſecurity for his Perſon from you; but I do not know how Fortune, which deprived him of his Throne, has made him a Gainer ſince. But I underſtood ſince, that he was not with you, and I was told, lately (without any certainty) that he was here in Armenia, whither I came to ſeek him, yet cannot find him. How, Madam, ſaid Cyrus, is not the King of Pontus, and the Princeſs Mandana in Armenia? I do not believe, anſwered ſhe, that the King my Brother is here; and though he were, indeed I cannot imagine how the Princeſs Mandana ſhould come hither. Cyrus ſeeing with what free ingenuity this Princeſs ſpoke unto him, told her all, how the King of Pontus had ſaved the Princeſs Mandana from Shipwrack; how he left his Ship,and took Boat up the River Halis to come into Armenia; ſo that Madam, ſaid he, I do not ſee it poſſible but he muſt be here, and I wonder you ſhould not know it. I have had ſo little liberty, ſaid ſhe, ſince I came into Armenia, nia, that it is not impoſſible but he may be here, and yet I not know it. But, Sir, how can it be, that he, of whom you ſpeak, who has divers times ſpoken unto me concerning you, as the Man, whom of all the World he moſt eſteems, though he knows not your Quality, ſhould any way diſoblige you? He, I ſay, whom you have ſo much obliged; he unto whom you gave both Life and Liberty; and he who had an intention to preſerve you, at a time when you were in Danger. He never had any intention to deſtroy me, replied Cyrus, but he has moſt cruelly wronged me. Ah Sir, ſaid ſhe, he did not deſcribe Artamenes unto me, to be ſo unjuſt, as that he ſhould think it to be a wrong, which was done without deſign; nor can I think him changed, ſince he was Cyrus. He is not changed at all, replied he, for he loves the Princeſs Mandana now, as he loved her then, although the King of Pontus did not know it then; ſo that Madam, you may eaſily judg, he does not at all oblige me in carrying away the Princeſs, and retaining her againſt her Will. I ſhould not ſpeak thus unto you Madam, ſaid he, if the Affection I bear unto her were not now known over all Aſia, and if I were not forced to juſtify my ſelf in the opinion of ſo excellent a Lady as you. Sir, ſaid ſhe unto him, I can ſay nothing to it; yet for your Conſolation let me tell you, that the King my Brother owes ſuch a profound Reverence unto the Princeſs Mandana, that you need not fear any ill treatment of her; and if I knew where he were, I would beg of you permiſſion to go and try whether I could move him to reſtore her unto her Father. Cyrus returned thanks unto this Princeſs with much Affection, and the Diſcourſe on both ſides was ſo very obliging, that Cyrus did wonder to find a Diſpoſition ſo ready to do him any good Office in the Siſter of his Rival. It is very true, ſhe was ſo handſom, and ſo amiable, that it was impoſſible but one muſt needs eſteem her infinitely, and be in terms of Friendſhip, though not in Love with her. Moreover, ſince ſhe found in Cyrus the reſemblance of a Perſon, who was moſt dear unto her, ſhe expreſſed more obliging Civility towards him, than ſhe perceived in her ſelf, ſo that for three or four days Cyrus did viſit her every ſpare Hour, wherein he did not viſit ſome Guard or other, and a great Friendſhip grew betwixt them; for after Cyrus had ſatisfied the Curioſity of this Princeſs, by making a ſhort relation of his Fortunes unto her, and ſince he aſſured her, that if the King her Brother would reſtore the Princeſs Mandana, he would help him to recover his loſt Kingdoms; ſhe thought the Conditions good, and ſhe her ſelf alſo believed, that as ſoon as the King of Pontus ſhould know, that Artamenes is Cyrus, and that Cyrus did love, and was loved by Mandana, he would change his Deſign: So that conceiving ſhe ought not to look upon this Prince, as the King her Brother's Enemy, ſhe regarded him, as both her, and his Protector, and as a Prince, who perhaps would become a Mediator between the King of Pontus, and the new King of Bithynia; ſo that ſhe enjoyed Pleaſure and Satisfaction in the Sight and Converſation of Cyrus. This Prince was for ſome certain days a little troubled to obſerve, that this Princeſs never ſaw him, but ſhe changed Colour, and ſighed often when ſhe looked upon him: But remembring the Picture which was ſhewed him in Bithynia, he concluded, that Spitridates, whom he reſembled, was not only in Love, but it muſt needs be, that he was loved alſo: and ſince he had great hopes in the Negotiation of this Princeſs, with the King her Brother, when it was known where he was, and ſince he knew that there was nothing ſo engaging, as to be a Confident unto one who is in Love, and he knew how to carry the Matter ſo handſomly without too much preſſing, ſo that he moved her ingenuouſly to acquaint him with the Misfortunes of her Life, to the end ſome expedient Remedies againſt them might be applied, and that he might find out means to prevent her Misfortunes, as ſhe would his, if it were poſſible. One Morning when Cyrus heard that Ciaxares would come up within three Days, and that the King of Armenia had not any Victuals to hold out long, his Mind being in more tranquillity, by reaſon of his Hopes to be ſatisfied from the King of Armenia himſelf, where her he ſought for was, he went unto the Princeſs of Pontus, to put her in mind of her Promiſe: but though ſhe was very willing to give him Satisfaction, yet had ſhe no mind that her Adventures ſhould come out of her own Mouth, but that one which was with her, who was well acquainted with every Circumſtance, even to the leaſt of her Thoughts, might make a Relation of them. Cyrus conſented unto the Motion, and for the preſent retired, but preſently after Dinner he returned unto her Chamber, where he found her who was to relate the Misfortunes of the Princeſs of Pontus, who was her ſelf gone into her Cloſet with ſome Armenian Women which waited upon her. This Lady who was to make the Relation, was called Heſionida, one of very good Quality, originally from Bithynia, whoſe Mother was Governeſs unto the Princeſs, and who indeed was a kind of Governeſs her ſelf unto her; for ſince ſhe was ſix or ſeven Years elder than Araminta, her Mother (who was very Old and Sickly) committed the charge unto her, ſo that ſhe was exactly knowing in all the Paſſages of that Court; and ſince ſhe had a moſt charming Wit, and was very ſweet and complacential in all juſt things, ſhe made the Princeſs of Pontus even adore her. Cyrus, who knew the quality of Heſionida, by the information of one of the Princeſſes Men, did treat her very civilly, and ſull as reſpective Complements returned as given: Then did they ſit down, and thus did Heſionida begin.

The Hiſtory of the Princeſs Ariminta, and Spitridates.

THe Order which I have received from the Princeſs, to make an exact Relation unto you of her Misfortunes, requires, Sir, that you arm your ſelf with abundance of Patience; for they are ſo numerous, that they cannot be comprehended in a ſhort Story; and neceſſity compels me to let you underſtand, not only thoſe which relate only to the Princeſs her ſelf, but thoſe alſo which concern her Father: the Uſurpation of the Kingdom of Bithynia is the real cauſe of all thoſe Miſeries ſhe endures. You Sir, who has won ſo many

Battels thereabouts, do know, that a River only divides the Kingdom of Pontus, and the Kingdom of Bithynia, ſo that it is not at all ſtrange, that an ambitious King of Pontus ſhould ſtretch his limits over it: But I believe the courſe he took will appear ſo unjuſt unto you, that you will hardly endure ſo much as the Relation of it. Be pleaſed to know, Sir, that the Grand-father of the Princeſs Ariminta, was a very violent Prince, one that was moſt jealous of his Authority, and as adventurous as any Man in the World; all his Life was wholly taken up in Wars with his Neighbours; ſometimes againſt the King of Phrygia, other whiles againſt the King of Cappadocia and Galatia, and ſometimes againſt the King of Paphlagonia; but in all theſe Wars he was continually aſſiſted by the King of Bithynia, which then reigned, who was Father unto Arſamones, who now is upon the Reconqueſt, yet notwithſtanding he bore a ſpleen in his Heart againſt him, becauſe he once oppoſed a new War, which he would needs undertake againſt Cappadocia, without any Ground or Reaſon for it; for ſince Bithynia was between the Kingdom of Pontus and Galatia, he could not make any Attempts upon it, unleſs that Prince gave him a paſſage through his Dominions, which he refuſed to do. After this, he always looked upon Bithynia, as a great Obſtacle unto his ambitious Deſigns. But, Sir, it beſits me, to paſs this over very ſlightly; for ſince I am originally a Bithynian, the love of my Country may perhaps make me ſpeak more than is fit, conſidering the reſpect which I am obliged to render unto thoſe Kings, from whom the Princeſs whom I ſerve is deſcended; yet muſt I not make that Crime a Secret, which is publickly known unto ſo many Kingdoms, ſince it is the very Foundation of all I ſhall tell you. Be pleaſed to underſtand then in few Words, that the King of Pontus, deſiring to confer with the King of Bithynia, about ſome important Affairs, which he ſaid concerned them both, both theſe Kings drew towards their Frontiers, and ſince the River Sangar is the limits unto both thoſe Kingdoms, they made choice of a moſt pleaſant Iſland, wherein there was a very fair Houſe, fit for this Interview, which was made ready with all poſſible Magnificence: But yet ſince this Iſle belonged unto the King of Pontus, he therefore was at all the Expences of theſe Feaſts, which laſted three Days in all imaginable Prodigality and Splendor: The laſt of theſe three days the King of Bithynia was ſeized upon with ſo ſudden and violent a Sickneſs, that the Phyſicians did give him over, and it was impoſſible that he ſhould be tranſported out of this Iſle, where the King of Pontus ſtayed with him, expreſſing ſo many Teſtimonies of real Sorrow, that all the World were deceived in him, and eſpecially the King of Bithynia more than any elſe. This Prince then, having only one Son, about ſix years of Age, and having buried the Queen his Wife, ſeeing himſelf in this extremity, and thinking to prevent the King of Pontus, whom he knew to be of an ambitious Humour, from uſurping Bithynia, he would declare him Governour over the Prince his Son; ſo that being in this deplorable Condition, unto which all the Kingdom believed he was brought, by a Poyſon which the King of Pontus had given him, he aſſembled all the Grandees of Bithynia, which waited upon him, to this Interview, and declared unto them, how he intended the King of Pontus, during the minority of his Son, ſhould have the Government of his Dominions, and diſpoſure of all things, with this Proviſo, yet to confer the Offices of Government only unto the Bithynians. The King of Pontus made a ſhew, as if he were unwilling to accept of this Offer; but at the laſt, this unfortunate Prince preſſing him more urgently unto it, he promiſed him to preſerve the Crown of Bithynia, as his own; and he ſpoke with ſo much ſeeming Generoſity, that he cauſed him to die a ſatisfied, though a violent Death. Though all the Grandees of Bithynia did ſeem to approve of this Reſolution, not daring to deny their dying King, yet after he was dead, Reports of Poyſon making great Noiſe, they oppoſed againſt it, and made uſe of the Guards unto the late King to ſecure the Perſon of their young Prince, who was within fifty furlongs of that Place, in a Caſtle where the Kings of Bithynia uſed to bring up their Children, until ſuch times as they were fit to be taken out of the Hands of Women: But the King of Pontus foreſeeing ſuch a Deſign, cauſed all the Gariſons of all the Towns along the River, ſecretly to redouble their Guards, ſo that in drawing them out, he quickly made up a little Army, with which he ſeized upon the Perſon of the young Prince, and made himſelf Maſter of Bithynia, procuring the favour of ſome Grandees in the Kingdom by Golden Arguments. After this, he returned into Heraclea, where he educated the young Prince Arſamones: At the firſt, he cauſed all Honours due unto a King of Bithynia to be rendred unto him, to the end he might the handſomer deceive the Bithynians, and allure them to receive his Orders: But afterwards, when he had well eſtabliſhed himſelf, he publiſhed a Declaration, by which he would make it appear, that the late King of Bithynia did acknowledg his Kingdom had been formerly uſurped from the Kings of Pontus; and by which he ſaid, that the late King deſired his Son ſhould be only a Subject unto him, who now raigned: In ſhort Sir, Force, not Juſtice, was his Law, and Arſamones was now treated only as a Prince, not a King, and was indeed no more than a Slave which is loaded with heavy Chains of Gold; he wore them with an unexampled Patience and Diſſimulation. Thoſe who uſe to dive deep into the reaſon of Things, could not comprehend why the King of Pontus ſhould put the Father to Death, yet ſpare the Son: but whether it was out of Fear, to force the Bithynians unto a War againſt him, or that he was reſtrained from it by a predominate Power of the Gods, which would not ſuffer him, yet he did it not. Arſamones then lived as a Subject, and married a Bithynian Princeſs, which was permitted, becauſe ſhe was not Rich; but in recompence thereof, ſhe was at that time admirable fair, and at this time as vertuous as fair; then you know, Sir, her Vertues and Condition as well I do, ſince you were with her, when you were taken for the Prince Spitridates. He permitted alſo a Siſter unto the King, whom he had impriſoned, to marry the Prince Gadates, yet it was becauſe Nitocris Queen of Aſſyria, did procure it. Mean while the King of Pontus, who had only one Son, died, and Arſa-

Arſemones changed Maſters, though not Condition: for indeed Sir, this new King of Pontus and Bithynia, Father of the Princeſs Ariminta, although he was not ſo criminal as the King his Father; yet finding himſelf in Poſſeſſion of two Crowns, he kept them, and never would hearken unto any Reſtitution, ſo that Arſemones was forced to diſſemble ſtill, and ſeem to be contented with his Fortune, becauſe he had no Power to make it better: for the King of Pontus was then in amity with all his Neighbours, and Arſemones had neither any Troops, nor Money to raiſe them. Mean while, Sir, the King of Pontus had two Sons, and one Daughter; and the Prince Arſamones had one Daughter, and two Sons; the elder of which is Spritridates, who ſo much reſembles you. As the Queen of Pontus died very young, ſo the Princeſs Ariminta was but five years Old when ſhe loſt her Mother: and as my Mother had the Honour of that great Queen's Love, ſhe moved the King her Husband, to confer the Government of the Princeſs Ariminta upon her. But to ſhew you the piety and vertue of this Princeſs, I need only tell you, that ſhe appointed my Mother to cheriſh as much as ſhe could, a Love and Friendſhip between her Children, and the Children of the Prince Arſamones, wiſhing heartily, that he might hereafter become ſo generous, as to reſtore the Kingdom of Bithynia unto the right Heir. You may be pleaſed to conceive, Sir, that ſhe did moſt willingly obey ſo juſt a Command; and truly there was no great difficulty to beget a Love amongſt them, ſince they were all ſo amiable; and it muſt needs be acknowledged, that never was a more joyful Sight, than this little Court of young Princes and Princeſſes: But amongſt the reſt, the Amity between Spitridates eldeſt Son of Arſamones, and the Princeſs Atiminta, was extraordinary; for the firſt of theſe two, Sir, you need only to remember your own Infancy, to imagin him, ſince truly there is a moſt wonderful reſemblance betwixt you and him; and as for the Princeſs of Pontus, you need only to look upon her, and judg, that ſhe was fair from her Cradle. The Siſter of Spitridates, named Ariſtea, is alſo, as you know, very fair; and the Prince Sinneſis, elder Brother ther unto Ariandus, who is now King of Pontus, was of a good ſtature, and handſom, as well as his Brother, whom you do know; and the youngeſt Son of Arſamones, called Euriclides, is alſo a very handſom Prince: of theſe, Sir, did the Court of Pontus conſiſt. So that ſince Peace on all ſides ſeemed now to be ſolidly eſtabliſhed, there was no thoughts but upon the Education of theſe young Princeſſes and Princes, and to contrive all the pleaſant Recreations their Ages were capable of. The King of Pontus himſelf, out of Policy, did command my Mother to do the ſame, which the Queen his Wife had appointed her to do out of Vertue; for he conceived, that if his eldeſt Son ſhould marry a Daughter of Prince Arſamones, that would more confirm the Poſſeſſion of the Kingdom of Bithynia in his Houſe. The ſtate of things ſtanding thus, all the Recreations of theſe young Children were together; their Walks, their Huntings, their Balls, their Muſicks, cauſed them continually to be together; and I dare affirm, that their Education was ſuch, as made them ceaſe being Children, much ſooner than their Age permitted them; and though they lived together with all equal Civility, yet their Inclinations began to make ſome difference, and I perceived that Spitridates did much more reſpect the Princeſs Ariminta, than the Prince Euriclides his Brother. I obſerved alſo at the ſame time, that the Prince Sinneſis was more indulgent towards the Princeſs Ariſtea, than he who is now the King of Pontus: And ſince my Mother had acquainted me with the King's Intentions, and alſo with the Queen's, to the end I might be ſerviceable that way, I was even raviſhed to ſee ſo happy a beginning in the Deſign, and I believe alſo, that the Prince Arſamones, and the Princeſs Arbiana his Wife did like it well. I perceived then that Love did kindle in theſe two young Hearts, and I ſaw them love one another, and knew it not themſelves; for Sinneſis and Spitridates did render a thouſand petty Services unto thoſe Princeſſes which they adored, not knowing they were in Love, more than the Princeſſes whom they loved. But the Princeſs Ariminta being in her fourteenth Year, and the Prince Spitridates his ſixteenth, they began to be ſenſible of their Paſſions: The joy which he was wont to have when he ſaw the Princeſs became more moderate, and though ſhe uſed her accuſtomed civility towards him, yet was he not ſo well ſatisfied, as before; his Heart moulded ſuch deſires, as that he did not know what he himſelf deſired, but not knowing very well what he wanted to compleat his good Fortune, he became very Melancholy: As the Princeſs Ariminta did very much eſteem him, and as he pleaſed her Eye better than any ſhe ſaw in the Court; ſo ſhe was the firſt which perceived it, and asked me whether or no I knew from whence this Alteration in the humour of the Prince Spitridates did ariſe? and when I anſwered her, that I knew not, ſhe told me, that it much troubled her, and that ſhe would ask him the reaſon her ſelf. Madam, ſaid I unto her, and ſmiled, it is not always fit to be ſo inquiſitive; how do you know whether the Prince Spitridates would have the cauſe of his Melancholy known? And why ſhould he hide it (anſwered ſhe unto me) from one that would pity him, if I could not help him? He would hide it perhaps (ſaid I unto her, and laughed) becauſe he does not know the cauſe himſelf. Ah Heſionida, ſaid ſhe unto me, Spitridates is too full of reaſon to be troubled without a cauſe, and if I thought that were all, I would quickly cure him. As I was ready to anſwer, the Princeſs Ariſtea came in, and a little after her the valiant Pharnaces, who had the Honour to be the laſt Man that fought with you in the Combat of two Hundred; and alſo at the ſame time, the Coward Artanus came in, who accompanied Spitridates thither. After their Converſation had continued a prety while, the Prince Sinneſis made a Motion unto his Siſter the Princeſs to go and walk, ſhe was ſo complacential as to conſent. This Prince was then ſixteen years Old, and the Princeſs Ariſtea fifteen; and I believe he had already expreſſed ſome ſlight Marks of his Paſſion unto her, which ſhe knew of, but neither much accepted, nor rejected them. When they were in the Garden, the Prince Sinneſis, after he had talked awhile with the Princeſs his Siſter, preſented his Hand unto the Princeſs Ariſtea, and Spitridates took the Princeſs Ariminta by the Hand, and ſo they walked; ſo that Pharnaces and Artanus ſeeing that their aims were prevented already by Spitridates, went away in a jealous fit. Mean while, the ſmall experience of this young Lady cauſing me to fear that ſhe would too urgently ask Spitridates the Thoughts of his Heart, I followed preſently after, and handſomly turned the Diſcourſe another way; for ſince my Mother, as I told you before, was both ſickly and aged, and ſince I was ſix or ſeven Years elder than the Princeſs, I was a kind of an Under-governeſs, the King appointing it ſo, and the Princeſs was glad of it, becauſe ſhe did me the honour to love me. But Sir, to return unto my Diſcourſe, the Princeſs Arbiana being come into the Garden, intending to ſpeak with me concerning ſome important Buſineſs, I was conſtrained to leave the Prince and Princeſs, and by conſequence to leave them at liberty to diſcourſe together, for the Prince Sinneſis did not at all moleſt them, being buſied enough in his Courtſhip with the Princeſs Ariſtea: Since we walked ten or twelve Paces behind them, I could not hear their Words, but only gueſs by their manner of Actions. But in the end, I ſaw the Princeſs Ariminta come ſuddainly towards us, ſaying ſhe was weary with walking, and would reſt her ſelf; ſo that leaving Spitridates, ſhe ſat down upon Seats of Graſs. I obſerved all the Paſſage very exactly, and ſaw Spitridates bluſh in quitting the Princeſs, and ſhe alſo bluſhed, though ſhe did hide it with her Hood: All the reſt of the day ſhe ſeemed much diſquieted, though ſhe did ſtrive to hide it with all her care: Upon her return unto her Chamber, ſhe went into her Cloſet, and called none of her Women with her, as ſhe was accuſtomed; I went in unto her, and found her leaning againſt the Window in a ſerious deep ſtudy. Madam, ſaid I unto her, and laughed, ſince you did not think it unhandſom to ask the Prince Spitridates, what was the cauſe of his Melancholy, I hope you will not think it impertinent in me, if I ask you, what's the cauſe of your muſing at this time? At the firſt ſhe would have perſwaded me, that ſhe muſed no more than ordinary, yet ſeeing ſhe could not; But Heſionida, ſaid ſhe unto me, did you not tell me it was not good to be too inquiſitive? Yes, Madam, replied I unto her, but I am not the Princeſs Ariminta, nor are you the Prince Spitridates, ſo that without any Fear of offending, I have reaſon to ask what it is which troubles you, ſince my only end is to help it, if it be in my Power. Truly Heſionida, (ſaid ſhe unto me) there is nothing in my Mind which vexes me. Truly, Madam, replied I, there is ſomething which does trouble you, and if you will not do me the Honour to tell it unto me, I ſhall think that the Prince Spitridates has diſcovered unto you the cauſe of his Melancholy, and that it has infected you. The Gods preſerve me, ſaid ſhe unto me haſtily: You know then Madam what it is, ſaid I unto her.

The Princeſs bluſh'd, ſeeing ſhe could not deny it, and coming near me, with the greateſt Ingenuity and Sweetneſs in the World; It is true, ſaid ſhe unto me, I do know it; and if you did but know how angry and aſhamed I was, doubtleſs you would extreamly pity me. But Heſionida, ſaid ſhe, why did you not deſire me more earneſtly than you did, not to ask Spitridates, the Cauſe of his Melancholy? for I do imagine that you knew it, or at leaſt ſuſpected ſomething. I confeſs unto you, that the Non-plus of this young Princeſs, and the Anger which I ſaw in her Eyes, moved me almoſt to laugh at her; yet I did reſtrain it, leſt I ſhould have too much incenſed her: And after I had intreated her to tell me, what their Conference was, and ſhe many times excuſing, but at the laſt conſenting unto my Deſire, told me: You were no ſooner entred into Diſcourſe with the Princeſs Arbiana, ſaid ſhe unto me, but being extreamly impatient to know what it was which troubled Spitridates, I entred into diſcourſe with him. You are ſo changed, ſaid ſhe, of late, that all your Friends do wonder it, nor can they imagine the Cauſe of your Melancholy. I do not think they do, anſwered he unto her, nor is there any in the World unto whom I will impart it. How, replied ſhe unto him, Is it ſuch a Diſpleaſure as you would not have any know it? then it ſeems you would not have any pity you, or comfort you. I wiſh the firſt, replied he unto her, but I dare not wiſh the ſecond. How can they do either, replied ſhe, when they are ignorant of your Sufferings? Did you not tell me, anſwered he, that all my Friends do wonder, and are ſorry for my Melancholy? and if ſo, can they not pity me, unleſs they know the Cauſe of my Sorrows? No, not I, anſwered ſhe, for perhaps you eſteem your ſelf unfortunate in ſome things, for which I would not pity yon at all. What may thoſe Things be, replied he, and ſighed, for which the Princeſs Araminta has no Compaſſion? If you ſhould envy at the Honour of another,ſaid ſhe,& that trouble you, I would not at all pity you for it. But ſuppoſe I were in Love, anſwered he, would you pity me then? No, anſwered ſhe, but on the contrary, I would eſteem you much more for it, ſince every one ought to be in Love with Honour and Glory. But indeed, Spitridates, ſaid ſhe, ſince it is not your Mind I ſhould know what it is which torments you, I ſhall not pity you, but ſhall believe you think me not diſcreet enough to keep a Secret. Ah, Madam, replied he, I do not fear that you would publiſh that which I ſhould tell you. What do you fear then? (anſwered ſhe, with ſuch a pritty ſimplicity, as made him almoſt deſperate.) I fear, anſwered he, that you would hate me. And why ſhould I hate you, anſwered ſhe, for truſting me with a Secret? Perhaps you would hate me, anſwers he, if you ſhould know that Spitridates is not unfortunate in any thing, but in that he loves the fair Princeſs of Pontus more than he ought. He had no ſooner pronounced theſe words, but immediately I ſaw (ſaid ſhe) my dear Heſionida, a thouſand things which I did not ſee before, and I was ſo confounded at my Simplicity and Innocency, that I durſt not look upon him; yet after I had reaſſumed my Confidence, You have reaſon, (ſaid ſhe, being both angry, and aſhamed) to think that the Princeſs of Pontus will hate Spitridates, if he ſhould love her too much, and as your Friend I adviſe you to keep your Secret ſo cloſe, that none may ever know it. I will obey you, Madam, ſaid he, you your ſelf ſhall be the only one in the World who ſhall ever know it, or to whom I ſhall ever reveal it. I no ſooner heard him ſay ſo, but I was ſo much aſhamed that I came unto you, ſaid ſhe, and returned no Anſwer. After that the Princeſs had ended her Relation, with many ſigns of Shame, and Anger in her Eyes, ſhe asked me, what ſhe ſhould do? And I adviſed her, to avoid any private Conference with Spitridates, as handſomly as ſhe could, without any Incivility to him; and to behave her ſelf towards him, as to a Prince whom perhaps ſhe might one day marry, and perhaps not; and to carry the Matter ſo with him, that he may eſteem you much: and to obtain this Eſteem, you muſt be neither too indulgent, nor too ſcornful unto him: and that ſince ſhe was very young, I deſired her, nor to keep any thing which Spitridates ſhould ſay unto her, or ſhe anſwer him, as a Secret from me, becauſe it was very dangerous to truſt ones ſelf with a Buſineſs ſo nice as this was, eſpecially in an Age ſo young as hers. This young and wiſe Princeſs did promiſe what I deſired, and indeed, did moſt exactly keep her word, and do whatſoever I deſired her.

As Spitridates was one of the moſt wiſe and diſcreet young Princes in the World, he did, for a while, content himſelf, that he had diſcovered his Paſſion unto the Princeſs Ariminta, without any further perſecution, fearing ſhe ſhould treat him ill: Inſomuch as ſeeing him him live in ſuch a moderate and diſcreet reſervedneſs, I did imagine that this young Princeſs perhaps knew not yet the difference between a bare piece of Gallantry and Courtſhip, and a real declaration of Love, ſince there is uſed, for ought I can hear, the ſame Language, both for the one and the other; and that there is nothing which makes the Difference between them, but the Tone of the Voice, and the manner of pronouncing words: ſo that I did believe this was all his meaning in it, and I would have made the Princeſs believe as much, who out of modeſty did give Credit unto what I told her, though that belief had no ground in the Bottom of her Heart. Mean while the Prince Sinneſis, who was of a more froward Spirit then Spitridates, and who, as things then ſtood, had not ſo great a reſpect unto the Princeſs Ariſtea, as Spitridates had unto Ariminta, did openly diſcourſe of his Paſſion; yet do what he could, he could never obtain one favourable look from the Lady: ſhe carried her ſelf indeed very civilly unto him, yet it was, as being the Son of the King of Pontus, and as Brother unto the Princeſs Ariminta, with whom ſhe held a great intimacy, not at all as being her Lover. All the Court were puzzled to find out the Cauſe of this her cold averſion to him, for they all knew, that if Ariſtea did not marry the Prince Sinneſis, ſhe ſhould never be Queen: For my part, I ever thought that her Reaſon why ſhe treated him in that manner, was, becauſe of the incertainty in his Deſign; and that as ſoon as the King ſhould ſpeak unto Arſamones concerning it, ſhe would then alter her courſe with him. Mean while, Sir, the Princeſs Ariminta, did darken all the Beauties in the Court, and in all Heraclea, with the ſplendor of her Beauty: and ſince there was none but only Ariſtea, which did not ſeem ugly in her preſence, ſhe conquered a thouſand Hearts, and without any Deſign of hers, did captivate a thouſand Slaves. Amongſt the reſt, the valiant Pharnaces, and the Coward Artanas were ſo captivated, that they could not conceal their Paſſions from all the Court, though fain they would have kept them ſecret; Not but that they were both of them of the prime quality in all the Kingdom; yet durſt they not look ſo high: but Love is of its own Nature a myſterious ſecrecy: and moreover, the gallant Air of this young Princeſs made them afraid to diſcover themſelves: They were moſt aſſiduous in waiting upon her, yet ſo full of reſpect, that ſhe could find no fault with their proceedings, ſince at this time, Artanus was very young, his Cowardize was not yet diſcovered, and ſince he had a good wit, and not unhandſom, he was well enough eſteemed on, and received into Company as a Man of his Quality ſhould be. As for Pharnaces, Sir, I need not ſpeak of his Gallantry, ſince the laſt Act of his Life ſpeaks be tter for him than I can. But let me tell you, that he was one of thoſe real Heroes, which uſe to look with Fury in the Face of their Enemies, and with pleaſing Favour in his Ordinary Converſation: he was both Wiſe and Modeſt; and though he ſpoke but little, yet had he a pleaſant Wit, becauſe whatſoever he ſaid was ſo juſt, and premeditated, that it was agreeable to all Hearers: he was alſo much eſteemed by Princes and Princeſſes; and amongſt the reſt, he who now is King of Pontus, (but then only Prince Ariandes) loved him extreamly. Thus Sir, you ſee the ſtate of things, the Princeſs Ariminta was courted by Spitridates, Pharnaces, and Artanus: the Prince Sinnenſis loved the Princeſs Ariſtea, and alſo loved Spitridates very well*:* and the Prince Argandes, not being in love with any, no more then the Prince Burielides, contracted a moſt intimate Friendſhip with Pharnaces. In all publick Feaſts, at Horſe-races, Balls, Walkings, all theſe Lovers appeared according to their particular Deſigns; and the Court of Pontus for a while, was one of the moſt gallant and pleaſant Courts in all Aſia: Since Phrygia, and Lidia were near, Muſicians out of both thoſe Kingdoms were procured, which much augmented their Delights; and ſince Heraclia is certainly one of the goolieſt Towns that ever the Grecians built, and the Country about it moſt pleaſant, not only becauſe of the Sea, which lies on one ſide, but alſo becauſe of a great and delightful River, which runs under the Walls: and it may well be ſaid, that all innocent Diverſions and Pleaſures in the World, did reign in the Pontean Court: For the King, as I already told you, did, out of Policy, deſire that Sinneſis ſhould marry the Daughter of Arſamones, and that Spitridates ſhould marry the Princeſs Ariminta; and was much pleaſed with the Gallantry, and Courtſhip of theſe young Lovers, who all this while let no opportunity ſlip, to pleaſe their Princeſſes. But above all the reſt. Spitridates was moſt officious; all his Actions were plauſible, every word he ſpoke had a charming Spel in it; and his very ſilence was ſometimes ſo eloquent and a greeable, that I confeſs, I looked upon this young Prince, as one moſt worthy to marry the Princeſs Ariminta: ſo that without any thing oppoſing his Paſſion, all my care was, that the Princeſs did not receive him too favourably: But that did little trouble me, for although ſhe did very much eſteem him, and had alſo a good inclination towards him, yet was ſhe ſo naturally modeſt, and preferred her Honour before all things elſe, that ſhe perplexed him as much as if ſhe had a ſtrong averſion to him; ſo that when he would diſcourſe of his Love unto her, ſhe would moſt ſharply forbid him, and plunge him into a deeper Melancholy: when I perceived the alteration in Spitridates; Madam, (ſaid I unto her one morning when ſhe was alone) do you remember the Day when you asked me whether I knew the Cauſe of the Prince Spitridates his Melancholy? and will you not now take it ill, that if in my turn I ask you what it is which thus diſquiets you at this time? Heſionida (ſaid ſhe unto me,) If you will abſolutely know it, you ſhall; but you would do me a greater Pleaſure, if you would ſave me the labour of relating the Follies of that Prince. Truly Madam, ſaid I unto her, I do ſo much eſteem Spitridates, that I am much troubled at his Sorrows; and this is the Reaſon that I deſire to know the cauſe of them. Then did I urge ſo much, that I moved her to acknowledg how Spitridates had ſpoken unto her concerning his Paſſion, and how ſhe had ſharply forbid him to do any more, and that ſhe believed he would not be ſo bold as to diſobey her. But (ſaid I unto her, to pump her Mind, after I had commended her for what ſhe had done, ſo ſhe had done it without any Scorn of that Prince) If Spitridates, ſhould be exactly obedient, and never any Teſtimonies of Eſteem come from him, would you then thank him for it? Do you think, ſaid ſhe, and bluſh'd, that I command things which I would have done? But, Madam, ſaid I unto her, before you make any freſh Queſtions, I beſeech you anſwer a little more directly unto mine, and tell me truly, Whether if the Prince Spitridates ſhould ſpeak unto you no more, wait upon you no more, neither unto the Temple, nor into the Walks;

if he ſhould never care for pleaſing you, or rendring you a thouſand Services every day: if he ſhonld look upon you with a cold indifferent Eye, or perhaps ſlight you, what would you then think? would not all theſe diſpleaſe you? But replied ſhe, and laughed, I did not forbid him ſpeaking, nor command him from thoſe things which Civility requires. Then I underſtand you, Madam, ſaid I unto her, and ſmiled, you would have Spitridates love you, and not tell you of it. No, replied ſhe, you do not rightly interpret my Words. I do expound them as I ought to do, ſaid I unto her; nor is it forbidden you to ſuffer a Prince, who in all Appearances muſt be your Husband, to love you: But, Madam, I beſeech you remember, that you carry your ſelf ſo unto him, that if ever that Happineſs befal him, you may never repent your ſelf of any Word, either too bitter, or too ſweet unto him; and it is after this Rule which I conjure you to direct your ſelf in your Carriage towards Spitridates: for I am certain, that if you punctually obſerve what I ſay, you ſhall never ſpeak any thing unto him, which may cauſe Repentance. Thus much ſhe did promiſe me, and ſo our Conference ended.

All this while, Spitridatts was not the only ſingular Lover of the Princeſs: for ſince Artanus was as bold with his Tonge, as he was timerous in Combate, after he had carried himſelf a while in a reſpective manner, he did at laſt unbend himſelf unto his natural Inclination, which was always inſolent, if his Hare-like Courage had not a little reſtrained him: but ſince in this War, there was no great Danger of his Life, he was as bold as a Lion: for upon a Day when Spitridates was with the Princeſs, and when Artanas came in, and the Prince received a Meſſage from Sinneſis to come unto him, that they might go and hunt together: ſo that Artanus remaining alone with the Princeſs Ariminta, after ſome common Diſcourſe, ſhe asked him why be went not unto the Chaſe with the Prince her Brother? and he anſwered her, that this Recreation was not predominate over his Paſſion. Though you do not go out with any Love to the Sport, replied ſhe, yet you may go out of Love to the Company. So I ſhould, replied he, if you would go alſo. I am much obliged unto you, anſwered the Princeſs, but there is no Reaſon you ſhould have no more Complacency towards my Brother the Prince; not that I can much blame you, for not affecting a Pleaſure which ought to be uſed only as a Diverſion, and not as a Profeſſion of Life; for I think it moſt proper to preſerve the Health of the Body by the Exerciſe, and not to poliſh the Minds of them that follow it in Exceſs, and do nothing elſe. It is very true, replied Artanus, and I am of your Mind: and I conceive it fitter for great Kings to hunt after their Enemies, and to take Kingdoms: and for fair Princeſſes (ſaid he with extream Boldneſs) to take Hearts: but I would not have them do, as they uſe in Hunting, where they take all they meet with: I wiſh they would take by choice, and not by chance. If ſo, replied the Princeſs, there would perhaps be many taken which are free. You, may, Madam, if you pleaſe, (replied he moſt inſolently) ſatisfy me in many things at once, concerning this Subject: for you may tell me what would the Deſtiny be, of the Prince Spitridates, of Pharnaces, and of Artanus, if this kind of hunting were in uſe: he pronounced the laſt of theſe Names ſo low, that the Princeſs did not well underſtand it; yet half hearing, and ſeeing by the Diſorders in his Face, that ſhe was not miſtaken, ſhe anſwered him very ſharply after this manner: If the Deſtiny of thoſe three Perſons whom you name depended upon me, two of them ſhould moſt aſſuredly be happy. And what of the third? (ſaid he.) As for the third, ſaid ſhe, he ſhould doubtleſs have what he deſerves; and that is, a good ſhare of the Averſion, and Diſeſteem of the Princeſs Ariminta. I am very glad then, anſwered he, that this kind of Hunting is not in Faſhion. And I am very ſorry, ſaid ſhe, that you have ſo ill invented it. But however, Madam, ſaid he, (and roughly interrupted her) you know not how to make your ſelf eternally adored by him, who the beſt of any Man in the World knows your Worth: He whom you ſpeak of, replied the Princeſs, would do better to acknowledg the reſpect he ows me: and to teach him, I forbid you to ſpeak any more unto me:

Then did I enter into the Chamber, and Artanus went out; and I ſaw ſo many Signs of Anger in the Princeſs, that I wondred; but ſhe did preſently ſatisfy me, and related the Impudence of Artanus unto me, with as much Anger as a Perſon of Honour could have, againſt one that had affronted her: I cheared her up as much as I could poſſible, and confirmed her doubtleſs in her Deſign to let Artanus know, that he knew not his Duty. But that ſhe might not be ignorant in any of her Conqueſts, the unfortunate Pharnaces brought in the Princeſs Ariſtea unto her, where the Converſation was as it uſed to be, very indifferent and pleaſant; and ere they were aware, they fell into Diſcourſe concerning Lovers, Paſſion, Gallantry, and Declaration of Love: and as the Princeſs Ariminta was yet angry in her Mind, at the Paſſage of Artanus: For my part, ſaid ſhe, I cannot conceive any thing more inconſiderate, than for any Man to tell her that loves him not, how he is deeply in love with her: and if any one ſhould this way fail in their reſpect unto me, it ſhould not be an eaſy matter for him that committed it, to repair his Fault. Then Madam, (replied Pharnaces, and ſighed whether he would or no) it ſeems it would pleaſe you beſt that he ſhould love you long before he tell you. He muſt not tell me at all, replied the Princeſs, at the leaſt, if he will be certain I ſhall not hate him. How ſhould any know your Humour, replied he? An hundred ways, ſaid the Princeſs Ariſtea: But Pharnaces, added ſhe, Is there any of your Friends that deſires to know it? Yes, Madam, ſaid he, and if the Princeſs Ariminta (then he bluſh'd, and looked upon her) had not told me what ſhe has done, the faireſt Princeſs upon Earth had been importuned: And the moſt faithful Lover in the World had been ill entertained. Perhaps, ſaid the Princeſs, that fair One whom you ſpeak of, is not of my Humour. Pardon me, Madam, replied he, for if I ſhould name her, you would ſay ſhe were. The Princeſs perceiving by ſeveral Paſſages what Pharnaces deſired ſhe ſhould know, ſince he carried the Buſineſs more diſcreetly then Artanus, ſhe was not angry at him; but yet continued all that Day in a very fretting Humour.

In the Evening, at the Return from Hunting, the Prince Sinneſis, who by the Rigour of the Princeſs Ariſtea, was almoſt deſperate, came to ſee Ariminta, and conferring in private with her; Siſter, ſaid he, Will you have no Pity upon me? Are you not ſo compaſſionate as to do me a good Office unto the inexorable Ariſtea? Did I entertain any Thought of her which was not innocent, I ſhould never deſire your Aſſiſtance; But loving her with ſuch pure Affection as I do, and knowing that the King will conſent I ſhould marry her, I think I may without any Offence unto you, conjure you to imploy all your Ingenuity, to make me acceptable unto her. I conceive your choice, and deſires ſo juſt and reaſonable, (replied the Princeſs) that I cannot condemn them, and if to ſpeak in your Favour unto the Princeſs Ariſtea, will give you Satisfaction, I ſhall with all Joy and Willingneſs pleaſe you, though in my Opinion, that which you call Rigour in her, is only an Effect of her Modeſty: and becauſe perhaps ſhe does not think, that you do really intend to marry her; but looks only upon your Paſſion as a Piece of Courtſhip and Gallantry. Pardon me, dear Siſter, ſaid he unto her, for this Princeſs does rightly underſtand my Intentions, and her Coldneſs does proceed from ſome other hidden cauſe which I cannot underſtand. I ſhall uſe all my beſt Endeavours, replied the Princeſs, to diſcover it: and will to Morrow go unto her, before ſhe be ready, that I may with more Freedom talk with her. There is another way, anſwered he, to proſper my Deſign, more eaſy, and more prevalent than that. Then let me hear it, replied the Princeſs. Since you cannot gueſs it, replied he, or at leaſt will not, I fear you will not undertake it. Do you think, Sir, anſwered ſhe, and laughed, that one can gueſs at Thoughts? And can you ſuſpect my willingneſs to ſerve you? Since you do aſſure me that my Fears were cauſleſs, ſaid he, then dear Siſter, let not your Coldneſs unto the Prince Spitridates cauſe the Princeſs Ariſtea to be revenged upon me: but be pliant unto him, if you would have her be ſo unto me. The Princeſs bluſh'd at the Diſcourſe of Sinneſis, and not knowing whether he ſpoke ſincerely, or only to diſcover her Thoughts: In truth, ſaid ſhe, you have ſo ſurprized me, that I almoſt know not how to anſwer you; for I am ſo ✓ little perſwaded of Spitridates his Suffering, that if your Miſery be not greater then his, I cannot conceive there needs any ſuch extraordinary Remedy as that you propoſe. No, no, Siſter, ſaid he unto her, you do not think as you ſay, nor ought you to think ſo; for Spitridates loves you even to the very height of Adoration: and I made him confeſs it unto me whether he would or no, when we were hunting together. Spitridates (replied ſhe, and was much aſhamed) would not have choſen a better Confident. I do acknowledg it (replied the Prince Sinneſis, and could not be interrupted) for if you will really oblige me, you muſt treat him better than hitherto you have done. But Sir, ſaid ſhe, ſince there is ſo great an Intimacy between you and Spitridates, there is no need that I ſhould meddle in the Buſineſs, you may do it well enough without me. Cruel Woman, ſaid he unto her, why do you ſay ſo? Do you not know that there is more powerful Eloquence in one of your looks to perſwade Spitridates, than in all my beſt Rhetorick? In ſhort, unleſs you have a Mind abſolutely to loſe me, you muſt entertain the Love of that Prince, who deſerves you better than any other, and who doubtleſs is adorned with all thoſe admirable Qualities, which may invite your, and the King my Father's choice of him. But, ſaid he, and ſmiled, If I be not much miſtaken in the Rules of Phyſiognomy, I ſee that Spitridates, maugre all your Severity and Wiſdom, is not much hated. And then not giving her any time to anſwer, he called that Princeſs unto him who was talking with me at the other end of the Chamber. The Princeſs was ſo much aſtoniſhed that ſhe knew not what to do, or ſay: Certainly Sir, ſaid ſhe unto him, you have loſt your Reaſon in Hunting, and I do believe you will not approve to Morrow of what you do to Day: Mean while the Prince Spitridates obeying his Call, came unto him. I have been as good as my Word ſaid Sinneſis unto him; and I have done that Service for you which I deſire you will do for me. Sir, replied Spitridates, what you deſired from me was ſo ſmall in Compariſon of the glorious Office which you offered me, that I bluſh for Shame. It is my part to bluſh for Shame, ſaid the Princeſs, to ſee unto what a ſtrange Adventure the Prince my Brother hath expoſed me. Whatſoever it be, ſaid Sinneſis unto her, and taking her by the Hand, It concerns the Life both of Spitridates, and Sinneſis : and I do here declare unto you, in the Preſence of the Gods who hear me, that if you uſe Spitridates ill, I ſhall become your utter Enemy. After this without giving her any time to reply, ſpeaking aloud that all they which waited upon him might hear; I will leave you Spitridates, ſaid he unto him, to ſpeak the reſt your ſelf, and went out immediately: Leaving the Princeſs ſo non-pluſt, that ſhe knew not what to reſolve upon, for ſhe knew well enough the violent Paſſion of Sinneſis unto Ariſtea, and his imperious humour. But though ſhe did very much eſteem of Spitridates, yet was ſhe angry to ſee that ſhe could not avoid his diſcourſing of his Paſſion to her: So in this perplexity of Mind, ſhe was a long while ſilent, and before Spitridates durſt open his Mouth : Yet ſince he feared ſhe would accuſe him of ſome indiſcretion, in acquainting the Prince her Brother with his love to her, I did at laſt begin the Diſcourſe.

I do not know Madam, ſaid he unto her, whether I ſhall be ſo unhappy, as to be ſuſpected of raſhneſs and imprudence ; but when you ſhall underſtand how the Prince, after he was pleaſed to acquaint me with the honour he intended unto my Siſter, was alſo pleaſed to tell me, that he knew of my Paſſion unto you, and that he would be ready to do me any good Office : When you underſtand I ſay, that at the firſt I deſired him not to meddle, and did not confeſs unto him my Affection unto you, till he had urged me above a hundred times, then I hope you will conceive it very difficult for a Man, who adores you as I do, to refuſe ſuch a prevalent Aſſiſtance, having ſuch need of it as I had : For Heavens know, Madam, I could never find by any of your Actions, any reaſonable ground to build the leaſt hope upon. After that Spitridates had done ſpeaking in his own Juſtification, the Princeſs lifting up her Eyes, which ſhe continually held down as long as he ſpoke; I am glad ſaid ſhe unto him, that the Buſineſs is as you tell me; and that I ſee this Accident is grounded only upon the imagination of the Prince Sinneſis, who to induce you to do him a good Office, would perſwade you to love, to love me better than you do. But Spitridates, let not this at all ingage you, and I do proteſt unto you, that I think nothing but what I thought before my Brother ſpoke unto me; therefore I pray, let you and I reſt upon the ſame terms we did, and endeavour only to perſwade the fair Ariſtea, whom I ſhould be infinitely joyed to ſee matched according to her Merit. Ah Madam (cried out the Prince Spitridates) do not ſo cruelly torture me, nor render all the Promiſes which the Prince Sinneſis hath made me, ſo ineffectual. What hath he promiſed, replied ſhe? He hath put me in Hopes, anſwered he, that you will give a favourable ear unto me. If he continue until to morrow in the ſame Mind, replied ſhe, then I ſhall conſider what I have to do; in the mean while, I adviſe you to retire your ſelf, with a Reſolution to do my Brother all the good Offices you can unto the fair Ariſtea, without any other intereſt or deſign concerning me. In ſaying ſo, ſhe roſe up, and went away, ſo that Spitridates was conſtrained to leave her, without returning any anſwer. As ſoon as this Prince was gone, ſhe called me; but though ſhe ſeemed to muſe upon the matter, yet ſeemed ſhe not very Melancholy; and to tell you truly, I believe, that ſince ſhe did eſteem Spitridates very much, ſhe was not at all angry with her ſelf, after ſhe had well conſidered upon it, that ſhe had expreſſed ſome Marks of Affection unto him, as without any wrong unto her modeſty ſhe might well do, ſince her Brother had ſpoken ſo unto her. I confeſs alſo, that when the Princeſs had acquainted me with the paſſage, I was raviſhed with Joy, to ſee ſo happy a beginning of that Deſign, which my Mother was to tranſact by the laſt Will of the Queen of Pontus; for as ſhe was even dying, ſhe commanded her to ſow as many ſeeds of Friendſhip and Love between theſe young Princeſſes, as poſſibly ſhe could. Mean while, the Prince Spitridates, as ſoon as he was gone from her, went unto Ariſteas

Chamber, with intent to do the like good office unto the Prince Sinneſis, which he had received from him, and thinking he had brought the beſt News in the World unto a young and fair Princeſs; Siſter, ſaid he unto her, (and ſpeaking low, leſt any of her Women ſhould hear) you ought to entertain me with more then ordinary Ceremony, for I bring you ſuch a Crown, as is not unworthy of you. If ſuch a thing as that were in your Diſpoſition, (anſwered ſhe, and laughed as well as he) I believe you would be ſo ambitious as to keep it for your ſelf, and not offer it unto me. Do you not know, ſaid he unto her, and ſighed, that one violent Paſſion drives out another; and that ſince I am ſo deeply in love with the Princeſs Ariminta, I have no other Ambition but to pleaſe her? In ſhort, Siſter, ſaid he, the Prince Sinneſis would marry you; and I have Commiſſion to tell you as much, and to move you to entertain him, as he deſerves. I am very ſorry Brother, replied ſhe, that you have undertaken any ſuch Commiſſion; for indeed the Prince Arſamones hath abſolutely forbidden me to give any hopes of it unto the Prince Sinneſis, and therefore I dare not entertain the leaſt thought of it. But certainly, ſaid Spitridates, he does not believe his deſign is real, as it is. Pardon me, anſwered ſhe, for I did ingenuouſly tell him that it was. And did he not acquaint you with his Reaſons, replied Spitridates? No, replied Ariſtea, though the Princeſs my Mother did preſs him unto it very importunately, as I underſtand by one of her Women who heard her. Then came one in, and ſaid, that the Prince Arſamones was coming into the Chamber, and indeed ſo he did preſently after. As ſoon as he entred, he cauſed all to withdraw, except the Prince his Son, and the Princeſs his Daughter, who were both of them a little ſurprized. After he had a while ſilently looked upon them; I know Spitridates, ſaid he unto him, that you are yet ſo young, that your green experience has need of ſome Advice; and though you were born with high and noble Inclinations, yet may you be capable of ſome Imbecilities which may be diſhonourable, and perhaps deſtructive unto ſuch as do not arm themſelves againſt them : I would have you know, both you and your Siſter, unto whom I have already ſpoken, that it is not my mind ever to have any Alliance with the Uſurpers of my Fathers Kingdom ; I was born unto that Throne which they unjuſtly enjoy ; and doubtleſs I am able to reſent many things, which your young innocent years are not capable of, eſpecially being born infortunate : But ſince I believe you both to be generous, and worthy to be deſcended from the ancient Kings of Bithynia, your Predeceſſors and mine, I conjure you Spitridates, ſtoutly to guard your Heart againſt the Charms of the Princeſs Ariminta, which have already a little ingaged you ; and I command you Ariſtea to keep you from the Prince Sinneſis ; for it would be as diſhonourable in you to ſit upon the Throne by ſuch an unworthy way, as it would be in Spitridates to renounce it, as he would, if he ſhould too deeply ingage himſelf in the Affection of the Princeſs Ariminta. Thoſe who have loſt Crowns, ought to be poſſeſſed with no Paſſions, but only deſire to get them again, and to ruin thoſe that uſurp them ; thereſore ſince I cannot unworthily degenerate, I would contract no Alliance with thoſe, whom I oug[illegible] and will ruin upon the firſt occaſion which ſhall preſent it ſelf. Diſſimulation is excuſeable in weak oppreſſed People, but yet not ſo far as any ſuch Alliance ; and if hereafter I ſhall arrive to ſuch a Condition, as to pull my Enemies out of that Throne which they uſurp, I would not deſtroy my own Children with them ; live then with them in all appearing Civility, but ingage no further, unleſs you will be unworthy of your ſelves, and my Affection. I know very well, that to ſpeak thus unto Perſons of your Age, ſeems to be imprudent : but I know alſo, that ſince you are deſcended from ſo many Kings, you muſt needs be generous, and have Souls ſenſible of Ambition ; and therefore I do not doubt, but you will honour what I ſay unto you, and willingly obey me. As ſoon as Arſamenes had ended his Speech unto them, he went away, not receiving any other anſwer from either Spitridates or Ariſtea, but this humble Reverence : For this Prince had cauſed all his Children to reſpect him ſo much, that they durſt hardly look upon him when he was gone. Spitridates did ſo deeply grieve at it, that the Princeſs Ariſtea, who was no leſs ſad then he, was moved to cheer him up: Brother, ſaid ſhe unto him, ſince you have both more Wit, and more Generoſity than I have, I hope you will not ſo deſperately reſent this Accident: and the exceſſive Sorrow which I ſee in your Eyes makes me take ſo much liberty, as to beſeech you not to be too much overcome by it. Ah, my dear Siſter, ſaid he unto her, what an advantagious thing is your inſenſibility to the Prince Sinneſis unto you? It is much more eaſy for you to endure that Arſamones ſhall hinder you of a Crown, then it is for me to be hindred of the Princeſs Ariminta, not but that I have Ambition enough in me, but it is becauſe Love is predominate in my Soul; and becauſe it is much more eaſy for me to let the Uſurpers of the Kingdom of Bithynia live in Peace, than for me to live without the Princeſs whom I love. There are other Crowns in the Univerſe, which Fortune and my Sword may give me, yet there is but one, only one Princeſs Ariminta in all the World: Yea, my dear Siſter, ſhe is the only One in all the World I can adore; without her, all things elſe are nothing to me; without her, I make no difference between Slavery and a Kingdom; yet for ought I can judge by the Orders of the Prince Arſamones, he intends I ſhould nouriſh in my Heart a deſign to poynard the King of Pontus, the Father of Ariminta, to kill the Princes her Brothers, and whenſoever occaſion preſents it ſelf, to bury her in the Ruines of her Houſe: Ah, no, no, I will never ſit upon a Throne by ſuch bloody Conditions; I do know very well that the Grand-father of Ariminta was an Uſurper; I know alſo, that the King her Father poſſeſſeth the Kingdom which belongs to me; but withal I know, that ſince Ariminta has uſurped the Empire of my Heart, ſhe hath rendred the Poſſeſſion of the Kingdom of Bithynia legitimate unto thoſe of her Houſe. I pretend nothing unto it, dear Siſter, ſince I cannot come unto it but by the loſs of my Princeſs, who doubtleſs would never look upon me but with horror, if I ſhould waſh my Hands in the Blood of her Father and Brothers: The Gods do know it is not out of any feeble Fear, that my Ambition ſubmits unto my Love; and I am ſo well ſatisfied with an inward Teſtimony of my Courage, that I do not care what Men think of me. But you, my dear Siſter, whoſe Soul is ſo ſenſible of this tender Paſſion, certainly you are more ambitious than I am; Can you be contented to loſe two Crowns? Do not, I conjure you, hearken unto the Prince Sinneſis, and not unto the Prince Arſamones, for which way is it poſſible he can bring his deſign about? he has been five and twenty Years about it, and yet can find no Hopes; he has educated me as a Subject, and he would now hinder you from being a Queen, though he have no Power to make me a King; For where are his Allies? where are his Armies? or where is any retreat for his Security? he can have no deſign in it, but by way of conſpiracy againſt the Perſons of the Princes: but by his Favour, he ſhall execute it without me; or to ſay better, he ſhall periſh without me, ſince what he would attempt is an Impoſſibility. Reſolve then, my dear Siſter, to entertain the Affection of the Prince Sinneſis, for indeed, if once you be Queen of Pontus and Bithynia, the Prince Arſamones would not, what ere he ſays, ſubvert that Throne upon which you ſit: He has permitted you to diſſemble, and me alſo; Let us diſſemble then, ſaid he, but let it be with him. The Gods do know, I would never do any thing contrary to that Duty which I owe unto him, wherein my Love is not intereſted; but when it concerns Ariminta, I cannot obey him. Yet Brother (ſaid Ariſtea unto him) you run a great hazard in diſobeying him. I ſhall run a greater in not diſobeying, replied he. And what, Siſter, do you intend to yield a blind Obedience? I am of that Sex, anſwered ſhe, which permits me not to do otherwiſe. Can you treat the Prince Sinneſis unkindly, (ſaid he unto her) who offers you two Crowns? he who hath ſpoken in my behalf unto the Princeſs Ariminta? he who may perhaps give her unto me? he who has given you all his Affections, and does infinitely adore you? I will not treat him unkindly, ſaid ſhe, but I will not marry him, unleſs my Father conſent unto it. Would you then have me die? anſwered he. Would you then have me diſhonour my ſelf? (replied ſhe.) I would have you ſit upon a Throne, and ſave my Life, and make me happy, anſwered this grieved Prince. The Gods do know, ſaid the Princeſs Ariſtea, that I would undertake the greateſt Difficulties for you; but to marry without the conſent of Arſamones, is a thing which I neither ought, nor can do; for I believe, that neither the King of Pontus, nor the Prince Sinneſis would offer it, if they knew that Arſamones would not conſent: So that, ſaid ſhe, ſince prudence tells us we muſt not bring things to that paſs, as that the Princes ſhould know my Father is againſt our Alliance with them, ſince they would then eaſily ſuſpect his reaſon; therefore all the whole Buſineſs had better reflect upon me, and that I paſs for a phantaſtical Girl, that has a ſimple ſecret Acceſſion to the Prince Sinneſis. You are very prudent, Siſter, replied Spitridates, and it ſeems your Reaſon is at liberty: But ſince it is ſo, conſider well I beſeech you, into what a deſperate Condition you bring me, if you deny me this favour, at the leaſt to teſtify unto the Prince Sinneſis, that I have ſolicited you with all my Power, and alſo that I have not ſpoken all in vain: permit me to hope awhile, and in the mean time the Prince Arſamones may chance to change his Deſign. In Concluſion, Sir, Spitridates was ſo importunate with the Princeſs Ariſtea, that ſhe conſented unto this laſt Favour, and then he retired inconceiveably diſquieted. As he had a great Soul himſelf, ſo he imagined ſome great Deſign that his Father ſhould have in denying a Crown unto the Princeſs his Daughter, in hopes hereafter to reconquer one for him. But for all that, Love rooted all ſuch Thoughts out of his Soul, and he reſolved rather to be always a Subject, than to loſe his hope of raigning hereafter in the Heart of the Princeſs Arimi[illegible] In the mean time, the Prince Aryandes, who was no Lover of Spitridates; though he ſhewed fair, ever ſince a Horſe-race, where Spitridates won the Match, and where he conceived Spitridates did not carry himſelf as he ought unto him; perceiving that the Prince Sinneſis did patronize him in his love to Ariminta, he took upon him to patronize Pharnaces, and indeed ſpoke very advantagiouſly for him; but he went another way to work then Sinneſis did, and told her, that he had no other intereſt in his Conſideration, but her own; that for his part, he could not find it fit ſhe ſhould ever marry Spitridates, who was of a Family, which in all ſound Policy the Kings of Pontus ſhould keep under the Hatches as much as they could; and ſince ſo, he conceived that Pharnaces was the fitteſt Man ſhe could caſt her Eyes upon. The Princeſs thanked him moſt civilly for his Advice, and anſwered him, that ſhe was reſolved to poize her ſelf with all equality unto all, and without medling in the Buſineſs of her Marriage, with one or other, ſhe would ſubmit that buſineſs of her Life unto the conduct of the King her Father. In the mean time the Princeſs Ariminta, to make good her word unto Sinneſis, went unto the Princeſs Ariſtea, who carried the matter according as ſhe promiſed Spitridates; ſo that Sinneſis finding a little more ſweetneſs from her than ordinary, gave moſt hearty thanks unto the Prince, and was ſo officious in his behalf unto the Princeſs his Siſter, that indeed he moved her to uſe Spitridates with much more Freedom and Sweetneſs. The Prince Sinneſis alſo did me the honour to ſpeak unto me, and deſired me to prompt the Princeſs his Siſter unto more kindneſs unto that Prince. Now was Spitridates in all appearance the happieſt Man in the World; for he was highly aſſiſted by the Brother of his Princeſs, he had the freedom to expreſs his Paſſion without offence unto her, and had ſo much delight, as to obſerve by divers Circumſtances, that he ſtood upon no ill terms in her Heart: Yet I oftentimes wondred to find ſome ſigns of Melancholy in his Eyes, and to hear him ſigh ofte[illegible] But ſince I heard ſay, that Love was an odd kind of phantaſtical Paſſion, I regarded it, as one of thoſe ordinary Effects which proceeds from ſuch Folly, as is in the Souls of the wiſeſt Perſons, and made no other account of it: But the Princeſs was not a little buſied, for Sinneſis had always ſomething or other to ſay unto her, either concerning Ariſtea or Spitridates. Aryandes alſo conferred with her very often againſt Spitridates, and for Pharnaces: Spitridates was always ſpeaking as much as he could for himſelf; and Pharnaces, though he durſt not ſpeak for himſelf unto her, yet was entertaining her with diſcourſe upon indifferent Things, as much as poſſible he could, to the end he might prevent others from ſpeaking: only Artanus abſented himſelf for certain days, because he durſt not look upon her; but afterwards, coming in the Company of the Princeſs two or three times, and being infinitely reſpective unto her, ſhe thought he had repented of his boldneſs, and reſolved to forget his Crime, which for all that was not the moſt pardonable which might be committed amongſt fair and young Perſons; ſhe ſuffered him then to viſit her, but yet treated him very coldly. Thus being the ſtate of Things, there fell out to be ſome ſtirrings upon the Borders of Phrygia, ſo that an Army muſt be raiſed, which the Prince Sinneſis muſt command, and Spitridates muſt be his Lieutenant General, which did extreamly anger the Prince Aryandes, who was to ſtay with the King, becauſe he would have had Pharnaces to be Lieutenant-General. I will not inſiſt upon Relations of all the Adieus which all thoſe illuſtrious Perſons did take; I ſhall only tell you, that this Separation contracted a ſtrong Bond of Amity between Spitridates, and the Princeſs Ariminta; and that Sinneſis alſo departed with much Satisfaction, becauſe Ariſtea, out of her complacency unto her Brother, did not treat him ill when he took his leave. I ſhall not inſiſt neither upon any relation of this War, which laſted but ſix Months, and then concluded by a happy Peace. But give me leave to tell you, that Spitridates did ſo gallantly behave himſelf, as the Fame of his Valour did deaf all others, though both Sinneſis and Pharnaces did alſo very many Miracles in that War; but indeed they cried up none but him, both in Court and Army: You may eaſily imagine then, that when he returned thus loaden with Honour, he was well entertained by the Princeſs. I forgot to tell you, that Artanus was not in this War, not but that he ſpoke of it as high as the braveſt; and provided the moſt ſumptuous Equipage that could be procured: I remember nothing was ſo much talked on, as the magnificence of his Tents, and the richneſs of his Arms, and the bravery of every Thing; yet when he was to depart, juſt at that very hour he fell Sick, and went not, though all his Equipage was gone before; yet none did at that time ſuſpect any thing of the cowardly cauſe, for he was ſo diſcontented at it, in ſpeaking unto thoſe who came to bid him adieu, that he moved them to pity, not accuſe him: Yet he recovered within a few days after, and carried it ſo hanſomly, that never ſpeaking of his Paſſion to the Princeſs, nor doing any thing which might give her juſt cauſe of complaint; he gave ſome cauſe to think, that it was his Love only unto her which kept him from the Army; and indeed his Deſign did ſo well take, that every one did believe it ſo: Yet when theſe Princes returned, he ſeemed for certain Days ſo much aſhamed, that he had much ado to ſhew himſelf: All the Court made it their raillary, and talked of his magnificent Equipage, which was never uſed; but brought back unto Heraclea, which would have drawn any other but himſelf into more Quarrels then one or two: but he carried it ſo for a while, that his Humour was not abſolutely diſcovered, until he had five or ſix Quarrels came upon him, but he fought none of them. Since this Peace was very advantageous unto this State, the Court continued a long time very joyful. Never was the Princeſs Ariminta ſo fair, nor the Princeſs Ariſtea ſo amiable, and by conſequence, never was the Prince Sinneſis, Spitridates, Pharnaces, and Artanus, more amorous. The King of Pontus, who did not alter his Deſign, took a Reſolution to execute it, and to make up the Marriage between the Prince Sinneſis, and the Princeſs Ariſtea; and between the Prince Spitridates, and the Princeſs Ariminta: Notwithſtanding, he did believe, that conſidering the ſtate of Things, Arſamones might accept of theſe Intentions with Joy; yet ſince he was prudent, and knew the humour of that Prince to be ſomething imperious, he would therefore try his Reſentments of it before any further Proceedings: And he was pleaſed to caſt his Eyes upon me for that Imployment, knowing that the Princeſs Arbiana did me the honour to love me: He commanded me then, whilſt he took a Journey for ſeven or eight Days, to impart the Deſign unto her, to the end ſhe might prepare the Mind of her Husband to accept of this Honour, as he ought to do: You may imagine, Sir, that I accepted of this Commiſſion with much Joy; and indeed the Pleaſure of it was ſo great, that my Heart could not contain it: But I made it known unto the Prince Sinneſis, unto the Princeſs Ariminta, and to Spitridates alſo. Yet was I much ſurprized, not to find ſo much Joy in that Prince as I expected; and without any Interpretation of his Reſentment, he ſeemed as if he would have hindred me from ſpeaking unto his Mother: yet ſince the Order which I had received was urgent, I left him in Ariminta's Chamber, and having a Coach ready, I went unto the Princeſs Arbiana, whom I had the good Fortune to find alone in her Chamber. But though I was ſurprized at the melancholy of Spitridates, I confeſs I was amazed to obſerve it in the Mind of Arbiana; ſince I loved her very well, and ſhe me alſo: I beſeeched her to explain her ſelf a little more clearly than ſhe had done; Though ſhe knew that being originally a Bithynian as I was, the Intereſts of her Houſe were dear unto me; yet for all that ſhe would not open her ſelf unto me further then coldly telling me, that ſhe would ſpeak unto the Prince her Husband, and that ſhe would give me an account of his Anſwer before the King's Return, who was gone unto a Town in Pontus, called Cabira, leaving the Princes, and the Princeſs his Daughter behind him. I afterwards came to know, that I was no ſooner gone from Arbiana, but ſhe went unto Arſamones, to tell him, that ſhe deſired this double Alliance with him, and that he muſt prepare himſelf to return an anſwer before the King's Return. So I ſhall, (ſaid he, without any further explaining himſelf;) in the mean time ſpeak to me no more about it, for I know very well what I have to do. Arbiana would have conjured him to tell her a little more plainly what ſhe was to expect; but he intreated her to preſs him no further, and to believe that he had very advantagious Thoughts in his Heart for his Children. As Arſamones was of a very violent Humour, ſhe was forced to ſubmit, and to retire into her Chamber without any deeper penetration into his Thoughts: As ſhe went out of the Chamber, ſhe met Spitridates, who afrer ſhe had carried him into her own, did conjure her with ſo much tenderneſs to be favourable unto him, that this wiſe Princeſs was much moved unto Compaſſion, and promiſed to uſe her beſt Endeavours for his Satisfaction; and alſo ſince ſhe ſaw no appearance of any poſſibility for Arſamones to get into the Throne of his Fathers, ſhe wiſhed with all her Heart that theſe two Marriages were conſummated. In the mean time, I was four or five days without any Vexation, but at the incertainty of Arſamones his Anſwer; not that I feared it would be abſolutely ill, but the melancholy of Spitridates, and the penſiveneſs of Arbiana, joyned unto ſome ſadneſs which I ſaw in the Eyes of Ariſtea, made me fear there was ſomething in the Wind which I could not underſtand. As for Spitridates, he was unconceivably troubled, and notwithſtanding all his Endeavours to hide it, the Princeſs did perceive it, yet he was ſo ingenious as to make her think, that the Hopes of any great good Carries with it always ſome kind of unquiet Melancholy. The Prince Sinneſis on the contrary, was in high content; for although he ſaw very well that the Princeſs Ariſtea was not very pleaſant, yet he took a real ſadneſs for a piece of Modeſty, and ſuted his Diſcourſe accordingly. As for the Prince Argandes, Pharnaces, and Artanus, ſince they knew not the ſecrets of things, each of them ſtudied how to promote their particular Deſignes, and never thought upon any ones elſe. The fifth Day after the King's departure, being come, three or four only remaining before his return; I remember that the Princeſs Ariſtea had a long conference with the Princeſs Ariminta, and not knowing well any Reaſon why they redoubled their Amity and Affection one to another; the Princeſs Ariminta gave a little Picture which ſhe had unto Ariſtea, the ſame which ſhe ſhewed you in Bithynia, to diſcover whether you were Spitridates or no, as afterwards ſhe ſent word unto the Princeſs : And in exchange Ariſtea gave a Jewel unto Ariminta, which ſhe wears at this day, and is the pretrieſt thing in the World.

After that Ariſtea had left the Princeſs, Spitridates came to ſee her; and ſince he found her full of thoſe pleaſing Conceits, which thoſe two fair ones had infuſed one into another; ſhe treated him better than ever ſhe did in all her Life before : for ſhe was then ſo full of obliging ſincerity, as that he plainly diſcovered in her Heart, that real eſteem which ſhe had of his Vertue; and ſince this Prince had certainly as much ſprightly Wit, as ever any had; and never any knew better how to love than he; ſo he expreſſed himſelf unto her ſo feelingly, ſo reſpectively, and paſſionately, that he did ſufficiently win upon the Soul of the Princeſs Ariminta. This Conference was long, though it ſeemed ſhort, by reaſon it was pleaſing, and it was very late when Spitridates went from the Princeſs : He went afterwards to ſup with the Prince Sinneſis, and he came not into his own Chamber until almoſt Midnight. He was no ſooner in his Chamber, but one came to tell him that the Prince Arſamones ſent for him. In obedience unto his Commands, he went unto his Chamber, and in the way he obſerved the Officers of the Houſe extraordinary buſy : yet his imagination was ſo taken up with the Princeſs Ariminta, that he leſs regarded it. When he was entred into the Chamber of Arſamones, he found there the Princeſs Arbiana, the young Prince Euriclides his Brother, and the Princeſs Ariſtea; but the ſight did much augment his Fears, when he found melancholy in the Faces of thoſe two Princeſſes. When he was come unto his Father, Spitridates, ſaid Arſamones unto him, we ſhould be weary of our Fetters, and the time is now come, when we will ſhake them off; therefore take the Princeſs your Mother by the Hand, and follow me without any Contradiction or Murmur: for it concerns the Grandure of my Houſe, my own Glory, and Yours, and more than that, my Life. Since I do owe mine unto you, replied Spitridates moſt ſadly, I have no will to diſobey you; But, Sir, dare I ask what your deſign is? You ſhall know it preſently, replied Arſamones roughly: Mean while do as I bid you without Reſiſtance, ſince I am in power to make my ſelf obeyed. Spitridates hearing his Father ſpeak in this manner, and ſeeing that indeed he might be compelled unto it, he gave his Hand unto the wiſe Arbiana, who in a low Voice conjured him to make no ſtir, and proteſted unto him that ſhe was ignorant of the Deſign. Then after Orders was given for all Things, this Prince, followed by his Children, and ſuch as he had made choice of to follow him, went down a pair of back Stairs into the Garden, and out of the Garden, to one of the Gates of the Town, which looked towards the Sea, and whoſe Porter was bribed: there he found a Shallop, into which he cauſed all of them to enter, and himſelf the laſt; after he had thruſt in Spitridates with his own Hands, who at that inſtant ſtaid at the ſide, as if he would conſider whether he ſhould enter or no; although he held the Princeſs his Mother by the Hand; all was no ſooner in, but Arſamones commanded to row away in all haſte, until they came unto the Cape of an Iſland called Acheruſiades: Since he had paid the Water-men very liberally, they made away ſo faſt, that in leſs then an Hour he arrived at the Creek, where they ſay Herculus landed, when he fought with that terrible Monſter; the defeat of which got him ſo great a Reputation in that Country. You may very well judg Sir, in what a pitiful Condition Spitridates was then in, who though he did not know his Fathers deſign, yet was he ſure it was contrary to his Love. After arrival at the Place before named, out of the Shallop they went, and entred into a Bithynian Ship, which waited there, and was guarded by three others, which the Calcedonians had ſent unto Arſamones. None of the Water-men of the

Shallop daring to return unto Heraclea, left it upon the River unto the Wind and Waves, and followed this Prince who promiſed to take care of their Fortunes. No ſooner was the ambitious Arſamones in the Ship, after he had given order to make towards Bithynia, he and Euriclides entred into the Cabin, where the Princeſs Arbiana was with Ariſtea, and Spitridates. When he was entred, Well (ſaid he unto them, with an aſpect which ſpoke both Fury and Joy) though I am not yet a King, yet am I no longer a Slave; and he that would conquer a Crown, muſt firſt break off thoſe Chains which hinders him. Come Spitridates (ſaid he unto him) let us go unto a Throne; and to make the way more pleaſant and eaſy unto you, I will tell you, that I will not oppoſe your Marriage with the Princeſs Araminta; but on the contrary, I intend to put you preſently in the Head of an Army, to the end you may go and conquer her, and not take her from the Hands of my moſt deadly Enemies; when you are the Son of a King, and in expectance to be King your ſelf, you will be more worthy of her Vertue and Beauty then you are, and doubtleſs you would extreamly injure her to have her marry the Son of a Slave, and a Slave himſelf. I have been twenty Years in contriving this Deſign, which I now begin to execute; the City of Calcedonia is for me, as well as that of Chriſopolis, and I hope within a few days the King of Pontus will be brought unto ſuch Terms, as to ſend his Ambaſſadors unto my Court to demand Ariſtea, for the Prince his Son: But whatſoever falls, I render thanks unto the Gods, that I ſhall die free, though I cannot live a King. Spitridates, as much taken up as he was with his Paſſion, could not chuſe but ſee ſomething that was great and heroick in his Father's Deſign: But how ambitious ſoever his Soul was, Love was ever the Maſter of it, and he could not conceive that any Hopes of being a King could comfort him for the loſs of his Princeſs; alſo he anſwered Arſamones after ſuch a manner as was not pleaſing unto him; ſo that he was conſtrained to be ſilent, and as much as he could ſhut up all his melancholy in his Soul: You may well imagine

Sir, what his Thoughts were, during this Voyage, they were ſuch and ſo ſad, that when he related them afterwards unto me, he almoſt wept. The thought not only to quit his Princeſs, but to ruin her, to declare War againſt her, and to appear her Enemy after he was upon the point of marrying her, was a thing ſo horrid, as that he thought divers times to throw himſelf into the Sea; and if the Princeſs Ariſtea had not been, he had deſperately done it: Ambition was too feeble to overcome the Love that was rooted in his Soul. No, no, (ſaid he in himſelf) thou glittering and imperious Paſſion, thou ſhalt never chaſe my Princeſs out of my Heart; ſhe ſhall be Soveraign, and raign there, in ſpite of thee, and thy plotting Power: my deſires of a Throne come infinitely ſhort of my deſires to enjoy her.

But alas, what will this divine Princeſs think of me? can ſhe ever believe that I knew of the Deſign of Arſamones? No, no, flatter not my ſelf, for notwithſtanding all the Teſtimonies of my Love that ever I gave her, ſhe will believe that I prefer the Crown of Bithynia before her. The Prince Sinneſis, in lieu of being my aſſiſtant towards her, will become my mortal Enemy; he will accuſe me for carrying away Ariſtea, and will ſpeak as much againſt me now, as he ſpoke for me before; I fear Ariminta, the generous Ariminta, will hate me now, as much as ſhe loved me before; and indeed ſhe has reaſon: For why, will ſhe ſay to her ſelf, did he diſcover his Love unto me, when he was tranſacting as my declared Enemy? But yet for all this, my deareſt Princeſs, I am only infortunate, not criminal. Ambition was ſtirring in my Heart, I muſt confeſs, but Love only did abſolutely enjoy it: So not knowing what he either ought, would, or could do, the miſerable Spitridates abandoned himſelf wholly unto Sorrow, and every Minute of his ſad Life ſighed out a remembrance of his dear Princeſs. In the mean time, Sir, give me leave to tell you, how great was our wonder in the Morning, when the departure of Arſamones was known; indeed it was ſo great, that I cannot remember, but tremble.

The Princeſs was yet aſleep, when the Prince Sinneſis came to her Chamber, where contrary to his cuſtom, he waked her; which no ſooner done, Siſter, (ſaid he unto her) Arſamones has carried away Ariſtea from me, and Spitridates from you; he is gone in the Night with all his Houſhold, and imbarqued ſecretly, not being diſcovered by any, but by this Inſcription, which is poſted up at every Corner in the Town, as this which I have here brought you; in ſaying ſo, he gave her the Note, which contained theſe Words:

The Prince Arſamones tells the King of Pontus, that to marry the Prince his Son, and the Princeſs his Daughter, unto the Children of a Slave, would be to make an Alliance unworthy of himſelf; therefore to tranſact both juſtly and generouſly, he muſt reſtore the Kingdom of Bithynia unto him, before he treat of any Alliance, otherwiſe he declares War againſt him, as an Uſurper of his Dominion, and as his mortal Enemy.

You may well imagine Sir, how this ſurprized the Princeſs; yet being wiſe, ſhe vented her Reſentments of it before the Prince her Brother; but enquired of him, with much reſervedneſs, all that he knew concerning the Buſineſs; yet he, who was of a violent temper, uttered all that either Love, Choler, Fury, and Deſpair could prompt him unto; ſometimes his rage roved at Arſamones; then preſently after, he ſuſpected Spitridates, as acceſſory to the Deſign, and confounding the innocent and culpable together; or to ſay better, not being able to diſcern them, he railed againſt Arſamones, againſt Spitridates, againſt Arbiana, againſt Euriclides, and againſt Ariſtea alſo. During all this turbulent Paſſage, the Princeſs ſpoke not a Word; ſhe had a deſire to ask him, whether he had ſent unto the King, to advertiſe him of the Accident? whether he had cauſed Arſamones to be purſued? and what Order he had taken in the Buſineſs? but not knowing what ſhe her ſelf ſhould adviſe them unto, ſhe ſuffered her Sorrows ſilently, without complaint; yet was her Curioſity ſatisfied preſently after, without any further enquiry; for the Prince himſelf told her, that he had ſent unto the King, and commanded two Ships to follow Arſamones, in which Pharnaces was imbarqued. This News made the Princeſs bluſh, becauſe ſhe knew, that if they were overtaken, there would be a Combate, ſince Pharnaces was there; yet diſſembling the matter as well as ſhe could, ſhe told the Prince Sinneſis, that according to her Apprehenſion, it was Arſamones only who had any hand in the Deſign. Afterwards this Prince being ſo paſſionately diſordered, that he neither knew, why he ſhould leave the Princeſs, nor whither he ſhould go, but he went out of her Chamber, and left her at liberty to lament. Well Heſionida (ſaid ſhe unto me, when I came to her Bedſide) what do you think of Spitridates? or what ought I to think of him? Madam, ſaid I unto her, I have ſo ſtrong an Inclination to interpret all things unto the advantage of that Prince, that I am apt to believe he did all he could to prevent this Deſign. If ſo, ſaid the Princeſs, ſighing, he is very unfortunate; but if not, I am ſure he is very culpable; for if he had any ſecret deſign to tranſact with his Father in his juſt Pretenſions unto Bithynia, why did he teſtify any particular Affection unto me? or why ſhould he engage my Heart to eſteem him above all the World? If he had any ſuch privy Deſign, ſaid I unto her, he pretended unto you, the more to delude the Court, and hide his Deſign the better. But Madam, I cannot believe it; and although the Melancholy which of late I obſerved in his Mind, did much amaze me, yet I am fully perſwaded, that he really loves you. If ſo, replied ſhe, then why does he go away? How can he ever hope I ſhould continue my Affection to him, if he intend to make War againſt my Father? Believe me, Heſionida (added ſhe, tears falling from her fair Eyes whether ſhe would or no) though I would gladly find out ſome good ground to juſtify Spitridates, yet I cannot: Perhaps he thought it no unworthy act, to delude the Daughter of that Prince, who kept a Kingdom from him, and to get into a Throne again, it was excuſable, if he uſed a hundred thouſand falſe Oaths, and as many lying Proteſtations. But no, Spitridates, ſaid ſhe, you deceive your ſelf; Heroick Vertue is more difficult to practiſe than you imagine; nor is it permitted to commit Crimes, though it be to gain Crowns by it. Be not ſo haſty, Madam (ſaid I unto her) to condemn too raſhly, who ever ſeemed to be vertuous. Ah, Heſionida (ſaid ſhe unto me) did you but know all he ſaid unto me the laſt Night, you would tremble, that he thus abandons me to Day, and that he ſhould declare War againſt my Father: for he muſt needs know, that the Kingdom of Bithynia will never be reſtored him without a War; and he muſt needs imagine, that if he fight againſt the King of Pontus, unto whom I owe my Life, I ſhall my ſelf fight, and drive him out of my Heart. But yet ſince ſhe had not ſufficient ground either to condemn him, or juſtify him, ſhe knew not how to regulate her own deſires: She could well have wiſhed that Pharnaces might meet with him, and bring him back unto Heraclea; yet not knowing how he ſhould then be treated, ſhe did ſometimes make Prayers for his flight, and deſired that he might either not be taken, or elſe that he might vanquiſh Pharnaces; for truly, would ſhe ſay unto me, whether Spitridates be innocent or culpable, I wiſh with all my Heart, he may not fall again into the Hands of the King my Father. Then did ſhe entreat me to enquire whether Spitridates had carried all his Train with him, and I found, that every one of his Servants ſtayed behind, and not one of them went with him, and that the Prince Sinneſis, and the Prince Aryandes, had cauſed them all to be arreſted, who all of them did ſay, that they were altogether ignorant in the Deſign of Arſamones; and alſo did affirm, that my Maſter was ignorant of it as well as they, becauſe he ſent for ſome of them to get him to bed, when Arſamones ſent for him: Though this was a ſtrong conjecture to juſtify him in the opinion of the Princeſs, yet the two Princes Sinneſis and Aryandes were ſo prejudicated in their Imaginations, that they abſolutely aſſured her, that Spitridates did know of the Deſign; ſo that though ſhe did not believe them, yet her Soul ſtood upon Incertainties, betwixt what they told her, and what ſhe wiſhed to be true. In the mean while, the King returned unto Heraclea, but ſo incenſed againſt Arſamones, as never Man was more: And when he conſidered, that this Prince tranſacted thus, at ſuch a time when he would have ſet his Daughters upon the Throne, and have given his own Daughter unto his Son; he could not then find out any excuſe for him, and never conſidered that he detained his Kingdom from him, but was as much incenſed againſt him, as if he were a rebellious Subject. Then did Pharnaces return without meeting with him, bringing this intelligence with him, from ſome Merchants Ships which he met withal: That he was gone unto Bithynia, where he was in danger of a Shipwrack, as he was entring into the Port; but having eſcaped this Danger, he was received as King by the Inhabitants of Chalcedonia, and alſo by them of Chriſopolis, who had ſeized upon all the Gariſons the King of Pontus had there. I confeſs, Sir, that upon this Accident, the love of my Country did much work upon my Heart, and my Hopes once again to ſee a King of Bithynia, did much joy me; for ſince this was towards the end of Autumn, I thought that during Winter, things might perhaps be well compoſed, and that the Princeſs Ariminta might marry Spitridates, and be one day Queen of that Country from whence I had my original: So that joining the intereſt of my Native Country, unto the intereſt of my Miſtreſs, I did endeavour all I could, to perſwade her unto ſome Hopes of it; but ſhe always told me, that certainly the King her Father would never conſent to part with a Kingdom, unleſs force did compel him unto it: And indeed, though the ſeaſon of year was not fit to begin a War, yet Commiſſions was granted to raiſe new Regiments, to be added unto thoſe which remained of the Phrygian War. During this time, Pharnaces and Artanus were ſo joyed at the abſence of Spitridates, and were ſo aſſiduous about the Princeſs, that ſhe was extreamly importuned, principally by Artanus, who divers times began again to be inſolent: As for Pharnaces, he was ſo diſcreet and wiſe, that he gave her no cauſe of offence; or if he did, it was at ſuch a time, when the Princeſs thought ſolitude the greateſt Conſolation: Whenſoever ſhe walked, it was as privately as poſſible; and the better to hide the malady of her Mind, ſhe oftentimes faigned to be Sick, and would ſee no Body. Upon a day, when none did ſee her, there came ſuch news from Bithynia, as did much ſurprize all the Court, which was, that Arſamones had impriſoned Spitridates, and kept him very cloſe in a Chalcedonian Caſtle: Such news as this, upon any other adventure, would have extreamly grieved the Princeſs, but now it did moſt ſenſibly joy her, becauſe ſhe looked upon the Priſon of Spitridates, as a convincing Teſtimony of his innocency, which did compleatly juſtify him in her Opinion. Moreover, ſince ſhe did not fear, that Arſamones would ever attempt any thing againſt his Life, becauſe he was his Son, ſhe fancied great Conſolation in thinking, that as long as the War laſted, he could not fight, either againſt the King her Father, or againſt her Brothers; ſo that if Peace ſhould hereafter be concluded, ſhe could not blame him for any thing: Sometimes ſhe would grieve for the Sorrows which he endured: But for all that, as things ſtood, ſhe did not deſire he ſhould be at liberty. Did I not ever ſay, Madam (ſaid I unto her) that Spitridates was never culpable? Yes, Heſionida, replied ſhe, and I am very ſorry I ſhould ſuſpect him of any ſuch Injuſtice. Mean while, the Princeſs would go in the Morning unto the Temple that was ſo famous in Heraclea, (and which was dedicated unto the Goddeſs Adraſtea, or otherwiſe called, Fatal Deſtiny) with Intentions to invoke the Goddeſs to be propitious unto Spitridates, and to compoſe all Differences between the King her Father, and Arſamones. But here, Sir, you may admire at the Power of Fortune, for we met (in this Temple of Fatality) with a Stranger newly arrived at Heraclea, who ſeeing the Princeſs go into the Temple, went in alſo: I heard him ask, which of all theſe Ladies that waited upon the Princeſs, was called Heſionida? and I told him, I was ſhe; If ſo, replied he, do me the Honour that I may ſpeak a word in private with you. I conjure you (ſaid he, and ſpoke low) by the name of Spitridates. When I heard a Name ſo dear unto me, though very dangerous to be named, as things ſtood in Heraclea, I bid him retire, and go out of the Temple, and ſtay at the Gate, until I ſent for him by a Slave, which I ſhewed unto him, that he might know him: Then going out of the Temple, I called this Slave unto me, whom I knew to be Witty and Faithful, and ſhewed him that Stranger, appointing him to bring him through the Pallace Garden, by a back-door, and to conduct him into my Chamber by a back-ſtair, which was over againſt it. I would not acquaint the Princeſs with any thing, until I knew exactly what the Man had to ſay unto me; ſo that after I had waited upon her unto her Chamber, I went in all haſte unto my own, where I preſently ſaw him, whom I expected, coming in. I commanded the Slave to ſtay in the outer Chamber, that he might carry him back, whom he brought, after I had conferred with him; and carrying him into my Cloſet, I beſeech you, ſaid I unto him, what have you to ſay unto me concerning Spitridates? Madam, ſaid he unto me, I have orders to conjure you to help me unto the Speech of the Princeſs Ariminta; and to aſſure you for your particular, that you are the Lady whom of all the World he moſt Honours, and whom he ſtands in moſt need of. After I had received this complement from Spitridates, and obſerved by the faſhion of this Stranger, that he was one of a good Wit, and ſome Quality, I deſired him to have a little Patience, whilſt I acquainted the Princeſs, and obtained audience for him: She was ſo ſurprized, that it was long before ſhe could reſolve what to do: But ſince none was with her, I importuned her much, that notwithſtanding her repugnancy to ſee him, ſhe conſented. She ſent me firſt to know, whether he had any Letters; and when he anſwered, that he had, ſhe deſired they might be given unto me, but he would not by any means, ſo that ſhe was forced to go unto him, ſaying, as ſhe paſſed through the Chamber where her Women were, that ſhe muſt go to ſpeak with a Man, who deſired her favour to the King, about ſome important Buſineſs: But afterwards ſhe commanded to bring the Man into her Cloſet, where I remained with her: Madam (ſaid he unto her, after a low Reverence) I beſeech your Pardon, that I did not deliver the Letter unto Heſionida, when ſhe did from you deſire it: For ſince the Prince Spitridates did not know, whether you would do him ſo much Honour, as to return an Anſwer, he expreſly commanded me to be preſent when you read it, if it were poſſible, hoping thereby Madam, to underſtand, at the leaſt, ſome part of your Thoughts. The Princeſs was ſo ſurprized, that ſhe knew not well how to anſwer him; but taking the Letter, Since my Thoughts are always ſuch as they ought to be, replied ſhe, I care not much if my Countenance diſcover them, and therefore without any difficulty I ſhall ſatisfy Spitridates ſo far, as to read his Letter before you: In ſaying ſo, ſhe broke open the Seal, and read theſe Words:

Spitridates unto the Princeſs Ariminta.

I Am ſo Infortunate, that how innocent ſoever I am, I cannot chuſe but fear you ſuſpect me to be fuller of Ambition than Love: and farther, that you have condemned me, before you underſtand me. He who ſhall preſent my Letter unto you, hath Orders to relate the pure Truth; to the end, that knowing it, you may do me no Injuſtice: The Priſon wherein I am ſhall be moſt ſweet, if it will but juſtify me in your Opinion; but moſt intolerable, if you accuſe me, ſince it will not let me tell you my ſelf, that I would quit all the Crowns in the Univerſe for the Glory of one favourable look from you. Do not ſuſpect, I beſeech you, that I have any deſire to conquer them, upon Conditions of loſing you; but on the contrary, believe that I ſhall ever prefer the glorious quality of your Slave, before the being King of all Aſia.

Spitridates.

After the Princeſs had read this Letter, and ſighed whether ſhe would or no, ſhe deſired him who brought it to acquit himſelf of his Commiſſion: ſo that he related all that I have told you; that is to ſay, in what manner Arſamones had ſent for Spitridates; how he ſpoke unto him in his Chamber; how he imbarked, and what he ſaid, when he was in the Ship which waited for him: then he told her, that their Sea-Voyage was very proſperous until they came to Chalcedonia: but in arriving there, the Pilot miſtaking his aim, the Ship was daſhed by the violence of the Waves againſt the point of a Rock, cloſe by the Mouth of the Port: that the Ship ſplit, and Spitridates being at the Poop, fell into the Sea, juſt at the ſame time when another of the Ships of Arſamones was ſpilt a little lower: Moreover he told her, how all the Water-ſide being full of People, there was ſome Merchants of Perſipolis, who were extream compaſſionate at this Accident, and deſired to ſave Spitridates: That there was two, who threw themſelves into the Sea in hopes to aſſiſt him, but both of them were drowned; and that the violence of the Waves had waſted him far off: ſo that none could diſcover where he was: He further related, that when Spitridates firſt fell, he recollected his Spirits, and becauſe he could ſwim very well, he made many Attempts to land, but the Waves daſhed ſo much againſt the Rocks in that Place, as it was impoſſible for him to land, ſo that he was carried by thoſe Billows a long way off, which were ſo high, that thoſe Merchants which did intereſt themſelves in his loſs, did loſe the ſight of him, and thought him Shipwrackt. Yet the Waves being not ſo rough where Spitridates was, with much ado he landed in a Place where an old Fiſher-man was drying his Nets upon the Banks, about four or five Furlongs from Chalcedonia: That ſince he was exceeding weary, he did lie himſelf down upon the Banks to reſt himſelf: That this old Fiſher-man, pitying to ſee a Man ſo lovely and handſom, and well habited, in ſo lamentable a Condition, offered to carry him unto a little Houſe cloſe by. That Spitridates accepted of his offer, and that not knowing any reaſon why, he intreated that charitable Fiſher-man to tell it unto none that he was with him: But Sir, when this Meſſenger from Spitridates related unto the Princeſs the unquiet and reſtleſs Mind of Spitridates in that place, I do confeſs that he made me extreamly pity him: and indeed, it may be eaſily imagined, that ſeeing himſelf now maſter of himſelf, and that he could either return unto Heraclea, or elſe go unto Chalcedonia, that his Soul was in a pittiful and wavering Condition. If I return unto Heraclea (ſaid he) then doubtleſs I ſhall ſatisfy my Love, and my Princeſs, but then I ſhall Diſhonour my ſelf in the Eyes of all Aſia; for then I ſhall fight againſt my own Father, and for him who retains that Kingdom from him which I muſt enjoy; yet if I go unto Chalcedonia, can I ever have a Heart to take up Arms againſt the Father, and Brothers of my Princeſs Ariminta? and ſhall I leave that moſt illuſtrious Lady in an Opinion that I have deceived her? that I have betrayed her? and that I expreſſed Affection unto her only as a Cloak to cover my Deſign of getting into the Throne of Bythinia? Ha, no, no, I can never conſent unto it. But then, ſaid he, what ſhall I do? I know not, anſwered he to himſelf: But I think, Death is the only courſe I can take, to put me into ſuch a Condition as that I ſhall do nothing, either againſt my Honour, or againſt my Love, or againſt mine own Inclination: yet I muſt reſolve upon one way, I muſt either go unto Heraclea, or Chalcedonia: If to the firſt, then I loſe my Honour, but ſatisfy my Love: if to the laſt, then I ſhall ſatisfy my Ambition, but ruin my Self in the Opinion of my Princeſs, which I prefer before all things, even my very Life.

In concluſion, this Meſſenger told us, That after a moſt violent agitation of Mind, Love was the moſt predominate in his Heart; yet deſiring to take a middle way between theſe two Extreams, and conſidering, that as the Seaſon of the Year was, the War could not begin this three Months; he therefore deſigned to diſguize himſelf, and return ſecretly unto Heraclea, without ſeeing either the King, or Princes, but to endeavour by my means to ſee the Princeſs, and to juſtify himſelf unto her: to promiſe her never to fight in Perſon againſt the King, her Father, and to beg leave from her to go and defend his own: That not doubting but the Princeſs would conſent unto his Deſires, and knowing her to be juſt and generous, he reſolved to return afterwards unto Chalcedonia, to the end he might endeavour a Pacification, and ſo to ſatisfy, if it were poſſible, both his Honour, and his Love. That to execute this his Deſign, he got this old Fiſherman to go unto the Town, and with ſome Money which he had about him, to buy ſuch Neceſſaries as might make an handſom Diſguiſe for his intended Voyage; and to enquire whether any Accident happened unto the King: That this Man having bought ſuch things as he had need of, he told him, that the King and Queen of Bithynia, the Prince Euriclides, and the Princeſs there had eſcaped from Shipwrack, but were extreamly grieved, out of Fear, that their eldeſt Son was periſhed: and that all the Sea-ſide was full of Men, whom the King had ſent to ſeek the Prince, living or dead: that they were enquiring News of him, within an hundred paces of that Place; and that he anſwered, He knew of none: afterwards Spitridates fearing to be found out, preſently diſguiſed himſelf, giving unto the Fiſher-man a very rich Jewel which he had about him: and as ſoon as it was Night, he got upon a Horſe, which the Fiſherman furniſhed him withal: ſo after he had commanded that his Clothes ſhould be hid, and ſhewed unto none, at the leaſt not until a long while after his departure, he took his Journey. I had forget to tell you, that he left a little Note with the Fiſherman, with Orders to go within eight days after unto ſome Officer of Arſamones Houſe, and give him that Note; ſaying, that he found it by chance: the words of the Note were theſe:

ASſure the King my Father, that Spitridates is not dead; and ſince he is not capable of doing any thing againſt his Honour, he will return unto him, before he ſhall have any need of his Courage.

After Spitridates was gone, the poor Fiſher-man, conſulting with his Wife concerning their happy Encounter, and ſearching out for a fit place to hide thoſe rich Clothes which Spitridates left; by ill Fortune, twelve or Fifteen of thoſe Men which Arſamones had ſent out to ſearch about the Sea-ſide, being hungry and cold, came into this Houſe, and entred ſo ſuddenly, that thoſe good People were forced to throw the Princes Clothes haſtily under their Nets: one of theſe Men ſaw ſomething ſhine, and moved him to ſo much curioſity as to look what it was: but he no ſooner ſaw thoſe Clothes, by the help of a Candle, but he knew them, for he was a Servant unto Arſamones. Then ſuppoſing that this Fiſher-man had perhaps found him half dead upon the Sea-ſhore, and had kill'd him out-right for his Clothes, they began to threaten him, to confeſs the Truth, and to tell them what he had done with the Corps of Spitridates. This poor honeſt Fiſher-man ſeeing himſelf unjuſtly accuſed, and fear forcing it out, told them the whole Paſſage, ſhewing them the Note which Spitridates had left with him. So that now making no queſtion but that he was alive, and eaſily imagining that he was gone towards Heraclea; they ſent one in all haſte to inform Arſamones of their Adventure, and to carry the Note which Spitridates had left: ſince they conceived that they ſhould do a great piece of Service in bringing his Son back unto him; they made all the haſte they could unto a Bridg, where of neceſſity he muſt paſs: and that which did the more facilitate their Deſign in finding, was, that they forced this Fiſherman to deſcribe the Clothes and Horſe which Spitridates had. When they overtook him, they firſt addreſſed themſelves very reſpectively, but yet ſo, as they reſolved not to let him eſcape; for they compaſſed him about. This Prince, who was but ill mounted, ſaw it was impoſſible for him to avoid being taken, uſed no reſiſtance, but Prayers and Promiſes. Afterwards, ſeeing that way would not work with them, becauſe they expected high Rewards from Arſamones; he began threaten them, and began indeed to force them: yet finding all his Attempts in vain againſt ſo many, he yeilded, and was carried unto Chalcedonia, where Arſamones looked upon him with as many ſignes of an incenſed Father, as a violent Prince could poſſibly expreſs: he told him, That there was no Reaſon he ſhould pretend unto the Crown of Bythinia, becauſe he was unworthy of it. But to ſhew him, that he would keep it without him, he would put him into ſuch a place, as ſhould cool him, ſince he could not extinguiſh that diſhonourable Paſſion which was ſo hot in his Soul, and ſo oppoſite unto his Honour. Spitridates would have excuſed the Matter, but ſince he could not force his Tongue to tell ſo loud a lie unto the King, as that he would not love Ariminta any longer, he impriſoned him in one of the Towers in the Caſtle, not permitting any to viſit him, but the Princeſs Ariſtea, and that was not obtained without much Difficulty, and only twice in a Week; Afterwards this Meſſenger from Spitridates told the Princeſs, that he having the Honour to wait upon the Princeſs Ariſtea, in three or four of her Viſits, and they having a good confidence in him, made choice of him to come hither, and render an acccount unto her of that Princes Life, ſince his departure from Heraclea: aſſuring her, that the Princeſs Ariſtea continued ſo firm in her affection towards her, that nothing can change it. The Princeſs Ariminta did very attentively hearken unto this Relation; and ſince ſhe was fully ſatisfied and reconciled unto the Prince Spitridates, ſhe ſeemed to be moſt ſenſibly moved at thoſe Miſeries which he endured in conſideration of her. I believe ſhe would not have writ back unto him, unleſs I had extreamly preſſed her unto it: and in concluſion, conſented unto my Deſires: writing this Letter in the preſence of him who was to carry it.

The Princeſs ARAMINTA, unto SPITRIDATES.

I Wiſh you could be innocent, and happy both: yet ſince the malignity of my Fate will have it ſo, that you muſt not be juſtified, in my Opinion, without your ſufferings; I do confeſs, with a Bluſh, that I had rather you were unfortunate, and not culpable, than culpable, and not unfortunate: But yet I reſent ſit your Priſon as I ought to do; and I do not know whether my Sorrows can keep within thoſe juſt Limits which Reaſon ſhould preſcribe them. Since I require nothing from you which ſhall be againſt your Honour, do not expect any thing from me contrary to mine. If the Deſtinies have ordained that we muſt be always Unfortunate, yet let us make all the World confeſs that we deſerve to be more happy.

ARIMINTA.

After the Princeſs had ſhewed me that Letter, ſhe ſealed it, and gave it unto him that was to carry it: ſhe writ another alſo unto the Princeſs Ariſtea, and after much Civility unto this faithful Agent of Spitridates, ſhe diſmiſſed him: and the Slave which brought him, conducted him out of the Town where he ſhould lodg: you may imagine what conference the Princeſs and I had upon this Adventure, and how often we read this Letter of Spitridates: His Priſon did not ſtrike only on the Heart of the Princeſs Ariminta, but in the Heart of the Prince Sinneſis alſo: who now did not any longer think him acceſſary to the Deſign of Arſamones, neither did he ſuſpect that the Princeſs Ariſtea had deceived him: ſo that Love re-aſſuming the ſame Seat in his Soul as formerly, he changed his manner of negotiating. He often came to his Siſter, the Princeſs; and ſince it was important unto her, that the Prince Sinneſis, ſhould always love Spitridates, ſhe therefore confirmed him in that Opinion: So that his Paſſion more ſtrongly reviving, he left off exaſperating the Mind of the King his Father, as before he did, but would divers times appeaſe it; yet the King of Pontus eaſily ſuſpecting the Cauſe, was extraordinarily more angry at him. Some certain days after, the King of Pontus had intelligence, that Ciaxares (who as you know, was then only King of Cappadocia, and Galatia) would aſſiſt Arſamones under-hand; ſo that ſeeing the Buſineſs more dangerous than he at firſt foreſaw; he deſired to compoſe the Buſineſs betimes. He then ſent unto Ciaxares to demand Aid, ſeeming as if he were ignorant of his ſiding with Arſamones ſecretly. He who was ſent unto him, negotiated the Matter ſo handſomely, that he took Ciaxares off from declaring openly for Arſamones, but yet not being willing, neither to declare for the King of Pontus, he propoſed to be a Mediator between the two Princes; which did extreamly grieve Arſamones, who was hereby diſabled from ſuſtaining a War: for ſince the Prince of Paphlagonia, and the Prince of the Caduſians, had not treated with him upon ſuch Conditions as the King of Cappadocia ſhould declare, they alſo drew back from the Enterprize. Moreover, the Inhabitants of Chalcedonia, and them of Chriſopolis, had been ſo much impoveriſhed under the Dominion of the Kings of Pontus, that they were not able to ſuſtain the Charges of the War: ſo that Arſamones ſeeing upon what a weak Foundation his Deſign did ſtand, reſolved to entertain ſome Propoſitions of Peace: But ſince he would not truſt unto the Word of an Enemy, becauſe the King his Father before him, had been thereby deceived; he declared to him whom Ciaxares ſent, unleſs the King of Pontus would give Hoſtages, as he himſelf offered, he would not treat. Ciaxares knowing that the King of Pontus had no greater mind to truſt Arſamones, then Arſamones had to truſt him, propoſed, that both Parties ſhould give Hoſtages, which ſhould remain with him, and it was accepted on by both parties: ſo that the King of Pontus ſent the Prince Ariandes unto the Court of Ciaxares, and Arſamones ſent the Prince Euriclides. This Treaty continued ſix entire months: at the end of which a Peace was concluded: and the Sentence was, That Arſamones ſhould not aſſume the Title of King; that he ſhould render up Chalcedonia unto the King of Pontus: That he ſhould enjoy the Town of Chriſopolis, and all the Country about it, holding it as a Vaſſal unto that Prince: and that he ſhould not be obliged either to dwell, or go unto Heraclea, nor ſend the Princes his Children thither. Before this Treaty, the Prince Sinneſis endeavoured all Poſſible ways to move his Father to conclude the Marriage which he deſigned; but he would never hearken unto it, which did ſo extreamly trouble the Prince Sinneſis, and grieved him ſo much, that he was hardly knowable. All this while was Spitridates in Priſon, and that much more cloſe than before; for ſince the return of him, who brought the Princeſs Ariminta's Letter, whom Arſamones ſuſpected, the Princeſs Ariſtea was not allowed to ſee him. Pharnaces, whoſe Patron was not now at Heraclea, did not ſo often ſpeak unto the Princeſs; nor could Artanus with all his Inſolence and Wit, find many Occaſions of conference with her. Pharnaces, though ſeeing that Artanus had more addreſs unto her than he had, was very angry at his Misfortune; though Artanus was no very terrible Rival unto him, yet he did divers times put Affronts upon him: At the firſt this Coward carried it ſo cunningly, as if he wanted no Courage; yet theſe laſt Injuries of Pharnaces, did much againſt his Mind (the Gods do know) conſtrain him to draw his Sword; but he did as much diſhonour himſelf in fighting, as if he had not fought at all; and the Averſion which the Princeſs had towards him, was ſo juſtly grounded, that none wondered ſhe ſhould treat him with ſo much coldneſs. Mean while, the news of the Concluſion of Peace being come into Heraclea, and the Prince Sinneſis knowing that he muſt not marry the Princeſs Ariſtea, was ſo extreamly grieved at it, that he fell into a Fever, which upon the Fourth day was at the height. The King his Father hearing how very ill he was, and not being ignorant of the Cauſe, ſuch an exceſſive Sorrow, mixed with Anger, ſeized upon him, that he died ſuddainly: Seven days after, the Prince Sinneſis quitted his Crown, and his Life, deſiring the Princeſs his Siſter, always to love Spitridates, and protect Ariſtea. You may eaſily imagine in what a deplorable condition Ariminta was, who without all doubt did infinitely honour her Father, and loved her Brother, the Prince Sinneſis, who though he was by Nature ſomewhat Violent, yet was he very amiable: Beſides, he loved her very well, and had a great Affection unto Spitridates; ſo that in loſing him, ſhe loſt a Brother, a Friend, and a Protector of her Lover: She ſtrangely reſented this loſs, and was ſo full of Sorrow, that for three days together ſhe could not eat. Pharnaces did not grieve ſo much, for the Prince Aryandes ever loving him ſo well, and being now King, he hoped that he would more eaſily move Ariminta to be favourable unto him: As for Artanus, ſince he loſt nothing but what Pharnaces found, this ſad Accident made no great alteration in his Mind. I was not in ſuch a Condition as to comfort the Princeſs, for my Mother died at the ſame time, who out of her love to her own Country, and her earneſt Deſire, that the Intentions of the Queen her Miſtreſs ſhould be accompliſhed, commanded me to be abſolutely ſerviceable, as much as I could, unto all the Houſe of Arſamones, and eſpecially unto Spitridates, as that I was more engaged unto it than before; and I could the more eaſily obey her in it, becauſe they appointed no other Governour unto the Princeſs. Mean while, the new King of Pontus, who now raigns, or to ſay better, who muſt never reign, was upon his way in returning unto Heraclea, (where they had rendred all due Honors unto the two dead Princes) and it was in his Journey, that he heard of the death of the King his Father, and of the Prince Sinneſis his Brother: Then did we underſtand, that the Treaty of Peace was performed, that Arſamones was gone out of Chalcedonia, and going to Chriſopolis, and by conſequence Spitridates changed his Priſon. Fifteen or twenty days did thus paſs over, whilſt the Inhabitants of Heraclea prepared all poſſible magnificence to receive their new King: But Orders came from him, which did forbid all Ceremony, having no deſire to mix ſo much Sorrow with the Joy. The Princeſs being extreamly Melancholy, and doing nothing but pray unto the Gods, did lament and mourn in Secret as oft as ſhe could. I moved her one Evening, againſt her Mind, to walk in the Garden of the Pallace, and to take the Air, for I perceived ſo great an alteration in her Complexion, as I feared ſhe would fall Sick: When we were in the Garden, ſhe made Choice of a dark and narrow Walk, which being railed in on both ſides, amongſt many great Trees which covered it, and made it the moſt Melancholy, and therefore the moſt agreeable ble Walk in the World; for there was two Fountains at the two ends, and one in the midſt, which murmured ſo much, as did incite a Soul unto muſing: The Princeſs making choice of this gloomy Place to walk in, would have no company with her but me, of whom ſhe had no ſuch fears as young Perſons commonly uſe to have of thoſe which overſee their Actions, for my Yeers were not ſo many above hers, as to cauſe any averſion in her towards me; and I gave advice always, rather with reſpect and ſubmiſſion, than with any domineering pride, ſo that we lived together in much Sincerity, and much obliging Confidence. After we had repeated many Misfortunes, and beſtowed many a Tear upon the memory of Sinneſis, ſhe aſſumed ſome thought upon the unfortunate Spitridates. Is not that Prince unfortunate, ſaid ſhe unto me, to loſe a Kingdom in loſing that Perſon, for whoſe ſake he was reſolved to have loſt it? Certainly the King my Brother, though that Arſamones ſhould permit him, yet would never conſent unto his good Fortune, as well becauſe he loves him not, as becauſe he loves Pharnaces; ſo that I ſee my ſelf expoſed unto a very great Perſecution: Yet, ſaid ſhe, did but Spitridates know the Juſtice that I render unto his Merit, and how exactly I obey the Prince Sinneſis my Brother, I ſhould have ſome Conſolation, in that it would be a Conſolation unto him: But, alas, it is not the pleaſure of my Fate I ſhould have ſo much Happineſs, and I have nothing to do, but to prepare my ſelf for all imaginable Miſery. Madam, ſaid I unto her, never exceſſively grieve at Misfortunes which are to come, becauſe perhaps they may never come; and can you be obliged to follow the will of the King your Brother, rather then the Will of the late King your Father? If I were only his Siſter, replied ſhe, I believe I ſhould not; but ſince I am his Subject, as well as Siſter, I think I am obliged to obey him, as I was the late King my Father. After much ſuch like Diſcourſe as this, obſerving that Night drew on, (for it being the Spring time, the Days were not very long) I perſwaded her to retire; yet ſince the Moon ſhined, ſhe followed not my Counſel, but would ſit down at one end of the Walk, near the Fountain: within a Quarter of an hour after, I ſaw a Man coming towards us, whom I ſuppoſed to be ſome of the Princeſſes Servants coming to tell her ſomething, but I was much ſurprized, when this Man, whom I could not know in that dark Place, came nearer us. Madam (ſaid he unto the Princeſs, bowing unto her, with much reverence) will you be pleaſed to ſuffer the unfortunate Spitridates to come and mingle his Tears with yours, and help to lament your Misfortunes, by grieving for his own? You may imagine, Sir, how much the Princeſs and I were ſurprized, when we heard a Voice which we could not but know, it was ſo great, that the Princeſs cried out ſo loud, that ſome of her Women came into the Walk, thinking ſhe had called; but I ſtepping readily towards them, ſaid, that ſhe did not call them, and that this was a Man who had a ſuit unto the new King, and came to beg the Favour of the Princeſs unto him. After this, coming near the Princeſs, I heard Spitridates, (ſince ſhe anſwered him with nothing but Tears) continue ſpeaking unto her. I am even deſperate, Madam, ſaid he unto her, that I ſhould renew your Sorrows, and to find that my preſence, in lieu of pleaſing you, ſhould grieve you. I deſire your Pardon, ſaid ſhe unto him, for receiving you ſo very ill: But Spitridates, my weakneſs has ſo juſt cauſe for it, that you may excuſe me: The Prince Sinneſis my Brother did ſo tendetly love you, that I cannot look upon you without a revival of my Sorrows, and ſo many ſeveral things come into my mind at once, that it is not ſtrange if my Reaſon be a little diſordered; for truly, the remembrance of what is paſt, the Fear of what's to come, and ſurpriz'd to ſee one ſo near me, whom I thought in Priſon, are lawful Cauſes of this Diſorder in my Soul. I was in hope, Madam (ſaid Spitridates) that this laſt mentioned Cauſe would rather have rejoiced than grieved you. So it does, anſwered ſhe, but not ſo much as it would, if the Prince my Brother were yet living: Yet tell me, I conjure you, how the choler of Arſamones is appeaſed? It is not appeaſed at all Madam, replied he, and doubtleſs I have more increaſed it by this my flight from him, which now I have made. Was it not by his conſent, ſaid ſhe unto him, that you are come out of Priſon? No, replied he, the Princeſs Ariſtea is ſhe unto whom I am obliged for my Liberty; for after I was brought from Chalcedonia into Chriſopolis, ſhe obſerved that the Place they put me in was not inacceſſable, as that was before; ſo that as ſoon as I was brought thither, and before my Father diſcovered the weakneſs of the Place, ſhe corrupted three of my Guards, who out of a Window, which was not barred with Iron, they helped me to eſcape, and carried me diſguiſed into a Houſe of the Town, where I remained three Days: Afterwards, when we heard the News of the King your Father's Death, which as you know preceeded the Death of the Prince Sinneſis, my Siſter adviſed me to come unto that Prince, whom ſhe then ſuppoſed to be King, and out of her Goodneſs to me, ſhe gave me a great part of her Jewels for the Accommodation of my Journey: In my way hither, I heard of yours, and my ſecond loſs; but though I did conceive it was not ſafe for me to come hither, ſince the Prince Aryandes was to be King; yet I could not deprive my ſelf of ſo much happineſs, as to come and throw my ſelf at your feet, Madam, and to ask you what ſhould be the Fate of my Life. Would to the Gods (replied the Princeſs, and ſighed) that it were in my Power to make you happy; but yet Spitridates, Fortune is more powerful than I am, and I am afraid ſhe will not conſent unto it. So that you will conſent, replied he, I cannot think ſhe is able to hinder my Happineſs. I wiſh that all you ſay were true, replied ſhe, but my Reaſon does not ſhew me how it can be: However, Spitridates, though I cannot deny but that I receive my Conſolation to lament it with you, yet I cannot chuſe but tremble to ſee you at Heraclea, for the King my Brother is to arrive here within theſe few days, and if he come to know that you are here diſguiſed, what will he think of it?

Alas Madam, ſaid he, do you think to drive me from you, by telling me the King will come ſo ſoon, and that perhaps he may know I am here? Ah Madam, torment me not ſo cruelly, I have a very ſecure Lodging; and ſince I have nothing to do at Heraclea, but to ſee you, I ſhall not eaſily be diſcovered: Yet however, anſwered ſhe, I may hazard both my Reputation, and your Life, by permitting Interviews, which how innocent ſoever they be, may be interpreted Criminal. It is not late, replied ſhe, and therefore it will not be thought ſtrange, that a ſad melancholy Mourner ſhould walk ſo long; therefore Spitridates (ſaid ſhe, in riſing up) we muſt leave you: However, Madam, anſwered this Prince, I beſeech you do me the Honour to promiſe me another opportunity of ſpeaking with you. I cannot conſent unto your deſire, replied ſhe, but Heſionida ſhall ſee you in any place. That indeed Madam, is a great favour, anſwered he; yet truly it cannot ſatisfy the Paſſion which my Soul has to you; and to diſcourſe with you in freedom, does ſo much import the welfare of my Life, that I do declare, Madam, I will never go out of Heraclea, if you do not grant my reſpective Paſſion that favour which I ask: I do not beg it Madam for any Merits of my own, but in the name of the Prince Sinneſis, who has ſo often pleaded in my Favour. This Conjuration is very prevalent, replied ſhe, yet all that I can promiſe you is, to uſe my beſt endeavour that I may ſee you once again. I ſhall be every Day about this Hour in this Walk, replied he, where I may ſafely receive your Orders, for the Gardner is moſt abſolutely my faithful Friend, having a long time ſerved the Prince my Father, and it was he who came to advertiſe me of your being here. I cannot conſent that you expoſe your ſelf every Day to the view, anſwered ſhe, but tell Heſionida where you lodge, and ſhe ſhall advertiſe you of my Will. After this, the Princeſs left him, and Spitridates having told me where he lodged, it happened to be with one of my acquaintance, and whom I durſt truſt with any thing: Since the time that the Princeſs returned to her lodging, ſhe appeared more ſtudious and melancholy, than before ſhe had ſeen Spitridates; and indeed ſhe grieved extreamly, when ſhe conſidered that this Prince would extreamly incenſe the King of Pontus, as he had already Arſamones by his eſcape; ſo that to avoid this Misfortune, ſhe ſaw a neceſſity of moving Spitridates to depart preſently, though ſhe knew not in what Quarter of the World he could find a Sanctuary, yet the Miſery had no other Remedy; for ſhe knew well enough the King of Pontus did not love Spitridates, but affecting Pharnaces, as he did, he would ſolicite her to marry him: She knew alſo, that this Prince did never approve of the late King his Fathers Policy, in deſiring this double alliance with Arſamones; but on the contrary, he would often ſay, that the beſt way to eſtabliſh the Kingdom of Bithynia, was to ruin all the Pretenders unto it, and not to exalt and magnify them; ſo that on every ſide, ſhe could find nothing but Misfortune unto Spitridates. It was in vain to tell her, that the Gods when they pleaſed could change the Hearts of Kings; for what confidence ſoever ſhe had in them, ſhe could not hope for that in which ſhe ſaw ſo little appearance. The next Morning news came, that the King would not have the Day on which he intended to come to the Town preciſely known, but that at the longeſt, it would not be above four or five Days: The Princeſs ſeeing then ſo ſhort a time to reſolve, and that to defer the ſeeing of Spitridates until he was come to Town would be extreamly dangerous, ſhe appointed me to ſpeak unto him, and if I could, to perſwade him unto a departure without her ſeeing him, but that was not poſſile to be done: But to tell you the truth, I did not very obſtinately oppoſe his Deſign, becauſe I did believe it would be in vain, and becauſe I conceived this Prince had reaſon for his deſire; perhaps alſo the love I bore my Country did induce me; but whatſoever it was, I told the Princeſs what Spitridates told me, which was, that abſolutely he would either ſee her again, or die. The Princeſs perceiving his obſtinacy, and ſeeing that the longer ſhe ſtayed, the more danger there was, both unto Spitridates, and her ſelf, reſolved to permit a Conference: We were long in conſulting, whether it ſhould be in the Garden or in her Chamber; at laſt, the reſult was, it ſhould be in the Garden, becauſe ſince the Kings Death, ſo much reſpect was rendred unto the Princeſs, as that none took ſo much liberty in that Place, as before they uſed: Alſo becauſe, if by any Misfortune the Buſineſs ſhould come to be diſcovered, it might there be taken rather for a ſurprize upon the Princeſs, then for an enterview: which ſhe premeditately conſented to, as it might, if he ſhould come into her Chamber. I advertiſed this unfortunate Prince then, to be in the Garden that Evening, and in the ſame Walk, in which before he met the Princeſs, who was in twenty Minds to go back with her word; one who ſaw her, would have ſaid, ſhe was going to commit ſome Crime which ſhe abhorred; and if I had not even violently forced her, I think ſhe had not gone: But thither ſhe went, without any with her but her Women, who according to their cuſtom, followed her no further than that ſolitary Walk, unleſs ſhe called them, ſo that I was there alone with her: Since we went thither betimes, becauſe the walk ſhould not ſeem extraordinary, Spitridates was not yet come, for he was to ſtay until it was Night, not but that he was well enough diſguiſed, and his Lodging ſo near the Garden Door, that he might come thither without Danger: yet I did ſo ſtrictly charge him to make it late before he came, that he did obey me, and made it dark; and ſince the Moon did ſhine, it was not ſtrange that the Princeſs ſhould walk ſo late, eſpecially ſince ſhe uſed to do ſo before. I cannot relate the thankful Acknowledgments which Spitridates rendred unto her for this favour; all his Words were ſo full of Paſſion and Reſpect, that all my Expreſſions are too weak to manifeſt unto you the joy this Prince reſented. The Princeſs for a quarter of an Hour together did lend him a willing Ear without returning any anſwer; but afterwards ſhe fetched a profound ſigh, and ſaid unto him, Spitridates indeed has ſome reaſon to invite me to this Conference, but he has much more reaſon to lament and complain againſt Fortune for engaging his Affection unto one, who can make him nothing but unfortunate. Fortune, Madam, replied he, has no ſhare in that Affection which I bear unto you: It is only your own Beauty, your Vertue, my own Inclination and Reaſon which prompts me unto it; and I am fully perſwaded, that if it be but your pleaſure to doom it ſo, all the malignity of fooliſh Fortune, who often perſecutes the innocent, and protects the vicious, cannot render me unhappy. Yes, yes, Divine Princeſs, if the unhappy Spitridates can but find any place in your Heart, and that your Goodneſs will always reſerve it for him, he defies any Misfortune that can come; all the Diſgraces of his Family ſhall vaniſh out of his Memory; his own particular diſhonours ſhall not trouble him; the pleaſing Thoughts only of being in the fair Ariminta's Heart, ſhall charm all his Sorrows, and root them out of his Mind. I underſtand, Madam, ſince I came hither, that the Prince Sinneſis upon his Death-bed, and before many People, did mediate in my behalf, and deſire you to look favourably upon me. This is it, Madam, which makes me thus bold, and moves me to deſire you, not to deny this Favour unto that Prince, who never denied you any thing: Therefore, I beſeech you, Madam, let not the King who now is, and who loves not me, hinder me from loving you, or you me. But yet I am his Siſter, and Subject, replied the Princeſs, interrupting him. You are alſo both Siſter and Subject unto the Prince Sinneſis, though he be dead, replied he, and the King who now raigns, having his Crown immediately from him, ought not in juſtice to obſtruct the performance of his laſt Will; ſince indeed he was his King, as he is now yours. Ah, Spitridates, cried ſhe, the Will and Commands of a dead King, are never ſo well obeyed as the Commandments of a living King; a Raign of ſeven Days, and in all that time Death raigning over him, will by the Succeſſor be eſteemed as nothing. Yet if it be eſteemed by you, anſwered Spitridates, it is enough. Yes, replied ſhe, and ſighed, you may be confident, that the laſt Words of the Prince Sinneſis, confirming in my Heart thoſe Thoughts which your Vertue had inſpired me withal, I ſhall as long as I live be the ſame I am at preſent: But alas, Spitridates, it will not make you any thing more happy, but my ſelf much more infortunate; for indeed, I do foreſee, that perhaps this will be the laſt time that ever I ſhall ſpeak unto you. The laſt time, Madam? ſaid he, and interrupted her; then muſt this be the laſt of my Life; and I beſeech you, Madam, unleſs you deſire I ſhould immediately die, do not deprive me of ſome better Hopes. I pray you, hope then if you can, ſaid ſhe unto him, and enjoy that comfort which I cannot find for my ſelf. Doubtleſs the reaſon is, ſaid this ſad Prince, becauſe you will not try all ways to make we happy. Perhaps, replied ſhe, I ſhall not try all ways, but I will promiſe you to do all I ought, though perhaps not all I can, to procure your Satisfaction; but as the caſe ſtands, which way ſhould I contribute unto it? I dare not tell you, Madam, anſwered Spitridates, that ſince you do not apprehend it your ſelf, it is a great ſign you have not any mind to do any thing for me. I would do any thing, replied ſhe, which is not againſt the rules of Vertue and Prudence. Can you not then aſſure me, ſaid he, that all the Power of the King ſhall not move you to marry Pharnaces? And if it be not too much to ask, Cannot you permit me ſome Hopes that if any advantagious alteration in my Fortune chance to fall out, it ſhall inſeparably reflect upon you? I am very ſenſible, Madam, that ſince I am without either Crown, or Kingdom, it is too much raſhneſs to ſpeak thus. Yet, ſince the reaſon of my unhappy Condition, is only becauſe I am not upon the Bithynian Throne, which the King your Brother unjuſtly detains from me, I conceive that the Princeſs Ariminta ought not to deſpiſe me. It is very true, ſaid ſhe unto him, and I ſhall much more eſteem you becauſe you merit Crowns, than I ſhall do them that wear them without deſert. But for all that, Spitridates, although I ſhould promiſe you not to marry Pharnaces, as perhaps without any Crime I may, yet I fear that you would not be nearer any happineſs; for you may very well imagine that I ſhall never marry you, againſt the King's Mind; ſince it is a decency which all of my Quality ought to obſerve. But ſuppoſe I ſhould marry you, what ſhould we do afterwards ? you are out of all favour with the Prince Arſamones for the love of me : Here is no ſafety for you by ſtaying in this Court : Neighbour-Princes will not entertain you who are Son to an unfortunate and weak Prince, leſt it ſhould incenſe a young King to declare War againſt them ; therefore, Spitridates, though you ſhould not hearken to all rules of Reaſon and Prudence, yet, me-thinks, your Affection unto me, ſhould diſſwade you from any ſuch Deſign, ſince queſtionleſs you will never carry a Princeſs diſguiſed and wandering throughout all Aſia : No Spitridates, no, I know you would not, I am ſure you love Ariminta in a more noble and uninterreſted way ; yet do not think, that my unwillingneſs to follow your Fortunes, how harſh ſoever, is any obſtacle at all : I do proteſt, that it does not at all affright me, but it is my ſhame, that I ſhould have any ſuch Reſolution, which moſt deters me ; Love, Spitridates, is a moſt innocent Paſſion, I confeſs, provided that all the Effects be innocent alſo ; and never deviate from the rules of Reaſon ; and therefore to juſtify my indulgence towards you, I muſt not do any thing which is unreaſonable. Tell me then, Madam, I beſeech you, what you would have me do, profeſſing, that ſince you do not forbid me to love you, nor to diſpair of Love from you, I ſhall moſt exactly obey you. Alas, I am not able to adviſe you, replied ſhe ; yet the beſt courſe which I can think upon, is to travel as a Stranger in ſome unknown Country, until ſuch time as the Princeſs Arbiana, and the Princeſs Ariſtea, have made your Peace with Arſamones. This Advice you give me, Madam, anſwered Spitridates, is a good expedient to bring me into the Subjection of the King your Brother, as the Prince my Father is already ; but I cannot conceive it a good courſe to procure me the enjoyment of the Princeſs Ariminta, ſince Arſamones poſſeſſing only an unfortunate ſhare of the whole Kingdom of Bithynia, which is his due, the King of Pontus will never conſent unto any Alliance with poor Arſamones, more than Arſamones would with him : And therefore Madam, ſince the

Affection which you are pleaſed to honour me withal, will not go a little higher than the limits of ordinary Prudence, I muſt reſolve upon my Death. I ſee the Prayers of the dying King your Brother are not prevalent, ſince they cannot obtain that favour from that Princeſs, who is the ſweeteſt in the World to them that do not adore her, but the moſt rigorous unto him, who of all Men upon Earth does moſt reverence her. But Spitridates (ſaid ſhe) whom do you complain of? Of you, Madam, replied he, who would perſwade me that you love me, and yet deny me any Remedy for a Love-ſick Soul; but if you did indeed love me, you would make me an abſolute Promiſe never to marry Pharnaces; and that if the Gods would permit——As Spitridates was going on with his Diſcourſe, Artanus came to tell the Princeſs, that the King was coming to her Chamber: By good luck I heard his Voice beyond the Rail of the Walk, ſo that we cauſed Spitridates to retreat in all haſte; yet for all that Artanus did ſee one with us when he came firſt into the Walk; but as ſoon as he had told the Princeſs, ſhe gave her Hand unto him, to the end ſhe might draw him out of the Garden. We were no ſooner come unto her Chamber, but the King came alſo, and Artanus having a handſom pretence to leave her, went in all haſte unto the Garden again, to ſee what that Man who he ſaw before was. As ill luck was, Spitridates was not yet gone out, for he found the Door next his lodging ſhut. Artanus ſpying him, did then follow him, and finding him one that ſhunned him, did conclude him to be the ſame who was with the Princeſs: he then imagined that perhaps it might be Pharnaces; but Spitridates being forced to leave the cloſe Walk, though he was diſguiſed, yet by the light of the Moon he knew him by his geſture and walk, or at the leaſt ſuſpected him to be Spitridates, and ſo much the rather, becauſe he heard that day by ſome Bithynians which were come unto Heraclea, that this Prince was eſcaped out of that Priſon where Arſamones kept him; ſo that his Suſpition filled his Heart fuller of Curioſity: He followed him out of the Garden into the Streets, and to the Houſe where he lodged: This confirmed him in his Opinion, for he knew thoſe who dwelt there were Friends unto Spitridates. I leave you to imagine how this paſſage grieved Artanus, yet upon ſecond Thoughts he reſented it not ſo ſadly, but reſolved by it to oblige the King, and ruin his Rival, by affirming, That aſſuredly Spitridates had ſome Conſpiracy againſt the State in Agitation, but he would not reflect upon the Princeſs, becauſe he imagined it would too much incenſe her, nor would the State reliſh it: He was much vexed that Pharnaces did not ſhare in his Sorrows, to ſee Spitridates in ſuch favour with the Princeſs, as that for the love of her ſhe permitted him to be diſguiſed in Heraclea; but he reſolved to reflect the Buſineſs wholly upon him, and went unto the King immediately, beſeeching the Honour of ſome privacy with him, concerning ſome very important Buſineſs. The King then went out of the Princeſs's Chamber into his own, where Artanus told all the Story: The King no ſooner heard that Spitridates was in Heraclea diſguiſed, but he apprehended ſome Conſpiracy plotting againſt him; ſo that without loſs of any longer time, he ſecretly commanded the Captain of his Guard, to go unto the Houſe which Artanus ſaw Spitridates enter, and to ſecure his Perſon; the King was obeyed; Spitridates not able to defend himſelf, is taken by the Guards, and impriſoned in a Tower, where Delinquents of high Quality uſed to be ſecured. You may imagine how exteamly was the Princeſs ſurprized, to hear within an Hour after that Spitridates was arreſted; at the firſt ſhe apprehended, that the King would think he was diſguiſed for her; yet hearing nothing but Conſpiracies againſt the State talked on, though ſhe thought her ſelf ſafe enough in Relation to her Reputation, yet ſhe feared the life of Spitridates was not ſo ſafe; you may imagine then how ſadly ſhe ſighed away that Night. But to diſguiſe the matter, I told all her Women that the Princeſs was not well, and therefore would go to Bed, and I would ſtay with her to comfort her; but yet it was more than I could do, for ſhe did look upon the Matter ſo full of danger unto Spitridates, that it troubld her extreamly, and him no leſs than her: Since they ſaid nothing when they took him, he knew not whether this Enterview was diſcovered, or whether he was taken only, as being found diſguiſed in Heraclea; but yet the next Morning his doubts were all cleared, for the King ſent to examine him, what he came thither for? what his Buſineſs was? and who were his Confederates in his Conſpiracy? Spitridates not hearing them ſpeak one Word concerning the Princeſs, was exceedingly joyed, and anſwered, That after he eſcaped out of the Prince his Father's Priſon, and hearing in Chriſopolis, that the Prince Sinneſis was King, he came unto Heraclea, in hopes to find a Sanctury under the ſhelter of his Favour; that when he came thither, and heard his Raign laſted but ſeven Days, he was much ſurprized, and ſo grieved at it, that he had not ſo much freedom of Spirit, as at the firſt to reſolve what courſe he ſhould take; that in Concluſion, he reſolved to addreſs himſelf unto the King which now raigned, and to deſire of him the ſame Protection which he hoped for from the late King his Brother, but that he had not time to execute his Deſign, becauſe he was taken within an Hour after his firſt arrival. Thoſe who examined him, ſaid, That there was no neceſſity of diſguiſing himſelf, in coming to demand Protection from the Prince Sinneſis, who loved him. Unto which he anſwered, That he diſguiſed himſelf only to get into Heraclea, out of Bithynia, and to make his Voyage more ſecure, than if he had travelled with a Train, Equipage and Habit ſuitable to his Quality. Although theſe his Anſwers were very reaſonable, yet did they not ſatisfy the King, but he ſtill believed, that there was ſome hid Deſign in it: And though he was not ignorant of Spitridates his Affection unto the Princeſs Ariminta, yet he knew her Vertue ſo well, that ſhe would never have any conſent in this Diſguiſement, but he believed, that Ambition was the only end of this adventure. Pharnaces and Artanus did much confirm him in that belief: The firſt of theſe believing Ambition to be his Deſign, becauſe he wiſhed it; and the other ſeeming to believe it, that he might the ſooner ruin Spitridates: Yet ſince he deſired that jealouſy might torment Pharnaces as well as himſelf, he acquainted him, that Love was the greateſt cauſe of this Prince's diſguiſement: He imagined alſo, that he might perhaps by this way ruin Pharnaces in the opinion of the Princeſs Ariminta, conceiving that Pharnaces to ruin his Rival, would infuſe this new Suſpition into the King, which when the Princeſs ſhould know, ſhe would be extreamly incenſed againſt him; and indeed at the firſt, the Deſign did take as Artanus did deſire it; for Pharnaces was much more troubled, to hear that Spitridates had ſeen the Princeſs, than he was to think he had Deſigns againſt the State: Jealouſy, as generous as he was, did rouz up his Heart to inſult over an unfortunate Man, and moved him to tell it unto the King in all aggravating Circumſtances: When the Princeſs heard of it, ſhe was infinitely angry with him; ſo that Artanus found out a way thereby to ruin both his Rivals at once, and make them as unfortunate as himſelf; for his own ſhare, he deſerved it, ſo did not the reſt, eſpecially Spitridates, who was far from deſerving ſuch diſaſterous Deſtinies: But yet there is all ſpying Inquiſitions uſed, to find out whether this Prince had held intelligence with any; thoſe with whom he lodged, are all arreſted, and examined, but do what they could, nothing was to be gotten out of them, or any elſe, which did either juſtify or condemn him; that which much contributed unto his Misfortune was, That the King of Pontus was ſo melancholy and ſad, as none could hardly know him, ſo much had it altered him; at firſt, every one did think the Death of his Father and Brother was the cauſe; but preſently after it was known, that his love unto the Princeſs Mandana was the real cauſe of his Diſtemper; for whilſt he was as a hoſtage with Ciaxares, (as you already know) he became more deſperately in love with her, than ever any, ſo that his Soul being deeply perplexed with the abſence of her he loved, it was more apt to be incenſed againſt, and leſs able to know the innocency of Spitridates; yet being without all doubt a very gallant Man, he behaved himſelf very well towards the Princeſs his Siſter; and though Pharnaces had told him of the Meeting betwixt Spitridates and her, yet did he not ſpeak any thing ſharply unto her; but on the contrary, coming one Day to viſit her, after he had firſt, without any Choller, ſaid as much unto her as any wiſe and diſcreet Prince could do upon the like occaſion, to diſcover her Thoughts; he afterwards told her, that he had perhaps incurred her diſpleaſure in cauſing Spitridates to be arreſted, ſince he underſtood ſhe had a great eſteem of him, both by the Command of the late King his Father, and alſo the late King his Brother: yet he was neceſſarily forced unto it by Reaſons of State for the good of his People. Moreover, he told her that he did not at all ſuſpect her as any Confederate with Spitridates in his Conſpiracy, who queſtionleſs would deceive her, and make her believe that his Love to her was only the cauſe of his diſguiſe, though indeed it was his Ambition. Sir, ſaid ſhe unto him, if the Affection which Spitridates expreſſeth unto me, had not the Authority of the late King my Father, and of the Prince Sinneſis my Brother, I ſhould not ſpeak unto you as I do intend. But ſince it has them both for his patronage; I beſeech you Sir, to believe that this Prince had never any Deſign to get a Crown by depriving you of it; for had he been that way diſpoſed, he had not been ſo long a Priſoner unto his Father. And without any ſcruple, I do ingenuouſly confeſs that I have ſeen him, and that it was by my invitation he came to Heraclea. Moreover, I am moſt certain, that he came hither without any Intentions of conſpiring either againſt your Perſon, or State. If I ſhould have the leaſt Suſpicion of any ſuch thing, in lieu of defending, I ſhould accuſe him, and move you to puniſh him. Siſter, ſaid the King, I do not ſo much endeavour the Juſtification of Spitridates, as I do the Preſervation of your Honour. And ſince I know you generous and full of Reaſon, I cannot believe you will love Spitridates more then the Honour of that Family from which you are deſcended; therefore you muſt not think it ſtrange, if this Prince being criminal, be not treated with ſo much indulgence as perhaps another Prince might be; for indeed, he is of that Family which muſt be kept under ; therefore Siſter, the leaſt I can do is to keep Spitridates in Priſon perpetually : Did I conceive him innocent, all the Policy in the World ſhould never induce me to this Rigour : but ſince he ſeems to be culpable, I muſt ſecure him : yet to make you Satisfaction for the loſs of this Prince, who doubtleſs was Owner of excellent Parts, I conjure you to marry Pharnaces. O Sir, ſaid ſhe unto him, I beſeech you ſpeak not unto me of any Marriage, ſo ſoon after the Funerals of the King my Father ; nor force me to diſobey thoſe Commands which the late King my Brother, when he was dying, did impoſe upon me. What Commands did he impoſe ? (replied he.) He commanded me, (ſaid ſhe, and bluſht) to be conſtant unto that Opinion, which he by his Will when he dyed appointed me to have of Spitridates. When he ſaid ſo, replied the King, he did not foreſee that Spitridates would be a Delinquent to the State. Oh Sir, ſaid ſhe, Spitridates is moſt innocent, and by your ſlighting of the laſt Will of the Prince Sinneſis, do not conſtrain me to diſobey you alſo in your commands of marrying Pharnaces ? though he be a Man of much worth, yet one whom I never loved, but eſteemed very much ; and therefore ſhall never behave my ſelf but with indifferency towards him. The Princeſs thought that the King would have returned a ſharp reply, unto ſuch an ingenuous Declaration : But the Paſſion which was in his own Soul, doubtleſs teaching him how to excuſe in another that weakneſs which he found in himſelf, he left her without one angry Word ; yet deſiring her ſtill to marry Pharnaces, and telling her, that ſhe ſhould change her opinion with the Times. The Love of Mandana taking up the whole Soul of this Prince, made him never think upon Spitridates ; his Thoughts for ſome certain Days were wholly imployed in ſending unto Ciaxares, to demand the Princeſs Mandana in Marriage, and giving all neceſſary Orders for the magnificence of the Embaſſador. In the mean while, the Princeſs foreſeeing that Spitridates would never get out of Priſon, unleſs either by Force or Policy, ſhe reſolved to ſet him free ; and ſhe was the ſooner induced to it, becauſe he who commanded that Tower where Spitridates was impriſoned, was one who was much obliged unto me; for during the late King's Raign, I ſaved the Life of one of his Children, who was ſentenced to die for ſome grand Crime, and I obtained his Pardon: Then was I imployed to negotiate in this important Buſineſs, which in fifteen Days I tranſacted ſo happily, that I moved this Man, by the Memory of my paſt Benefit, preſent Gratuity, and future Hopes, to contrive a way how Spitridates might eſcape, and he not ſuſpected. This Tower did ſtand in the very Sea, in the top of which there was a Walk; this Man in the Name of the Priſoner asked leave for him to walk there one Hour or two every Day; ſo that bribing two of the Guards which accompanied him, he tied unto the top of this Tarraſs, a Ladder of Ropes, as if Spitridates had eſcaped that way, and none perceiving him: this Captain of the Tower did ſhut this Prince and the two ſuborned Guards in a very private place of the Caſtle; counterfeiting after this,to be much troubled: he asked where Spitridates was? and was anſwered, that he was in the Tarraſs: Thither he went with many Souldiers, and not finding him, he found the Ladder which he himſelf had placed there; he ſhewed it unto them which followed him, he chafed, and ſaid, that certainly their Companions had betrayed him, and that doubtleſs he was gone in a little Boat, ſince a great Ship could not approach; he began to fume and fret, and threaten all them that were preſent, and to accuſe them as well as thoſe who were eſcaped; and being in all appearance tranſported with Fury, he went to acquaint the King, he told them, that Spitridates might certainly be overtaken, if he were immediately ſent after, and that he conceived he could not yet get into Heraclea, and therefore if they ſent out many Shallops they would infallibly meet with this Priſoner, and all his Complices; to be ſhort, he carried it ſo handſomly, that the King himſelf was deluded; and appointed not only many Barks to be ſent out to Sea, but alſo that there ſhould be ſtrict Guards kept at the Gates of the Town, leſt Spitridates ſhould get in diſguized, not conceiving that he durſt put to open Sea in a ſmall Boat; and upon ſearch there was not any conſiderable Ship wanting in the Port. Moreover, Pharnaces and Artanus knowing that his Paſſion to the Princeſs was the cauſe of all this, perſwaded the King, that certainly he would get into Heraclea in the Habit of a Fiſherman, or ſome ſuch diſguiſe, and therefore what pains did not they take to apprehend him? they doubled the Guards at the Gates; they ſet Sentinels in the Streets; they ſearched all ſuſpected Houſes; and omitted nothing that might make their wiſht-for Diſcovery. The King had ſome light Suſpicions, that the Princeſs had ſome hand in this eſcape, and told her as much. But ſince he had no proofs, and was ignorant of any Obligations between me, and the Captain of that Tower, for it was by the Prince Sinneſis, that I had obtained Pardon for his Son, all theſe Surmiſes and Suſpicions did quickly vaniſh. All this while, Spitridates was in the Priſon where they never ſearched, and where he muſt remain a while before he durſt attempt a coming out. When Spitridates was informed by this Captain, that it was by my Negotiation he was in Priſon, but not a Priſoner; he ſuppoſed that the Princeſs did alſo know of it; ſo that he deſired ſo much favour as to ſee me before he departed, which, without acquainting the Princeſs, I conſented unto it, conceiving my ſelf obliged to do ſo much for the Son of the right King of Bithynia: but after I had given him ſome hopes of his Deſire, the difficulty was how to execute it; yet ſince the Captain of the Towers Wife was of the intelligence, I reſolved to go thither with one Woman only, and to enter by a little back Door, which was towards the Walls of the Town. It is impoſſible, Sir, for me to relate all the Teſtimonies of grateful Acknowledgments, which Spitridates did give unto Araminta, and me. But Heſionida, ſaid he unto me, have you not ſet me at liberty, with Intentions to exile me for ever? Is it not only an exchange of this puniſhment for one more cruel? Sir, replied I unto him, it is Fortune, not the Princeſs, which baniſheth you; but ſince Fortune is a very unconſtant Lady, there is ſome Hopes that ſince ſhe has changed ſo often unto your Diſadvantage, vantage, ſhe will at length change in your Favour. I wiſh ſhe may, replied he, although I cannot hope it: However, Heſionida, it would be the height of Cruelty for me to depart, and not bid adieu unto my Princeſs, or know her laſt Will and Pleaſure. I can eaſily acquaint you with her Intentions, ſaid I unto him, ſince ſhe has done me the Honour to truſt me with her moſt ſecret Thoughts; but as for ſeeing her, it is not permitted ſo much as to think upon it. Leave it unto the Gods, Sir, who perhaps will be more propitious unto you during your Exile, than you imagine: But Heſionida, ſaid he unto me, and ſighed, may a miſerable and abſent Prince ever hope that the Divine Ariminta will ever preſerve her Affection entirely to him? Yes, Sir, replied I, you may, and without any fear of being deceived: For ſince your Unhappineſs is but an Effect of your Love to her, ſhe would be very unjuſt, if ſhe ſhould not always reſent your Misfortunes: Go therefore, Sir, and ſeek out ſome Sanctuary, until ſome change be found in the Hearts of the two Kings of Pontus, and of Bithynia. The Princeſs does very well know, that if you had any Thoughts of remounting the Throne, you might have done it: and ſhe conceives her ſelf moſt ſenſibly obliged unto you for preferring her before a Crown; ſo that it is impoſſible ſhe ſhould ever forget it.

In Concluſion, Sir, I made him reſolve upon his departure: and ſince he had many Jewels which the Princeſs Ariſtea gave him at his departure from Chriſopolis, he would not receive any of thoſe which I offered him from the Princeſs; for I knew her Intentions was to furniſh him; he therefore deſired me to deliver a Letter unto her; which he Writ in my preſence, and which, if my Memory fail not, was in theſe Terms.

Spitridates unto the Princeſs Ariminta.

I Go Madam, ſince it is your pleaſure, but I go the moſt miſerable Man alive; I neither know whither I ſhall go, nor when I ſhall return, no, nor whether you wiſh I ſhould ever return, and yet I am bid to live and hope; but I can neither do the one nor the other, unleſs you command it by two lines under your Hand: Therefore, my divine Princeſs, I do beg it in the Name of that Illuſtrious Prince, who now is Dead, but who yet ſhall live eternally in the Memory of Spitridates.

After this Prince had given me his Letter, and a hundred things in charge to tell the Princeſs, I went unto her, and related all the Paſſages of our Meeting. At the firſt ſhe lamented his Fate, but upon ſecond thoughts was ſorry for it; and I was ſo importunate with her, that I moved her to return this Anſwer unto that diſtreſſed Prince.

Ariminta unto Spitridates.

MAY you live as long as it ſhall be the Pleaſure of the Gods to permit; and hope, that as long as Ariminta lives, ſhe will pray for you; and ſince you deſire it, ſhe bids yot live, and hope.

Ariminta.

The Captain of that Tower coming to take this Letter, he aſſured me that Spitridates would depart that Night following; with thoſe two of the Guard, who helped him to eſcape, and whom he took to ſerve him. Moreover he told me, that Spitridates deſired he might ſometimes write unto him, to the end he might acquaint me with his Fortune, and return my Anſwers back unto him: So when Night came, we were certain this Prince would depart, and the Princeſs was ſo troubled at it, that I wonder ſomething extraordinary was not diſcovered in her Mind; but the next Morning we were informed, that Spitridates was very ſafely gone out of Heraclea, by the ſame way, which it was conceived, he eſcaped before, the Captain provided a Ship for him in the Night. Though the Princeſs had reaſon rather to be glad that he was gone, then that he ſhould continue mued up in a Priſon, yet her Soul was extreamly ſad, when ſhe imagined that perhaps ſhe ſhould never ſee him again; but this long and tedious Abſence muſt be endured: And in the Interim there fell out many remarkable Accidents; for as it is well known unto you, Sir, Ciaxares refuſed to give Mandana unto the King of Pontus, which made him the ſooner forget Spitridates, and his Anger was ſo high, that a War againſt Ciaxares muſt be declared, under a ſpecious Pretence of Right unto the Towns of Aniſa, and Ceraſta. You, Sir, are better acquainted with all the Paſſages of that Buſineſs then I can relate, and obtained more Honour then my Memory can contain; I ſhall only relate what is requiſite to inſtruct you in the Story of this Princeſs: As ſoon then as the King of Pontus heard, that Ciaxares had rejected him, he prepared for War, thinking that perhaps it might move him to give the Princeſs Mandana unto him; he ſent for Aid from the King of Phrygia, who promiſed to imbrace his Intereſt, according to the laſt Treaty between the late King of Pontus and him, and that he would come himſelf in Perſon to command his Forces. Since the King of Pontus ſtood in need of all Aid, he invited the Prince Arſamones and Euriclides his ſecond Son to ſerve in his Army, and Arſamones durſt not deny him. We underſtood alſo at the ſame time, that this Prince hearing how Spitridates came diſguiſed unto Heraclea, was ſo incenſed at it, that he did proteſt, if ever he got him within his Power, he would not treat him as a Son, but as a rebellious Subject, and a Delinquent unto the State, who had broke out of Priſon, ſo that Spitridates, who was gone into Paphlagonia, and writ unto me as well as the Princeſs, to know whether he might come ſafely unto the King her Brother when he was in the Head of his Army, ſhe did forbid him, becauſe Arſamones was to be there, and becauſe the Princeſs Ariſtea had acquainted her with the real Reſentments of Arſamones. But whilſt all preparations of War were in Hand, Pharnaces and Artanus neglected no Addreſſes unto the Princeſs Ariminta, and ſpruſed up themſelves every way to invite her Love; but all their Cares and Courtſhip was in vain: for as there is nothing which faſtens the Knot of Amity more then Misfortune does, amongſt Perſons truly Generous, ſo Spitridates being Unfortunate, by reaſon of his love unto the Princeſs, was deeper rooted in her Heart than before; and ſhe knowing that Artanus was the Occaſion of his laſt Impriſonment, and that Pharnaces did acquaint the King with their Meeting, ſhe was therefore ſo incenſed againſt them, that ſhe could not endure the ſight of them; yet after that the Phrygian Regiments were drawn up to the general Rendezvouz, and joined with the Pontean Forces, the King made ready to depart; and though Artanus had no great fancy unto any Matters of War, yet he durſt not do as he did before, but made himſelf ready as others did to go; and ſince the King did not at all favour his Deſign upon the Princeſs, he took his Leave of her only in publick, but Pharnaces did not ſo: for the King of Pontus going to bid her Adieu, he carried Pharnaces with him, and left him there in private with her. I chanced to be then in the Princeſs Chamber, and I do confeſs, I ſaw ſo deep a melancholy in the Face of Pharnaces, that conſidering his Merit, I did much pity him, and wiſhed for his ſake, that he were able to deſiſt his Love from the Princeſs, ſince it was not in her Power to render him happy; ſince the King was gone, and this like to be his laſt viſit, ſhe was not to ſevere towards him as formerly, but ſuffered him to ſpeak unto her. Madam, ſaid he unto her, I come to receive my Doom from you, before I go unto the Wars, and ask you whether I muſt Fight, as one that would vanquiſh, or as one that muſt die? Whether I muſt preſerve my Life, or abſolutely loſe it, for upon your Will only, abſolutely depends my Deſtiny: Yes, Madam, if you permit me any hopes, perhaps I ſhall live, vanquiſh, and return; but if you intend to tell me, that I muſt not have any ſhare in any hope, then I beſeech you bid me this laſt Adieu without any Bitterneſs, ſince the Gods certainly will not preſerve what you deſire to deſtroy, nor draw me out of thoſe Dangers unto which I expoſe my ſelf, pronounce my Sentence then, Madam, and let it be with Sincerity, though you will not with Satisfaction: Remember, I beſeech you, that he whom you deſire to make Happy, cannot be ſo, and therefore you have leſs Reaſon to treat me ill: If the Prince Spitridates could ever enjoy your Affection, I do proteſt, before the Gods which hear me, I would rather die without Complaint, than interrupt your Felicity; but ſince that Fortune has put an irremoveable Obſtacle unto his Happineſs, why may not you make me Happy? and why, Divine Princeſs, will you oppoſe againſt my Glory? I do not ask ſo much, as that you ſhould love me, I only beg you would not hate me, and to be more pliant unto the King's Deſires. I wiſh to the Gods, Pharnaces, replied the Princeſs, that your Happinsſs did depend upon me, as you believe it does: But to manifeſt unto you that the Cauſe of Complaint againſt you, has not extinguiſhed out of my Soul that high eſteem which all the World ought to have of your Merit; I will contribute as much as is in my Power unto your Freedom, and move you, by my own Sincerity, to Vanquiſh your own Soul, and to reſt ſatisfied. Know then, Pharnaces, that ſince I am obliged to entertain the Affection of Spitridates by the Commands of the late King my Father, and the Prince Sinneſis my Brother, I muſt Eternally pay Obedience unto them; and the moſt peremptory Commands of one living King, ſhall never make me Diſobedient unto the Will of two dead Kings: 'Tis true, I do reſolve never to marry Spitridates without the conſent of the King my Brother, neither am I as fully reſolved ever to Marry any elſe but him; therefore Pharnaces regulate your Deſigns accordingly, and make uſe of that great Courage which the Gods have inſpired you withal, to vanquiſh and ſuppreſs a Misfortune, which as I think requires not the all vigor of your Mind to ſurmount it;

live then, Pharnaces, live I ſay, but let it be in Liberty, that you may live happily; and ſince the want which the King would have of you, would be irreparable, I earneſtly deſire you to preſerve your Life, which would conduce infinitely unto my Satisfaction, if you could ſo far prevail with your ſelf, as only to eſteem me. But ſuppoſe, Madam, replied he, that I cannot ſo prevail with my ſelf, would you not conceive it more reaſonable that Death ſhould rather deliver you and me from that Servitude which diſpleaſeth you, than to ſee me perpetually languiſhing at your Feet, and vexing you? Death, ſaid ſhe unto him, is a thing ſo horrid, that I do not wiſh it unto my very Enemies; and therefore I muſt needs adviſe you, not to take ſo violent a Remedy as that. But, Madam, (ſaid he unto her with extream Sorrow) is it ſo, that you can never love the Miſerable Pharnaces, nor forſake the too happy Spitridates? I muſt needs confeſs it, with much Ingenuity, (ſaid ſhe unto him) becauſe I may do it with much Innocency. It is enough, Madam, (ſaid he unto her, with a drooping ſadneſs) and I beſeech you do me the Favour to believe, that this ſhall be the laſt time of all my Life I ever ſhall importune you; and I pray unto the Gods, that the News of my Death may make you know I am able to diſpute with Spitridates for the Glory of perfectly loving you. After this, he left the Princeſs with ſuch a Melancholy Motion, and his Countenance did ſo alter as he did bid her Adieu, that it might well be ſaid, all the Horrors of Death were in his Eyes, and the Princeſs could not chuſe but pity him. After this, Sir, we remained at Heraclea, ſoliciting the Gods againſt you, Sir, for we knew you would be in that War: but it ſeemed Heaven was not propitious unto us; for you ſaved the Life of Ciaxares, you conquered, and triumphed, aud did ſuch Wonders, that though they were unto our Diſadvantage, yet could we not chuſe but admire when we heard them related. I ſhall ſlightly paſs over the beginning of this War, and in a few words tell you, that when the Combate of two hundred againſt two hundred was reſolved upon, and when all the Queſtion was concerning the Choice, there was a great conteſt amongſt the Gallantry of our Army, who ſhould be the Combatants: and though Artanus was none of them, yet ſeemed he to deſire the liſting himſelf in the Catalogue of thoſe who were to be choſen: The election was to be by Lot, and the Names of thoſe who aſpired unto this Honour, ſhould be put in Writing, and drawn by the Captain of the King's Guard. Pharnaces who was in the firſt degree of Valour, and who looked for nothing but Death ſince he could not be loved, had no fancy to truſt the Buſineſs unto Lot: ſo that knowing who was to draw theſe Lots, he went unto him; and after a thouſand proteſtations of Friendſhip, and as many prayers to grant his deſire, he gave unto him the Roll wherein his Name was writ, and beſeeched him to keep it between his Fingers, and give it unto him as if he had drawn it: The Captain ſmiling at his Propoſition, could not chuſe but tell him, that every one who brought their Names were not ſo urgent as he was to be in this Combate. Pharnaces had a ſuſpition that the Captain did mean Artanus: he told him, that he could not believe there was any which did extreamly deſire to Honour themſelves by ſuch an extraordinary Occaſion as this; no not Artanus himſelf, ſaid he unto him, hoping thereby to move him into a farther Explanation. When the Captain heard the Name of Artanus mentioned, he laughed; ſo that Pharnaces thinking his Thoughts true, did preſs ſo urgently, that he told him how Artanus had been with him, and told him that this Combate being to be performed on Foot, he ſhould not be able to be an Actor in it; becauſe his Horſe not long ſince falling upon him, had cauſed a great weakneſs in his Thigh: yet he was not willingly to make uſe of this excuſe in publick, leſt his Enemies ſhould make an ill conſtruction upon it, and therefore he deſired and conjured him, by all poſſible Entreaties, to take out the Roll wherein his Name was written, from amongſt the reſt: and to gratify the Favour, he offered him any Courteſy if he would be faithful and Secret unto him.

Pharnaces finding the baſeneſs of his Rival, deſired to puniſh him for it, and beſeeched the Captain to draw himſelf and Artanus together in the Number of the Combatants, which the Captain, as well to puniſh the Cowardiſe of the one, as to ſatisfy the generous Valour of the other, promiſed him to do: The hour of this Ceremony being come, all the Rolls were brought unto this Captain, and he put them all into a Bag, whilſt all the Pretenders unto this Honour ſtood about him: Since Artanus thought his Roll not amongſt the reſt, who was more forward and Deſirous to be one of that Number than himſelf? but how lamentably was he damped when he heard his own Name to be in the third Scrole which was Drawn? he ſeemed ſo qualmed at the Heart as every one perceived it: Fharnaces who was next him, did taunt him with ſome ambiguous Language by way of Raillery, which Artanus did well enough underſtand: but afterwards the Name of Pharnaces was drawn, and all the reſt in their Courſe, ſo that nothing more was to be done but to prepare for Combate: As for Artanus, he had never been choſen, had he not been in love with Ariminta: but he durſt never publiſh as much, nor complain of the Captain who had deceived him: yet however he reſolved to go as far as to the place of Combate, though he did nothing elſe. As for Pharnaces, he went thither with other kind of thoughts; for he went in hopes to periſh there, and alſo to ſee his Rival die, but before he departed, he writ theſe words unto the Princeſs Ariminta.

If Fortune ſecond my Deſign, I am going thither whereby dying I ſhall vanquiſh; and where I ſhall make it known by my generous Diſpair, that though I could not merit your Affections by my Services, and by my Life, yet I ſhall not render my ſelf unworthy of your Compaſſion by my Death.

Pharnaces.

The truth is, Sir, you know, he fought like a Fury, and died a Hero: As for Artanus, I believe you are not ignorant, Sir, of the Reaſon why he kept himſelf hid whilſt Pharnaces only was reſiſted by you, which was, his hopes that you would diſpatch his only Rival, for he made no account of Spitridates : and ſo Love having its ſeveral Operations, it moved Pharnaces to be more valiant than ever, and Artanus to be more Cowardly than he could imagine himſelf. When we had intelligence of Pharnaces his Death, and preſently after heard of Artanus his Baſeneſs, we lamented the Loſs of the firſt, and abhorred the Villany of the other: ſo that ſince the Combate you had with him to make him confeſs his Lie, he durſt never ſhew himſelf, neither to the Army, nor to the Princeſs, nor in Heraclea, but hid himſelf for a time in the Country, where he haboured an inveterated hatred againſt you, not only becauſe you had loaded him with an intolerable Burden of Diſhonour and Shame, but alſo, becauſe he ſaw you reſembled Spitridates. That Letter from the unfortunate Pharnaces, did deeply imprint it ſelf in the Heart of the Princeſs when ſhe read it, which, as her Soul was ever extreamly tender and Compaſſionate, ſo ſhe could not look upon it without Tears in her Eyes; and was for a quarter of an hour together ſo drowned in a Flood of Sorrows, as I believe if that illuſtrious Lover could have revived, and Spitridates had been a Spectator, he would have died of a cauſleſs Jealouſy. In the mean while we had no Intelligence from this exiled Prince; and all the Conſolation which the Princeſs had, was a ſecret Correſpondency with the Princeſs Ariſtea, and in doing her all the good Offices ſhe was able. The King was ſo deeply perplexed at the Death of Pharnaces, as poſſible could be: but ſince the Love of Mandana was more prodominate in his Heart than any thing elſe, he cheared up himſelf with the thoughts of her; and that ſeeming Peace after your Victory, being again broken; Wars, as you know, began to break out more violently than before: then I muſt needs tell you, Sir, that none could ever entertain a greater admiration of any, than we of you; and when we heard the Wonders of all your Actions related, we had good Ground for our belief, that the Gods were infinitely favourable unto Ciaxares in ſending him ſuch a Defendor. To be ſhort, it was impoſſible for any to eſteem an Enemy more than we did the Illuſtrious Artamenes. Alſo when the Princeſs heard how Artanus had conſpired againſt your Life, and ſuborned forty Conſpirators to deſtroy you, ſhe had ſuch a freſh and ſtrong Averſion to him, that his very Name was horrid unto her Ear: for ſince ſhe underſtood you had ſaved the King her Brother's Life, ſhe became extreamly tender of yours: and when you pardoned Artanus, aud ſent him back, ſhe murmured a little (though ſhe did admire you) againſt that exceſſive Generoſity which moved you to deſire the King of Pontus not to puniſh him: yet notwithſtanding, ſhe negotiated ſo with the King her Brother, that ſhe procured his Baniſhment out of the Kingdom, with a ſtrict Command never to be ſeen in it again. Since this, Sir, until that famous Adventure when you took the King of Pontus Priſoner, and when we thought you Dead, I have nothing to relate, unleſs I ſhould entertain you with thoſe Sorrows which the Princeſs apprehended, for the Diſgrace of the King her Brother, and with her Lamentations for the long abſence of Spitridates. But ſince I ſhould thereby only abuſe your Patience, becauſe you may eaſily imagine it without my Relation, I ſhall only tell you, that the very next morning after you came wounded unto that Caſtle, where the Princeſs Arbiana, and the Princeſs Ariſtea were, there came a Meſſenger from the King of Pontus, who was going unto the Princeſs Ariminta his Siſter with this Meſſage, that he was as much grieved for the Death of his Vanquiſher, as he was for the loſs of his own Liberty: ſince this Envoy did but only paſs by, and was not to ſtay in this Caſtle, where Arbiana and Ariſtea were, the Princeſs Ariſtea taking you for Spitridates, did write theſe few words only in a Letter.

Th

The Princeſs Ariſtea, unto the Princeſs Ariminta.

I Hardly dare tell you that Spitridates is here, becauſe is here Wounded: yet ſince I cannot make a Secret of a thing which will add unto your Joy, I cannot conceal it.

Ariſte

You may imagine with what variety of Appreheſions the Princeſs's Mind was poſſeſt upon the receipt o this Letter: and underſtanding by this Meſſenger that the King her Brother had loſt two Battels in one day; That he was taken Priſoner; that you were Dead: You, Sir, I ſay in whom the King her Brother had ſo great a hope, her Sorrows were ſo great, that ſhe could not perfectly reliſh any Joy at the pretended return of Spitridates, eſpecially hearing by the ſame Relation that he returned wounded: yet ſince Love, as they ſay, is a moſt Imperious Paſſion, and will be Soveraign in that Heart which is poſſeſſed with it; therefore ſhe would ſometimes rejoice and chear up her ſelf in hopes of ſeeing Spitridates again: but within two days after this, ſhe was deprived of that Hope; for the Princeſs Ariſtea did write again unto her how ſhe had been deceived by a moſt prodigious reſemblance, ſhe intimated by her Letter, that the Picture of the Princeſs Ariminta did undeceive her, when ſhe ſhewed it unto him whom ſhe took for her Brother; and the concluſion of the Letter was, that Spitridates was not returned; ſo that ſhe reſented the Misfortunes of her Brother the King of Pontus, without any Ingredient of Conſolation; but yet notwithſtanding preſently after, when ſhe heard of your being revived, as I may ſay, it was a great mitigation of her Sorrows, eſpecially when ſhe heard that it was you who was taken for Spitridates, at the Houſe of Arbiana; her hopes was, that you, Sir, being the moſt generous of Men, would treat her Brother the King of Pontus very well; and her hopes alſo was the more pleaſant unto her, that Spitridates, according to the Princeſs Ariſtea's Letter, would exactly reſemble him. In the mean time, ſince this Princeſs had a Soul which was capable of all things, ſhe began to caſt her Cares upon the buſineſs of State, but ſhe found them to be in extream Diſorder. The King of Phrygia was retreated, after the loſs of two Battels in a day, unto the furtheſt part of all Bithynia: and who when he was over the River Sangar, received intelligence, that Cræſus King of Lydia was entred into his Dominions with a puiſſant Army, ſo that he was conſtrained to look after his own Defence, and taken off from the Aſſiſtance of others: All his Regiments alſo were exceedingly ſhattered and weakned; but yet when the Princeſs did conceive that Ciaxares having the King of Pontus Priſoner, he would not make any new Attempts, ſince he was able to make his own Conditions, without any further hazard of his Forces, ſhe was then a little more at reſt.

But within a few days after, ſhe was extreamly aſtoniſhed to hear, that all the Souldiers, after the King was taken, did declare themſelves for Arſamones, and that all Bithynia was up in Arms in his behalf, and were reſolved to return under the Obedience of their Antient Lord. Moreover, that Artanus, who was one of high Quality, was returned into the Kingdom, and had alſo raiſed a great part of Pontus, and was himſelf retired unto a very conſiderable Town called Cabira, having beforehand ſuborned the Governor thereof with a good ſum of Money. Imagine, Sir, I beſeech you, in what an intangled Condition this young Princeſs was in, to ſee the King of Pontus, her Brother, a Priſoner, and that Arſamones, the Father of Spitridates, was not only Maſter of all Bithynia, but was alſo in the Head of an Army, ready to fall upon the Kingdom of Pontus; ſo that ſhe was conſtrained, with all the Power ſhe had, to oppoſe and make War againſt the Father of a Prince, who infinitely adored her, and whom ſhe her ſelf did not hate. She furthermore ſaw, that he who of all Men living ſhe moſt ſcorned, and had the greateſt averſion unto, had bandied a conſiderable Party againſt her, notwithſtanding withſtanding his great affection unto her: She, poor Princeſs, had neither any Forces, nor Money to raiſe them; and that State was ſo imbroiled, that ſhe knew not whom to truſt; and in this pittiful diſtracted Condition, ſhe knew not whether ſhe ſhould be ſad or glad at the Abſence of Spitridates, for ſhe conceived it not fit for him to fight for her againſt his own Father, neither did ſhe deſire he ſhould fight for his Father againſt her; ſo that not knowing either what to wiſh, or what to do, ſhe prayed unto Gods to deliver her out of this Gulph of Misfortunes. But in concluſion, Sir, your Generoſity not deceiving her Hopes, but ſetting the King of Pontus at liberty, unto whom you gave conſiderable Auxiliaries under the Conduct of Artaxes, we received this Intelligence with all Acclamations of Joy; and indeed the people of Heraclea took freſh Heart, when they heard their Prince was ſet at liberty after ſo generous a manner, publick Rejoicings were appointed, and the glorious Name of Artamenes was as highly celebrated in Heraclea, as it was in Sinope or Themiſcira. The Princeſs then hearing the King was upon his return, would go to meet him, and ſince we knew there was none of Arſamones his Troops that way which he was to come, we went two days Journy before to meet him; but to our great Misfortune we fell into an Ambuſcado which waited for us in a Forreſt, and carried us a blind Way which was unknown unto us; we knew not whether they would carry us unto Arſamones or Artanus, and in the choice of theſe two, the Princeſs knew not which to wiſh; for if it ſhould be unto Arſamones, though ſhe was in hopes of much mildneſs from him, by the meditation of the Princeſs Arbiana, and the Princeſs Ariſtea, yet ſhe imagined that the King her Brother might perhaps ſuſpect ſhe did voluntarily fall into his Hands, ſince he was not ignorant of her Affection unto Spitridates, though he could not be ignorant that Arſamones did hate his Son for loving her; yet notwithſtanding the very Name of Artanus was ſo averſe unto her Fancy, that at the hazard of being ill uſed by Arſamones, or ſuſpected by the King her Brother, ſhe wiſhed rather to be carried into Bithynia, than unto Cabira, under the Power of ſuch a Man: But yet the choice was not in her, for towards Night we were brought unto Artanus, who, as amorous as he was, durſt not venture himſelf in this Enterprize, but committed the carriage of the Buſineſs unto a reſolute Souldier, who heretofore was one of thoſe who conſpired againſt your Life. When the Princeſs ſaw Artanus in the Head of two hundred Horſe ready to receive her, ſhe was ſurprized; for though he was known to be a very Coward, yet ſince to be a Mutineer and a Rebel is ſufficient to raiſe a Party, his was not ſmall, and we were much grieved to ſee ſo many gallant Men obeying ſuch a Captain; but we were forced to ſubmit unto Fortune, and be carried into Cabira, where he was Maſter, and in which there was a Caſtle of great ſtrength, wherein he lodged us: I will not ſtay to relate unto you, Sir, all the Inſolencies of Artanus, for it is enough that you know him a Coward, to imagine how he would lay aſide all due reſpects when he is once the ſtronger; and ſince it is moſt ordinary to ſee them who want courage, never to be ſubmiſſive but when they are weak, yet he met with a Soul ſo great in the Princeſs, and ſo reſolute a Spirit, that maugre all his inſolence, ſhe ſo charmed him, that he durſt hardly come into her Chamber, or to ſee her. Mean while the King of Pontus, as afterwards we heard, came to Heraclea, and was extreamly angry at the carrying away of the Princeſs his Siſter; but as the ſtate of things ſtood, he durſt not by any means divide his Army, and he knew that Arſamones was ſo ſtrong, that it would not permit him to continue a Siege; and therefore ſince his Buſineſs was either to relieve a Siſter, or to ſave two Crowns, I believe common Policy might eaſily incline him unto the latter, rather than the firſt.

The Condition of things ſtanding thus, Artanus was ſo impudent as to ſend unto the King of Pontus, and offer unto him his Forces, upon Condition of his conſent unto the Marriage betwixt himſelf and the Princeſs Arimінta: but the King would not hearken unto any ſuch Propoſitions, anſwering him, That if he had a deſire to vanquiſh his Enemies without any trouble, he would wiſh them ſuch aid as he offered; and alſo bidding him have a care how he uſed the Princeſs his Siſter, becauſe as ſoon as he had finiſhed the Bithynian War, he would then call him to a ſtrict account for all his demeanour. You may imagine then, Sir, in what a Condition the Princeſs was in, who knew of all theſe Paſſages by one of her Guards, who was ſuborned unto it: For when ſhe imagined that Arſamones would kill the King her Brother, or that the King her Brother would kill the Father of Spitridates, ſhe did abſolutely loſe her Reaſon. In the mean while the King of Pontus, after he had rallied all the Forces he was able, went into the Field to oppoſe Arſamones, who was already Maſter of a great part of the Kingdom of Pontus, and in the firſt encounter the Prince Euriclides was ſlain, which much grieved Arſamones. But, Sir, why ſhould I buſy my ſelf in relating the particulars of a War which is known all over Aſia? It is enough that I acquaint you how this Prince, as gallant as he was, yet was he almoſt quite beaten; that which contributed much unto his ruin, was Aribeus, who calling away his Brother with all his Forces, did much weaken him; and though the King of Pontus would not conſent unto it, becauſe it was done without any order, either from Ciaxares or you, yet Artaxes obeyed the abſolute Authority of Aribeus, who was then Governour of Sinope; ſo that this Prince being much weakned thereby, was forced to make a retreat into Heraclea, and to ſtay there until he had raiſed freſh Forces, and be able to come again into the Field: But, Sir, he had not time for it, for Arſamones, after that the Prince Intaphernes the Son of Gadates was come unto him, not omitting ſuch a favourable opportunity, advanced with his Army, and beſieged him within the capital City of all his Kingdom, which indeed was the only place that remained under his Obedience, for that part which was not ſubjected unto Arſamones, yet took part with Artanus. We underſtood by ſeveral Relations whilſt we were in Cabira, how the King of Pontus during this Siege, did do ſuch Miracles, as that it may well be ſaid he deſerved a hundred Crowns in loſing his own: But however, ſeeing his Enemies were not only Maſters of all without the Town, but alſo of one of the Gates, and that they had now nothing to do but to enforce the laſt Entrenchment; ſince he had no mind to fall alive into the Hands of Arſamones, he reſolved to fly away in a Ship, and to go and offer his Sword unto Ciaxares towards the delivery of the Princeſs Mandana, of whoſe carrying away he had heard with unconceiveable Sorrow, and hoping that after this you would aid him to recover his Dominions. And indeed he did execute the firſt part of his Deſign, for he went out of Heraclea, not any thing of two flouriſhing Kingdoms remaining unto him, but the Title of King, which Fortune could not deprive him of. When the Princeſs received this ſad News, ſhe reſented it with inſupportable Sorrow: for, Sir, be pleaſed to know, that the inſolent Artanus aſſuming new boldneſs upon this new Misfortune, came unto her with more incivility than ever before we ſaw him. Madam, ſaid he unto her, ſince I ever thought that the ſtrongeſt Reaſon which moved you to treat me ſo imperiouſly as you have done, was, becauſe I was a Subject unto the King your Brother, I think it therefore expedient to let you know, that now he muſt never be my Maſter again, ſince Fortune has taken from him his Crown, and two Kingdoms which he enjoyed, and has nothing left him but one ſingle Ship, in which he has conveyed himſelf away from his Enemies; therefore, Madam, ſince you are not now the Siſter of a King, you may well look upon my Condition as not Inferiour unto yours, and for the future carry your ſelf otherwiſe than heretofore you have done. 'Since you have only the Heart of a Slave, replied the Princeſs, I ſhould do you too much Honour to regard you as a ſimple Subject of the King my Brother's; and though Fortune ſhould take away his Crown, yet ſince ſhe cannot take away his Birth, which is infinitely above yours, ſhe therefore cannot change my Opinion of you; and though you had more Crowns than the King my Brother has loſt, yet ſhould I deſpiſe and ſcorn you upon your Throne, as much as I do now; and though there ſhould be an Alteration in your Soul, (as I think it mpoſſible,) yet ſhould you never ſee me change; therefore Artanus conſider a little better what you ſay, and remember that my Fathers were ever Maſters over yours; that I have the Honour to be Daughter and Siſter unto three Princes, unto whom I have ſeen you ſubject, and indeed there is an undiſpenſable Obligation lies upon you, to reſpect and honour me all the days of your Life. The Princeſs pronounced theſe Words with ſo much majeſtick Choler, that ſhe made him bluſh, and forced him to make a ſcurvy excuſe for his Inſolency, and at laſt to leave her at liberty to lament the diſgrace of the King her Brother, which we had a more particular Relation of from that Guard which was very faithful unto us. Alas, Heſionida, ſaid ſhe, how deplorable is my Deſtiny? and unto what a cruel Fate am I expoſed? I was born upon a Throne, and am now a Slave, and a Slave unto him that is the moſt unworthy amongſt Men: If I conſider the Misfortunes of my Brother, I have not Tears enough to lament them; If I contemplate my own Misfortunes, I ſhall find them ſo diſmal that I ſee no way but Death to terminate them: hitherto I have loved Spitridates moſt innocently, the late King my Father deſired it, the Prince and King Sinneſis my Brother appointed it. But now, Heſionida, ſince he is Son to an Uſurper of my Brother's Kingdom, and a Ruiner of my Family, how is it poſſible I ſhould love him without Sin? But, Madam, ſaid I unto her, Spitridates was not in this War. 'Tis true, ſaid ſhe, but yet he is Son unto the Uſurper of the Kingdom of Pontus; ſo that though my Reaſon does not induce me to accuſe him, yet it is not handſom or fit I ſhould love him any longer; therefore, Heſionida, whether he be innocent or culpable, I ought not to ſee him any more, though he were in a place where I might do it. Moreover, in what part of the Earth could he poſſibly be, where he could not hear the Pontean and Bithynian War diſcourſed on? and is it credible, that ſince he muſt needs know the ſtate of things, I ſhould never hear any news from him? If he was fuller of Ambition than Love, why did he not appear in the Head of his Father's Army? and if he was fuller of Love than Ambition, why does he not endeavour to deliver me out of the Hands of Artanus? and why did he not let me know that his Heart did not approve of what Arſamones his Father had done? I confeſs, Madam, ſaid I unto her, that I cannot underſtand why Spitridates ſhould be ſo long ſilent: No more can I, replied the Princeſs, and therefore in all reaſon I muſt imagine him dead; but I wiſh the Gods he may not juſtify himſelf in my opinion by ſo ſad a way. If I ſhould, Sir, repeat unto you all the Lamentations and Reflections which the Princeſs had upon the King her Brother's Misfortunes, upon the Mutability of terrene things, and upon the innocent Paſſions of her Soul, I ſhould abuſe your Patience; therefore I ſhall ſlightly paſs by them, and tell you, that Artanus conſidering himſelf under the verge of a victorious Army, commanded by a Prince who had conquered two Kingdoms, he was not without ſome unquiet Thoughts; for although he had very gallant Men in his Party, yet was he not at all grown more valiant himſelf; and notwithſtanding all his Love unto the Princeſs, I believe he repented more than once of his Undertakings: He alſo ſent unto Arſamones to capitulate and propound ſome Conditions betwixt them. But ſince he deſired that Cabira ſhould remain in his Hands for his Security, and that he might always keep the Princeſs Arſminta under his Power, Arſamones abſolutely deſiring it himſelf, would not hearken unto him, nor handſomly entertain thoſe which came from him; ſo that after this refuſal, Artanus was more perplexed than before: 'Tis true, he enjoyed ſome Days of reſt, becauſe Arſamones falling ſick, it retarded the March of his Army which was coming againſt him. As things ſtood in this Condition, there came a Cavalier into Heraclea, where then the Queen Arbiana was (for it is but juſt to give her that Title which is her due) there came I ſay a Cavalier, who on his Buckler bore the Emblem of a Slave, which ſeemed to have his choice either of Fetters or Crowns, and he broke the laſt, and aſſumed the firſt, with this Motto, More heavy, but more glorious: As it was late when he came, ſo he was unknown at his entrance into the Town, and his Deviſe was not obſerved that Night; but as ſoon as he alighted from his Horſe, at the Houſe of an old Acquaintance, he went unto the Palace where the Queen and Princeſs were; as for Arſamones he was yet ſick in the Country, whither theſe Princeſſes (with the Princeſs Iſtrina Siſter unto Intaphernis, who was then in that Court) were the next Morning to go. This Cavalier went ſtraight unto the Chamber of the Princeſs Ariſtea, and deſired a Servant to tell her there was a Stranger which deſired to ſpeak with her in private, concerning ſome important Buſineſs; the Servant told him, that ſhe was with the Queen in her Cloſet, into which he durſt not enter; but he was ſo urgent with him to tell it unto them both, that thinking the Buſineſs was of ſome great conſequence, that he went in, and returned preſently back to bring him in: But Sir, he was no ſooner ſtepped into the Cloſet, but the Queen, riſing up, was extreamly ſurprized: I am very glad (ſaid ſhe unto him) to ſee you in a better Condition than you were the laſt time I ſaw you in Bithynia, and when I miſtook the Illuſtrious Artamenes for the unfortunate Spitridates. Madam, you give me a very glorious name (replied the right Spitridates, for indeed it was he whom the Queen Arbiana took for you,) but yet I wonder that you ſhould not know me. The Princeſs Ariſtea taking a Candle, and looking him in the Face, Madam, ſaid ſhe unto the Queen, without all doubt he whom now you ſee is my Brother, and not Artamenes. Spitridates who had ſeveral times been taken for another in his Travels, was not leſs ſurprized, than if he had not been formerly miſtaken; therefore telling them many Paſſages which none but they could know, they then knew him, and expreſſed all the ſigns of Joy and Tenderneſs that poſſible could be at the meeting of one ſo dear unto them, whom they never thought to ſee again. Since the Queen his Mother did always love him, ſhe had uſed all poſſible Endeavours to molify the incenſed Spirit of Arſamones, but ſhe could never move him unto it; yet becauſe ſhe would not perplex this Prince at the firſt meeting, ſhe ſpoke not any thing concerning it unto him, but only told him after ſome two hours conference, that he muſt not let it be known he was in Heraclea, until ſhe had ſpoken with him. After this he went a back-way unto his Chamber, where ſome Tears were beſtowed upon the Memory of Euriclides, and the Princeſs Ariſtea ſtaid with him, who had not ſeen him ſince the Death of Sinneſis, in the Memory of whom both ſighed; but before he entred into diſcourſe of any thing elſe, he asked concerning the Princeſs Ariminta. I cannot, Sir, expreſs the Sorrows which Spitridates reſented to ſee himſelf in that place where firſt he began to love the Princeſs, and ſhe him; nor can I deſcribe his grief of Heart when he conſidered that it was his own Father who was the cauſe ſhe was not here now. Moreover, when he fancied her to be in the clutches of Artanus, he was almoſt out of his Senſes, and it was long before he could give Satisfaction unto the Princeſs his Siſter, who deſired to know what Adventures he met with ſince ſhe ſaw him: But after many ſad Condolements, he told her (as we knew afterwards from himſelf) that when he was diſguiſed in Paphlagonia, he writ a Letter unto the Princeſs Ariminta, to ask her whether it were her Pleaſure he ſhould come and offer himſelf unto the King her Brother, who was then beginning the Cappadocian War, and that in lieu of receiving ſuch an Anſwer as he expected, he had received from the Princeſs the moſt cruel Letter in the World, and ſuch a one as made him amazed to ſee it: And as the Princeſs Ariſtea told him, that without all manner of queſtion there had been ſome cheat put upon him, he pulled out thoſe two Letters which he always kept about him ever ſince he received them, and ſhewing them unto her, ſhe found them to this Effect.

Ariminta unto Spitridates.

Come not hither to offer your ſelf unto the King my Brother, but rather ſeek out for your ſelf a Sanctuary, in ſome Place of the World ſo far from me, that you may forget, even the very name of Ariminta.

Oh Brother (cried out the Princeſs Ariſtea) my Eyes tell me, that the Princeſs Ariminta writ this Letter, but my reaſon aſſures me, that ſhe never thought it: Afterwards, without ſtaying for Spitridates his Anſwer, ſhe opened the other, and found theſe Words.

Heſionida unto the Prince Spitridates.

IT grieves me to tell you, that Glory is above all things predominate in the Heart of the Princeſs: and ſhe is ſo peremptorily reſolved to obey the King, to quench her Affection unto you, and to forget it, that no Arguments under Heaven can alter her. Conform therefore your Mind unto your Fortune if you can; and ſince you are generous, ſtrive to forget her who is abſolutely reſolved never to remember you.

Heſionida.

I leave it unto your Imagination (ſaid the Prince Spitridates, as ſoon as the Princeſs his Siſter had done reading theſe two Letters) what I apprehended, after I received what now you have read. I do eaſily imagine, ſaid ſhe, but ſince I am certain that ſome or other has put a trick upon you, I am not ſurprized at it: for truly, ſaid ſhe, as long as the Cappadocian War laſted, I continually received intelligence from the Princeſs Ariminta, as I was wont to do: ſhe always enquired concerning you with extream Care; ſhe has ſecretly done us an hundred good Offices: and until the time ſhe was taken away by Artanus, we ever held a good correſpondency together; eſpecially ſince the War began between my Father, and the King of Pontus. Moreover, when the Illuſtrious Artamenes came into Bithynia; and when we thought it had been you, who returned thither, ſhe expreſſed abundance of Joy, when I did intimate it unto her by a Letter, and I am certain that ſhe was as ſad when we acquainted her with our Miſtake: But, ſaid ſhe, I muſt compare this pretended Letter from the Princeſs Ariminta with ſome which I have; and ſaying ſo, ſhe opened a Cabinet which was upon the Table in her Cloſet, and taking ſeveral Letters out, ſhe ſet her ſelf to obſerve them very exactly; and ſhe found much difference in many Characters: At the firſt Sight all the World might have been deceived; but none could be ſo deluded that ſaw the falſe Letter compared with the true one. Spitridates was ſo overjoyed at his Hopes of being deceived, that for a quarter of an Hour he could hardly perſwade himſelf that it was a Cheat, but ſeemed to doubt of it, to the end he might move Ariſtea to give him mine Aſſurance of it, and to have a pretence to look longer upon the great difference between the Hands. But how may it be imagined, ſaid Spitridates, this Cheat ſhould come about? Pharnaces was not a Man likely to do it: No, ſaid the Princeſs, but Artanus may probably be ſuch a Knave; and indeed Sir, (as we afterwards came to know) it was he, who having diſcovered that Spitridates had ſent unto Heraclea by that Captain of the Tower, wherein he was a Priſoner, cauſed this Man who had the true anſwer from the Princeſs, and me, to be followed, his Letters were taken from him, and carried unto a Man, who was excellent at imitating of Hands, to be counterfeited: It happened, for the favour of his Cheat, that this Man who had the Letters, was brought up in the Houſe of Artanus his Father, unknown unto Spitridates, ſo that knowing him to be the Son of his old Maſter, he was eaſily ſuborned to carry the counterfeited Letters of Artanus, which cauſed leſs knavery to be ſuſpected. That which moved Artanus unto this, was becauſe he hoped the great courage of Pharnaces would cauſe him to be killed in this War, and then if he could but ſend Spitridates far enough, he himſelf ſhould then be the only Man of Quality in all the Kingdom, which could pretend unto the Princeſs. After that Spitridates was well confirmed in his belief of being deceived, he related with a far more calm Mind than before, the diſpair which he was in, and how he reſolved to ſeek out a Death ſomewhere ſo far off the Princeſs, that ſhe ſhould never hear any more news of him: How in this ſad Deſign, he went unto that Port which was neareſt, and to imbark in the firſt Ship which put to Sail, without ſo much as asking whither it went: How by chance it was a Merchants Ship of Tenedos which took him in: How from thence he went to Epheſus, becauſe Reports went that Crœſus would aſſault it: How he was in all that War, and yet could not meet with Death, although he did ſufficiently expoſe himſelf unto all Dangers: How remembring himſelf, that if he would follow the Ambition of Arſamones, rather than the Love of the Princeſs Ariminta, he might be a King; and that he preferred the Fetters of Ariminta, before the Crown of Bithynia, he cauſed to be painted upon his Buckler, a Slave, who refuſed Crowns, and made choice of Chains, as I already told you: How after the Concluſion of that War, he imbarqued again for Cyprus, hoping that Iſland which was conſecrated unto the Mother of Love, would be more propitious unto him, than any other; but conceiving that Journey too pleaſant for an unfortunate Man, he paſſed into Sicilie: afterwards, not being able to ſtay in any Place, he would needs put to Sea again, had he not met with a Perſian Magi, who being new come aſhore, did render him all imaginable Honour; ſpeaking an hundred things in a Language which he underſtood not. An Interpretor which he carried with him for the conveniency of his Travel, told Spitridates how this Man was a Perſian, who took him to be the Son of his King, whom Merchants had reported to be drowned at Chalcedonia: Spitridates hearing this, anſwered him by the Interpretor, that he was not a Perſian: that it was very true it was ſuppoſed he was drowned at Chalcedonia, but he was not: But whatſoever this Interpretor ſaid, this Perſian would not be perſwaded but all that Spitridates ſaid was but Excuſes. In concluſion, Sir, he was ſo importunate with Spitridates, to confeſs that which he was ignorant of, as he was forced to leave him: But this Man going unto the Magiſtrate of the Town, told him, that the King his Maſter, had loſt his only Son, and Succeſſour unto his Dominions, who for ſome concealed Reaſons, would not return into his Country; and how that by chance he had met with him, that he was in this Town, and ready to imbarque away. He conjured the Magiſtrate to arreſt him, and to ſend him back unto the King his Father: ſo that this Magiſtrate finding the Perſian of a grave Phiſiognomy, and had acquaintance with the greateſt and wiſeſt Men in the Town, ſent Orders to ſtop Spitridates, as being Son to the King of Perſia, and to treat him with all reſpect as befitting his Quality. You may eaſily imagine that this Prince was extreamly amazed at it; he uſed all his Arguments to undeceive theſe Men, but the more he denied, the more this Perſian maintained that he was Cyrus.

In Concluſion, the Magiſtrate ſent both Spitridates and this Perſian unto the Prince of the Place, who after he had heard them both, and fearing to commit an Error, did ſend them both unto the King of Perſia, and made choice of a Man of a good Ingenuity and Quality for this Imployment, and ſay what Spitridates could, he was ſent away with a great Number of Souldiers. I ſhall omit the Relation of his Melancholy during ſo long a Voyage, during all which time he was guarded very vigilantly: I ſhall only acquaint you, that the Perſian Magi died during this Voyage: and being come into Perſia, where the Embaſſador which went with them, heard that all the People believed Cyrus to be dead; and that the Merchants ſaw him drowned, he began to believe Spitridates, conceiving he had no reaſon to conceal his being the Son of a King, as really he was ſo: But ſo it happened that this Embaſſador fell ſick as well as the Magi, and died for Company: ſo that Spitridates was now at more Liberty, and ſtole away from this Embaſſadors Men, when they were in the height of their Mourning: but yet notwithſtanding, he was often in Danger to be ſtopped by ſeveral others who took him to be you, Sir: And ſince he was reſolved to draw nearer the Place where we were, that he might hear in what part of the World his Princeſs was, he paſſed out of Perſia, into Media, where he was alſo followed divers times, not knowing the reaſon why: Afterwards being come as far as the Frontiers of Galatia, there he heard of the Bythinian Rebellion, and of the War which the King his Father had declared againſt the King of Pontus; alſo he did afterwards tell the Princeſs Ariſtea, that this News did ſo cruelly perplex him, and he fell ſo extreamly ſick upon it, that never Man was more violently tormented: for hearing every Day a Relation of his Father's Victories, and alſo of Prince Euriclides his Death, he conceived this to be the worſt way to regain the Opinion of the Princeſs Ariminta: not that he wiſhed the King his Father were vanquiſhed, but that he himſelf knew not what to wiſh. In Concluſion (ſaid he unto the Princeſs Ariſtea) You ſee me here, dear Siſter, well recovered of my Sickneſs, againſt my Will, and deſiring your Advice, what Courſe I ſhall take: for though my Princeſs ſhould be perfidious unto me, yet would I deliver her out of the Hands of Artanus, where I underſtand ſhe is. That is not an eaſy matter for you to do, ſaid ſhe unto him, unleſs it be with the King's Forces: and the ſooner to induce him to ſee you, it is requiſite you ſeem as if you did not love that Princeſs: Ah, my dear Siſter, ſaid he, I cannot counterfeit, nor know I how to owe my good Fortune unto a Lie. But alas, ſaid he, what might my Princeſs think of my Silence during all theſe great Alterations? Perhaps ſhe imagines that I lurk quietly till the Wars be ended, that I afterwards would peaceably enjoy the Fruits of the Victory: but my Divine Princeſs, how unjuſt would you be in ſuch a thought? Well, Sir, after many ſuch like Complaints and Lamentations as theſe, Spitridates retired himſelf unto the place where he was to lodg; and Ariſtea told him before he left her, that the Prince Intaphernes, the Son of Gadates, who is now in the Army of Ciaxares, had done great Services unto the King his Father; and that the Princeſs Iſtrina his Siſter, came unto the Queen Arbiana, preſently after the Queen Nitocris died, who deſired it ſhould be ſo: After this, Spitridates went away, and the next Morning the Queen and Princeſs ſent unto him, with Advice to keep himſelf cloſe, until he heard from them, and that they were going unto the Camp where Arſamones was ſick: and ſince the Army was not above one Days Journy from Heraclea, they ſhould be there that ſame Night: But ſince they found Arſamones very ill, it was the next Day in the Morning, before they could acquaint him how they had received ſome News of Spitridates, but they did not tell him he was come, becauſe they would not expoſe him unto any Danger. Arſamones was much ſurprized at the News and Diſcourſe of Arbiana, and the Princeſs Ariſtea obſerved both Aſtoniſhment and Anger in his Face: yet notwithſtanding his angry and tumultuous Thoughts, ſhe perceived ſome Signs of Joy mixed with them: And indeed ſince Arſamones had no other Son, though he had ſome Reſentments of Diſpleaſure againſt him, in reſpect of the King of Pontus, yet was he very glad and deſirous to ſee him that was to be his Succeſſor: Therefore after he had pauſed a while, If Spitridates (ſaid he unto the Queen his Wife) return with the Mind of a Slave, as he had when he broke out of Priſon, it is but fit he ſhould be fettered again; but if he return with ſuch a Mind as becomes a King, it is fit he ſhould be treated like ſuch a Prince as hereafter he may be. Therefore, Madam, ſaid he unto the Queen, let him know, if you pleaſe, that he himſelf is the Arbitrator of his own Deſtiny: and if he have a Mind to finiſh this War, which I have ſo proſperouſly begun, and bring the Princeſs Ariminta into my Hands as my Priſoner, I ſhall entertain him, and give him the Command of my Army: But if he think to return, and continue his Affection unto her, whom he ought to look upon as the Daughter and Siſter of our Tyrants, I ſhall let him ſee that I am Maſter of two Crowns which I have conquered, and can beſtow them upon whom I pleaſe: He has been long enough abſent, ſaid ſhe, to forget his Paſſion: therefore, (ſaid he, and looked upon the Princeſs Ariſtea) I give you a Commiſſion to dive into the Secrets of his Heart, and diſcover his real Thoughts: for I perceive you know more than yet you tell me, and perhaps he is already in Heraclea. Arbiana would have denied it; but it was after ſuch a manner, that ſhe more encreaſed the King's Belief, ſo that he ſaid unto them, No, no, if Spitridates be wiſe, let him not fear any thing: therefore if he be returned, as I believe he is, return you into Heraclea, (ſaid he unto the Princeſs his Daughter) and if you find him ſuch a one as I ſay, then bring him hither; but if he be not, I permit him to return unto his Exile again; yet I ſay, if he be come with Intentions of good Fortune unto me, and himſelf, let him come hither in all haſte, becauſe I would then imploy him, ſince I am not well my ſelf, againſt Cabira, and give Artanus no longer time to fortify it, and himſelf in it. The Queen hearing him ſay ſo, confeſſed the Truth: and the next Morning the Princeſs returned unto Heraclea, with private Inſtructions from the Queen, to deſire Spitridates that he would diſſemble his Love; and to tell him, that when Ariminta is under the Power of Arſamones, ſhe would intercede, and keep him from any rigorous treating of her: and that perhaps the rare Merits of that Princeſs would in Concluſion win Arſamones to favour her: and that to conclude all in one Word, he muſt neceſſarily force himſelf, and diſguiſe his Thoughts for a time. The Princeſs did negotiate with him very handſomly: for as ſoon as ſhe came to Heraclea, ſhe ſent to Spitridates, and uſed all poſſible Arguments expedient for the Buſineſs: But when ſhe found that he could not reſolve upon a Diſſimulation, What do you intend to do then, ſaid ſhe unto him? the Princeſs Ariminta is under the Hands of Artanus, where I believe ſhe is in a worſe Condition then ſhe would be under the Diſpoſe of my Father, and in Heraclea, where I might be ſerviceable unto her. Ah, dear Siſter, ſaid he, my Soul is ballanced betwixt two great Extreams: I do know very well that it is my Duty to get Ariminta out of the Power of Artanus, but I know alſo, that it does not become me to releaſe her, that ſhe may be again a Priſoner. Of two Evils the leaſt is to be choſen, replied the Princeſs, and, as I conceive, there is no Compariſon betwixt theſe two. Spitridates was then a long while ſilent, contemplating whether there was not a middle way between theſe two to be taken: but the more he thought upon it, the further was he from finding it: gladly would he have preſerved his Reſpects unto the King his Father; he wiſhed he were out of this vexing Neceſſity of diſguiſing his real Thoughts; he did moſt earneſtly deſire that the Kingdom of Pontus were reſtored unto him who loſt it, and keeping only the Kingdom of Bithynia, he might marry the Princeſs Ariminta, and ſo place her upon the Throne hereafter: But yet he knew well enough that Arſamones would never conſent unto ſuch Propoſitions; ſo that not knowing what Courſe to take, he was extreamly perplexed. Yet when he bethought himſelf that Artanus had the Power to perſecute the Princeſs; Well, my dear Siſter, ſaid he unuo her, I am too long in deliberating: and ſince I know that Ariminta is in the Power of my Rival, it is too much to conſider upon one Minute longer: Come then, let us go unto the King, and tell him, ſince he will needs have it ſo, that I am not at all in Love: let us tranſact like an Enemy, that I may hereafter appear a moſt real Lover: and let us not think it a Diſhonour to tell an innocent Lie, and to aſſume that Diſguiſe which I would never undertake, but to ſet the moſt glorious Princeſs in the World at Liberty. After much ſuch Diſcourſe as this, Spitridates promiſed the Ptinceſs Ariſtea, to carry the matter towards the King, as ſhe deſired: ſo that without any loſs of time both of them went to Court the next Morning, and would not admit of any Viſits in Heraclea until he had ſeen the King: when they were come unto the Camp, they underſtood that this News had ſo much troubled Arſamones, as he was worſe than he was before; and ſince the Departure of the Princeſs he expreſſed much Impatiency of ſeeing Spitvidates. He was no ſooner arrived, but it was told the King, who commanded him to enter preſently, and notwithſtanding his Sickneſs, he received him with many Teſtimonies of Tenderneſs: But after the firſt Paſſion, whereof he was not Maſter, he aſſumed a more ſerious and ſevere Countenance: Spitridates, ſaid he unto him, I muſt tell you, that if it be the Pleaſure of the Gods to diſpoſe of me, I would not have you to hold any Treaty, or contract any Alliance with thoſe unto whom we have been Slaves: And if you do, I do diſpenſe with all my Subjects, from acknowledging you as their Prince. Sir (ſaid Spitridates unto him, and bowed) Doubtleſs the Gods will permit you to enjoy your Conqueſts long, and I ſhall have leiſure enough hereafter to underſtand your Intentions more preciſely: Therefore it will ſuffice, if you will be pleaſed, to grace me ſo far as to tell me what Service I ſhall do you for the preſent, as I am your Subject, without any further Diſcourſe of what I ought to do when I am King, as yet I am not. It is my Intentions, anſwered the King, that if my Sickneſs continue, you ſhall command my Army: That you march againſt Artanus, and reduce Arminta into my Power. Spitridates did then bethink himſelf of ſome Words which would admit of an ambiguous ſenſe, which might both ſatisfy the Nicety of his Love, and might make the King believe that he would punctually obey him; and indeed, he did hit of it ſo handſomly, that the King was ſatisfied with his Anſwer, and imbraced him: after which being retired unto a very magnificent Tent which was prepared for him, he was viſited by Intaphernes, and all the Officers of the Army; for we were informed of all theſe Paſſages afterwards from Spitridates himſelf. Within three days after, the Phyſicians told Arſamones, that there was no danger in his Diſeaſe, but yet it would continue long; ſo that not to loſe time, he gave Orders unto Spitridates to go, and beſiege Artanus: yet appointing one of his Lieutenant-Generals to have an obſervant Eye upon all the Actions of this Prince. Then went Arſamones with the Queen, and the Princeſs his Daughter unto Heraclea; as for the Princeſs Iſtrina, ſhe was there before: So Spitridates departed for Cabira, the Prince Intaphernes being his principal Lieutenant-General, with whom he contracted a great League of Friendſhip. You may imagine, Sir, how much we were ſurprized, when we were informed, by our faithful Guard, that there arrived a Cavalier at Heraclea, having a Buckler, (as I told you before,) and afterwards that this Cavalier was Spitridates, and that this Prince was ſo gracious with the King his Father, that he made him General of his Army: Our wonder for a long time was ſo great, that our Words could not expreſs it; Joy to hear that Spitridates was alive, and the incertainty of his Deſign in coming againſt Artanus, did ſo divide the Mind of the Princeſs Ariminta, that ſhe knew not whether ſhe ſhould grieve or rejoice: However, Madam (ſaid I unto her, when ſhe began to grieve) I cannot chuſe but be extreamly glad to know that Spitridates is living. I have the ſame Reſentments, replied ſhe, but however, my Soul muſt needs be in much unquietneſs, for Arſamones has not altered his Opinion; and it ſeems to be almoſt without all Queſtion, that ſince Spitridates is in ſuch Favour with him, they are both of one Mind. Oh, Madam, (ſaid I unto her) cenſure not before you hear: But yet it is very likely, anſwered ſhe, that I am not miſtaken; a long abſence may eaſily bury all his Affection unto me in the Grave of Oblivion; and he may as eaſily prefer the enjoyment of two Kingdoms, above a Princeſs whom he has not a long time ſeen, and who has nothing but Misfortunes to her Portion. The truth is, Heſionida, if Spitridates do continue faithful, it is a Miracle: and if he do not, then doubtleſs it is the greateſt Misfortune that ever could happen unto me: ſo that not knowing whether I ſhould pray for or againſt him, whether he will ſet me at Liberty, or take me Priſoner, my Soul is in a moſt reſtleſs condition. I did all I could to leſſen her Fears, and fortify her hopes: But, to tell you truly, I do believe they both raigned ſucceſſively in her Heart for many days, and ſhe was not well reſolved in her ſelf. In the mean while Artanus was ſomething ſick upon the Buſineſs; the very Name of Spitridates, and of his return, did caſt him into a Qualm, nor could all the power of his Love cure him: ſince he had many brave and gallant Men with him, they moved him, much againſt his Mind, God knows, to go and meet their Enemy, and to hazard a Battel: at firſt, he did oppoſe the Motion, but afterwards fearing, that if he ſhould diſcover his Cowardiſe, then doubtleſs they would all forſake him, therefore he conſented unto them, and reſolved to be there himſelf: ſo that all the Regiments being drawn up under the Walls of the Town, where we were, he viewed them, and without bidding any Adieu unto the Princeſs, he departed, leaving her under the Guardſhip of a Captain, who was abſolutely his Creature. I ſhall not relate unto you, Sir, all the particulars of this War; only thus much in ſhort, that Spitridates was Victor, and the Coward Artanus being much againſt his will engaged in Fight, was mortally wounded by the Hand of Spitridates, who took him Priſoner; this perfidious Wretch living only ſo long as to confeſs the counterfeiting of the Princeſs's Letter and mine: The ſhattered part of this defeated Army fell into the Town, and all the Commanders conſulted what to do, and reſolved to receive their Orders from the Princeſs, hoping thereby to obtain more advantageous Conditions, by a treaty with Spitridates.

All the Captains then came unto her Chamber, whilſt we were altogether ignorant of any Paſſages, becauſe Artanus had taken that Guard, who was our Intelligencer, with him, and he was killed in the Battel. At the firſt ſight of them ſhe knew not how to interpret the Viſit; but one of them being Speaker for the reſt, ſaid thus unto her; Madam, we are come to beg pardon for our paſt Rebellion; we come to tell you that Artanus has loſt the Battel, and his Life, and we come to receive Orders from you, as the Daughter and Siſter of our Kings; therefore, Madam, we beſeech you let us know what is your pleaſure we ſhall do? whether you will render your ſelf, or whether it is your pleaſure we ſhould defend you againſt the Prince Spitridates? which of theſe two ways ſoever you are pleaſed to command, we are ready to obey you. You tell me of ſo many Wonders at once, ſaid ſhe, that I cannot upon a ſuddain preciſely reſolve you; but it is moſt certain that I muſt take no other part but the King my Brothers, and that his Enemies, mies are and muſt be mine; and if they will not do us juſtice, it will be much more noble to die in defending our Selves, then cowardly to ſubmit: Yet ſince you are from Rebellious Subjects become my Protectors, I do conjure you to take ſuch Orders as are neceſſary for the preſervation of the Town, and not to attempt any thing without my knowledg; and for the preſent I conceive you have nothing elſe to do, but to defend your ſelves if they aſſault you. Here, Sir, was a great Alteration in our Fortune, our Guards became almoſt our Slaves, and the Priſoners command their Keepers. But all this while Spitridates was not without his Vexations amidſt all the Joys of his Victory, ſince he was not ſo abſolute Maſter of his Army that he could do what he would; ſo that in appearance he muſt carry himſelf as a mortal Enemy againſt the Princeſs, but really as a Man who preferred his Love unto her above all things elſe. He ſent then to ſummon the Town, To render it ſelf unto his Diſcretion, after he had ſurrounded it on all ſides, for he could do no otherwiſe, becauſe that Lieutenant-General, whom Arſamones did ſet as an Adjutant with him, was very ſevere and obſtinate. When the Princeſs heard that Spitridaies had ſent a Meſſenger, ſhe commanded him to be brought into her Preſence, and with an incenſed Spirit ſaid unto him; Tell your Maſter, that the Princes of Pontus are not uſed to pay Obedience unto the Princes of Bithynia, but rather have been for a long time Obeyed; and that I could never have believed that the Siſter unto the Prince Sinneſis ſhould have been thus treated withal by Spitridates: and laſtly, ſince he goes ſo unjuſtly to work, he may aſſure himſelf he ſhall find it a greater Difficulty to overcome the Princeſs Ariminta, then he did in defeating Artamus. After this Anſwer, the Herald departed, and the Princeſs being a liberty to condole with me, Well, Heſimida (ſaid ſhe unto me) what do you now think of Spitridates? I think that he is come to releaſe you, Madam, (ſaid I unto her) and I cannot ſuſpect that he deſires to have you in the Power of Arſamones, but in his own Power. Servitude is not the way to Liberty, replied ſhe, and very few Lovers uſe to releaſe thoſe they love by ſuch extraordinary ways. But, Madam, replied I, as the caſe is, what would you have Spitridates do? I know not, anſwered ſhe, and ſighed, but I am ſure I would not be brought under the Power of him who is the ruiner of my Family; yet Heſionida, I have no reaſon to complain againſt Fortune, but rather give her thanks, ſince ſhe has done all ſhe can to give me cauſe of excluding that tenderneſs which I kept in my Heart for Spitridates, becauſe he is Son unto the declared Enemy of the King my Brother. I ſhould never end, Sir, if I ſhould relate all what the Princeſs ſaid, and all that Spitridates thought upon the return of the Herald; for ſince he durſt not ſend any obliging Meſſage, leſt he ſhould render himſelf ſuſpected, he perceived by her Anſwer that ſhe did not think he diſſembled when he tranſacted with her as an Enemy; yet had he ſome conſolation, that the Commanders of Artanus his Army did obey her, and that it was her ſelf only with whom he was to treat; ſo that changing his Opinion, he call'd a Council of War the next day, where he declared, That there was no great Honour to be got by forcing a Town which was kept and defended only by a Princeſs, but that it were expedient, firſt to uſe all endeavours to reduce it otherwiſe, before it came to open Force; ſo that to ſave Blood, and the King his Father's Forces, and alſo carry the Matter handſomely with a Woman, he did reſolve to ſend and deſire to ſpeak with her: The major part of Officers, who began to love Spitridates, principally Intaphernes, did approve of his Deſign, and there was none who did oppoſe it but that Lieutenant-General, of whom I ſpake, and he did moſt violently oppoſe it, as afterwards we came to know: but do what he could, ſince the plurality of Voices carried it, he was forced to ſubmit, and Spitridates had his deſire.

He ſent then the ſecond time unto the Princeſs by one who was very faithful and truſty, with Orders moſt humbly to beſeech her, that he might have the honour to ſpeak with her, before he was forced to make any Attempts againſt her; he commanded him to tell her, that he conjured her by the glorious Name and Memory of the Prince Sinneſis, not to deny this Favour; and that ſhe would be pleaſed to believe that he is, and ever will be, the ſame Spitridates which once ſhe knew him. This Meſſenger received this Order in private, but he ſpoke in publick before all the Captains, with leſs tenderneſs, and more ſharply: Might he have followed the Humour of his Paſſion, he would never have thought upon the Security of his Perſon, but would have entred into the Town, and not ſo much as deſired her to engage her Word; but ſince he was not abſolutely his own Maſter, and not to render himſelf ſuſpected by his own Party, he beſeeched her ſhe would be pleaſed to come unto one ſide of the Wall, which was not very high, where he might with conveniency ſpeak unto her. Theſe, Sir, were the Orders which the Envoy of Spitridates received, whoſe coming was great Joy unto me, as well as to the Princeſs, who then began to hope ſhe had been deceived in her Opinion of that Prince; yet ſhe was ſo ſurprized at his Meſſage, that ſhe took two hours time before ſhe would return an Anſwer: and to colour the Matter, ſhe aſſembled all the Officers into a Council, though it was with me reſolved upon what courſe to follow; I ſaw ſome Joy in her Eyes, which ſpoke her hopes that this Prince was not ſo culpable as ſhe believed him; and I perceived alſo that ſhe was reſtleſs, and knew not whether ſhe ſhould ſee him, or not ſee him. Seeing her in this anxiety, I told her ſhe was too blame in making any doubt of the Matter. Ah, Heſionida, replied ſhe, It is not ſo eaſy a Matter to determine: for if Spitridates come as an ambitious Prince, who prefers the poſſeſſion of two Crowns before Me, I ought not to ſee him, ſince it would be to no Purpoſe: But if, on the contrary, he be the ſame he was, yet ought I not to ſee him, ſince it is impoſſible I ſhould be the ſame to him I have been heretofore; and the ſtate of Things being changed, I ought to change my Thoughts alſo; therefore, Heſionida, I muſt in reaſon conclude, that it is not expedient for me to ſee him; yet notwithſtanding, if they counſel me to ſee him, then I will; and if I find him Innocent, I ſhall not hate him. If he be Innocent, Madam, (ſaid I unto her) you would be very unjuſt to withdraw your Affection from him, and which way ſoever I look upon the Buſineſs, I find it expedient for you to ſee him; for though he be your Enemy, yet, as the caſe is with you now, you muſt have recourſe unto his Clemency; and if he be your Lover and Adorer, then ought you to accept his Services, and rely upon his Generoſity and Love. The truth is, Sir, I found it no great Difficulty to perſwade the Princeſs unto a Parley with him; but ſince my expectations from this Enterview were very great, ſo it might be in ſuch a Place where they might ſpeak together with Freedom, I told the Princeſs, that it would be much better if ſhe met Spitridates upon the middle of the Bridg, which ſtands over that River that runs under the Walls of the Town. After the Princeſs had well conſulted, and ſince all the Officers could not foreſee any happy iſſue of this Siege but by ſome advantageous Capitulation, and alſo ſince they ſaw no hopes of any Relief, they adviſed her to ſee Spitridates, and ſhe cauſed him whom the Prince had ſent to come unto her, to tell him that ſhe conſented unto the Deſire of his Maſter, commanding one of her Captains to ſhew him the place where ſhe deſired this Meeting might be next Morning, and alſo to inſtruct him in ſuch Orders as ſhould be obſerved, and during which time there ſhould be a Ceſſation of all Hoſtility. After this Meſſenger had viewed the Bridg, and returned to his Maſter, who approved of the alteration of the Place, the reſt of the Day and Night following was imployed in Preparations for this Enterview, and making the Place fit, which indeed was a moſt Glorious Sight: As the River was great, the Bridg over it was alſo very large and ſtately, ſo that it contributed much unto the magnificence of this Buſineſs; for juſt over the middle Arch were Liſts made ready, and covered with rich Sidonian Tapiſtry; over the Head was a rich and ſtately Pavilion, truſſed up on two ſides with Golden Strings, or to let down if the Sun did offend; ſo that the next Morning Spitridates, who was all Joy, in hopes to ſee the Princeſs, did not fail of his Time, after he had drawn up all his Forces into Battalia, in ſight of the Town, and cauſed five hundred Foot, and two hundred Horſe only to advance with him to the end of the Bridg. The Princeſs on the other ſide commanded, that all the Walls ſhould be well lined with Souldiers, and with the like number of Horſe and Foot came to the other end of the Bridg: She no ſooner knew that Spitridates was come, but ſhe prepared to meet him, and that ſo Fair, as I was aſtoniſhed at the mixture of ſo much Melancholy, and ſo much Beauty together: Since the Sun was not likely to annoy, I moved her Women to dreſs her as ſhe was uſed when ſhe went to hunt at Heraclea, which was with a waving Plume over her Head, to caſt a ſhadow upon her Face. The Princeſs being thus dreſſed, went unto the end of the Bridg,and was waited upon by all her Women, and Commanders in her Army: as ſoon as ſhe appeared, Spitridates advanced, being waited upon by the like Number. The Princeſs came to the Bars, and went under the Pavilion, under which we were alſo, but at a diſtance behind her: Spitridates did wear the lovelieſt Sute of Arms upon Earth, and in ſpite of his Melancholy, his Garb was ſo high, and his Air ſo ſprightly and delighting, that I never ſaw him more glorious than that Day; as ſoon as he eſpied the Princeſs afar off, he ſaluted her with much reverence, and both of them meeting at the Bars at the ſame time, all the Men of both ſides remaining under their Colours and Arms,Spitridates did bow down to the very ground, and ſhe returned him her Complement very civilly. Afterwards began his diſcourſe: When I ſent unto you, Madam, (ſaid he) to beg the honour of treating with you, I never had any intentions of coming to capitulate with you,but in all humility I come to receive your Commands, and to render you an Account of a tedious Exile, of my return, and of what I do at this preſent: Indeed, Divine Princeſs, if the Actions of the King my Father, have not rendred me unworthy of your Ear, I am come to give you an account of my Life paſt, and to hear from your own Mouth what it muſt be for the future. Since I hear you ſay ſo, (anſwered the Princeſs) I begin to think you are the very ſame Spitridates whom the late King my Father made choice of, for his Alliance; who was ſo well beloved by the Prince Sinneſis, and ſo really eſteemed by the unfortunate Ariminta; I begin to think, I ſay, that you are the ſame Spitridates, who for the Love of me endured two Impriſonments with high Generoſity; and who expreſſed an hundred ſigns of a moſt conſtant Affection: But yet, when I look upon this Bar, and all theſe Souldiers about you, then I do confeſs, me-thinks, you do not look like the ſame Spitridates I ſpeak of; but I look upon you as the Son of Arſamones, that is a mortal Enemy to the King my Brother.

Oh Madam, cryed he out, if it be your pleaſure to know what I am, I beſeech you hear; and look not upon that which may ſeduce your Reaſon, and may make me paſs in your Opinion for what I am not: I do confeſs, Madam, that if I did not infinitely, and beyond all Expreſſions, love you, I ſhould think my Father had ſome reaſon to take poſſeſſion of that Crown which was ſurreptitiouſly taken from off his Head: yet ſince he cannot do it but by the ruin of your Houſe, I ſhall look upon him (in ſpite of all Conſiderations of Ambition or Nature) as an Uſurper of his own Kingdom; and all this, becauſe my Love to you has taken the whole poſſeſſion of my Heart. You know, ſaid the Princeſs unto him, that Arſamones is not content with his own, but the Kingdom of Pontus is now in his Hands as well as the Kingdom of Bithynia; ſo that though his War were juſt in the getting of the one, yet it was moſt unjuſt in the getting of the other. I do confeſs it, Madam, ſaid he unto her, but if it may be permitted a Lover, to ſpeak ſomething in excuſe of his Father, I ſhould then ſay, that ſince Ambition and Revenge never uſe to keep within thoſe Limits which Reaſon and Juſtice preſcribe unto them; it is no wonder if an injured and an ambitious Prince do not act altogether according to the Rules of natural Equity: But, Madam, dam, loving you as I do, I will never approve of the Aꝺ: I confeſs alſo that the King my Father is injurious; that he deſerves the Name of a cruel Enemy, and that I am the Son of an Uſurper: But, Madam, you may remember, if you pleaſe, that when I began firſt to adore you, you were then (if I may ſay it) in the ſame Condition which I am now, and I then as you are now; for as the King my Father has taken the Kingdom of Pontus from your Houſe, ſo likewiſe your Father held the Kingdom of Bithynia from mine; yet for all that, Madam, I ſhall love and adore you; and though you be the Daughter of an Uſurper, (be it ſpoken without any diſreſpeꝺ unto that honour I owe you) yet I do for ever devote my ſelf unto your Service. I do wiſh unto the Gods, with all the deſires of my Soul, that the ſtate of things did ſtand upon the ſame Terms they did; that I were ſtill a Subjeꝺ unto your Brother; and that it were then permitted me to hope for the ſame which now I do. Your very long abſence, replied the Princeſs, did doubtleſs work ſome change in your Mind, otherwiſe your Baniſhment, notwithſtanding my enjoyning it, would not have been ſo long. When Spitridates heard her make that Objeꝺion, he then told, in ſhort, the cauſe of his departure from Paphlagonia; the cheat of Artanus; his diſpair when he believed her perfidious; his Voyages, his Return, and his extream Sorrows to hear of all the Viꝺories which his Father had obtained, and that ſhe was in the power of his Rival. And now, Madam, (ſaid he unto her, at the concluſion of his Relation) you know not what the Life of unfortunate Spitridates hath been; he loved ever, even when the King your Father detained that Kingdom unto which he might pretend for a ſhare, and he adored you even then when he believed you to be perfidious; he lamented all his Father's Viꝺories; he grieved at the Conqueſt of two Kingdoms; he has preferred the Condition of your Slave, before the glorious Title of a King; and he ſtill does, and ever will adore you, be you unjuſt, or as incenſed as you will againſt him; he is ſo fully devoted unto you, that there is nothing which he will not attempt for you. Yea, Madam, if you ſhould command me any thing but to turn my Arms againſt the King my Father, I ſhould do it; and truly if you ſhould be ſo unjuſt as to command that, I know not whether my Virtue were able to ſtand out againſt it. Now, after all this Madam, can you believe me culpable? I took up Arms, 'tis true, but it was only to kill Artanus, and force you out of his Hands: I carry them ſtill, I confeſs; but how could I have come to have known your Pleaſure, unleſs I had ſeemed your Enemy? Therefore, Madam, ſince I am only unfortunate, and not at all culpable, you would be moſt unjuſt if you ſhould change your opinion of me. Though you have fully perſwaded me of your innocency, replied the Princeſs, yet are you not nearer any happineſs; for truly, Spitridates, true Generoſity will never allow me to preſerve ſo pure an Affection as that which I retain for you, ſince you are Son unto a declared Enemy of the King my Brother: for, conſider, I pray you, in what a deplorable Condition is that Prince, who of two flouriſhing Kingdoms which once he had, has nothing but one poor Ship in his Power, and that too more in the power of unconſtant Winds and Waves, than in his own; and would you wiſh me, Spitridates, to ſurrender my ſelf without any Conditions? and can you think I ever will (if Arſamones would conſent) ſit upon that Throne which belongs not to me, whilſt the King my Brother who has moſt right unto it, is toſſed upon the Waves, and languiſhing in a miſerable Exile? No, no, I never will; and if you think it, you eſteem me but a little, and know me not at all: I have eſteemed you, I do confeſs, and do ſtill very much; and if this phraſe be too weak to expreſs, think upon one more obliging for your Satisfaction, and I will conſent unto it; but yet for all that, though my Heart be the ſame unto you, that it was at Heraclea, yet I cannot comply with you, but as with the Son of mine Enemy: therefore, Spitridates, one of theſe two things muſt neceſſarily be done; either move the King your Father to content himſelf with the Kingdom of Bithynia, and reſtore the Kingdom of Pontus, or elſe you reſolve never to have this Place but by Violence and Force, or at the leaſt upon ſuch Capitulations, as ſhall permit me to go whither I ſhall hear the King my Brother is: for I do peremptorily declare my ſelf, that you ſhall never put me into the Hands of Arſamones, and there is nothing which I will leave unattempted, rather then I will ſubmit unto that. I know very well that the Queen Arbiana, and the Princeſs Ariſtea would protect me; but I know withal, that all Aſia would ſuſpect me for either Treachery, or Weakneſs, which I am not capable of; therefore, Spitridates, never endeavour to make me change my Thoughts, for it will be abſolutely in vain; and if there be any memory of the Prince Sinneſis yet remaining in you, promiſe me that you will never bring me under the Power of Arſamones, if Fortune ſhould reduce me into yours. I will promiſe you any thing, Madam, replied he, upon condition you will promiſe me not to hate Spitridates, if he be not able to compaſs all your deſires. The Gods do know, that if I were abſolute Maſter of two Kingdoms, you, and only you, ſhould be the ſole Diſpoſer of them; and I ſhould without the leaſt murmur conſent unto the loſs of the Bithynian Crown once again, rather than I would in the leaſt diſpleaſe you. But alas, Madam, they are not in my Power, the King my Father is in Poſſeſſion, and all I can do is to imploy the Queen my Mother, and the Princeſs my Siſter to perſwade him; for my part, if I ſhould quit the Army, I ſhould then fear he would not permit me to return, and ſo I ſhould diſable my ſelf from being inſeparably devoted unto your Fortunes, as my Intentions are: But Madam, may I be ſo bold as to tell you, that if Spitridates were as deeply rooted in your Heart as he might be, you would not tranſact thus with him? You would then leave the conduct of things unto the Gods, and wait their happy time for the Re-eſtabliſhment of the King your Brother; nor would you then reject a Prince who for you has ſuffered Priſons, Baniſhments, and all imaginable Miſeries; and who may hereafter make you change a Priſon for a Throne, and bring you into a condition to give a Crown unto the King of Pontus: Not, Madam, but that I am reſolved to obey you moſt exactly, but becauſe I foreſee into what a miſerable extremity I ſhall be reduced. I do not intend to impoſe any Impoſſibilities upon you, replied the Princeſs, ſomething more mildly, and therefore, if you cannot obtain theſe my deſires, I ſhall ſurrender up the Town, upon condition that I may be conducted unto what place I ſhall chuſe to go unto; and if that cannot be obtained, then aſſure your ſelf I will bury my ſelf under the Ruins of the Ramparts, whilſt you enjoy the pleaſant Fruits of your Father's Conqueſts, and making Love ſubmit unto Ambition, by forgetting the Princeſs Ariminta, you become as happy as I am miſerable. Ah cruel Lady, ſaid he unto her, I ſhall make it appear that I am not capable of any ſuch Thoughts: No, no, Madam, you ſhall never ſee Spitridates happy as long as you are miſerable; nor will he ever be a King, until you be in a condition to be a Queen, and this I ſolemnly proteſt before the Gods who hear me: But I beſeech you, Madam, promiſe me this at the leaſt, that when I have abandoned all the World for you, you will be pleaſed to let me follow and participate of your Deſtinies, and that I may never leave you. The Princeſs was ſo moved at the Expreſſions of Spitridates, that ſhe repented her ſelf that ſhe had ſo perplexed him; I will believe, ſaid ſhe unto him, that all your Thoughts are generous, and I will promiſe you, not to ſuſpect your Fidelity; and be perſwaded of this, that though I act as your Enemy in many things, yet you ſhall be ſtill the ſame in my Heart that ever you were; yet for all this, I muſt tell you, that in all likelihood we ſhall not agree. Oh Madam, ſaid he, that Language is ſo cruel, as it moves me to part with my Life, and ſo neither take your part, nor turn Arms againſt them I command: I am not of ſo violent a temper as you, replied ſhe; and as I do not intend to do any thing unworthy of my ſelf, ſo I do not expect or deſire any thing from you, which ſhall be diſhonourable for you: Therefore without any more unprofitable Complaints, ſaid ſhe, and ſighed, I adviſe you to go back, Spitridates, and endeavour to induce Arſamones unto ſome Reaſon; let thoſe whom you imploy, tell him, that the beſt Expedient to preſerve the Kingdom of Bithynia (which is his right) in Peace, is, to reſtore the Kingdom of Pontus, which is not his right: Go, Spitridates, and tranſact with all your Ingenuity, both for your Satisfaction, and mine; And if you cannot induce Arſamones unto it, yet however, remember that you preſerve my Liberty, if you deſire to preſerve my Life.

Spitridates was ſo troubled at theſe Words, as he hardly knew how to anſwer; Why Madam, ſaid he, would you have me leave you? Becauſe it is not convenient, anſwered ſhe: And let me tell you once more, Spitridates, becauſe I deſire to die in Liberty. And let me tell you once again, Madam, ſaid he, and interrupted her, That I deſire to die your Slave. It is not for thoſe who are happy, replied ſhe, to deſire Death. Nor is it for thoſe who are unfortunate, ſaid he, to deſire Life; and therefore, Madam, if I cannot alter either the Mind of the King my Father, or yours, though I ſhould ſet you at Liberty, yet ſhould I expect nothing but my Grave. Since your Life is, and ever ſhall be, moſt dear unto me, anſwered ſhe, I deſire you ſhould preſerve it: But, Spitridates, once more I adviſe you to retire, and tell your Captains that which I ſhall tell mine, which is, that you cannot give an anſwer unto my Propoſitions, before you have ſent unto the King your Father. Your Wits are at ſo much liberty, Madam, replied he, that I perceive your Heart is not over-deeply engaged. Since you have ſo great a Soul, replied ſhe, this Anſwer is not becoming you; but Spitridates, I will pardon you, and wiſh you would not think as you ſeem to do of me. In ſaying ſo, ſhe bowed unto him, and went away, agreeing firſt, that there ſhould be a ceſſation of Arms, until the Anſwer of Arſamones was received. For my part I never ſaw a more lamentable parting: Spitridates was as pale as if Death were in his Face; the Princeſs, for all her high Soul, ſeemed ſo dejected at that inſtant, as it might well have been a Cordial unto the Prince, had he been able to have diſcerned the ſadneſs of her Eyes. He looked after her as long as he could, but ſo Planet-ſtruck, that he knew not what he ſaw: When the Princeſs was gone ten or twelve Paces from the Bar, I ſtepped to him; Sir, ſaid I, Fortune offers you a good occaſion to uſe your Generoſity. Fortune, anſwered he, may be more propitious unto me in the favour of Hiſionida, who may do me many good offices to the Princeſs Arimint a. I ſhall do all I can, Sir, ſaid I, and retired, but in the mean time do you all you can. This was ſpoke ſo low and quickly, that none could hear or take any notice of it: And preſently after we went back to the Town, in which we no ſooner were, but Spitridates, ſince he could not ſee the Princeſs any longer, took Horſe, and retired to his Company. He told what ſhe appointed him unto his Officers, and not to loſe any time, he made choice of one Democlides to ſend unto Arſamones. This Man was one of an excellent Wit, and who loved the Prince extreamly, ſo that he could not make a better choice; and that he might the Letter underſtand all his Thoughts, he related all the Paſſages of his Life unto him: He gave him a Letter unto the Princeſs his Mother, and another unto the Princeſs his Siſter: He writ alſo unto the King his Father with all imaginable Submiſſion; he forgot nothing, which might probably induce him to be contented with the Reconqueſt of his own Kingdom, with the Uſurpation upon the Kingdom of another: He inſtructed Democlides with all the ſubtil and politick Maximes expedient for his Negotiation, and to perſwade Arſamones, that it were better to poſſeſs one Kingdom in Peace, than to have two upon terms of War. Whilſt Spitridates was diſpatching this Captain, the Princeſs was exceedingly grieved, and almoſt wiſhed that ſhe had not ſpoken unto him in ſo obliging a manner: Sometimes again, ſhe was very glad ſhe was not deceived in her choice, and that ſhe had no cauſe to repent her ſelf for loving Spitridates; but yet theſe Moments of Conſolation were very rare, for when ſhe conſidered the preſent condition of her Fortune, and looked upon the future, ſhe found ſo many ſad Objects of Sorrow, that all Hopes were as far from her Soul, as from the Prince's, who ſince the departure of Democlides was full of unquiet Thoughts and Fears, not to obtain any thing from Arſamones; and indeed his Apprehenſions were not without cauſe, for all the perſwaſive Arguments which the Queen and Princeſs could uſe, would not move the new King of Bithynia. This excellent Princeſs imployed all thoſe who had moſt prevalency with him, but all in vain. Democlides uſed all his politick Arguments wherewith he was inſtructed, but could not perſwade more than the reſt; the Tears of the Princeſs Ariſtea would not move him; but he anſwered them that moved him generouſly to reſtore the Kingdom of Pontus unto them it belonged, that when he and his had enjoyed the Crown of Pontus as long as the Father and the Grandfather of this King had enjoyed the Kingdom of Bithynia, then perhaps there would be ſome Juſtice in the Reſtitution demanded: I have (ſaid he) gotten it by more legitimate and honourable ways, than they uſurped ours; and it is but juſt, that they who have thus long fettered others, ſhould take their turn, and bear thoſe Fetters themſelves, that they may experimentally know the Miſeries of Servitude; and therefore it is my poſitive Pleaſure, that Spitridates aſſiſt me in taking this Town wherein the Princeſs Ariminta is, otherwiſe I ſhall let him know, that he who has not the Heart and Courage of a King, ſhall never be my Succeſſor; but treating him as a Slave, I will caſt him into Priſon with the Princeſs Ariminta, whom he loves above his own Honour. Democlides, according to the Inſtructions of Spitridates, did put him in memory of what he ſaid unto the Prince his Son, in the Ship as they departed from Heraclea, how he then ſaid he would not oppoſe his Marriage with this Princeſs. I remember it very well, ſaid he; but when I ſaid ſo, it was with this Condition, that he ſhould go in the Head of an Army to conquer two Kingdoms, and ſave me that labour; but ſince he has not performed the Condition, tell him, that as it was then diſhonourable for the Princeſs Ariminta to marry the Son of a Slave, ſo now at this time it is a ſhame for him to marry a Siſter of a conquered Uſurper, and the Slave of Arſamones, as e're long ſhe ſhall be; therefore tell him from me, that within theſe few days I will come unto the Camp my ſelf; and becauſe it will grieve him too much to captivate her whom he values above two Crowns, let him attempt nothing againſt Cabira until I come my ſelf; bid him endeavour to overcome himſelf, or otherwiſe he ſhall know the difference between a Scepter and a Priſon. You may imagine, Sir, how ſadly Democlides carried this Anſwer. The Queen did write unto the Prince her Son to comfort him; the Princeſs Ariſtea did the like; But O Heavens, how in vain were all Conſolations? Democlides underſtood at his coming away from Heraclea, that Arſamones ſent Orders unto the Lieutenant-General his Confident, that he ſhould keep a vigilant Eye upon Spitridates; and I underſtood afterwards by this Democlides, that the diſpair of Spitridates was ſo great when he received this rigid Anſwer from the King his Father, as it was likely to have coſt him his Life; yet was he very deſirous of the whole truth; and though Democlides had a deſire to have ſweetned the anſwer in the Relation, yet he durſt not, becauſe the King did ſpeak it ſo publikely before all the World, that Spitridates would certainly have known it by others, and then he had juſt cauſe of complaint againſt Democlides for concealing the truth, ſince it was that Anſwer upon which he intended to ground all his Reſolutions. What (ſaid he, after he had underſtood it) does the King my Father intend that the Princeſs Ariminta ſhall be his Slave? and that ſhe who deſerves a hundred Crowns, ſhall were Fetters? No, no, Spitridates cannot ſuffer it, or at the leaſt will attempt all ways poſſible to releaſe this incomparable and unfortunate Princeſs. Do you not admire, Democlides, ſaid he, at the ſtrange blindneſs of Men? The King my Father has all his Life complained againſt Uſurpers, and now he is become one himſelf purpoſely to make me unhappy; he, who if he pleaſe, may get unto himſelf immortal Glory, and make me the happieſt Man alive, whereas now he makes me the moſt miſerable: For, Democlides, to have got two Kingdoms, and to keep that only which he hath a right unto; and generouſly to reſtore the other, and then to beſtow the Princeſs Ariminta upon me, theſe would be things which all after-Ages would ſpeak on with Admiration; yet ſince he will not, indeed he will force me to forſake his Intereſts, though he be my Father, and my King; I muſt abſolutely diſobey him, and be all the reſt of my Life the moſt miſerable Prince upon Earth. But the greateſt wonder is, Sir, that though Ambition could never prevail againſt his Love, yet his Love did never exceſſively tranſport him againſt the King his Father; But maugre the violence of all his Sorrows, he began to contrive ways of releaſing the Princeſs, eſpecially ſince he newly received intelligence from the Princeſs Ariſtea his Siſter, that the King would be in the Army within theſe few days. He alſo perceived, that the Orders unto the Lieutenant-General were very vigilantly obſerved; but do what he could, Spitridates was ſo reſpected by the Commanders, and Souldiers, that he could not bring about this Deſign. To be ſhort, Spitridates did publickly ſend unto the Princeſs, to tell her, that the King his Father had not yet returned an Anſwer unto her Propoſitions, and that within a few days he would come himſelf, and bring the Anſwer. Mean while, after he had conſulted with Democlides how to releaſe the Princeſs, he commanded him to get into the Town diſguiſed like a Peaſant, which during the Ceſſation was no great difficulty; and that he ſhould go unto the Caſtle, and enquire for me, which accordingly he did: He delivered a Note unto me from Spitridates; the contents whereof was, That I ſhould give credit unto what Democlides ſhould tell me: ſo then, after he had delivered it unto me in private, he acquainted me with the ill ſucceſs of his Voyage, with the deſpair of Spitridates, and his Reſolution to releaſe the Princeſs, with the Orders that he had taken about it: he told me further, that the Troops which were under his particular Command, were quartered all along the River-ſide; That our beſt courſe would be to come out of the Town in the Night by Boat, and unto that Place where his Troops would wait for us, and be our convoy unto Sea, which was not above fifty Furlongs further, and that he had taken order for a Ship at the next Port: he told me further, that to move the Princeſs the more to truſt her ſelf with him, Spitridates would firſt let her ſee, he truſted her ; therefore, ſaid he, if the Princeſs pleaſe to give Orders for one of the Gates which ſhe ſhall name unto me, to let him enter, he will be there at Midnight with one Page only, and no more. You may be ſure, Sir, that I went in all poſſible haſte unto the Princeſs, and carried Democlides with me. Though the news was but a ſubject of Aſtoniſhment and Sorrow, yet to what purpoſe is Complaints where there is no Remedy ? and therefore it was reſolved upon to depart the very next Night. Since all her Women were placed about her by Artanus, we cared not for carrying them with us : and ſince all her Captains had once been her Enemies, ſhe hardly knew whether ſhe ſhould truſt any of them ; but ſince they had teſtified much Affection unto her, ſince the Death of Artanus, ſhe was unwilling to abandon them, and leave them in the lurch unto the Victory of her Enemies ; yet upon more conſideration ſhe conceived it beſt not to carry any of them with her, and that the Officers being Maſters of the Town, they might make honourable Conditions for themſelves when they pleaſed : Therefore the Reſolution was to confide in none of them, but ſuch as were neceſſary for the Buſineſs ; to wit, that Spitridates might enter, and we go out. But, Sir, I have already ſo treſpaſſed upon your Patience by the length of my Relation, as I muſt tell you in ſhort, that I took ſuch order with two Captains, as they were wholly devoted to ſerve the Princeſs in any thing whatſoever. About Midnight, Spitridates ſtole undiſcerned out of the Army, after he had left one Letter for Arſamones, and another for the Princeſs Ariſtea, and entered into the Town ; Democlides conducted him unto the Princeſs Chamber : and kneeling down, Madam, (ſaid he unto her) are you ſo generous as to ſuffer the Son of your Enemy to throw himſelf at your Feet ? and will you be pleaſed to receive your Liberty from that Prince whoſe Father would make you a Slave ? Liberty (ſaid ſhe unto him, and firſt deſired him to riſe) is ſo ſweet, that one would take it from their moſt mortal Enemy ; but Spitridates, it is not juſt I ſhould purchaſe mine with the loſs of yours: It is enough for me to eſcape out of the Tyranny of your Father, without engaging you to ſhare in my Misfortunes: Therefore, do not charge your ſelf with my Eſcape; ſeem to be ſorry for it; return unto your Camp, and live happily whilſt I ſeek out ſome blind Corner of the World to hide my Tears, and my Misfortunes in. Can you, Madam, give ſuch Counſel unto a Man whom you have promiſed to honour with your Eſteem? And indeed, how eſteem him if he ſhould be ſo unworthy as to take it? No, no, Divine Princeſs, either you care not what you ſay, or elſe you ſay this only to make trial of my Conſtancy: But ſince we have no time to ſpend, I beſeech you, Madam, let us depart, and when we have once taken Ship, then may you command what courſe we ſhall ſteer: as for my part, I am reſolved to wait upon you over all the World. The Princeſs did a while refuſe it, though it was but in appearance; at laſt, I interceded, and ſaid unto her, I beſeech you determine ſome way or other, the time is almoſt paſt, and Spitridates perhaps would be more in danger with his Father, than with you; and Democlides tells me, that all things are ready for our departure.

In concluſion, Sir, Spitridates preſented his Hand unto the Princeſs; we got happily out of the Caſtle, and Town, accompanied only with the Prince, the Page he brought, Democlides, and the two Captains, which were of the Plot, and ſo took Boat. Never was flight more proſperous than this, for we met with no obſtacle: The Troops which Democlides commanded, guarded us to the Sea; and Spitridates having cauſed a Bridg to be broke in the Night, by which other Quarters had Communication with Democlides, ſo that we were very ſafe all the way. Democlides did not expoſe his Souldiers unto any danger, for they acted according to his Orders, and it is not for Souldiers to examine the Commands of their Superiour Officers, but are bound to obey without any Diſpute, and therefore they ran no hazard. In concluſion, we came to the Ship, which waited for us, and we imbarqued, not yet knowing whither to go; nor thinking upon any thing but how to avoid the danger of falling into the power of Arſamones. When we were once in the open Sea, Spitridates came unto the Princeſs's Cabin; Madam, ſaid he unto her, you are now at liberty, and there is none here who are not moſt willing to obey you: Whither is it your Pleaſure we ſhould ſteer our Courſe? This Queſtion brought Tears from the Eyes of the Princeſs; for when ſhe could not find any Place in the World wherein ſhe had any Power, ſhe could not chuſe but fall into Apprehenſions of Sorrow; yet recollecting her Memory, ſhe told him, how ſhe heard that the King her Brother when he went from Heraclea, did deſign for Cappadocia, and to offer himſelf unto Ciaxares to deliver his Daughter, with Intentions to demand ſome aid from you: and ſhe ſaid, that ſhe could not think upon any other place of Safety but that. Then Spitridates told her, how he heard the Day before from a Souldier which came from that Army, that the Princeſs Mandana had ſuffered Shipwrack, and was drowned, and that certainly the King of Pontus was not with Ciaxares. The Princeſs then not knowing either what to ſay or do, in Concluſion reſolved, to get far enough off from Pontus, and Bithynia, and to make towards Cappadocia, to try whether what the Souldier ſaid was true. All that Night, and the next Day, we ſteered that way, and towards Evening a violent Storm did ariſe, which laſted all the Night following; at laſt we were almoſt gravelled in a Bank of Sand, but by good Fortune we eſcaped the danger without any hurt to the Ship: There we ſaw the Sea even almoſt covered with abundance of Shipwrack, and near a Rock cloſe by us, ſome Men that were dead, and ſome in whom there was ſome Life. It was a long while before we could put out a little Boat to help any of theſe miſerable Men, becauſe the Tempeſt was yet very high, but after a little Calm we took two of them up, who did yet breath, and one of them I knew to be a Servant unto the King of Pontus: I no ſooner ſaw him, but I cried out, and calling him by his Name, he turned his Eyes towards me, and would have anſwered, but could not; It was apparent enough that he knew me, for he lifted up his Hands towards Heaven, as if he did deplore the Misfortune of the King his Maſter, and ſeemed aſtoniſhed to ſee me. whilſt I was buſy in applying ſuch things unto him as common Humanity required, ſome or other did very inconſiderately advertiſe the Princeſs of this Accident, who would needs come to ſee this unfortunate Man; ſince it was ſhe who preferred him unto the King her Brother, he knew her Voice as ſoon as he heard it, and when ſhe ſpoke unto him, he began to ſtrive with himſelf, and pronounced theſe Words deſtinctly; Ah Madam, is it you? Yes, replied ſhe, but where is the King? In Armenia, ſaid he unto her, and ſent me to bring you——. In ſpeaking theſe Words he fell into a ſwound, and expired before he could end what he begun to ſpeak. The other Man alſo who we brought into the Ship died ſpeechleſs alſo, and we could know no more. Then did we ſearch his Clothes for Letters, and indeed did find one, but as ill luck was, the Water had defaced all the Characters, except two or three by which the Princeſs knew it to be the Hand of the King her Brother. This Encounter renewed all our Sorrows, and whilſt they were endeavouring to get this Ship from off this Bank of Sand, the Princeſs grieved exceedingly, not becauſe this Man had been her Slave, but becauſe he had ſomething to ſay unto her, and died before it could be known. In the mean while we got unto the open Sea, and the Princeſs deſired Spitridates to go into an Arm of the Sea not far off, where the Lower Armenia towards Pontus does border upon a little Province, which formerly was the King's. It is a hard task, Sir, to relate unto you, all the diſcourſe between Spitridates, and the Princeſs Ariminta, during our Navigation: But in ſhort, they expreſſed themſelves unto each other in all the terms that Love and Vertue could invent. After we were come into this Arm of the Sea, we quitted our Ship; and Democlides, whom Spitridates had ordered to take Money enough for a long Voyage, when he came firſt from his Quarters, went unto the next Town to buy Horſes, to carry us unto the River Euphrates; for, as you know, this River divides the two Armenia's.

menia's. Then was it put to the queſtion, what courſe Spitridates ſhould take when they came into Armenia? and it was a moſt pitiful Story unto him, when the Princeſs ſaid, that he muſt leave her; for I muſt confeſs unto you, ſaid ſhe unto him, that I dare not truſt too much unto the Generoſity of the King my Brother, and though I do know him to be very generous, yet I will not adventure you in the Power of a Prince who never loved you, eſpecially now, ſince you are Son unto his Enemy, and an Enemy who hath taken two Kingdoms from him: Therefore Spitridates, ſince your Vertue has preſerved me from falling into the Hands of the King your Father; it befits me to preſerve you from the Fury of the King my Brother. Alas, Madam, ſaid he, let not any Conſiderations of my Intereſt trouble you, nor hinder me from waiting upon you; for though the King your Brother ſhould treat me hardly, yet would I moſt willingly endure it for the Love of you. I doubt it not at all, ſaid ſhe unto him, but however I deſire you ſhould only endure the Miſeries of abſence for the love of me; for I cannot look upon you but with an Eye of great eſteem, and I know that the King my Brother will not reliſh it, becauſe perhaps he will imagine that my complacency towards you proceeds from my hopes of two Kingdoms from Spitridates. But, Madam, ſaid he unto her, whither would you have me go? Any whither, ſaid ſhe, where you may with ſafety to your Perſon wait for a turn of Fortune; and until the Heart of the King your Father be molified. But Madam, replied he, ſince I moſt willingly forſake all for you, may you not diſpenſe a little with that rigid Decorum which you obſerve in every thing? If you really love me, and think upon my Paſſion and Reſpects unto you, what Sorrows I have ſuffered, what Impriſonments I have endured, and what Exile I now undertake for you, I conceive you will permit me to live diſguiſed with you, or elſe to let us go and live together in ſome unknown Place far from any acquaintance, where we may wait upon the pleaſure of the Gods, until ſuch times as I am in a capacity to reſtore one Crown unto the King your Brother, and preſent another unto you.

what you now tell me, replied the Princeſs, is neither juſt nor honourable; for I ſhould thereby incenſe the Mind of the King my Brother, and you the King your Father, and we ſhould expoſe our ſelves to a thouſand unprofitable Miſeries. Then, ſuffer me, ſaid he, to go with you unto the King of Pontus, without any Diſguiſement or Baniſhment. Though he ſhould be in a Diſpoſition to receive you favourably, anſwered ſhe, yet certainly it would be upon a condition that you ſhould bear Arms againſt the King your Father, which queſtionleſs you never will, nor will I adviſe you unto it; and therefore, Spitridates, of neceſſity you muſt leave me. Muſt I needs leave you, Madam, replied he in a ſad Tone? Yes, ſaid ſhe, and if Reaſon will not prevail with you, I will joyn my Prayers and Commands unto it. And however, you may be ſure of this advantage, that as my Fortunes are, you need fear no Rivals. Ah Madam, cried Spitridates, in taking away of Crowns, they have not taken away your unparalled Beauty, nor your incomparable Mind, which has not a ſecond in Vertue: Therefore, Madam, I muſt always doubt it, eſpecially knowing that the King your Brother will be continually exaſperating you againſt me. Look not upon Spitridates, I beſeech you, Madam, as the Son of an Uſurper, but as a Prince who will never be King, till he can reſtore one Crown unto the King your Brother, and another preſent unto you: I have already ſaid it, and I repeat it again; you Madam, ſhall either Raign, and your Brother too, or elſe I will not; and therefore, you may if you pleaſe, be ſo juſt at the leaſt, as to give him ſome aſſurance of your Affection, who has conſecrated every Minute of his Life unto you: Do not, I beſeech you, baniſh me from you, before you aſſure me that I ſhall be entertained always in your Heart, and that nothing can even baniſh me from thence, for without this Madam, I cannot obey you. I will promiſe you, ſaid ſhe unto him, to poſſeſs the King my Brother with your Generoſity as much as I can; and will eternally remember the Commands of the dying Prince Sinneſis, and by conſequence keep my Affection entirely for you, as long as I live. May I build upon this?

ſaid this ſorrowful Prince? You may, replied ſhe, and I ſhould think my ſelf moſt unjuſt and ungrateful if I failed, ſince you are ſo generous, and ſince my Affection is ſo pure and innocent, that it were a greater Crime to reſiſt it, than preſerve it for you. I know not, Madam, whether I ſhould dare to tell you, that this is not enough. I know not, Spitridates, (ſaid ſhe, and interrupted him) whether I ſhould tell you, that I think it a little too much, and that you do me wrong to ſuſpect me, and complain. But, Madam, replied he, what is it I beſeech you that you do for me? and what can I do more for you? You do every thing, anſwered ſhe, that I can deſire, I cannot deny it; but though I do nothing for you, yet I do all I can, or may be more than I ought, and let that ſatisfy you. Oh Heavens! replied he, what do you do, my Divine Princeſs, which I can interpret unto my advantage? I ſhew you, anſwered ſhe, thoſe Sorrows which I cannot hide; you may ſee the Thoughts of my Soul in my Eyes; and I permit you to think that my Heart prefers you before all the World; and after this, Spitridates, what can you deſire more? and whether is it not more than the Princeſs Ariminta ought to do for the Son of Arſamones? However, Spitridates, take heed leſt Ambition be too prevalent with you during your abſence, ſince it is uſual to alter the Souls of all Men. To be ſure of that, replied he, do not baniſh me from you. I would I could not, anſwered ſhe, but it muſt be, and you muſt be gone. I ſhould be too tedious, Sir, if I ſhould repeat all this ſad Conference, which truly on both ſides was ſo tender, ſo generous, and ſo full of ſorrow, that I who heard it, wept; for, the Princeſs deſiring it, I was all the while preſent: It was in vain for Spitridates to uſe any Arguments of Diſſwaſion, for ſince we were got a good way into Armenia, and out of any Fears of Arſamones, ſhe would needs have him leave her; and ſhe reſolved to go either into Sicily, or Paphlagonia, and wait there for ſome Alterations in Fortune. He had a great deſire not to part until they certainly knew where the King her Brother was; but ſhe would not hearken unto him, being much afraid leſt Spitridates ſhould fall into the Hands of her Brother;

ther: So he obeyed her, but never was ſo ſad a Separation; he would needs have Democlides, and the two Captains, remain with her, and he keep none with him but his Page. I ſhall not relate every Circumſtance of this ſaid Adieu, ſince the truth is, I cannot without Tears, and ſo many Teſtimonies of my weakneſs, as perhaps you will condemn me for it: But ſo it was, Sir, that Spitridates departed the ſadeſt Man alive, and the Princeſs as melancholy as ever any in the World. Then we left the River Euphrates, and went towards Artaxates. Since the Princeſs did not know the Intentions of the King her Brother, ſhe deſired not to be divulged for what ſhe was until ſhe had ſpoken with him, ſo that all the time of our travel we did not ſo ceremoniouſly render thoſe Honours which were her due. When we came to Artaxates, where we might eaſily conceal our ſelves by Reaſon of its greatneſs, we were informed, that the King of Pontus had been there, but every one told us he was not there at that time: The Princeſs could not believe it, but imagined that the thing was known only amongſt the Grandees, and that for ſome Reaſons, which ſhe underſtood not, the King her Brother deſired to be received privately, and without any Ceremony.

In concluſion, ſhe commanded Democlides, and the other two Captains, to be ſo inquiſitive to get true Intelligence, that thoſe unto whom they addreſſed themſelves ſuſpected them for ſome cloſe Deſign: Moreover, the Prince Phaartes, Brother unto the Illuſtious Tigranes, and ſecond Son unto the King of Armenia, chancing accidentally to ſee the Princeſs Ariminta enter into a little dark Church whither we went early in a Morning, her Beauty invited his Curioſity to know who that Stranger was; for though our Habits were after the Armenian faſhion, he ſuppoſed ſhe was not an Artaxetian, becauſe he never heard her Beauty ſpoke of; ſo that being extreamly deſircus to know what ſhe was, and where ſhe dwelt, he cauſed one of his Servants to follow her: He who was employed in the Buſineſs, having enquired concerning us, told him, that we were People of ſome hidden Deſign, and that certainly the Princeſs was one of great Quality, though we had never ſpoke as much; and by his Reports, this Prince was much more earneſt to know who ſhe was. At the ſame time one of the King of Armenia's Grand-Officers, who lodged near us, being informed by this Prince, that there was ſome diſguiſed People in Artaxates, who had ſome bad Deſign in Agitation, and ſince all Aſia almoſt was in Arms, and knowing how he had incenſed the King of Medes, by refuſing Tribute, he ſent unto us to know who we were? At the firſt, we diſſembled the Truth, but ſince no credit was given unto us, and the Princeſs was in fear to expoſe her ſelf unto ſome dangerous Adventure, ſhe confeſſed all, and told them who ſhe was, and deſired to ſpeak with the King. But the King not being very well, he appointed the Prince Phaartes to go unto her, and to ſee what the matter was: Then went this Prince unto the Princeſs Ariminta, whoſe Beauty made a deep impreſſion upon his Soul: She told him her Quality, her Condition, and her Buſineſs: he without any difficulty believed her, and did aſſure her that the King her Brother came not unto that Court. He was exceedingly civil unto the Princeſs, and went in all haſte unto the King his Father, with Intentions of moving him to treat her according to her Quality: But the King who ever was of a ſuſpicious and covetous Diſpoſition, had Thoughts far different from the Prince his Son; for he would not take any notice of her, leſt ſhe ſhould put him to ſome Expences, and leſt he ſhould thereby incenſe a proſperous Prince, as Arſamones was, by protecting the Siſter of his Enemy; ſo that notwithſtanding all the Alliances between the Kings of Pontus, and the Kings of Armenia, he ſeemed as if he ſuſpected her, and commanded that ſhe, and all about her ſhould be ſecured; as afterwards I underſtood by one who was a Confident unto Phaartes. This young Prince did with all his Power oppoſe the King his Father's Deſign: but the King being deſirous not to have it publiſhed, charged the Prince his Son not to ſpeak of any thing which the Princeſs had ſaid unto him; intending doubtleſs to ſerve his own Ends by it upon any Occaſion, either by reſtoring her unto the King of Pontus, or unto Arſamones. The Prince Phaartes even deſperate in this injurious Reſolution, did yet procure that we ſhould be brought into this Caſtle, with the two Captains who are here alſo. As for Democlides, the Princeſs had employed him to go and enquire after News of the King her Brother, ſo that he was not taken as we were. You may eaſily imagine, Sir, the Sorrows of the Princeſs, when ſhe ſaw her Sanctuary was turned into a Priſon, and when ſhe ſaw no poſſible means to get out without ſome extraordinary aſſiſtance from the Gods: Since then, Sir, we have been kept here, without any Conſolation, but from the Prince Phaartes, who often did viſit the Princeſs; and indeed when you did take this Caſtle, his frequent viſits began to diſpleaſe; for, contrary to the King his Father's Orders, we were treated with ſo great a Reſpect, that it was apparent he diſobeyed his Father, and that Love had took too deep an Impreſſion in his Soul. In the mean while we heard no news either of the King of Pontus, or Spitridates, or Democlides, nor heard we the King of Bithynia ſo much as talked on. This, Sir, is the Fortune of the Princeſs Ariminta, unto whom, if you pleaſe, we will go, ſince I have no more to ſay, but to conjure you to protect her.

You need not move me unto that (wiſe and diſcreet Heſionida, replied Cyrus) which ſo many Reaſons does invite me unto. The Beauty, Vertue, Quality, and Miſfortune of this Princeſs, are Arguments able to move the moſt inſenſible Man alive to ſerve her, and therefore ſince you think it fit, let us go and tell her as much; for I can aſſure her, that her Miſfortunes are not greater than my deſires to be ſerviceable unto her; for though ſhe be a Siſter unto a Prince who is my Rival, and who detains from me that which is incomparably moſt dear unto me, yet ſhall I be as juſt unto her, as ſhe is unto Spitridates, who does not accuſe Spitridates for the Ambition of his Father, but knows how to put a juſt difference, without any prejudicated Opinion. After this Cyrus gave Heſionida thanks for her great pains, in relating unto him the Story of the Princeſs Ariminta; and going unto the Chamber where ſhe was, he ſaluted her with extraordinary Civility. Madam, ſaid he unto her, when

I did viſit you before, I knew only your Quality, your Beauty, and ſome part of your Mind; but now, ſince I underſtand the whole Story, and am acquainted with the height of your Soul, your Vertue, and your great Misfortunes, I regard you with much more Reverence and Admiration than before. The laſt of theſe whereof you ſpeak, Sir, anſwered ſhe, and which is the only thing that I have any pretence unto you, does not uſually beget reſpect in the Minds of Men; but ſince you, Sir, are none of the ordinary ſort, I muſt and ought to expect Miracles from you. You may expect Submiſſion and Service, anſwered he, from all that are capable of Reaſon. Then to let her know, that he hearkened unto her Story with an attentive Ear; he repeated the moſt conſiderable Paſſages of her Misfortunes, and condoled them: Then did he exceedingly commend Spitridates, knowing that nothing is more obliging and pleaſing, then to hear the Party loved, well ſpoken of; and indeed he omitted nothing which was requiſite to comfort this great Princeſs, from whom alſo he hoped for ſome good Office, whenſoever ſhe ſhould ſpeak with the King her Brother. After a thouſand Expreſſions of reciprocal Love from both ſides, he left her, and went to give neceſſary Orders for matters of War. He was informed that Artaxates was very quiet, that all the Guards were very Circumſpect, and that Hidaſpes, who was gone out towards the Foot of the Mountains, unto which the King of Armenia was retreated, had intercepted many Carriages of Victual and Ammunition, which the Country would have carried unto the King; and afterwards retiring to his Chamber, he ſpent the reſt of the day in Memory of his dear Princeſs; he wondred that Ciaxares came not up; he was vexed that he could not hear any thing of the Aſſyrian King; he was grieved that he could not know where Mandana was; and comparing the Misfortune of the Princeſs Ariminta with his own, though hers were great, yet he thought his more inſupportable. Then did he remember how Heſionida ſpoke of certain Perſian Merchants, which had ſeen Spitridates near Shipwrack at Chalcedonia: Then did he conclude, that from thence did the Reports of his Death ariſe, ſince every one ſaid, there was ſuch a great reſemblance between the Prince and himſelf; and that ſince Spitridates had been in Perſia, and afterwards in Media, from thence did ariſe all the Reports of his Reſurrection; and ſo his Fancy paſſing from one thing to another, yet never forgetting to retain a pleaſing Apprehenſion of his dear Princeſs, he paſſed away almoſt all the Night without any ſleep at all, and he did think it not permittable, that he ſhould beſtow one Minute of his Life upon any thing whatſoever, that might exclude the Paſſion which raigned in his Heart.

ARTA-

ARTAMENES, OR THE GRAND CYRUS.

Part III. Book III.

THE Sun no ſooner ſent out his firſt Rayes, but Cyrus had intelligence of ſome Troops which appeared upon the further ſide of the Plain, in the way towards Artaxates: Since it was not that way which Ciaxares was to come, nor had he received intelligence of his Advance, he imagined that perhaps it might be ſome relief going unto the King of Armenia; ſo that he took Horſe, and went himſelf out to ſee who they were: he preſently diſpatched Orders unto all the Quarters of his Army to take heed of a ſurprize, and commanded them all to randezvous. Then drawing out that Troop which was next him, he went out to obſerve the March of theſe unknown Forces which appeared: he had no ſooner got upon a little hill, from whence one might diſcover all the Plain of Artaxates, from the bottom of the Chaldean Mountains as far as thoſe where the King of Armenia was, but he eſpied a far off ſome Troops, which ſeemed to make a halt, whilſt a party of about fifty Horſe only were drawn out, and came directly towards the place where Cyrus was; he no ſooner obſerved that, but drawing out the like Number ber of his own Men under the Command of Aglatidas, he ſent them to know who they were; himſelf ſtaying in much impatience to obſerve what paſſed: ſince Aglatidas deſired nothing more then any occaſions to die honourably, he obeyed Cyrus with much joy; and after he had given ſome animating exhortations unto his Men to fight gallantly, if there ſhould be any occaſion, he advanced towards them, who made towards him: when they were both of them within a flight ſhot one of another, and Aglatidas believing them for Enemies, and prepared for Fight, he ſaw that he who commanded this fifty Horſe, did let fall the Point of his Javelin, in ſign of Peace, and cauſed all thoſe who followed him to do the like. Aglatidas being much amazed at this, kept his Javelin with his Reſt, and advanced to ſee who it was: Then the Commander in chief, of this ſuppoſed Enemy, advanced himſelf alone in the poſture of one that would parley, and not fight: Aglatidas ſeeing this, ſent back thoſe which followed him, and letting the Point of his Javelin fall, he went unto him, and ſaw him to be a Man of a moſt admirable Garb, wearing the moſt glorious Arms that ever eye beheld, and mounted upon a moſt goodly Horſe; they ſaluted one another very civilly, and afterwards this unknown Gallant, ſaid unto Aglatidas, Since I do not now come to fight with you, I pray do me the favour to conduct me unto your General; and if you think theſe fifty Horſe be too many for my Guard, I will go ſingle with you upon your Word. Your Generoſity to truſt a Man you know not, replied Aglatidas, doth let me ſee that I need not fear any thing, and takes away all diſtruſt of you; now therefore if you pleaſe, you may command your Men to follow mine. In the mean while Cyrus was much aſtoniſhed to obſerve the paſſage, and could not poſſibly imagine the meaning of it: he was ſo unquiet at it, that he could not reſt any longer in that place, but advanced ſome forty or fifty paces, with a party of Officers and Voluntiers with extream curioſity. He ſaw afar off, that this Stranger was very handſom; but being come nearer him, he was much more ſurprized to ſee it was the King of Aſſyria: This unexpected ſight did make him change colour, and brought a freſh luſtre into his Face: and as for the King of Aſſyria, he no ſooner ſaw Cyrus, but he was much moved: yet ſince they were both of them infinitely generous, after Aglatidas advanced to tell Cyrus, that this ſtranger whom he knew not, (for he had but only one glimpſe of him before upon the Tower of Sinope) deſired to be conducted to him; they ſaluted one another with much Civility; and both of them lighting from their Horſes, Cyrus, ſince he was yet only the Son of a King, and the moſt civil of all Men living, did render unto this King all the Honours which could poſſibly be expected, as if he were yet the Maſter of Babylon, and a quiet Poſſeſſor of all Aſſyria. The King of Aſſyria did alſo pay all due Civility unto Cyrus, as one that merited the Empire of all the World, and as one that was both his Deliverer, and Vanquiſher. And indeed, the Complements from both were ſo high, that it was evident they ſtrived which ſhould excel in Civility, and it was evident, eſpecially to ſuch as were acquainted with their Intereſts, that their Minds had not much tranquillity in them: There appeared ſuch a kind of fierceneſs in their Eyes, as did diſcover the agitation of their Souls; and ſuch a conſtrainedneſs in all their Civilities, as plainly ſpoke them to be Rivals, and Enemies: After they were both alighted from their Horſes, every one, out of civility, withdrew, and kept at a diſtance. Then (ſaid the King of Aſſyria), As I have not changed my Mind, in changing my Name of Philidaſpes, ſo I cannot think that you have changed your Reſolution in ceaſing to be Artamenes: but that I ſhall find Cyrus to be the ſame Prince with whom I made Conditions on the top of the Tower in Sinope; I hope, I ſay, that we ſhall both of us go together in Queſt of our Princeſs; that we ſhall fight for her; that we ſhall releaſe her; and until then, we ſhall live together as if no difference were between us; and then, in concluſion of all, I do expect that Satisfaction from you, which you promiſed; and that though your illuſtrious Arm has already vanquiſhed me, yet you will not refuſe to diſpute this laſt Victory with me. You have reaſon to believe, replied Cyrus, that I ſhall punctually perform all my Promiſes, and therefore you may think your ſelf as ſafe in the King of Medes Army, as if you were in the Head of your own; for I am moſt certain, that Prince will never fail no more than I, in whatſoever he has promiſed. I am very ſenſible, replied the King of Aſſyria, that the Conquerour of Babylon may well think it ſtrange, that the ſame Prince whom he hath vanquiſhed, both in private and publick Fight, who ows his Life unto him, and who has no ſhare in the Princeſs Mandana's Heart, ſhould, yet after all this, contend for that Prize which his Conqueror does deſerve, which he hath already conquered, and which ſhe hath beſtowed upon him. But yet, Sir, Love is all my Argument; I love her, and you love her, there needs no more. And ſince Love, not Ambition, was the ground of our Wars, to conquer Provinces, and Kingdoms only, is not an abſolute Conqueſt; but it muſt be my Death only which will compleat your Victory, and permit you to enjoy the Fruits of it without any moleſtation. Queſtionleſs, replied Cyrus, it was not Ambition which ſpurned me up unto this War; and I wiſh with all my Heart that you were Maſter of Babylon again, ſo the Princeſs Mandana had not been carried away; I wiſh that giddy Fortune had never put me to the neceſſity of making my ſelf happy, by the Ruins of ſo great a Prince as you: but ſince the Caſe is upon theſe Terms, let us think no more upon it; nor of any thing elſe, but releaſing our Princeſs, and putting her into a condition to take the Vanquiſher, and lament the Vanquiſhed: Let us, I ſay, perform ſuch glorious Acts for her Deliverance, that we may both of us render our ſelves worthy of her Eſteem and Compaſſion: for knowing your Valour, as I do, (ſaid Cyrus with much modeſty) I ought rather to expect her Compaſſion, then her Affection, after your Defeat; but, ſaid he, I would it were come to that, ſince we cannot know where the Princeſs Mandana is. The King of Aſſyria did condole with Cyrus at the bad News, and rendring an account of all his Actions, he told him, that in his Departure from Pteria, he went unto a Province in his Dominions, which lies along the River Euphrates, and confines upon Armenia, that there he had raiſed ſome Forces, which with ſome freſh Levies in other Places, amounted to the Number of twelve thouſand Men. Cyrus alſo out of his high Generoſity, rendred an Account unto him in a conciſe manner, of the State of all things: and after that the King of Aſſyria told him that all his Forces were to be ordered according to his Commands. Cyrus for a while refuſed it, yet in the end he took all neceſſary Care for their Encampment, and appointed them their Quarters. After this, theſe two Illuſtrious Rivals took Horſe, and went towards the Caſtle where the Princeſs Ariminta lodged, as if they were the beſt Friends upon Earth, without any Difference at all betwixt them: In the way, Cyrus ſhewed his Army as they ſtood in Battalia unto the King of Aſſyria; ſhewed him alſo their ſeveral Quarters, and the Mountains unto which the King of Armenia was retreated. Both of them did ſigh very oft: for Love and Jealouſy, Hatred and Grief, did ſo diſcompoſe their Minds, that they ſtood in need of all their Magnanimity to keep themſelves within thoſe Limits of Civility which they had preſcribed. The King of Aſſyria told Cyrus, how he heard the King of Lydia was arming himſelf without any cauſe, knowing that it was neither in behalf of Ciaxares nor himſelf.

Thus, diſcourſing upon ſeveral Subjects, eſpecially upon their hopes to hear more of the Princeſs Mandana upon the King of Armenia's taking, they came at the laſt to the Caſtle, where Cyrus having given Orders to make the beſt Chamber in it ready for the King of Aſſyria, he left him in it, and went out to take care of all things expedient unto their Deſign. The Sight of this Rival did ſo freſhly revive all the Differences which had paſſed between them when he was only Philidaſpes, that he longed to be alone in his Chamber, and therefore with none but Feraulas he went thither: It is not enough, (ſaid he unto this dear Confident of his Paſſion) that I ſhould be ſeparated from her I love above my Life, but that I muſt be tormented with his Preſence, whom I hate even unto

Death; and yet Generoſity commands me to ſuſpend all my Reſentments, and civilly to comply with my moſt mortal Enemy: Yet were I aſſured the Divine Mandana would one day recompence me for this Violence I do unto my ſelf, I ſhould have ſome Conſolation. For my part, ſaid Feraulas, I conceive you may rather expect a chiding than any Thanks from the Princeſs, for promiſing the King of Aſſyria to fight with him, after you have releaſed her. O I wiſh to the Heavens, replied Cyrus, it came to that! No, no, Fortune, I deſire no other Favour at thy Hands, but to aſſiſt me in releaſing my Princeſs, and ſo let me meet my inveterate Enemy with a Sword in my Hand; commit all the reſt unto my Valour and my Love; for as gallant as he is, I hope for Victory. But alas, in the mean time I am all Fury; the Sight of my old Enemy Philidaſpes revives all my Jealouſy and Hate. The King of Pontus alſo, who loved me before he knew I was his Rival, triumphs over all my Hopes; perhaps, I ſay, he has not only the Happineſs of ſeeing her, but hath gained her Heart, and obtained his Pardon; ſo that ſince he did not, like Philidaſpes, raviſh her away, but ſave her from Shipwrack, ſhe cannot look upon him as an injurious Raviſher: however he is no leſs culpable in my Eyes; ſo that which way ſoever I look, I ſee none but the Raviſhers of Mandana to puniſh; yet alas, I ſee them but afar off, ſince I muſt not fall upon the King of Aſſyria, and ſince I know not where the King of Pontus is. Amidſt theſe Thoughts Aglatidas entered, and brought Artaban unto him, who came from Sinope, and aſſured Cyrus, that within theſe two Days the whole Army would be come up before Artaxates: Cyrus did gladly receive him, both becauſe his News did pleaſe him, and becauſe he was a Friend unto Aglatidas. He enquired very affectionately concerning the Health of Ciaxares, the Kings of Phrygia and Hercania, and of all the reſt in the Army. After this, conceiving it fit to acquaint the King of Aſſyria and the Princeſs Ariminta with this News, he prepared to go unto them, bidding Aglatidas very ſweetly to make his Friends welcome, but (ſaid he, addreſſing himſelf unto Artaban) grieve him not with any Stories of Ame-

ſtris, for his own Paſſion, without the Addition of new Misfortunes, torments him enough. I ſhould be very ſorry, Sir, (replied Artaban) not to obey you in all things; but I told him, as we were coming hither, how that fair Lady was not in a very happy Condition; and I told him alſo how Ottanus would not accept of the Government in the Province of the Ariſantines, which you would have conferred upon him. Would not Ottanus (replied Cyrus in great Amazement) accept of a thing ſo advantagious for him? what may be his Reaſon for it? I know not that, Sir, anſwered he; but I am certain he hath left Ecbatan; and when I came from thence, Reports were, that he came into Artaxates, ſo that if this be true, he is certainly upon the Mountains where the King of Armenia is. If it be ſo, ſaid Cyrus unto Aglatidas, perhaps we ſhall releaſe Ameſtris before Mandana; for it is to be ſuppoſed, that Ottanus having committed ſo baſe an Act, as to ſide with the Enemies of his Prince, and a Prince too who had honoured him with a Government ſo much above his Deſert, he will periſh and die there; which if he do (added he, and ſmiled) Aglatidas muſt go and comfort Ameſtris. I do not know (replied that ſad Lover) whether or no I ſhall be able to comfort others, but I am moſt certain that I have had a long time need of Conſolation my ſelf. After this, he thanked Cyrus for his Tenderneſs over him, and waiting upon him as far as the Princeſs Ariminta's Chamber, he went to entertain his dear Friend Artaban with more Freedom than before, and to enquire more particularly of him concerning Ameſtris. Mean while, after Cyrus had acquainted the Princeſs Ariminta with the King of Aſſyria's Arrival, and with the News of Ciaxares his advance, he went unto the Chamber of his Rival, whoſe Mind was altogether as turbulent as the Mind of Cyrus, who in all likelihood could never hope for the Happineſs of being beloved, although he ſhould deliver Mandana, and vanquiſh Cyrus: nor though he did flatter up himſelf with Hopes in the Oracles, yet could he never pretend to have any other Satisfaction than Revenge upon him. However, ſince Love and Hope are inſeparable Companions, he ſometimes fancied that this his illuſtrious luſtrious Rival ſhould be no ſooner out of the World, but he ſhould poſſeſs his Place: yet theſe Fancies did quickly vaniſh, and he did more often imagine, maugre all his oraculous Aſſurance from Heaven, that as ſoon as he had killed Cyrus, he ſhould then be more hated than before. Theſe were the Imaginations of that Prince when Cyrus came into his Chamber, to acquaint him with the News which Artaban brought. After he had ſtaid a Quarter of an Hour with him, conſulting what Quarters thoſe Troops which he brought ſhould have in the Morning, he left him, and went to give Orders for it, and many other things.

Mean while the King of Aſſyria, after he had ſent to ask the Permiſſion of Cyrus, went to viſit the Princeſs Ariminta: In the mean while alſo Cyrus ſent unto ſeveral Guards which he had placed, that they ſhould not be ſurprized or amazed when they ſaw the Troops of Ciaxares advance. He ſent alſo into Artaxates, appointing them to prepare the King of Armenia's Palace for Ciaxares, and the Princeſs Ariminta: for ſince the whole Army was to be joyned, he thought it expedient to make ſure as well within the Town as without. He was alſo informed by Araſpes, that Hidaſpes and Chriſantes had defeated ſome Troops which the Prince Phaartes had ſent out into the Plain to forrage for Victuals. After all this he retired unto his Chamber, and, as uſually he did, paſſed over the Night without a wink of Sleep. In the Morning he went to viſit the Quarters of Hidaſpes and others; and the Day following that, he would go meet Ciaxares, and carry the King of Aſſyria with him: Theſe two Princes then took Horſe; Thraſibulus, ſome Voluntiers, and two hundred Horſe only waited upon them, and after he had cauſed the Aſſyrian Troops to advance, and ranked them in Battalia with the reſt, to receive Ciaxares with the more Ceremony, he ſent Araſpes before, that he might prepare the King to meet with the King of Aſſyria; not but that he knew Ciaxares would keep Promiſe ſince he had paſſed it, but becauſe he always uſed to obſerve Order and Decorum in all things. After ſome three Hours March, they diſcovered Clouds of Duſt to ariſe from the Ground, cauſed by the

March of the Army; preſently after, they met; and he came up to that Regiment where Ciaxares was, with the King of Phrygia. As ſoon as the Souldiers ſaw Cyrus, they began to ſhout with ſuch great Acclamations of Joy, that it may well be ſaid they forgot Ciaxares was there. Cyrus beckened unto them with his Hand, and with great Modeſty made Signs unto them to be ſilent, to march, and keep their Ranks; he refuſed theſe Honours with ſuch a kind of obliging Smile, as ſpoke him neither pleaſed or angry at it. The King of Aſſyria heard all theſe Acclamations with much Perplexity, though he would not ſhew it; and at laſt they met Ciaxares in a Place where he was lighted from his Horſe to refreſh himſelf, and to ſee thoſe Troops drawn out, which he intended ſhould march firſt unto Artaxates. As ſoon as Cyrus diſcovered him under the Trees, he advertiſed the King of Aſſyria, ſo that lighting from their Horſes ſome twenty Paces off, they went up unto him. Our invincible Hero went ſome three Paces before the King of Aſſyria, with Intentions to preſent him unto Ciaxares; but do what he could the King embraced him firſt, and afterwards ſaluted the King of Aſſyria very civilly, telling him, that though he had been the cauſe of all his Troubles, yet it was juſt he ſhould in ſome ſort repair thoſe Incivilities done unto Philidaſpes, with the Reſpects which they would render unto the King of Aſſyria. Sir, replied this Prince, if I have treſpaſſed againſt you, Fortune hath ſufficiently puniſhed me for it; not that I think the Loſs of my Crown comparable to the Loſs of the Princeſs Mandana: My Intentions are to bring the laſt unto you, without asking you the other; and I come into your Army with Reſolution to hazard my Life for your Service: If the propitious Fate of your Arms had left me a greater Number of Subjects, I ſhould have brought you a greater Aid; but ſince all are become yours, I hope you will accept of theſe twelve thouſand Men which now I bring, as well as if they were an hundred Thouſand, ſince they are all I have. Ciaxares returned a very civil Anſwer unto him. After this, Thraſibulus, and others of Quality who came from the Camp, ſaluted Ciaxares, and gave Cyrus time to beſtow a

Complement upon the King of Phrygia, upon whom the King of Aſſyria did caſt a malicious Eye, remembring him as one that changed ſides, and forſook him. After this, Ciaxares taking Cyrus aſide, whilſt the King of Aſſyria was in Diſcourſe with Thraſibulus, he commended him for all he had done, and grieved with him, that they could not yet hear of Mandana. Cyrus rendred a ſhort and pithy Account of all the Armenian Affairs ſince he came into it, and of the preſent State of every thing: After which taking Horſe, and giving the right Hand unto the Aſſyrian King as unto the greateſt Prince of the World, they went unto the great Town of Artaxates; near which Cyrus, by Orders from Ciaxares, did draw up all his huge Army into Battalia, that the People ſeeing it, might ſtill continue in better Obedience; and that the King of Armenia diſcovering it from the Mountains, might ſooner think upon rendring himſelf. Mean while Cyrus ſent all thoſe Troops which he brought firſt to guard the Place where the King was to quarter; he ſent others alſo to keep Courts of Guard in other publick Places, and Ports of the Town. And when all was thus ordered, Ciaxares entred into Artaxates with thoſe who were ordered to quarter in it; leaving the main Body of his Army to quarter all along the River Araxes, which runs through the midſt of that great Plain. The next Morning Cyrus moved Ciaxares that he would be pleaſed to permit the Princeſs Ariminta to come from the Caſtle where ſhe was, unto Artaxates, that ſhe might be well uſed, although ſhe was Siſter unto the Raviſher of Mandana: Ciaxares conſented; ſo that he went, and conducted her into the Town, where Ciaxares did viſit her, and at the Requeſt of Cyrus rendered her all the Honour that was due unto her Quality: She was lodged in a Palace by her ſelf, which formerly belonged unto the Prince Tigranes, for Cyrus did alter his former Intentions, and ordered it ſo; becauſe he thought that to be more convenient for her, by reaſon ſhe would be there at more Freedom. This Prince likewiſe treated thoſe two Captains which came with her very civilly; aud omitted nothing that either Reaſon, Civility or Generoſity required: The King of Phrygia alſo did viſit this Princeſs, remembering ſtill the Friendſhip that was between him and the King her Brother, though now they were on oppoſite ſides, and confirming her in that high Eſteem which ſhe had already entertained of Cyrus. The Day after, the Rear-guard came up, under the Conduct of the Hircanian King, which was quartered alſo in the ſame Plain of Artaxates: This Prince not deſiring to lodg in the Town, more then Cyrus, who ſince the Army came up, lay always in the Field; and ſo did the King of Aſſyria, who, according to his old Cuſtom, could not endure his Rival ſhould outdo him in any thing. Mean while a Council of War was called to conſult whether they ſhould content themſelves with ſtopping all Victuals from the Enemy? or whether they ſhould enforce the King of Armenia out of thoſe Mountains, which ſeemed abſolutely inacceſſable? The King of Aſſyria, though he had been vanquiſhed and an Enemy, yet had his Voice in Council: But though Cyrus and he had both of them jealous Thoughts one of another, and ever had a ſecret Hatred and Spirit of Contradiction in every thing, yet in this they were both of one Opinion, and were the only two which voted to force the King of Armenia out of thoſe inacceſſable Mountains: Not that they ſaw any great Reaſon for their Opinions; but ſince it concerned Mandana, and ſince they gave their Votes in Preſence of one another, they both of them aimed at the higheſt Difficulties, and the moſt hazardous for themſelves. All that Hidaſpes reported from the Armenian Souldiers whom they took Priſoners, and related their Prince had not Victnals to ſubſiſt many Days, was in vain; and they anſwered unto that, how it was not Wiſdom to give Credit unto Reports, ſince it is common for Priſoners to flatter their Conquerors with ſome advantagious Tales in hopes to be better uſed. When it was objected, that theſe Mountains were inacceſſable, and that by rouling down gteat Stones only, ſix thouſand Men might eaſily defend themſelves againſt ſix hundred thouſand: when they could not contradict this Objection, nor belie their own Eyes, then they ſaid, that it muſt indeed be confeſſed ſome Men would be loſt, yet the Diſhonour and Shame to have ſo great an Army at the Foot of theſe

Mountains, and attempt nothing, would be ballanced with it. That there was a great Neceſſity of knowing where the Princeſs Mandana was, and to be ſatisfied, there was as great a Neceſſity of taking the King of Armenia preſently, and not to linger out the time till Famine force him out of his Sanctuary. That, whilſt they were buſy in guarding only the Paſſages and Advenues unto theſe Mountains, perhaps the People of both Armenia's were uniting themſelves, and gathering into a vaſt Body, which might find them more Difficulties to overcome than this: and therefore for theſe Reaſons their Opinions were to enforce theſe Mountains. But although the Opinion of Cyrus did always uſe to lead the reſt at other times, yet it did not ſo now; for all with one Conſent knowing certainly the King of Armenia had Scarcity of Victuals, and ſeeing that at feweſt thirty thouſand Men muſt needs periſh in the Attempt, did reſolve only to ſtop all Paſſages; to repulſe all thoſe that made any Sallies out of the Mountains; and to invite them unto it, to ſeem ſometimes as if they would make Aſſaults in ſeveral Quarters: They conceived it not juſt to let ſuch a vaſt Number of People to periſh for want of a little Patience, eſpecially ſince they had no Certainty that the Princeſs Mandana was in the Place. This Advice being generally to be purſued, no more was to be done, but to keep moſt ſtrict Guards round about the Mountains, and to find out all the blind Paths and by-ways.

The next Morning, Ciaxares would take a View of the Aſſyrian Troops, in Battalia by themſelves, which now they had mingled with the reſt, as being all of one ſide. Mean while, this Siege without a Town, was not ſo idle a Buſineſs as Cyrus did imagine it, for ſince the Prince Phraartes was very gallant, and ſince Love was a Spur unto his Valour, he began to beſtir himſelf, though during the firſt days, he was ſick with Grief at his Father's Loſſes, and that the Princeſs Ariminna was in the Hands of his Enemies. As he was well verſed in all the by-ways of theſe Mountains, he would ſometimes come and ſend us a Shower of Arrows, and ſo vaniſh in a Moment, that none could know what was become of him: Sometimes he would come in the Night unto the Foot of the Mountains, by ſuch blind-ways through the Rocks, where none but Armenians could come, and give an Alarum unto all the Camp; and ſince he had very good Spies in the Army of Ciaxares, he always made his Sallies on that ſide where Cyrus was not, for the Valour of this Prince was moſt terrible unto all the Armenians. But ſince Cyrus was not uſed to be ſurprized, but ſurprize others, he reſolved every Night to go into ſeveral Quarters, in hopes to meet with this almoſt inviſible Enemy, who would never fall upon his ſide, and who he knew to be the Prince Phaartes by ſome Priſoners which he had taken. Upon ſuch a Deſign as this which Cyrus had, the King of Aſſyria would be ſure to make one, as well as other particular Friends of Cyrus. Thraſibulus, Aglatidas, Araſpes, Perſodes, Gedates, Gobrias, Megabiſes, Hidaſpes, Thimocrates, Leontidas, Philocles, Aduſias, Chriſantes, Feraulas, and many others were then with him. After they had waited ſeveral Nights in vain, at the laſt it happened one Night that Phaartes having no Intelligence in what Quarter Cyrus was, and having a Deſign to ſend out a Captain diſguized in the Habit of a Peaſant, unto Tigranes his Brother, he happened to deſcend from the Mountains on that ſide, where Cyrus lay in Ambuſh with ſix hundred Men, which he had culled out for that Purpoſe; yet he had placed himſelf ſo, that Phaartes taking a little Path upon his left Hand, could not come unto the Foot of the Mountains, but that which at the firſt ſeeing did anger him, was afterwards his Advantage; for when Phaartes with half his Men was paſt the Foot of the Mountains, Cyrus did immediately ſtep between him, and his Retreat, and perceiving that there was Abundance of Men amongſt the Rocks as well as in the Plain, he could not tell in which of thoſe two the Prince Phaartes was; ſo that to be ſure of meeting with him, he divided his Men, the one half to aſſault thoſe who were in the Rocks, and the other half to purſue thoſe in the Plain, who ſeeing their Retreat cut off, endeavoured to find out another; but Cyrus purſued them very cloſe, whilſt the King of Aſſyria did ſcuffle with them amongſt the Rock: The Heavens were very ſerene and clear, and the Stars did give a ſpendent luſter, ſo that this Nights Combate proved very ſharp and bloody: Thraſibulus and Aglatidas did Wonders in ſeconding the Valour of Cyrus, who found no ſmall Reſiſtance from thoſe he fought with; for the Prince Phaartes being there, did deſperately defend himſelf, and did things worthy of eternal Memory, yet being wounded in the right Arm, and left Hand, ſo that he could not hold his Sword, he endeavoured to ſave himſelf; then he fell off, being followed by fifteen or twenty of his Men, whilſt the reſt kept their Ground, and unperceived by Cyrus, or any of his Men, he got into a little Valley, wherein did fall a very rapid Torrent from the Height of the Mountains; there Phaartes hid himſelf, hoping that when the Combate was ended, and the Troops of Cyrus drawn off, he might then perhaps get into his rocky way again. In the mean time, all the reſt of his Men were cut all in Pieces, and Cyrus finding no Reſiſtance, went to ſee what the King of Aſſyria had done; he found him very buſy with his Enemies, who did not fly according to their old Cuſtom, becauſe they knew that the Prince Phaartes was engaged; yet at the laſt, hoping he might gain ſome other Paſs whereby to retreat, they retired unto a Paſs, beyond which it was not poſſible to follow them; for it was ſo narrow that two Men might make head againſt an hundred thouſand. After they had done all that was poſſible, and were thinking upon a Retreat, Cyrus enquired concerning all his Friends, whom in the Obſcurity of Night he could not diſcern: Aglatidas being next, told him that he heard the Name of Ottanus uſed in the Combate. I heard more then you, ſaid Cyrus, for I heard one cry, Ottanus is dead. As Aglatidas was about to anſwer, Intelligence came to Cyrus, that ſome of the Enemy had rallied together in a little Valley, ſo that he went immediately thither; but Phaartes, (for it was he they meant) being advertiſed of their coming, by a Souldier whom he had ſet Sentinel at the Advenue of the Valley, and finding himſelf diſabled from fighting with any; and alſo conſidering the ſmall Number of his Men, and they all wounded as well as himſelf, commanded them, to throw down their Arms, and follow him, chuſing rather to truſt unto the Generoſity of his Enemy, than to a feeble Reſiſtance, which could do him no good: and ſince he was diſabled from fighting, he thought it leſs Shame to render himſelf unto a gallant Enemy, then to fly, or let himſelf be killed without Reſiſtance: All his Men obeying him, he went unto a Paſſage where he expected his Enemy to come; and ſince the Moon ſhined very bright, and Objects might well be diſcerned; Cyrus was no ſooner in Sight, but one of his Men knowing him, (becauſe he had been with Tigranes at Sinope) did ſhew Phaartes which was he: This Prince then cried out, with a moſt generous Boldneſs, ſo loud as he thought he might be underſtood; Whither art thou going Cyrus? doſt thou not know, that it is not glorious to overcome at all times? Suffer thy ſelf ſometimes to be vanquiſhed, and be aſſured that being overcome after that manner, thy Victory will be more noble than if thou wert a Conquerour; and at this time there will be more Honour in the Triumph of thy Clemency, than of thy Courage and Valour. Cyrus upon this ſtood ſtill, and turning towards Chriſantes, who ſtood next him, ſaid ſmilingly unto him, I ſee there is nothing more ingenious than ill Fortune, nor any thing more witty then Neceſſity: and how much more wiſely and eloquent we ſpeak when we are conquered, than when we are Conquerors: after this, holding out his Hand unto this diſarmed Enemy, whom yet he knew not; Aſſure thy ſelf (ſaid he unto him) thou ſhalt receive no harm from me; and whoſoever thou art, I will render thee any Service in my Power, even ſo far as to give thee thy Liberty; for it is my Cuſtom to take them only for Enemies, who are in a Condition to defend themſelves. Phaartes being charmed with the high Generoſity of Cyrus, ſaid unto him, I do not wonder at all that the Gods ſhould ſo continually give Victory unto a Prince who knows ſo well how to uſe it; and I wonder leſs at the extream Affection which the Prince Tigranes my Brother had unto the moſt Illuſtrious Artamenes. Cyrus knowing by theſe Words, that it was the Prince Phaartes, he imbraced him moſt civilly, and perceiving him wounded, he commanded a Horſe to be fetched in all haſte to carry this wounded Prince ſpeedily unto ſome place where he might be dreſſed: For, generous Prince, ſaid he unto him, the Mountains may perhaps be Dangerous for you, conſidering the State you are in. The Horſe being brought, Cyrus commanded them to aid the Prince Phaartes, and two Souldiers to lead his Horſe, becauſe he was not able to hold the Bridle by reaſon of his Wounds.

When he was gone, Cyrus miſſing Thraſibulus, enquired concerning him, and they told him, that he ſtaid with a wounded Enemy, who rendred himſelf unto him: Feraulas ſaid further, that after the Fight was ended, he cauſed this Priſoner to be carried by Souldiers to the Camp, and he himſelf followed. Since the Place where now they were was not far off from the Place where the Prince did quarter, they went into his Tents, and placed the Prince Phaartes in one of the moſt magnificent Pavilions; cauſing the Chirurgions which were in the Tent of Thraſibulus to be called, for Cyrus himſelf would ſee him dreſſed: Mean while he ſent Feraulus unto Ciaxares to inform him of all Paſſages. The wounds of the Prince Phaartes being found to be more Painful then Dangerous, the Chirurgions ſaid, that there was no Danger, if he eſcaped a Feaver; to prevent which, it was requiſite for him to reſt all that Night, and a good part of the next Morning. Cyrus then retired as well as the King of Aſſyria, though it went much againſt his Mind to depart before he had asked him concerning the Princeſs Mandana, which conſidering the Condition Phaartes was in, he durſt not mention, but Reaſon at this time ruled above his Love, and Cyrus reſolved to wait ſome certain hours for a Satisfaction of his Deſires: Mean time, ſince Thraſibulus yet appeared not, and ſince he underſtood the Chirurgions had been in his Tent, he asked them, whom they dreſſed there? They anſwered him, that they had dreſſed a very Handſom Man, who was in great danger of Death, and who told Thraſibulus an hundred obliging Stories: That Thraſibulus was very much perplexed for him, and that without all doubt he was a Man of Quality. Cyrus ſent to aſk who it was? but Thraſibulus leaving his Wounded Priſoner at reſt, according to the Orders of the Chirurgions, came himſelf to relate the Adventure. Cyrus no ſooner ſaw him, but he ſaw Melancholy in his Face, and asked him very obligingly, how he did? What, generous Prince, ſaid he unto him, are you ſo Unfortunate as to Wound a Friend in lieu of an Enemy? Sir, ſaid he unto him again, to make you underſtand the whole Adventure, it is requiſite I relate the whole Story of my Life, being impoſſible otherwiſe to comprehend the Averſneſs of my Deſtiny: for, Sir, when I ſhall tell you that he who is now your Priſoner, and Wounded in my Tent, is Son unto the wiſe Pittacus, Prince of Mytelene, whoſe Name is Tiſſander, then you will doubtleſs know that he is Son unto one of the prime Men of all Greece. I have long deſired, ſaid Cyrus, to know the Life of that Prince, who hath taught me to overcome my Self, and I am much indebted unto your Valour; but illuſtrious Thraſibulus, I have been ſo buſied with my own Misfortunes, ſince you came to Sinope, that now I have no Mind to deſire the Relation of yours; yet prepare your ſelf ere long for the Relation of it, and in the mean time go and reſt your Self, and take Care of your Wounded Priſoner, who out of my Affection to you I know not whether I ſhould love or hate; and if ſome Conference which I am to have with the Prince Phaartes concerning the Princeſs Mandana, do not drive me into abſolute Deſpair, and deprive me of my Reaſon by depriving me of all Hopes, I ſhall then hold an hour or two in Diſcourſe with you in Private. Thraſibulus then thanked him for this Goodneſs, and retired; leaving this Prince at Liberty to lie down upon his Bed for two or three hours, to recover his Wearineſs; his ſleep was not over quiet, for his Impatience to ſpeak with Phaartes did ſo torment him, that he could take no Reſt: He ſent above twenty times, to know whether he was awake, and how he did of his Wounds? but ſtill the Anſwer was, he was aſleep. But deſiring to ſee him before the King of Aſſyria came unto him, he went himſelf to viſit him, and came juſt as he waked, ſo that he and the Phyſicians and Chirurgeons entred together; they found him very well, ſo that after he was dreſſed, they permitted him to perform his Complement unto Cyrus for his great Care of him, not forbidding him to talk, as they did the night before. Sir, ſaid Phaartes unto him, if you treat your Enemies thus, how would you treat your Friends? You may know that by your ſelf, anſwered Cyrus, if you will; for if you ſincerely tell me where the Princeſs Mandana is, you will oblige me to be your Friend. I ſhould be extreamly glad to ſatisfy your Curioſity, if I could, replied Phaartes, but I do profeſs before all the Gods whom we adore, that I know not where ſhe is; and to make it evident that I am ſincere, I will not ſay with the ſame Confidence, that the King my Father knows not, becauſe ſince he is a Prince who doth not uſe to impart Matters of State unto any, he may know more of it then I do: But, Sir, if you dare take the Word of an Enemy, permit me to go as ſoon as I am able unto the King my Father, and after I have employed all my Ingenuity to Diſcover the Truth, I will return and give you a Sincere Relation of it. Generous Prince, replied Cyrus, you need not paſs your Word, for you are abſolutely Free, and may do what you pleaſe; for I ſerve a King who uſes to make good all the Promiſes which I make: ſo that when it is your pleaſure to return unto the King your Father, you may; but if the Prayers of an Enemy have any prevalency with you, I do conjure you to move the King of Armenia to impart all he knows concerning the Princeſs Mandana, and not to force Ciaxares to ruin him: Perchance you have ſeen how potent his Army is from the tops of your Mountains, ſo that I hope both Reaſon, Senſe, and Generoſity will induce you to ſatisfy my Demands. Phaartes then obliged himſelf by an hundred Proteſtations of Sincerity and Freedom, and told him, that if the Chirurgeons thought Expedient, he would be carried the next Morning, though he would not accept of that Favour which Cyrus offered, to releaſe him abſolutely. But, ſaid he further unto him, that you may give more Credit unto my Words, I will truſt you with a Secret which much concerns my Life, which is, Sir, that you have in your keeping a Princeſs who hath the ſame influence upon the Heart of Phaartes, that Mandana has upon the generous Cyrus: ſo that having a Pawn ſo dear and Precious unto me, you may well expect that Fidelity from me, which very few Enemies would pay unto thoſe they fight with.

As they were thus in Conference, intelligence was brought unto Cyrus, that Ciaxares and the King of Phrygia, who alſo lodged in the Town, were coming to the Camp; ſo that he went from Phaartes to meet them: Juſt as the King of Aſſyria was entring, having ſome Curioſity to enquire of the Princeſs Mandana, Cyrus bluſhed, and in ſhort related the Anſwer of Phaartes unto him, ſo that they went both together to meet Ciaxares, who gave them both very high Commendations, but ſo, that it was eaſy to ſee he put a great Difference between them. Cyrus gave him an Account of all his Conference with Phaartes, and beſeeched him that he might be treated as he had promiſed: which Ciaxares eaſily condeſcended unto, conceiving indeed that it was eaſier to come unto the knowledg of the Truth by the Mediation of that Prince, than any other way: So that Ciaxares gave Cyrus full Power to tranſact that Buſineſs, and every thing elſe, as he himſelf thought beſt expedient, without making any Addreſſes unto him for Advice; and after he had beſtowed a viſit upon Phaartes and Tiſſander, he returned unto Artaxates. In the mean while Aglatidas, who thought he heard the Name of Ottanus mentioned in the Fight, and who underſtood from Cyrus, that Ottanus was ſaid to be Dead, went to ſee the Prince Phaartes, and beſeeched him to reſolve him, whether it was true that Ottanus was engaged in his Quarrel, and out in the laſt Combat? Phaartes told him both were true, and that he believed he periſhed the laſt Night, becauſe he heard one Cry in the heat of Combat, that Ottanus was Dead. Aglatidas underſtanding this, deſired Artaban who knew him, to enquire more certainly of it, during the two hours of Truce which was agreed upon, for the fetching off their Dead, and which indeed the Enemy did deſire, principally to ſee whether Phaartes could be found amongſt them.

Artaban then went along with thoſe whom Cyrus ſent to bring off the Bodies of ſome ten or twelve of his Souldiers which fell in the Fight, ſeeming to look for an Officer and Friend of his who was miſſing: He ſearched very narrowly amongſt all the Dead; but though he did not find the Body of Ottanus amongſt them, yet was he able to carry back moſt certain News of his Death: for amongſt thoſe who carried off their Dead, there came alſo a Servant of Ottanus who Artaban knew, and who ſearching for his Maſter cloſe by that Torrent which falls from the Mountains into the little Valley where Phaartes was retreated, he began ſuddenly to cry out: Artaban came to him, and there ſaw, amongſt ſome Rocks which ſtood in the Water, a dead Man, yet could not diſcover his Face; but by the reſt of his Body, Clothes, and very remarkable Arms, the Servant knew it to be his Maſter Ottanus: he ſaw alſo, that his Shoulder, which lay out of the Water, was all Bloody, and therefore concluded him to be Wounded: yet ſince this Torrent was ſo rapid and deep, it was very difficult to come unto the place where the Corps was, which ſtuck upon the point of a Rock: They ſent for long poles wherewith to draw him out, but none could be found long enough to reach him; and no other Invention could be deviſed; for it was too deep to wade, and too rapid to Swim: yet whilſt they were inventing ſome new way to draw off this Corps, a great Guſh of Water fell from the Rocks upon that point which ſtopped him, and then the impetuous Torrent did gulf him into the Bottom of the Water, and there was he buried. After this, Artaban returned to the Camp with certain news of Ottanus his Death, ſince his Eyes were Witneſſes of it, it being imaginable, that as he fled with the reſt into this little Valley, he fell into this Torrent, and there periſhed; at the leaſt it was the imagination of Artaban, for all the other Men were of a hundred Opinions contrary to one another. All thoſe who knew the Intereſt that Aglatidas had in the Death of this Man, did rejoice at it; but as for himſelf, he was too Wiſe, and too well accuſtomed unto Sorrows, to paſs ſo ſuddenly from Melancholy to Joy: all he ſaid was, that he was not very Sorry for the Death of him who was a Tyrant unto Ameſtris, and by Conſequence that ſhe was rid of him: Yet Megabiſes, who upon the ſame Reaſon ſhould have been glad alſo, was very ſad at it, becauſe he thought it would become the Happineſs of Aglatidas: ſo that though he thought never to have loved Ameſtris again, yet he found that he loved her ſtill, by the renewing of his Secret hate unto Aglatidas; yet he durſt not manifeſt it, for Cyrus did ſo tenderly affect him, that it was a capital Crime to be his declared Enemy. All this while Thraſibulus was with Tiſſander, whom the Chirurgeons found to be in a better State. The Prince Phraartes alſo did much mend upon it, ſo that he deſired Cyrus he might go the next morning unto the King his Father, and acquit himſelf of his Commiſſion: Yet Cyrus would needs have him carried in a Litter; and ſo, that very morning on which the King of Armenia ſent to ſee the Prince his Son, he was conducted by a Guard of two hundred Souldiers unto the firſt Guards of the Armenian King, with whom Cyrus renewed the Truce, until the Prince Phaartes returned with his Anſwer. During this ſhort interval, in which Cyrus hoped for a clear Satisfaction of his Deſires, he payed all due Civilities unto every one: He went unto Artaxates to wait upon Ciaxares, and there he viſited the Princeſs Ariminta, and related unto her all that Phaartes had ſaid concerning her, and what had paſſed between them, which ſhe hearkened unto not without ſome bluſhes: She gave Cyrus thanks for the liberty he had given Phraartes, but it was after ſuch a manner, that he might know ſhe rather thanked him for delivering her from all new Expreſſions of his Affection which he would have rendered her whilſt he had continued a Priſoner, then for any love ſhe bore him, though ſhe did eſteem him very much. After this, Cyrus returned unto the Camp again, contemplating always upon his dear Princeſs, or diſcourſing either with Aglatidas, or Feraulas, or Chriſantes, in whom he put much confidence. He loved Araſpes very well, yet ſince he had been in Love, he never ſpoke unto him concerning his Paſſion. When he was come into the Camp, he went immediately unto the Tent of Thraſibulus, where ſince he was at leaſure, he intended to paſs that Day, and part of the Night in hearing a Relation of what he deſired ſo much to know. As ſoon as he went thither, he expreſſed his Deſires of being alone with Thraſibulus, ſo that every one did leave him the liberty of Conference; and as ſoon as Cyrus ſaw this Opportunity, he ſaid very obligingly unto him; Well, my old Conqueror, ſaid he, will you ſuffer your ſelf to be overcome, and acquaint me with all the Circumſtances of that Life, which as far as I know of it, is moſt Glorious? You will not ſay as much of the reſt when you know it, replied Thraſibulus and ſighed; for Sir, you will only find two things in it, that is, much Weakneſs, and much Misfortune: Yet ſince it is your pleaſure to have it ſo, and ſince indeed it concerns the preſent Conditions of my Affairs that you know it, therefore I ſhall very exactly obey you: But can you endure, Sir, the relation of ſo many trivial Paſſages, which muſt needs be very impertinent unto you, and indeed very Inconſiderable unto any who knows not what belongs to Love? Call them not trivial and inconſiderable, replied Cyrus, when they concern my Friends: and, my dear Thraſibulus, (ſaid he, and ſighed alſo) I am not ignorant of that Miſery whereof I think you complain; tell it therefore, I conjure you, and know that I have leiſure enough to hear it, though it take up all Day, and night alſo: for ſince there is a Truce with the King of Armenia, I have little other imployment; and ſince Nights are but tedious, and reſtleſs unto me. Thraſibulus then ſeeing his Opportunity, and knowing that it was requiſite Cyrus ſhould be acquainted with his paſt Adventures, conſidering the preſent Condition of his Fortune, was moſt willing to obey him; and taking their Seats, he began thus.

The Hiſtory of Thraſibulus and Alcionida.

HAd I a Soul as ſenſible of Ambition as Love, I do not think it had been poſſible to endure all thoſe Miſfortunes which have fallen upon me : But ſince I ever thought it a greater Glory to merit Crowns, than poſſeſs them ; I ſtood in need of all my conſtancy, ſince I was not tormented with that proud Paſſion, which has razed and ruined all the Monarchies, and Republicks in the World. And though I am ſenſible of the loſs of that Soveraignty which belonged unto me, yet did I not give my ſelf over unto Deſpair and Sorrow for it, but only as this Loſs was an Obſtacle unto my Love ; ſo that it may almoſt be ſaid, I never was ſenſible of Ambition until I began to be in Love. But to acquaint you, Sir, with thoſe Miſeries I have ſuffered both in my Fortune, and in my Love, give me leave to tell you, that I am the Son of Thraſibulus, Prince of Miletes, whoſe Name I bear, who as long as he lived was an intimate Friend of Periander King of Corinth, and whoſe Name was very notable as long as he lived, for the Wars which he waged for eleven Years together againſt Sadiattes, the little Son of Giges, and againſt Alliates, Father of Cræſus, which he finiſhed with too much good Fortune, Wiſdom, and Honour, to be related in a few Words, and ſince that which followed after was the Foundation of all my Miſeries. This War, Sir, was the more conſiderable, ſince it was begun during the Raign of Giges, when he uſurped the Crown from Heraclidus ; for ſince that Ardis who ſucceeded him, did keep it from him, as likewiſe Sadiattes his Son after him, and as now Alliates does the ſame. The Prince my Father, then being very buſy in the beginning of his Raign to eſtabliſh in his Houſe that Soveraign Authority which belonged unto him ; he could not during the firſt Year of his War againſt Sadiattes, with all the Forces he had reſiſt him, becauſe he had many Enemies within the Town ; and not daring to go out of it, leſt in his abſence a Seditious Party ſhould gather to a Head in it. Sadiattes was abſolute Maſter of the Field, and continued his Wars for ſix Years together, in a very ſtrange manner; for without making any Attempts againſt the Town, he brought every Year in the Harveſt-time a very vaſt Army of Foot into the Mileſians Country, and without any burning of Houſes, or deſtroying Towns, he only carried away all their Corn and Fruits, and ſtayed no longer in the Country. Since my Father was ſtronger at Sea, he ſaw it was in vain to attempt any thing againſt Miletes, ſeeing it could not be famiſhed; but his Hopes were, that the Mileſians being forced to buy their Corn of Strangers, and Money growing ſcarce amongſt them, then they would revolt from their Prince: But for all this, my Father would not draw out of the Town, until ſuch time as he ſaw himſelf abſolute Maſter of his People; ſaying, That the Sea would bring him Corn, when as nothing would bring him Miletes if it were once loſt. Afterwards when by Fears he had made the People abſolutely to ſubmit unto him, he drew into the Field preſently after the Death of Sadiattes, and the new King of Lydia made War after another manner. The Prince my Father, without the aſſiſtance of any, unleſs them of the Iſle of Chios, (who remembred the Aids which he lent them when the Erithreans made War upon them) was in a Condition to fight that famous Battel of Limenia, and afterwards that upon the Banks of the River Meander, where with his own Hand he killed the Prince of Phocians Son. And ſince theſe two Battels were bloody unto both ſides, and the Victory dubious, they gave a ſtop unto the progreſs of Alliates, who deſpairing of abſolute Victory, according to his Hopes, did upon his return ſet fire unto a great Field of Corn, whoſe flames did not only conſume the Corn, but by the greatneſs of the Wind did ſet the Temple of Minerva on fire, and entirely conſumed it. This ſad Accident did trouble the People of Miletes, more than it did the King of Lydia. But within a while after, that Prince falling ſick, and ſending to conſult with the Oracle of Delphos, the Pythian told the Lydians, that ſhe would return them no anſwer, until they had rebuilt the Temple of Minerva which they had burned. Periander, who knew of this Anſwer, ſent to advertiſe the King my Father, that he might make the beſt uſe he could of it, ſo that a while after when the Lydian Embaſſadours came to ask leave, that they might rebuild the Temple, my Father commanded all the Inhabitants of Miletus to bring all the Proviſions of Corn that were in the Town, and to ſet them down in the publick Place of ſale, where the Embaſſadours of Lydia were to paſs; which being done according to his Command, and the Embaſſadours making a report of what they had ſeen unto their Maſter, they cauſed him abſolutely to deſpair of ever overcoming my Father; and ſince they ſaw the Mileſians themſelves were able to make War with four Kings at once, they offered them very advantagious and glorious Conditions of Peace: Alliates then cauſed two Temples in lieu of one to be rebuilt; and afterwards recovering his Health, he became a very intimate Friend of my Father's, who ſince that Pacification, was a very quiet Poſſeſſor of his Dominions, notwithſtanding the ſeveral ſecret Factions which he knew was amongſt his Subjects; for he was very conſtant, bold, and politick, one that made every one to fear him, and one who defeated all manner of Conſpiracies againſt him. This being the ſtate of things, he lived a long time in great Tranquillity, and Miletus was queſtionleſs one of the moſt magnificent Towns of all Cairo. I was then about the Age of thirteen, or fourteen; and a natural Son unto the Prince my Father, called Alexideſmus, was ſome ſeventeen, or eighteen Years of Age: ſince he was the Son of a Concubine, whom my Father did highly affect, he loved him exceeding well, and educated him with the ſame care he did me. Since the Princeſs my Mother died, when I was very Young, and the Prince my Father did enfranchiſe and marry that Mother of Alexideſmus, that illegitimate Prince had a powerful Upholder which I was deprived of; for that Woman was of a witty and ſubtile Spirit, and one that was capable of any thing. About the ſame time it was, that the wiſe Thales, ſo famous every where, returned from his long Voyage out of Egypt, where Solon was then Reſident ; and he took ſo great Affection unto me, as I can well boaſt without any Vanity, that I am beholden unto his wiſe Precepts for that little Vertue which I have; had I made as good uſe of them as I ought, doubtleſs I ſhould not have been ſo unfortunate as I am : for he always read ſo many Leſſons againſt Love, and againſt Marriage unto me, that had I followed his Advice, I ſhould at leaſt have prevented one part of my Miſery. The principal Rule which he taught for the order of Life, was, never to do that thing which we would condemn in another: But though he taught me the Leſſon over and over an hundred times, yet did I not keep cloſe unto his Document; for though I have often condemned others for ſuffering themſelves to be ſo far captivated by Beauty, as to loſe their Tranquillity, I my ſelf am ſo deeply plunged in the ſnares of Love, that I even loſt my Reaſon. But ſince the Miſeries of my Fortune did precede thoſe of my Love, it is therefore fit, I firſt tell you, Sir, that Melaſia (ſo was the Mother of Alexideſmus called, whom my Father had married ſince the Death of my Mother) did project a marriage for her Son with a Mileſian Lady, who was extream Rich, and of high Quality. This at the firſt ſeemed very ſtrange unto the World, for every one thought that I ought to be firſt thought upon : But yet ſince the Prince my Father did favour the Deſign, none durſt make the leaſt Murmur, and Alexideſmus, continued his Addreſs without any Obſtacle ; for though this Lady, whoſe name was Leonia, whoſe Father was Dead, and ſhe at the Diſpoſition of her Mother, had no fancy unto Altxideſmus, ye ſhe concealed it by the command of her Mother : and indeed (if it be lawful to ſpeak ſincerely of a Man who was the Cauſer of all my Miſery) Alexideſmus was far from being Amiable,for he had the violent Humours of my Father, but he wanted his Wit, his Reſolution, and an hundred other good Qualities which he was Owner of: on the contrary, he was extreamly cholerick, cruel, ambitious, weak and bold both together; as for his Perſon, it was reaſonable handſom, and there was a great difference between his Body and his Mind: yet ſince Melaſia had the Heart of the Prince her Husband at command, he would not ſee the faults of her Son, or at leaſt ſeemed as if he knew them not; for he was continually cheriſhing and flattering him up, and made no Diſtinction between me and him, though I dare boldly affirm, I was free from many Vices which they winked at in him. The Mother of Leonia was Siſter unto the Prince of Phoceus, whoſe Son, (as I told you before) my Father killed, at the laſt Battel againſt the King of Lydia, ſo that in her Heart ſhe hated our Houſe: yet notwithſtanding the Prince of Phoceus being all Ambition, he ſent her Word, that if ſhe could ſo contrive it, that Alexideſmus ſhould raign, and I be diſinherited, that then ſhe ſhould conſent unto this Match, but otherwiſe not ſo much as to think upon it. This Lady being ambitious as well as her Brother, and holding a great correſpondency with Melaſia, did ſo cunningly break the Buſineſs unto her, that there was no queſtion but to find a ſuitable compliance between two Women of one and the ſame Diſpoſition, both of them did quickly underſtand the deſires of each other, ſince the ſame Ambition did enflame them; ſo that no longer hiding the matter, they plotted together how they might make Alexideſmus Raign, and concluded to bring it about, though at the rate of many Crimes committed.

Whilſt things were thus tranſacting, the Prince my Father finiſhed that good ſtrong Cittadel in Miletus; and I was continually buſied either in my Exerciſes, or in the Converſation of Thalis, or elſe diverting my ſelf in ſuch delights as were fit for a Prince of my Age: I carried my ſelf with all Civility towards Melaſia and Alexideſmus, but I do ingenuouſly confeſs that my Averſion to them both was ſo great, that I had much ado to diſſemble it: All this while the marriage of Leonea went ſlowly on; for ſince the Prince of Phoceus would ſee ſome appearance of his hopes before he would conſent unto it, his Siſter, whoſe name was Philodicea, did cunningly protract it; neither could he bring it about ſooner; becauſe they of Prienna being forced to declare War againſt Policrates Prince of Samos, who would needs be King of the Sea, and fight with all he met, my Father thought, that in common Policy he was bound to oppoſe this new Soveraignty, ſince he had a good Pretence unto it, and ſet forth a great Navy of Ships, of which he was conſtrained to make me Admiral, becauſe he could not conveniently do otherwiſe, ſince he would not go himſelf in Perſon unto this War: Not but that I was very young for ſuch an Employment, being than but fifteen Years of Age; but ſince my Lieutenant-General was a Man of great experience, he was to manage the Buſineſs, and I only to have the Honour of the Title; neither do I know whether I ſhould have had that if Alexideſmus had not faln ſick, ſo that he could not go this Voyage. The Prince Philoxipes, who was then about my Age, and the Prince Tiſander, being both of them moved with a deſire of Glory, came and took our parts, and carried themſelves moſt heroickly in this War, which proved not very proſperous unto us; for the Fortune of Policrates was ſo great, that nothing could reſiſt him; yet may I truly ſay without a boaſt, that though we were ſometimes worſted, yet was it not without Glory; and though we were not ſo fortunate as to conquer, yet we ſhewed our Enemies that we deſerv'd it. At the laſt a Peace was concluded by the Mediation of ſage Bias, who to that end went from Prienna unto Samos, though it laſted not long, ſince it was impoſſible to tie up Policrates from roving at Sea, and aſſaulting almoſt all he met. At my return to Milete, I found the marriage of Alexideſmus and Leonea almoſt concluded; for during my abſence, Melaſia and Philodicea had cajolled with the chief of that Faction in the Town who were oppoſite unto the wiſe Thales, who though he was a great Lover of his Countries Liberty, yet would he not buy it at the rate of any violent Courſes, oftentimes ſaying, That a Tyrant who governed his Subjects in Peace, was better than that Liberty which was bought at the Price of a War. But there were ſome of another Faction, who tranſacted upon other Principles, and after another manner; for conceiving that the Prince my Father had uſurped an Authority which did not belong unto him, and deſiring to reduce the Government into a Popularity, and to prevent his Succeſſors from raigning after him, ſee how they argued the matter amongſt themſelves, without acquainting Melaſia and Philddicea with it, though they were all of the Conſpiracy. They thought, that as long as the Prince my Father lived, there was no Thoughts of recovering their Liberty, but all their Deſign was how to carry things after he was dead: Theſe Men took notice how the People of Milete did extreamly affect me, and ſeeing by my Inclinations that my Raign would be milde and ſweet, they conceived it would be very difficult to make the People ſhake off their Obedience; but on the contrary, foreſeeing plainly that if Alexideſmus ſhould Raign, he would prove the moſt cruel, violent and tyrannick Prince in the World, they thought it would be a moſt eaſy Buſineſs to induce the People to revolt, and to ſhake off a weak and wicked Maſter; ſo that in hopes this way to ruin Soveraign Power, they promiſed Melaſia and Philodicea, that when it was fit time, they would ſet Alexideſmus on the Throne: ſo that theſe two Women were ignorant of their Principles; but however they were even raviſhed with Joy, to ſee their Deſign like to proſper according to their Wiſh; and therefore the Marriage between Alexideſmus and Leonea muſt be ſolemnized without any longer delay, and a Feaſt is prepared in Milete for it; at which the Prince of Phocius, ſeeming to forget the Death of his Son, was preſent; and for a Months time, nothing but publick Rejoycings and Sports were to be found amongſt all thoſe who were not of this cloſe Deſign: Every one did think it ſtrange the Prince my Father ſhould marry Alexideſmus before me, ſince by uſual courſe he who was to be his Succeſſor, ſhould firſt be thought upon: But ſince it was not the cuſtom to murmur at whatſoever he did, all the Town ſeemed to be very jocund. I ſeeing which way things were like to be carried, conſulted with wiſe Thales, who always told me, that what the Gods had ordained, muſt needs come to paſs, and therefore the beſt courſe would be to ſubmit unto their Providence. The ſtate of things ſtanding upon theſe Terms, and the Prince my Father thinking himſelf the happieſt Man upon Earth, Periander, King of Corinth, who at that time found no very exact Obedience from his Subjects, did ſend unto him to ask, What would make a King that was but ill obeyed, to live quietly in his Dominions? The Prince my Father, who naturally was of a jealous Diſpoſition, and one of whoſe principal Maxim was, To truſt a ſecret unto as few as poſſible, and to put nothing to hazard; in lieu of writing unto Periander, or giving any Anſwer unto the Meſſenger, he carried him to walk in a great Meadow, and through a great Field of Corn ready to reap (for it was that time of the Year,) and ſaid unto him, Tell the King your Maſter what you ſee me do in this Corn-Field, and tell him that's my Anſwer. The Meſſenger, who knew not the Contents of that Letter which he brought, began to obſerve very exactly what the Prince did, who as he walked along the Field of Corn, as if he were in a deep Study, did break off thoſe Ears of Corn which grew higher than the reſt, and medled not with thoſe whoſe weight did bend them down to the Ground. Whatſoever this Meſſenger might think upon this Action, yet he could not comprehend the meaning, but reſolved to tell his Maſter what he had ſeen. Yet ſince it ſeemed ſomething odd, and of ſmall conſequence, after the Prince my Father was entered into the Town, and this Envoy gone to his Lodging, he could not chuſe but tell the matter unto a Man of Milete, whom he thought to be his very good Friend, and one who promiſed him not to ſpeak of it: But as ſoon as he was gone, this Man told another, and that other told his Friend, and that Friend told another Friend, and he unto the chief of the Conſpirators againſt me. As this Man was of a ſubtile Wit, and knew very well the ſtate of the Corinthian Affairs, and who, moreover, underſtood from Melaſia that Periander had ſent to aſk Counſel of my Father concerning ſome important Buſineſs, did well enough interpret the Riddle, and eaſily underſtood, that the breaking thoſe higheſt Ears of Corn, was as much as to ſay, that he muſt pull down the Grandees of his Dominions, who he thought did aſpire above their Quality. So that fearing leſt this Leſſon which was taught unto Periander, ſhould be executed upon himſelf, if ever the Prince of Milete ſhould come to diſcover his Plot, he told thoſe of the Combination, that it was requiſite they put their Plot in Execution ſooner than once they intended: But it was a long while before they could act their Intentions, ſo that I had leaſure to go into that War, wherein Leontidas ſerved Policrates, of which he told you in his Relation at Sinope. But during my abſence Anthemius (ſo was the chief of the Conſpirators called) did ſo cunningly manage his Buſineſs, that he induced Melaſia to think that the Prince my Father lived too long; for ſince the Vices of Alexideſmus did every day grow higher, the Prince began to make ſome difference between him and me: And Philodicea, who ſaw that her Daughter would be moſt unhappy in the Perſon of her Husband, yet her Ambition was her comfort, and ſhe continually preſſed Melaſia to move the Prince unto a Declaration in behalf of Alexideſmus, telling her that it was eaſily done, and that there did need no more but to publiſh unto the World, that ſhe was his firſt legitimate Wife, and that the Princeſs my Mother was never ſo, and ſo by conſequence Alexideſmus being the Elder, it was his Right to Reign; and alſo to tell the Prince my Father, that it was expedient to ſee it ſetled ſo whilſt he lived. Melaſia promiſed ſhe would, and indeed did move my Father unto it; but he would never give her a direct Anſwer; ſo that her Spirit being exaſperated, ſhe conſulted with Anthemius. The Prince of Phocius alſo came again to Milete, to conſult afreſh with the ſaid Anthemius and Melaſia; and the reſult of the Councels was, to poyſon my Father during my Abſence, and cauſe Alexideſmus to be proclaimed Soveraign. The Prince of Phocius ſaid further, that he made no queſtion but I had many Friends, yet ſince I was not in Town, they would not be over-violent in my behalf; and to prevent the worſt, he ſaid, he would cauſe a ſtrong party to enter into Milete ſecretly. Anthemius wiſhed it otherwiſe, becauſe he deſired to introduce Liberty upon the Death of the Prince, yet he durſt not openly oppoſe it, leſt he ſhould render himſelf ſuſpected, and diſcover the Plot which he hatched in his Heart.

The wiſe Thales, though very buſy at his Study, yet had Intelligence that ſome Plot or other was in Agitation, ſo that hearing of a Ship which the Prince my Father ſent with Ammunition, he writ a ſhort Letter unto me, wherein he intimated that my Preſence was very neceſſary at Milete; but ſince he could not imagine at what end the pernitious Plots of Melaſia, Philodicea, the Prince of Phocius, and Anthemius, did aim, he writ no more unto me, hoping that I would come time enough to diſperſe all Factions. In the mean while, the four Perſons did almoſt all of them tranſact by ſeveral Principles; for the Prince of Phocius did principally aim at Revenge; Melaſia and Philodicea ſought to ſatisfy their Ambition; and Anthemius aimed at the Liberty of his Country. But, Sir, why ſhould I trouble you thus long with the Miſeries of my Houſe? To be ſhort therefore, let me tell you, that Melaſia poyſoned my Father, and publiſhed a Declaration, by which Alexideſmus was acknowledged for his Succeſſor: The Prince of Phocius was in Milete with a commanding Power; Anthemius acknowledged Alexideſmus for his Prince, and after his Example others alſo. Thoſe Friends I had in Town would have taken up Arms; the People in general murmured; but the Party of Anthemius and Phocius had the Sword in their Hands, and were the ſtronger: When I arrived at Milete, they would not permit me Entrance, and ſince my Navy had been much weather-beaten, I was in the moſt pitiful Condition that ever was Prince: But ſending about two Hours after to know the Reaſon, Alexideſmus ſent me a counterfeit Declaration, which he had forged in my Father's Name, and as ſoon as it was dark, the wiſe Thales did let me underſtand the Truth of all things by a Fiſher-man, who came by Water;

ter; ſo that in one Day I heard of my Father's Death, the Loſs of my Dominion, the Treaſon of my Brother, and Revolt of my Subjects, and all this without any Power to help it. My Ships were much torn; I was not in a Condition to attempt any thing, having not Men enow to attempt any thing againſt Milete either by Sea or Land; nor knew I well how to get away from the Town, conſidering the Diſorder which this Affront had infuſed into my Fleet. The wiſe Thales did further ſend me his Advice, and conjured me not to ruin my Country for my own private Intereſt; but to ſtay until Time, my Friends, the Debauchedneſs of Alexideſmus, and the Gods, did revenge my Quarrel, and re-eſtabliſh me in my Dominions: for without all doubt the Gods were ſo juſt, as they would in fit time puniſh my Enemies, and recompence my Vertue, if I were ſo patient as to make good uſe of my Misfortune. When I firſt received this Advice, I did much wonder at it, and I confeſs it was ſomething difficult to follow it; ſo that it was Neceſſity rather than Choice which made me follow his Counſel. However, the Sea being very ſerene, although my Ships were in a very bad Condition, yet I endeavoured to put in at one of the next Iſlands, and there to accommodate my ſelf; yet did ſecretly ſend a Declaration into Milete, by which I let all my Subjects know, that the pretended Declaration of the Prince my Father was forged, and that Alexideſmus was not only a Rebel and an Uſurper, but that Melaſia his Mother poiſoned her Husband purpoſely to make her Son to reign. Since this Crime was horrid in the higheſt Degree, every one would not believe it, but imagined that it was only my Politick Scandal, to render them the more odious. But ſince Misfortunes ſeldom come alone, I was no ſooner in the open Sea, but a tempeſtuous Storm began to riſe, and within two Hours all my Fleet was diſperſed: The angry Billows waſted ſome of my Ships into the very Port of Milete; daſhed others againſt the Rocks, and ſplit them; ſome ſunk into the bottomleſs Abyſs; and I only with three Ships remained ſtruggling with the Wind and Waves: I thought a hundred times that it was impoſſible but I muſt needs periſh, and I did as often render Thanks unto the Gods that I was not to ſurvive my Misfortunes; but againſt my Wiſh, it was my Fate to live, and after a whole Day and Nights moſt diſmal Tempeſt, I was caſt upon the Iſle of Chios, where I landed, and was permitted only to re-accommodate my Ships; for ſince thoſe Iſlanders did know of the Alteration in Milete, they were afraid that if they ſhould harbour me long in their Ports, then the Miletians might have a Pretence of War againſt them. And thus, Sir, I found the Proverb true, That thoſe find the feweſt Places of Retreat, who ſtand moſt in need of them; and unfortunate Men ſeldom find Sanctuaries from thoſe who are not ſo themſelves. It was in vain to ſtay in hopes that any of my Ships would return; for whether they all periſhed, or were driven by the Tempeſt far off, or forſook me, and returned to Milete, I know not; but I am ſure I never heard any News of them: Two only of thoſe three which remained were fit to ſail, and the third was no ſooner ready, but I reſolved for Leſtos, to try whether that Friendſhip which I had contracted with Tiſander Son unto ſage Pittacus Prince of Myteline, would entertain me in ſpite of my Misfortunes. This generous Friend received me with Abundance of Kindneſs, and induced the Prince his Father alſo to reſpect me with as high Honour as if I were in full Poſſeſſion of my Dominions. In this Court I ſtayed a long time, and ſent unto Periander King of Corinth for ſome Aid; but his Hands were ſo full at home, by Reaſon of ſome oppoſite Faction amongſt his Grandees, that he was in no Condition to aſſiſt me. The Prince Policrates was at Peace with Alexideſmus; ſo likewiſe were they of Prienne: The Prince of Phoceus alſo was for him, and engaged all thoſe of his Alliance to the like; ſo that I ſaw no Poſſibility of effecting any thing with thoſe Succors which the Prince of Myteline only could afford me. I underſtood likewiſe by that Intelligence which I ever held with Thales, how he had diſcovered that Anthemius, who ſeemed ſo jealous in behalf of Alexideſmus, did privately animate the People againſt this Uſurper; ſo that there was much Reaſon to believe, there would ere long be ſome freſh Alteration in Milete. My beſt Courſe then was, not to incenſe the People

ple by bringing a War upon them, but to prepare my ſelf in a Readineſs to enter the Town whenſoever any favourable Occaſion ſhould be offered. Thus was I forced to ſit ſtill, and wait for the future Succeſs of my Fortunes; but I muſt confeſs it was with ſo melancholy a Mind, that nothing was able to divert me. And there was one thing which did double my Miſery, which was, that the Prince Tiſander was as unfortunate as my ſelf: for be pleaſed to know, Sir, that he had above two Years loved, in a moſt violent and deſperate manner, that famous Lady which you ſaw at Lesbos, when we met there together, but he could never obtain ſo much as a favourable look from her, though he courted her with all poſſible inviting Allurements which uſually move Affection. Since the admired Sapho, of whom I ſpeak, was a Miracle of Wit, Beauty, and Affability, I could not blame him for eſteeming her above all the World; yet ſince I never had been in Love my ſelf, I did extreamly condemn him for being as melancholy as my ſelf. But, Sir, it is not the Hiſtory of this Prince which I intend to relate: I ſhall only thus far tell you, that he being paſt all hopes of ever moving the Heart of this Lesbian Beauty, he deſired me to be the Companion of his Exile, and to travel with him over all thoſe Seas which were not far remote from Milette, in hope that Abſence would be his Cure. Since, in this Diſgrace wherein I lived, all Places were indifferent unto me, I eaſily conſented unto his Deſire; ſo that colouring our Departure as well as we could, we left Lesbos, and committed our ſelves unto Fortune. All our Diſcourſe was commonly Diſputes of Ambition and Love, and each of us maintained his Opinion according to the Suggeſtions of his Heart. We had two Ships beſides that in which we were; but preſently after we had only that, for meeting the Prince Policrates, who was much ſtronger than we, he took the other two from us, and all we were able to do was to eſcape out of his Hands. This Accident did extreamly incenſe me, and (if I may uſe the Phraſe) firſt moved me to turn a Pirate; for it begot in me ſo hot a Deſire to regain what I had loſt, that we reſolved to fall upon all we met, that would not render themſelves, conceiving it as lawful for us, as for Policrates, to make Prize of what we could. In leſs than a Months time we made above twenty Combates, and I preſently got the Name of a Pirate: as for the Prince Tiſander, he would not be known in any Place where e're we came. It may, I confeſs, be ſaid I was a Pirate, but now am none; for ſince my Deſign was only to get a ſmall Fleet by my Courage, I only retained the Ships and ſuch of the Men as would willingly ſerve me, and only as much as would ſuſtain us. We took three Ships from the Prince of Phocæus my Enemy, which did beyond all Expreſſions joy me; and at the firſt Iſle we came at, I ſet the Men on Land, and took others in their room: This did revive my hopes, ſince I began to conquer my Enemies. I underſtood from theſe Phocean Mariners, that their Prince would ere long imbarque, and go by the Euxine Bridg unto the Town of Appolonia, ſo that reſolving to intercept his Paſſage, I returned from whence I came, and it was then, Sir, when I met with you as you were ſailing from Corinth to Epheſus: Since my Deſign was to fight the Prince of Phocæus, whom they ſaid would come with ſix Sail, I reſolved to ſet upon yours, and gain it if I could. Yet to ſpeak the truth, you diſputed that Victory with ſo much Courage, as it may truly be ſaid that Number did overcome you, and that your Valour notwithſtanding was victorious. But, Sir, will you give me leave to tell you, how that valiant Man who fought with you in the Sea after you were both faln in, and whom I took up with you in a little Boat, was this ſame Tiſander who is now in my Tent, and who would not permit me to diſcover him unto you all the while you was in my Ship?

How, generous Thraſibulus, (ſaid Cyrus, and interrupted his Story) is he whom I fought withal, and who certainly had overcome me if you had not been, is he here? Then let me entreat you at my Requeſt to redouble your Cares of him, for I do not think there is a more valiant Man in the whole World than he: But I beſeech you go on with the Relation of his Life, which is as tender to me as my own. When Thraſibulus had admired the high Generoſity of Cyrus, in intereſting himſelf as he did in the Preſervation of that Man who had ſo furiouſly diſputed with him for the Victory, he continued his Diſcourſe in this manner.

I will not bring into your Memory, Sir, any more Paſſages of that Adventure, becauſe I know your Modeſty will not permit it; but give me leave to tell you, that when I landed at Lesbos, it was to ſet Tiſander on Shoar, who had received two Wounds from you, leſs in Appearance than thoſe two you received from him, but much longer, and more difficult to be healed. Then, Sir, according to my intended Deſign, I carried you to the Euxine Bridg, where I had the good Fortune to encounter him I was in queſt of, to wit, the Prince of Phocens; for indeed, it was he, Sir, againſt whom you fought, and whom you vanquiſhed, for certainly without you I had been vanquiſhed; but as Fortune was, he was not in any of thoſe three Ships which we took, but by a Miracle of Fate eſcaped: Then, Sir, after you refuſed thoſe two Ships which I did preſent unto you, becauſe indeed they belonged unto you more than unto me, and after that you were pleaſed to accept but of one of them; that ſame Tempeſt which did riſe within ſix Hours after we parted, and which, as I underſtood afterwards, did drive you ſome two Days after upon the Port of Sinope; that ſame Wind, I ſay, which drove you that way, did alſo by a prodigious blaſt, drive me the contrary, and carried me into the Helliſpont, and afterwards cauſed me to paſs between Lemnos and Lesbos; then forced me more upon the left hand, until I touched upon the Iſle of Chio, and after upon the Coaſts of Gnides, ſo well known by that Iſthmus which ſhoots it ſelf ſo far into the Sea, as if that Neck of Land did joyn it unto the Continent.

Hitherto, Sir, you may be pleaſed to look upon the moſt happy time of my Life, for amongſt my Misfortunes, I always enjoyed ſome Happineſs, either in the Friendſhip of the wiſe Thales, or in the ſweet Society of Tiſander, or Yours: But ſince the Day that I arrived at Gnides, nothing but miſerable Misfortunes were my Lot; for be pleaſed to know that juſt upon the point of this Iſthmus, whither the Tempeſt had driven me alone, (all my other Ships being diſperſed by the Storm) there ſtands a very ſtrong Caſtle, which is the greateſt Defence of this Iſle. A Man of good Quality, whoſe Name was Euphranor, and who was one of the Councel of ſixty which governs that Republique, did command in that Caſtle when I came thither. This Man, to my good Fortune as then I thought, was upon the top of a Tarraſs, and from that Height did ſee how the impetuous Winds did daſh me againſt the bottoms of the Walls; ſo that out of his civil Humanity, he ſent preſently unto all the Mariners in the Port to aſſiſt me, and he took eſpecial care to know in what Condition my Ship was, which indeed was the very ſame in which he had formerly commanded; for he ſaw it to be a Man of War, and one of the goodlieſt and biggeſt that ever was ſeen in thoſe Seas, and indeed it was the ſame I fought in againſt Policrates, and in which I had the Happineſs of your Company. Some Mariners which knew my Ship, told him I was that famous Pirate, who had a long time kept thoſe Seas, and who never uſed to take any Money or Merchandize, but only Men and Ships; aſſuring him alſo that they knew me very well, and once ſaw me aſſault a Ship whilſt they eſcaped. But being informed by others at the ſame time, who came to ſee me, that I had not the Garb of a Pirate: that my Ship was much Weather-beaten, and that it would be a long time before I could be in a Condition to depart from Gnides; he ſent order, either out of Curioſity to know who I was, or elſe for the Security of his Fort, to bring me unto him. Since I knew it was the Cuſtom of all Gariſons to do the like, and ſince I reſolved not to make my ſelf known, I willingly obeyed, and only one Man of Quality in Milete, called Leoſthenes, (who would never forſake me) and three more of my own Men followed me: I was brought unto Euphranor in a great Gallery, where ſeveral People were walking with him: he ſpoke unto me very ingenuouſly and civilly; he asked me from whence I came, and whither my Intentions was to go? he did alſo put many Queſtions unto me to diſcover the Truth of my Anſwers: unto which I replied ſo readily, as I did not fully give him Satisfaction; for I anſwered, that though I ſhould tell him my Name, yet would it be unknown unto him; that I came from the Euxine Bridg upon ſome important Occaſions, but knew not whither I went when the Tempeſt did drive me upon that Coaſt, however I acknowledged my ſelf bound unto his Generoſity in ſending his Men to relieve me, and my Ship, which if he had not done, I had certainly periſhed. Whilſt I was thus ſpeaking unto Euphranor, I obſerved how all the Men in the Gallery with him flocked about me with a prejudicated Opinion that I was a Pirate: Since there are only four Languages ſpoken amongſt all the Ionians, and they much reſembling one another, ſo that whoſoever underſtood one, might underſtand all the reſt: we underſtood one another very well; there being but little Difference between the Language of Milete, and that of Gnides, only in the Accent, for both were Greeks. But, Sir, amongſt thoſe which came about me, I ſaw four or five Ladies of handſom Garb; amongſt the reſt, the Daughter of Euphranor was the faireſt that ever Eye beheld; and ſince ſhe was more curious than the reſt, to ſee a Pirate, which I heard her ſay, ſhe had never ſeen before, ſhe came nearer to me than the reſt, and I did ſalute her with more ſubmiſſive Reverence than I did the reſt, unto whom I only bowed my ſelf in general without any particular Application: But unto Alcionida, (for that was the Name of that Beauty) I addreſſed my ſelf with as much humble Reverence as if a Divinity had been preſent. Whilſt I was in Conference with Euphranor, methought I heard her ſay unto her Companions, that I had not the Garb and Air of a Pirate, as they had formerly deſcribed Pirates unto her; ſo that to comfirm her in that good opinion of me, I endeavoured to anſwer Euphranor with all the Ingenuity that poſſible I could, and indeed he was ſo well pleaſed with me, that in lieu of the Quality of a Pirate, which is never admitted into their Ports, he very favourably offered me his Aſſiſtance, and told me, that I might ſtay in Gnides as long as I pleaſed to trim up my Ship: after this, I retired, holding Diſcourſe as long as handſomly I could; to the end I might the longer look upon the Wonder of Beauty, Alcionida. But at the laſt I went out of the Gallery, and returned unto my Ship: But ſince it leaked in very many Places, I was forced to lodg in the Town; at the end of which this Caſtle was built, ſtill retaining in my Fancy the perfect Idea of this Divine Beauty which I had ſeen. The next Morning, I went unto that famous Temple of Gnidenian Venus, where I found the Divine Alcionida, and ſo charming and amiable, that I changed Colour when I ſaw her. Since I wore that Day a very rich Sute of Clothes, ſhe hardly knew me, yet recalling my Face into her Memory preſently after, ſhe anſwered my Salute very civilly; ſince ſhe was then with her Mother, and ſince I paſſed but under the Notion of a Pirate, I durſt not accoſt her, but conceived it fit to ask leave before I addreſſed my ſelf unto her: I conceived it fit to go and thank Euphranor, and give him a ceremonious Viſit; I went unto him the very next Morning, and my Diſcourſe was ſo ſutable unto his Diſpoſition, that he acknowledged himſelf to be very glad of mine Acquaintance: After I parted from him, I bethought my ſelf, that commonly, Preſents with Men, have the ſame Operation that Sacrifices have with the Gods, and therefore I preſented him with an admirable Sword, the Hilt of which was Gold, and ſet with precious Stones, full of moſt rare Workmanſhip; for it was done by the Hand of that famous Philoſopher, and Arts-maſter, whoſe Skill in Gold-Works none could imitate. Euphranor was much taken with this magnificent Preſent, and received it with much Delight. In the mean while, I was ſo charmed with the Sight of Alcionida, that I forgot all neceſſary Orders for the trimming up of my Ship, and left the care of it wholly unto Leoſthenes: I ſhould ſtay alone in my Chamber, and contemplate upon nothing but the Divinity of her Beauty; I ſhould ſtand a whole Hour in a pleaſing Study, and think upon the Sweetneſs of her Looks, the Pureneſs of her Complexion, the excellent Compoſure in every part of her Face, and of the Modeſty which appeared in all her Actions, and the Sweetneſs of her Mind which appeared in her Phiſiognomie: But after I had long ſtood in ſuch contemplative Muſings, I ſhould upon a ſudden wonder to find my ſelf ſo imployed; I (I ſay) who ever ſince the Death of my Father had a Mind continually full of revenging Thoughts and Hatred, thinking upon nothing but how to regain what I had loſt; I confeſs, this Alteration aſtoniſhed me, and I was much aſhamed of ſo much Weakneſs in my ſelf: I reſolved to take another Courſe, and to ſend for Permiſſion to viſit the Wife of Euphranor, whoſe Name was Phedima: for, ſaid I unto my ſelf, I muſt not expoſe my ſelf unto ſo great a Danger as to look upon ſo charming a Beauty as Alcionida; for I ſcarce ſaw her above one Minute, but I forgot all my Enemies, what then would become of me if I ſhould diſcourſe with her, and give her time to captivate my Heart? Yet in a Moment after I laughed at my own Fears, and believed, that to quench my kindling Flames, there did need no more, but to deſire I ſhould not love Alcionida, and that would ſmother it up. Others, ſaid I, who are entangled with this kind of Paſſion, are themſelves in the Fault, becauſe they do not check and ſtifle it at the firſt, but I for my part ſhall take another Courſe, and I will go and ſee Alcionida, with a firm ſetled Reſolution only to admire, but never to love her. Thus, Sir, thinking my ſelf ſufficiently armed againſt the Charms of this admirable Beauty, I ſent after Dinner to ask leave that I might viſit her, and it was granted unto me. I went then, and took Leoſthenes only with me, but ſpoke not a word unto him all the way. Sir, ſaid he unto me, and laugh'd, you are too much reſerv'd for the Viſit of Ladies. I laugh'd at the Obſervation of Leoſthenes, and knowing no Reaſon why I ſhould acquaint him with the Cauſe, I gave him no Anſwer, but ſeemed as if I underſtood him not. I went then into the Caſtle which was very near, and Phedima received me very civilly. The admirable Alcionida alſo was ſo charmingly ſweet unto me, that I had all the Motives poſſible to commend her: Since there was many Ladies there when I came in; after the firſt Complements were paſt, Phedima addreſſed her ſelf unto thoſe ſhe was in Diſcourſe with before I entred; and ſince I had the Honour to be next Alcionida, I had Occaſions given me to obſerve that her Soul was as full of Beauty, as her Face: and I believe never any had a more charming Diſcourſe courſe than ſhe, for ſhe did ſpeak as much as poſſible could be to divert her Hearers: ſhe equally ſpoke well of every thing, and kept her ſelf within the Limits of the Ladies Knowledg; and would not diſcourſe of things too high, and above the Sphear of their Underſtanding: her Eloquence was excellent, but natural, and came freely, and unpumpt for, from her: and though ſhe was of the talkative Sex, yet ſhe could be diſcreetly ſilent, and lend a willing Ear unto any that ſpoke, though never ſo far from the Purpoſe; ſo complacential ſhe was, and wiſe, and judicious; ſo that according to this Deſcription of her, you may eaſily imagine, that ſhe would permit me to ſpeak to her; and was ſo kind as to return her Anſwers. After much common and indifferent Diſcourſe, in which all the Company did intermix, ſhe very obligingly told me, that I was ſomething beholden unto her for the Opinion which ſhe had of me before ſhe knew me: For (ſaid ſhe unto me) it was oft-times my Diverſion, when the Sea was highly incenſed, to look out, and ſee the mountanous Waves daſh againſt our Rocks; and it happened, that as I was looking out of my Cloſet, I ſaw how the Wind did beat your Ship againſt the Foot of the Caſtle; and when I ſaw that all within were ready to periſh, I confeſs my Heart did beat, and I prayed unto the Gods for your Preſervation: Since therefore my firſt Thoughts of you were well-Wiſhes and Pity, therefore I ſay you are a little beholden unto me. Is it then, Madam, unto your Prayers that I owe my Safety, (ſaid I unto her?) then it is to you that I muſt addreſs my Thanks. It is unto the Gods, and not to me, replied ſhe, that you are to render Thanks; and I can claim no more but a ſlight Commendation for pitying you before I knew who you were: and I know that when I met you this Morning in the Temple, doubtleſs you thanked the Goddeſs of that Place for your Preſervation. It is moſt true, ſaid I unto her, that I went thither to that Purpoſe, for then I did not know that it was unto your Prayers that the Goddeſs was propitious; and at this time I do not at all wonder that the Goddeſs of Beauty ſhould grant the Deſires of the faireſt Lady in the World. But, Madam, perhaps now you know me, you repent of that Favour you did me when you did not know me. I know not why, replied ſhe, unleſs appearances be very Fallacious, I ſhould repent of my pity, ſince Miſeries are apt to move all unto it, eſpecially my Sex, and ſince you ſeem to be of another Quality then I thought you to be. Oh, Madam (ſaid I unto her) I do conjure you not to change your Opinion of me. It ſeems then by your Diſcourſe, replied ſhe, that you rank your ſelf in the number of Miſerable and unfortunate Men. Yes, Madam, replied I, the moſt of any Man living, not only in Relation to thoſe Misfortunes which have already faln upon me, but alſo in reſpect of thoſe which in probability will hereafter happen. You are too Ingenuous to perſecute your ſelf, ſaid ſhe, in grieving for that which perhaps may happen; and for my part I do confeſs unto you, that I do equally condemn thoſe that build their happineſs upon Hopes only of being ſo, and thoſe who are miſerable only out of future Fears. There are a ſort of Men in the World (ſaid I unto her, and ſmiled) whoſe Joys and Sorrows do conſiſt only in Hopes and Fears. I have heard as much, replied ſhe, and ſmiled as well as I, but for your part, you cannot be acquainted with any misfortunes of theſe kinds, ſince living continually at Sea, you have nothing to hope for but a gentle Gale, nor any thing to fear but a ſurging Tempeſt. Pirates (replied I, in ſuch a tone, and after ſuch a manner as might make her think I was not one) are not originally out of the Sea, as your Goddeſs is, but they are born upon Land as others are; and indeed, Madam, ſaid I and bluſhed, my Shipwrack may tell you, that Pirates are not always amongſt the waves. You give your ſelf a Name, ſaid ſhe, which ſuits ſo ill with your Diſcourſe, that I do not think it belongs unto you. I do confeſs, ſaid I unto her, that I have not always had that Title, nor did I take it up my Self, but ſince People beſtow it upon me, I ſhall keep it until it pleaſe Fortune to take it away again.

Thus did I hold the fair Alcionida in diſcourſe until all thoſe Ladies which were with her were making ready to depart, and I thought it long enough for my firſt Viſit: So that giving Phedima a Complement of Gratitude, and deſiring the Honour to viſit her as long as I ſtayed at Gnides, I returned to my Lodging: Leoſthenes, who all that while had only the Company of a ſtupid Blockhead, complained againſt the tediousneſs of my Viſit: but my Mind was ſo taken up with my new Paſſion, that I knew not well what he ſaid, nor anſwered him much to the purpoſe; he judging therefore, by my Actions, that I deſired to be alone, left me, and went unto the Port, to ſee whether the trimming up of our Ship went forward. I then was no ſooner at liberty, but remembring my firm Reſolution which I had taken in going unto Alcionida, not to love her, I began to queſtion my ſelf, whether I was Free, or whether I was a Captive? I examined my Reaſon and my Heart upon it; but, O Heavens! I found the firſt of theſe ſo engaged, and the other ſo prejudicated, that I was not a little amazed at it. I called for the Aid of Ambition, ſince I heard ſay, that Paſſion of all others was able to reſiſt the Power of Love; but all was in vain, and Ambition did ſubmit unto Love: yet for all that ſhe did not quite deſert my Heart; but, on the Contrary, notwithſtanding the predominancy of Love, ſhe redoubled all her Strength; and I eſteemed my Self a hundred times more unfortunate in loſing my Dominions ſince I knew Alcionida, than before; becauſe now I looked upon my Misfortunes as an invincible Obſtacle unto the happy Succeſs of my new Paſſion. If I were abſolute Soveraign in Milete, ſaid I, I might almoſt be certain to obtain the Favour of this fair One: but ſince I am an Exile, and paſſing for a Pirate, I can never have any hopes in pretending to any ſhare in her Affection; and I muſt prepare my ſelf to ſuffer all the Torments that both Love and Ambition can inflict upon me. Moreover, what will the wiſe Thales ſay unto me? what will the King of Corinth think? what imaginations will the Prince of Mytilene have? and what Cenſures ſhall I incur from all the Princes and People of Ionia in particular, and from all Greece in General, when they ſhall underſtand that a

Prince unjuſtly driven out of his Dominions, abuſed by his Enemies, betrayed by his own Subjects, and depoſed by a Baſtard; a Prince, I ſay, who ſhould think upon nothing but Revenge and Honour, and not ſuffer himſelf to be weakly overcome by the fair Eyes of Alcionida without any Reſiſtance? Reſiſt then, for ſhame, ſaid I unto my Self, and do not yield thy ſelf a Captive without a Combate. But, O Heavens! (ſaid I preſently after,) what Arms ſhould I uſe againſt her? what can I think or do, not to love her? Can I diſcover any blemiſh in her Beauty? or can I find any fault in her Mind? and can I ſuſpect that her Soul is not ſo generous as his Face is fair, and her Wit as charming? Let me try if any thing can cure me: Let me viſit her daily, and keep a cloſe obſervant Eye upon her, and enquire whether this fair One, who doubtleſs is beloved of all that know her, do not alſo love ſome one or other; and let me neglect nothing which may free me from that Miſery which torments me. Thus did I reaſon with my Self, and could not contrive any other way to deliver my Self, but by diſcovering ſome Defects in this Incomparable Beauty, or elſe to find out that her Heart was already engaged. The next day then I enquired with all poſſible Diligence of what I deſired to know, which I could with more eaſe do, becauſe at the ſame Lodging where I did lie, there quartered alſo a Man of good Faſhion, a ſtranger as well as my Self, who had been at Gnides a long time to hearken after News, with him I did comply, to effect my Deſires the ſooner: I underſtood then from him, that Alcionida was loved by all reaſonable Men which ever ſaw her, but none could ever move her Heart; and he told me ſo many things in her Commendations, that I made no queſtion but her Soul was as excellently fair as her Face, and as great as her Wit: Sometimes I deſpaired of finding any of thoſe Defects which I ſought for; and ſometimes again, my Heart, whether I would or no, would extreamly rejoice at the knowledg of her excellent Perfections. I could not chuſe then but ſubmit, Sir, and love the fair Alcionida. But for all that, my harted of the Prince of Phocæus, Alexideſmus, Melaſia, Philodicea, and Anthemius, was not extinguiſhed: on the contrary, I wiſhed them worſe then I did before, becauſe the miſerable Condition into which they had brought me, was the Obſtacle in my Love: So then, not neglecting my Mileſian Affairs, I reſolved to pleaſe Alcionida, if I could; ſo that I was not a little buſily employed about it. Since Euphranor had ſome ſuſpicion that I was not of that Quality which I ſpoke my Self, he always treated me very civilly, and took it kindly when I came to viſit him; and the ofter I ſaw Alcionida, the more charming I found her, and me thought ſhe did not look upon me as a Pirate; yet was I not at all the happier, for I knew ſhe would not look upon me as a Lover: I oftentimes had a deſire to hint ſomething unto her which might make her gueſs my thoughts, but preſently after I check'd my Deſign; and my Fears to be ill uſed, moved me to be content with her Civilities to me, rather than to expoſe my ſelf unto her Anger: for ſaid I unto my Self, If I ſhould acquaint her with my Paſſion, and not my Quality, ſhe will treat me as a Pirate: Alſo, if I ſhould tell her the Condition I am in, what hopes is there, that ſhe ſhould give any entertainment unto an Exile, and an unfortunate Prince. In concluſion, I reſolved to make her know I was in Love with her, and that ſhe ſhould ſtill think that I was not of that Quality I appeared in; but not to let her know directly that I was a Prince, which was thruſt out of his Dominions: but it was ſo Difficult a Task to keep an even way, as not to ſpeak either too much, or too little, to infuſe this knowledg into her, that I looked upon it as a buſineſs almoſt impoſſible, and I lived a moſt vexatious Life. Mean while Leoſthenes, who had a bold and an attempting Wit, fell into league with a Couſin of Alcionida's, who dwelt with her; and that ſo deep, as I wondred at it; for this Woman was full of friendly Expreſſions to him. 'Tis true, he had prepared her with many little Preſents which he bought privately in Gnides, and ſaid he brought them out of a far Country, ſuch as Eſſences, Powders, Perfumes, and ſuch knacks; and ſince this Woman was of a free Diſpoſition,ſhe imparted all that ever ſhe knew unto Leoſthenes.

Upon a Day then, as ſhe was in diſcourſe with him, ſhe preſſed and conjured him to tell her truly who I was; and ſince he imagined, that happily this Curioſity did not proceed from her ſelf, he preſſed her as earneſtly to tell him why ſhe deſired ſo much to know it: ſo that according to her uſual freeneſs and Ingenuity ſhe told him,after ſhe had made a mighty Secret on it,that her Reaſon was, becauſe Alcionida had a great Deſire to know my Quality, for ſhe could not believe that I was really a Pirate. As good Fortune was, Leoſthenes anſwered her, as I would have appointed him if I had known of it; for he fretted and fumed, and anſwered ſo ambiguouſly, that he made her believe Alcionida was not miſtaken. As Leoſthenes had plainly perceived that I was deeply in Love with Alcionida, ſo he thought it would pleaſe me in telling how inquiſitively ſhe had enquired who I was; and indeed the Relation of it did ſo much joy me, that having no Power to hide my Paſſion, I diſcovered all my thoughts unto him, and made him my Confident: not that I thought him very fit for it, for his Spirit was a little too Inſolent; but becauſe, the truth was, I had no other to chuſe, and becauſe I could not incloſe the Violence of my Paſſion in ſo cloſe a place as my own Heart. Oh Heavens! how many pleaſing minutes did this Curioſity of Alcionida afford me? and how many Fears did I apprehend, when I did imagine the Knowledg of my Misfortunes would bar me admittance into her Heart? However,I did viſit her every day, and every day I loved her more and more violently. The moſt powerful of her Charms was, that all thoſe Vanities which uſually young People are moſt taken up in, were much below her: this alluring Lady did never do any thing as a Diverſion only: her Dreſs was moſt Ornamental, but ſo, as it did not require half a Life to the putting it on, as moſt Women uſe; her Diſcourſe was never upon any trivial Vanities; moreover, all the Gold and Diamonds of the Eaſt could never adulterate her Mind; but ſhe could at the firſt Viſit diſcern a compleat Man though in meaneſt Habit, from a ſtupid Aſs in the moſt magnificent Clothes upon Earth; and notwithſtanding his outward luſtre, ſhe would be ſo juſt unto real Merit, that ſhe would be more reſpective unto a Pirate who was owner of good Qualities, than unto a Prince who could boaſt of nothing but his Vices. I finding then ſo much Wiſdom and Vertue in this admirable Lady, how could I chuſe but love her? I remember, being one day with her, and leaning againſt the Window in the end of a Gallery towards the Sea, whilſt other Ladies were walking behind us; See (ſaid ſhe, and ſhewed me the place where my Ship was bulged) yonder is the very place where you were like to ſuffer Shipwrack. Pardon me, Madam (ſaid I haſtily unto her,) that is not the place where I was moſt like to Periſh; for indeed it is not ſo far off you. Truly (ſaid ſhe, and did not underſtand the Myſterious meaning of my Anſwer) you do not know ſo well as I do the place where your Ship was in moſt Danger, for theſe Eyes did ſee it at that Time, but I believe you were ſo buſy in giving Order what to do in that Extremity, that you did not obſerve the Place. I know very well, Madam, ſaid I unto her, that my Shipwrack was like to have been in your preſence, but yet for all that, thoſe who are ready to periſh, know the place better then any lookers on. For my part, ſaid ſhe, and laughed, did I not conceive your Soul to be very reſolute, I ſhould think that Fear might at that inſtant have a little diſturbed your Reaſon, for I can aſſure you, it was at the Foot of that great Rock where you were in greateſt Danger. And I am moſt certain, replied I, and notwithſtanding the Reſpects which I owe you, I muſt maintain, that it was againſt this Rock againſt which I am moſt in Danger, and not that which you ſpeak of. Alcionida, being not accuſtomed to find me ſo full of Contradiction, did then ſuſpect there was ſome hidden ſence in my Words, and bluſhing at it, I am to blame, ſaid ſhe, to argue with you concerning a buſineſs of no Importance; for ſince you eſcaped the Danger, it is ſufficient, and I may well be ſatisfied, without more diſcourſe upon it: But truly, ſaid ſhe, and laughed ſtill, thoſe who ſay, a wiſe Pilot will never ſpilt twice upon one and the ſame Rock, do not know how difficult it is to prevent it, ſince you who ſeem ſo wiſe, do not know the Place where you were in moſt Danger: however, let us ſpeak no more upon this Subject, but fall upon ſomething elſe which will better pleaſe you; and tell me I beſeech you when your Ship will be ready to put to Sail, for I imagine you wiſh for your departure as much as all they who know you do wiſh your ſtay. I was much non-pluſt at this Queſtion; for though it gave me a fit opportunity to diſcover my thoughts unto her, yet there appeared in her Eyes ſo much Severity mixed with her Sweetneſs, that I durſt not reveal it: I only told her, that I thought it not poſſible to be very earneſt in haſting away from the place where ſhe was; and ſince common Civility might well exact as much as I did ſay, ſhe returned me as civil an Anſwer; and all the reſt of our Conference was ſuch as this. I had been divers other times with her, and never durſt expoſe my Self unto her Anger in declaring my Love to her; and I underſtood from Leoſthenes, that ſince the firſt Day, Alcionida never ſpoke a word to her Couſin concerning me. In the mean time, I deferred the mending of my Ship as long as conveniently I could; and I could have found in my Heart a diſpoſition to break ſome things which were whole, purpoſely to gain time: ſo that in lieu of three weeks, I made it ſix, that I ſtayed in the Port of Gnides. But at the laſt, the wiſe Thales, whom I had ſecretly advertiſed of the Place where I was, did ſend me Word, that there was a very ſeditious Face upon things in Milete, and adviſed me to come thither; and then was I forced to depart, notwithſtanding the intereſt of my Love: Moreover, ſince the repairing of my Ship was ſo long in Hand, there was a report in Gnides, that I had ſome ſecret Deſign in it, and Euphranor himſelf ſuſpected ſomething, as I underſtood by Leoſthenes, and he from his Confident, giving it out, that as ſoon as he returned from his Voyage of eight days, he would force me to explain my Self. All theſe Conſiderations therefore requiring my Departure, and my Ship being ready, when Euphranor was to go his Journey, I took my leave of him, telling him that I ſhould depart before his return; and beſeeching him to believe, that if I did not die in a buſineſs about which I went, I would return, and make my ſelf a little better known unto him. After his departure, I ſtaid four days ſtill at Gnides: during which time, Alcionida who never had been in a Ship of War, no more than three or four of her Friends, ſeemed very deſirous to ſee Mine; and I beſeeched her to ſatisfy her curioſity in honouring me ſo far as to come into my Ship, the laſt afternoon I was to ſtay in that Port: and having obtained a Promiſe of it, with the Permiſſion of Phedima, I prepared to receive her with all poſſible Magnificence, but yet with all the Melancholy that a Heart could be capable of. And when I ſeriouſly conſidered, I ſhould within thoſe four days ſee Alcionida no more; I was ſo grieved at the thought of it, that I was not able to order this intended Feaſt as I deſired: but relied wholly upon the contrivance of Leoſthenes, who did order it admirably well: for though the time of preparation was very ſhort, yet was my Ship adorned with an hundred waving Flags of ſeveral Colours, on which the name of Alcionida was written in Gold and Silver, with variety of Mottoes. There was placed upon the Deck all manner of Sea-Muſick, ſuch as might reſemble the Tritons, and the Nereides; and beſides theſe, there were very admirable Voices in imitation of the Syrens. All the Souldiers were tricked up in the beſt Arms in the Ship.

The Day and Hour being come, in which I was to be honoured with ſeeing Alcionida in a place where I had any Power, I went to meet her, and her Aunt which accompanied her, with ten or twelve more of her Friends; as for Phedima ſhe was not very well, and therefore could not come: I was in the moſt magnificent Arms that ever I wore, with a Plum of ſeveral Colours, and waited upon by Leoſthenes, and all the principal Officers of my Ship: conducting her then into the Ship, thus ordered, as I told you, the Muſick begun to play as ſoon as we came near, and going into a Cabin, ſhe was amazed at the greatneſs of it; at the rareneſs of the Pictures, and the Magnificence of every thing; and ſhe could not be perſwaded ſhe was in a Ship: After ſhe had well viewed theſe things, the Mariners, to divert her, did in her preſence, do all they uſe to do, either in a Calm, or in a Tempeſt, which was to pull up, and let down the Sails; to turn upon a ſudden, or by degrees, to remove all that abundance of Cordage in an inſtant; and in ſhort we ſhewed her all manner of Maritime works, which uſually are Wonders unto thoſe who never ſaw them. Whilſt Alcionida was viewing theſe Sights, the Banquet was brought into the Cabin wherein we were at the firſt: ſo that when ſhe entred again into it, ſhe was afreſh ſurprized with pleaſing Delights: for the truth was, Leoſthenes had ordered things very ſo well; ſhe began then to commend and thank me, but ſtill chiding me for my Magnificence, and telling me with a moſt obliging ſmile, that if all Pirates were like me, they would ſhame all that Greece had moſt excellent and magnificent. I returned her a Complement with much Joy, and was extreamly pleaſed to obſerve Alcionida ſo delighted: But when I began to think, that I muſt depart that very Night, (for the Wind was good) I was not able to look upon Alcionida without extream Sorrow: Alas, (ſaid I unto my ſelf, whilſt ſhe was at the Banquet with her Friends, and looking moſt attentively upon her) perhaps I ſhall never ſee Alcionida again; every minute drives me further from her: And canſt thou live Thraſibulus, and endure this? haſt thou an Heart to bid her adieu? Ah, no, no, rather die a thouſand Deaths, than admit of ſo rigorous, ſo incertain, and ſo long an Abſence; ſo certain for its Cruelty, and ſo inſufferable in its Torments. Theſe Cogitations did make ſo deep an Impreſſion into my Soul, that I changed colour twenty times in an hour; ſo that Leoſthenes drawing me aſide, when he perceived me extream Melancholy, and whileſt the Ladies were eating, and according to his free and bold Humour, How do you, Sir, ſaid he unto me? are you the only

Man in all the World, whom the ſight of the Party loved does ſatisfy? Alas, Leoſthenes, ſaid I unto him, what Satisfaction can it be to ſee this admirable Beauty whom I adore, ſince I muſt ſee her no more? If that be the Cauſe of your Sadneſs, ſaid he to me, why will you not ſee her all the days of your Life? Alas, how can I do that, ſaid I to him? You may do it (replied he very haſtily) by permitting me to cut the Cable which faſtens the Ship unto the Anchor, and ſo let me hoiſe up Sails, and put to open Sea, as if it were with intention to divert them, and ſo you may carry them whither you pleaſe; retaining only the fair Alcionida, and her lovely Couſin, and ſet at the reſt on ſhore, at ſome convenient diſtance from this Place. Euphranor, ſaid he, is not now at Gnides, and we ſhall be far enough off before our Flight will be diſcovered: and however, ſaid he, whether you do it as a Pirat, or as a Lover, it will be a Prize worthy of you. At the firſt, I thought that Leoſthenes had ſpoken this out of Raillery: but preſently after, ſeeing he ſpoke Seriouſly, and as one that was Intereſted in it, my firſt Apprehenſion was to refuſe the Motion; but Love in an Inſtant, ſeducing both my Generoſity, and my Reaſon, forced me to ſay to Leoſthenes, almoſt not knowing what I ſaid, Canſt thou tell me of no Way, cruel Friend, to make me happy, but by making me Culpable? and doſt thou make ſuch a pleaſing Propoſition, as Honour forbids me to accept? The fault is eaſily repaired, ſaid he unto me; and thoſe who are Happy, do never paſs for Culpable: and therefore without Loſs of time in needleſs Diſcourſe, go, and entertain the Ladies, and amuſe them, whilſt I take all neceſſary Courſes to execute ſo happy a Deſign. Ah, Leoſthenes, ſaid I unto him, I dare not conſent unto ſuch an unjuſt Propoſition, how pleaſing ſoever it be. Conſider (ſaid he again) that if you will needs be ſo exactly juſt, you may perhaps never ſee the fair Alcionida again; but may for ever enjoy her, if you follow my Counſel. But then ſhe will hate me, replied I unto him. But on the other ſide, you will for ever loſe her, (anſwered he.) Look upon the Treaſure, (ſaid this unjuſt Friend, and pointing unto her with his Finger) which you intend to loſe. Indeed, Sir, what ſhall I ſay in my Excuſe? Love diſturbed my Reaſon: Leoſthenes ſeduced my Will: and hardly knowing what I ſaid, I half conſented unto his Deſires, which doubtleſs were more for his own intereſt, than mine, in relation to the Couſin of Alcionida, whom he loved; and I went as he adviſed me to entertain, and amuſe the Ladies, whilſt he cut the Cable, hoiſted Sails, and took the open Sea. Since the Banquet was ended when I entred, Alcionida came towards me with ſuch obliging Civility, and ſo many ſigns of Satisfaction in her countenance; I was ſo aſhamed for conſenting unto what Leoſthenes had propounded; as I did not only grow Pale, and bluſh, both in an inſtant, but checking my thoughts, No, Madam, (cried I upon a ſudden) I can never conſent unto it, I had rather die an hundred times: come, Madam, (ſaid I unto her, and preſented her my Hand) and go out of this place which is unworthy of you, and never truſt your ſelf again in the Hands of Pirats: But, Madam, make haſte, I conjure you, leſt that Repentance which now is in me, be not ſeconded by a worſe. Alcionida was ſo amazed at this, that ſhe knew not what to think; but ſhe ſaw ſo much Diſorder in my Face, that ſhe was in a great Diſorder her ſelf, and knew not what ſhe ſhould Anſwer. Then ſeeing that every one began to obey Leoſthenes; and that he had his Sword in his Hand, and his Arm up to cut the Cable, I did abſolutely forbid him: Then turning towards Alcionida, do as I deſire you, Madam, ſaid I unto her, though what I deſire do coſt me my Life. But (ſaid ſhe, in giving me her Hand, and making ready to go out) will you not tell me, what the matter is? When you are upon the Land, replied I, and I rid of my Fears, then perhaps you will gueſs what the Matter is. I cannot poſſibly expreſs, Sir, the diſorder of my Soul at that time, the aſtoniſhment of Alcionida, and likewiſe of her Aunt, and her Friends; nor can I expreſs the Vexation of Leoſthenes, or my Deſpair: for being prompted unto it by my Love, my Reſpects, and my Repentance, I ſet Alcionida on Land, and in her Coach, not remembring what I ſaid, or whether I ſaid any thing or no: I know only that I left her, that I embarqued, and though our Intention was not to depart until the next Night, yet I cauſed the Anchors to be taken up, the Sails to be hoiſted, and left Gnides immediately, where alſo I left the Soul of my Affection. Leoſthenes would have ſaid ſomething to me, but I could not endure his Sight, nor would admit of his Excuſes: for I muſt needs grieve firſt for my Loſs, before I could pardon his evil Counſel. Within an hour after our Departure, I commanded the Sails to be let down, and the Anchor caſt: And though this Command ſeemed to be very odd, yet was it Obeyed: And in the mean time not knowing what I would have, I grieved moſt exceſſively, ſometimes for the abſence of Alcionida, and ſometimes for conſenting unto ſo unjuſt a Deſign, and ſometimes I repenting of my Repentance, thinking that I was in no Fault, and that it was rather an effect of my violent Paſſion, than any diſorder of my Soul: and in the mean while, not being able to reſolve whether I ſhould come nearer the Shore, or put farther off; although I know both Honour, and Neceſſity doth require the latter, yet I could not do it, until I was aſſured Alcionida did know I loved her: ſo that I deſigned to write unto her, and ſend my Letter by one of my Men in a little Cock-boat: I writ then, though Heaven knows with much ado, and if I be not very much miſtaken, the words were theſe.

Thraſibulus to the fair Alcionida.

I Have ſo many things to ſay, that I am much puzzled where to begin. But, Divine Alcionida, I wiſh you knew, that my Affection unto you is in the higheſt Extream: that my Quality is not as it ſeemed: that my Sorrows to leave you are unexpreſſible: that my conſenting for a minute to diſpleaſe you, will beget a miſerable Repentance in me, as long as I live: and though I durſt not tell you as much, yet did I love you more than any tongue, indeed, can tell. You might perceive as much, methinks, by the diſorders of my Soul: you, I ſay, whoſe Judgment is ſo ingenious, and piercing, I beſeech you, remember a Prince, who durſt not tell you his Quality, unleſs he had acquainted you with his Misfortunes alſo : Remember, that he departed from you with Intentions to return, and to return the moſt paſſionate and faithful Lover in the World : But remember not, I beſeech you, that I was a while your Raviſher, unleſs you remember at the ſame time I was your Deliverer : However, Madam, though perhaps you will not retain any Thoughts of Tenderneſs towards me, yet I beſeech you do not think upon me with Scorn, ſince it would be too much Injuſtice to uſe him ſo, who adored you without telling it, departed from you without hope, and who ſhall love you as long as he lives, although you hate him.

After I had read this Letter over and over, unto which I did not ſubcribe my Name, I was conſtrained to make uſe of Leoſthenes to carry it ; as well becauſe he did extreamly preſs me to Pardon him for his evil Counſel, as becauſe he was very fit for ſuch an Expedition ; and ſo as ſoon as Night was come, he went to Gnides. Since there was a very good correſpondence between him, and her whom he loved, ſhe let him ſee Alcionida whether ſhe would or no, and unknown unto Phedima ; and alſo carried him into her Chamber without any asking. When Leoſthenes gave her my Letter, ſhe made a queſtion whether ſhe ſhould read it ; but after ſhe had read it, ſhe made a greater difficulty to anſwer it, being very angry againſt her Couſin for bringing him into her Chamber : Yet Leoſthenes being very bold, told her, he would never go out of her Chamber as long as he lived without an Anſwer ; ſo that to be rid of his Importunity, ſhe writ me theſe Words.

THough I did believe all that you writ in your Letter to me, yet ought I not to anſwer it ; or if I did anſwer, yet not ſo as would pleaſe you : Therefore I do declare unto you, that of all which you writ, I believe only one thing, which is, that you are not of that Quality which People think you, and therefore fore I aſk your Pardon for all the Incivilities which I offered unto you whilſt you were here: I ſuppoſe you to be ſo juſt, as not to deny it: And I hope you will not take it ill, that one who is a profeſſed Lover of Truth, do not make any anſwer unto ſo many Incredibilities as your Letter is filled with: In the mean while be perſwaded, that it is advantagious for you, that I do not believe it; and had it not been for the wilfulneſs of Leoſthenes, you ſhould not have ſeen under my Hand the Name of

To be ſhort, Sir, Leoſthenes returned, and brought me this Letter, which though it contained nothing but matter of indifferency; yet did it ſo much joy me, that I ſhould hardly have gone from the Coaſt of Gnides before I had writ another Letter unto her, if a Tempeſt had not riſen, and forced me to take up Anchor, and put to open Sea. I went then to Milete, according to the advice of the wiſe Thales, and in my Voyage I had the good Fortune to meet two of the Ships which I had loſt; but in exchange thereof, I had the bad Fortune to hear the Prince of Phoceus was returned to Milete, as ſoon as Thimocrates was gone to render an Account unto the Amphictions of all Paſſages; and that this Prince had croſſed all that Thimocrates had done in my Favour; that he had eſtabliſhed the Authority of Alexideſmus, and puniſhed all thoſe who deſired to Rebel, or expreſſed any zeal to my Party: So that my croſs Deſtinies driving me into deſpair, I was conſtrained to retire, and wander over all our Seas, not knowing well what courſe to take. I ſent once again unto Gnides privately, to enquire what Eupharnor would ſay at his return concerning my odd departure: for ſince there were many Ladies with Alcionida at that time when I left her in ſuch haſte, that I imagined the buſineſs would be made known unto all the Town. In the concluſion, I underſtood that Euphranor was much amazed at the Matter, and could not gueſs at my reaſon; and that things were in ſuch a ſtate, as that I could not return unto Gnides. So that being out of all Hopes ever to ſee the Face of my miſerable Fate to ſmile upon me, I conceived it impoſſible to gain the good opinion either of Alcionida, or her Father. I gave my ſelf over ſo deſperately unto Sorrow, that paſſing by Lesbos, I would not land there, but ſent only to enquire of Tiſanders Health, and writ a Letter to him, which was left with the firſt Mariners I met in the Port; wherein I told him in general, without naming Alcionida, that I was to ask his Pardon, for condemning that Paſſion in him, which at that preſent was moſt predominate in my ſelf. After this I fell into the Helleſpont, and then into Delphos, intending to conſult with the Oracle; but when I came there, I was ſo full of Fears to find what I ſought for, that I could not reſolve whether I ſhould enquire of it or no. In the mean while I fell ſick, and that ſo violently, that I was not able to ſtir from thence in four Months: But at the laſt, when it was the Pleaſure of the Gods that I did recover, without ever praying unto them for it, but found ſo little pleaſure in Life, that I did not look upon Death as an Evil; then, I ſay, I imbarqued, and coming by Gnides, but landed not, I took this way; yet the Winds were ſo contrary, that I was forced to leave Chios upon the right Hand, whereas my Intention was to paſs between that Iſle and the Iſthmus of Gnides: and being carried by the Winds, I met with four Ships in that Rode: Now ſince all the World were become my Enemies, and ſince I was accuſtomed to make all thoſe I met to vail their Bonnets, I would needs do ſo by theſe, but they would not: I looked upon their Flags, but knew them not, and I imagined that perhaps it might be the Prince of Phoceus diſguized: After they refuſed to ſtrike Sail, I aſſaulted them, and turning towards the greateſt of the four, I gave her chaſe above an hour; ſince he had no Diſpoſition to fight, he betook himſelf wholly to his Sails: but ſince my Ships were lighter than his, though greater, I came up to him, and fought him ſo ſharply, that in leſs than half an hour I became Maſter of him: I was moſt encouraged to fight, by ſeeing my other Ships had burned one of their Enemies, ſunk another, and taken the laſt: So that notwithſtanding all the reſiſtance of thoſe I fought with, I ſaw my Victory was certain. All that were in the Ship having ſubmitted themſelves, I entered into her with my Sword in my Hand, having no other Arms left, for I had not only darted many Javelins, but that alſo which had the name of Alcionida upon it, which I had kept ſince the day ſhe was in my Ship. I entered then, and charged my Souldiers to commit no diſorder: But going into a Cabin where I heard the Voice of Women, I ſaw the fair Alcionida lying upon a Bed, having a mortal paleneſs in her Face, and her left Arm naked and bloody, becauſe a Javelin had run quit through it, and I ſaw alſo ten or twelve Women crying about her, and durſt not venture to draw this fatal Javelin out of her Wound. You may imagine, Sir, what operation this Object had upon my Soul: I came nearer her, and cryed as loud as ever I could, that he who threw this Javelin ſhould die for it, if I could know who it was: I kneeled down at the ſide of her Bed; I called for my Chirurgions to come unto her: I took her fair and bloody Arm in my Hand, whilſt all the Women about her, not knowing me, were amazed. But O Heavens, I no ſooner took her by the Arm, but I knew that fatal Javelin to be the very ſame which had her moſt illuſtrious Name upon it; and that it was my own ſelf which darted it, at the firſt aſſaulting the Ship. Imagine, Sir, in what a deſperate Condition my Soul was in, when I ſaw it was my Hand which wounded Alcionida; my Amazement was ſo great, that not knowing what I did, I let her Arm fall ſo rudely, that its own weight did almoſt bring the Javelin out: The pain of it did cauſe her to come out of her ſwoond, and to open her Eyes juſt as the Chirurgions entered. I, not being able to ſpeak, made ſigns unto them, to help her; and looking for my Sword with Intention to run it through my own Heart, I remembred Leoſthenes had taken it up when I let it fall upon my firſt ſeeing Alcionida in that Condition: I would have pulled it from him, but he would not part with it, telling me, that it were a thouſand times better for me to help

Alcionida, than deſperately to ruin my ſelf. I approached then nearer unto her Bed; and ſeeing that ſince the Chirurgions had pulled out the Dart, ſhe was very well come to her ſelf, I kneeled down before her, my Sorrows being ſo great that I could not cry, (for thoſe are but ſlight Sorrows which can be expreſſed by Tears:) Oh Madam, ſaid I unto her, inflict what puniſhment you pleaſe upon that ſacrilegious Hand which wounded you; and do not think, that though I defer the Execution for a little while, it is not with Intention of living long: No, Madam, I would only ſee you in a way of recovery, to the end you may ſee me die, and that way expiate this horrid Crime which I have committed. Alcionida was ſo ſurprized to ſee me, and hear me thus expreſs my ſelf, that though ſhe had not been in ſo weak a Condition as ſhe was, ſhe would not have been able to hold any long Diſcourſe; therefore not anſwering at all unto what I ſaid, If I die, ſaid ſhe unto me, I ſhall pardon you with all my Heart; and alſo I entreat the Prince Tiſander, if he be living, to pardon you, as well as I. The Prince Tiſander, Madam? (ſaid I with much wonder,) is he here? As ſhe was about to anſwer, the Chirurgions prevented her, and told me it would kill her if ſhe ſpoke any more; ſo that haſty retiring, and leaving her with her Women, I took her Couſin by the Hand, and carrying her to the Cabin door, asked her what it was which Alcionida ſaid unto me? But at the ſame time, ſome Souldiers which had taken Tiſander in another Ship, brought him into mine, and he knowing that it was I which he had fought againſt, deſired to ſpeak with me; and when in entrance into the Ship he underſtood that Alcionida was wounded, he was in as deſperate a caſe as I: Cruel Friend (ſaid he, in coming firſt to me) what a fatal Adventure is befaln us? Give me leave rather to ſay (anſwered I) what a fatal Adventure is mine? Ah, ſaid he, you are not to be pitied ſo much as I, for the Thoughts of Friendſhip are nothing ſo tender as thoſe of Love: Doubtleſs you love me, and will be ſorry for fighting with me, and for being perhaps the cauſe of her Death whom I moſt adore, and intend to marry. But (ſaid I, and interrupted him) do you intend to marry this fair and moſt incomparable Lady? Yes, cruel Friend, anſwered he, and therefore imagine the Sorrows of my Soul: But I beſeech you, let me ſee this fair and unfortunate Lady. In ſaying ſo, he went into the Cabin where ſhe was, and I with him, and he no ſooner ſaw her, but taking her Hand, kiſſing it, and alſo waſhing it with his Tears, he expreſſed a hundred ſigns of Sorrow and Affection, which I durſt not render unto her. She caſt her Eyes upon me, and doubtleſs did ſo plainly perceive the Sorrows I endured, that ſhe turned away her Eyes and bluſhed. Tiſander obſerving this, and fearing to be troubleſom to her, went from her, imagining the alteration of her Face to proceed from no other cauſe but the extremity of her Pain. We asked the Chirurgions what they thought of her? but they could not tell what Judgment to give, until the ſecond dreſſing, not yet knowing whether any of the Nerves were moleſted, or Veins cut. In the mean time I underſtood that Tiſander, being cured of his paſſionate Affection unto the fair and wiſe Sapho, did conſent unto the Marriage which the Prince his Father had made up between him, and the fair Alcionida, before he knew her; and that as ſoon as ever he ſaw her, he was more in love with her, than ever he was with his firſt Miſtreſs. I underſtood afterwards, that he did not know my Ship, becauſe it had been newly trimmed up at Gnides; and ſince all the Banners and Flags which Leoſthenes had ſet up for the entertainment of Alcionida did ſtand ſtill, it was not poſſible Tiſander could know it: Neither could I know his Ship, for ſince his intended Marriage, his Flags alſo were full of gallant Devices, and other Motto's than he was accuſtomed to have. Since this Prince was really generous, and ſeeing me ſilent, he did ask me Pardon, if in the extremity of his Sorrows, he had ſpoke any thing which was offenſive to me. But I my ſelf was ſo much diſturbed in my Mind, that I knew not what I ſhould anſwer him: But I gave orders, that all his Men ſhould be ſet at liberty, and treated as my own; however, the ſight of this Prince was inſufferable to me, ſince I underſtood he was to be the Husband of Alcionida, and I could not reſolve to go out of his Ship, becauſe I could not depart from her : yet not being in freedom to grieve in her preſence, I went into my own, under a pretence of giving out ſome Orders, and went into my own Cabin, with a mind ſo full of Sorrow, that I was a hundred times ready to throw my ſelf into the Sea, and there bury my ſelf and all my Misfortunes together ; but there was a kind of ſecret Chain which linked me to Alcionida, that reſtrained me, and kept me alive : And being alone with Leoſthenes, I began to deſcant upon the ſtrangeneſs of my Misfortunes ; and my Mind being a little more quiet than before, Confeſs with me, Leoſthenes, ſaid I unto him, that I was born under a moſt malignant Conſtellation ; for if you look upon the preſent Condition of my Fortune, you may therein find Miſeries enough to make a hundred Men unfortunate : Were it only the conſideration of my Sorrows for fighting with my Friend, and hurting her whom I infinitely loved, I deſerved Compaſſion ; though for nothing but to find my Friend my Rival, I had cauſe enough to grieve for it extreamly ; were it for nothing elſe but to find my Miſtreſs enjoyed by another, I were moſt worthy of pity ; and were it for nothing but wounding with my own Hand that Lady for whom only I deſire to live, all my Tears are too few to lament the ſadneſs of the Accident : But having in one day fought with my Friend, wounded her I loved, found him to be my Rival, heard my Miſtreſs is to be married, and my own Hand putting her in danger of Death ; Ah, Leoſthenes ! theſe are too many Miſeries to be endured ; and it would be as baſe as impoſſible for me to live under the weight of them : For indeed, what can I do ? I muſt not hate my Rival, ſince he is both my Friend and my Benefactor : I never dare ſpeak any more of my Paſſion unto her who firſt did cauſe it ; My Soul is out of all Hopes ; my Love cannot now be innocent ; I dare not hereafter find any fault with her : I have no reaſon to accuſe Tiſander ; I have not power to acknowledg my Paſſion unto him, and it were in vain if I ſhould, ſince he is the Husband of Alcionida: In one word, I am in as deplorable a Condition as ever any Lover poſſible can be: But alas, what do I ſay? and what would I do? I ſpeak as if Alcionida were not wounded, and wounded by my own Hand, and that perhaps mortally. Oh moſt cruel Thought (ſaid I,) canſt thou ever ſuffer that prophane Hand which did it, to be employed in any thing but reaching a Dagger to my Heart? But Sir (ſaid Leoſthenes unto me,) you are not in any fault; it was a meer chance which gave Alcionida that fatal Wound. After this I ſtood a long while ſilent, and my Mind was ſo filled with variety of different Thoughts, that I was not Maſter of my ſelf. If ſhe die (ſaid I) I muſt follow her into the Grave; if ſhe recover, ſtill I muſt die, for ſhe recovers only for Tiſander; who is already her Husband, and ever muſt be; he who perhaps will one day leave loving her, as he did the fair Sapho: Tiſander, I ſay, whom I am ſo much obliged unto, that I dare not hate him, nor cannot love him: This Tiſander, who has ruined all my Hopes, and made me the moſt miſerable Prince upon Earth. It is an extream Grief to ſee one that one loves a dying; but to be the cauſe of that Death, is a Grief which exceeds all others, and which can never be remedied but by Death it ſelf. After this, I was ſilent a little while, and then, imagining that perhaps it would be prejudicial unto Alcionida, I was ſo very impatient, that I could not endure to ſtay in my Ship; though the ſight of Tiſander did extreamly trouble me, it being impoſſible to look upon him, as my Friend, as the Husband of Alcionida, and as the Ruiner of my hopes: But for all that, though I could not ſee Alcionida, but I muſt alſo ſee Tiſander, I brooked the diſpleaſure of the one, to enjoy the neceſſary Conſolation of the other.

I went then into the other Ship; and Alcionida being aſleep, I was conſtrained to ſee Tiſander, and not her. The ſadneſs which he ſaw in my Eyes did trouble him, becauſe he thought that the love of him was the cauſe of it; he was ſo generous as to tell me, that he could not lay any fault at all in me, but that he himſelf only was cupable, ſince it was much more eaſy for him to imagine that it was I he met with, then for me to think of meeting him : That he looked upon this Misfortune as the act of the Gods, wherein I had no ſhare : yet ſaid he, I can never conform my ſelf unto their Wills, for if Alcionida die, moſt certainly I ſhall die alſo : Did you know, ſaid he, the ſweetneſs of her Spirit, her Goodneſs, and her Vertue, you would excuſe my weakneſs ; for truly, when I married her, ſhe hardly knew me ; and I am certain that a common light eſteem was all ſhe could have of me : I underſtood ſhe was againſt our Marriage, for ſhe ſaid a little before that ſhe would never marry : and yet within ſix Weeks after I had been at Gnides, ſhe was as complacential as if ſhe had married me by her own choice, and not forced unto it by her obedience unto her Parents. For my part, as ſoon as ever I ſaw her, I fell deſperately in Love, even to the loſs of my Reaſon ; and therefore, my dear Thraſibulus, excuſe my exceſſive Sorrows, and I beſeech you take no notice of what I ſaid, or any thing my Grief may perhaps force me to ſay. I know it is not ordinary for a Lover, in the Fruition of her he loves, to love with ſo much violence : But I may almoſt ſay, that I have not yet enjoyed Alcionida, ſince I have not yet had time to win her Heart by ten thouſand Expreſſions of my Love : True it is, I enjoy her Beauty, but not her Soul, in ſuch a meaſure as I deſire, and therefore though I am the Husband of the incomparable Alcionida, yet my Love has but unquiet and unſatisfied deſires, and by conſequence is violent and diſorderly : and thus you ſee, my dear Thraſibulus, I diſcover the very bottom of my Heart unto you, as unto a Man whom I love moſt of any Man living ; and from whom I can conceal nothing. I confeſs, that all the while Tiſander was ſpeaking, I did hearken with extream impatience ; and I found ſomething in his Diſcourſe which moved me unto ſome Joy, and in a moment after unto extream Sorrow : For I did imagine, that perhaps I had ſome ſhare in that repugnancy which Alcionida had unto her Marriage : But alas, (ſaid I to my ſelf whilſt Tiſander was ſpeaking) how miſerable am I, and how many Tears will this Diſcourſe coſt me? Since this Prince was extreamly grieved, he did not much care whether I returned any Anſwer or no; ſo that after I had replied four or five impertinent Words, we went to know whether Alcionida was awake; and we were told ſhe was, but withal, that ſhe had been ſo ill all that Night, as it was feared ſhe would not live: Imagine then, in what a condition Tiſander and I were, eſpecially I, who was an hundred times more tormented than Tiſander could be, and was alſo forced to conceal my Reſentments: But the Morning, when the Chirurgions did dreſs the Wound, they told us, that her extremity of pain was cauſed by a little Splinter of the Javelin which was left in her Arm; but after they had ſearched the Wound to the bottom, and found it, they told us, if a Feaver by reaſon of her pain did not endanger her, they would warrant her Life. You may very well judg what Conſolation this news brought unto me, and how much Joy it afforded Tiſander; but yet they told us we could not ſpeak with her that day, but muſt needs let her reſt until ſhe was paſt the danger of a Feaver; yet Tiſander would needs ſee her then, and whether I would or no, did go in, but would not ſuffer me to enter with him; yet he ſtayed not, but returned preſently with ſo many ſignes of Joy in his Eyes, that he made me a Partaker with him: Thanks be to the Gods, ſaid he, I found her in a good Condition, and ſhe is ſo well amended, and her Countenance ſo revived ſince Yeſterday, as you cannot imagine. I could not chuſe but rejoyce to hear Alcionida upon her recovery; yet I could not chuſe but mourn when I conſidered that ſhe revived for Tiſander, but was for ever dead to Thraſibulus. You are ſo accuſtomed unto Melancholy, (ſaid Tiſander unto me) that, me-thinks, good news makes no impreſſion upon your Heart. 'Tis very true, ſaid I unto him, not but that the recovery of Alcionida does joy me more than you can imagine, but the long Habit which I have contracted with Sorrow, will not ſuffer me upon a ſudden to alter Humours, and paſs from exceſſive Sorrow to exceſſive Joy. But my dear Conqueror, (ſaid he unto me) what courſe ſhall we ſteer? I know not, ſaid I unto him, the Victory which I have gotten, has coſt me ſo dear, that you would do me a Favour never to remember it. The Truth is, Sir, that Tiſander, and I, both were in ſuch a deſperate Humour, that neither of us had given any Orders which way to go, but left it unto Leoſthenes, to do as he pleaſed, who turning our Misfortunes into his own Advantage, would entertain the Couſin of Alcionida; ſo that according to our Cuſtom, and to keep her he loved the longer, he commanded the Pilot to wander only up and down the Sea, not aiming unto any Place whatſoever, ſo that we rather went further off from Lesbos, than drew near it. I confeſs, I was puzzled for an Anſwer unto what Tiſander ſaid unto me, yet overruling my own Mind, I told him, that we would go unto Mitilene; and indeed we ſteered that way, but ſo gently, becauſe I did ſecretly appoint it ſo, that I might the longer enjoy the Sight of the admirable Alcionida, that I had time enough to try all the moſt rigorous Torments that were in Love: I was joyed to hear her Feaver did leſſen, and I was ſo diſpleaſed to obſerve the Satisfaction which Tiſander enjoyed, that I could not endure it: I knew well enough my Thoughts of it were very unjuſt, but I could not help them; and then when I was no wellwiſher of his good Fortune, I was not a Maſter of my own Mind: Since he did eaſily ſee theſe Diſorders in me; he was ſo generous as to ask me, whether any new Misfortune had befallen me? and I returned ſuch confuſed Anſwers, that I rather did augment his Curioſity than diminiſh it. Preſently after, the good News was brought us, that the Feaver had quite left Alcionida, but yet for all that we muſt not viſit her until the next Morning. Now were the Joys of Tiſander moſt compleat; for my part I was joyed too, but yet I did not guſt it very perfectly; ſo that my Friend being aſtoniſhed to ſee me thus diſquieted, whom he formerly knew to be of a more calm Spirit: he began to ask me an hundred ſeveral Queſtions; and before I was aware, I anſwered unto one of the Queſtions, and told him, that what he deſired to know of me, did happen preſently after my Departure from Gnides. From Gnides, replied he then, did you ever land there? Yes, (ſaid I, in a great Diſorder, and could not deny it) A Tempeſt once did drive me thither, and there I mended my Ship. Tiſander bluſh'd at this Diſcourſe, and looking very attentively upon me, Did you there ſee Alcionida? ſaid he unto me: I did, replied I, and that is one of the Reaſons why I am ſo grieved, to ſee her here wounded. But why did you not tell me thus much at the firſt, replied he? I know not, anſwered I unto him, unleſs it be becauſe the Accident did ſo trouble me, that I knew not what I did; but ſince I was there known only under the Notion of a Pirate, I did not paſs for what I am, ſince I did force my ſelf to diſſemble the Matter. Tiſander could not draw any ſtrong Conjectures out of my Anſwer; ſo that ſaying no more unto me, the reſt of the Evening paſſed on in this manner. I could not go into my own Ship that Night, becauſe the Winds being very lofty, our Ships durſt not come near one another, for Fear of Counter-Shocks; nor could a little Boat endure the violent Waves, ſo that Tiſander and I did lie both in one Cabin: and ſince the Recovery of Alcionida had ſatisfied his Deſires, he ſlept ſoundly; yet whether I would or no, my Sighs and unquiet Toſſings did awake him, and would not let him ſleep all the reſt of the Night, without telling him the true Cauſe of it though he often asked me. The next Morning, Alcionida being very well recovered, we went into her Cabin, and in our going thither, we met the Chirurgions, who, to be ſatisfied whether they had taken all the Splinters of the Javelin out of Alcionida's Wounds, did look upon it very circumſpectly on every ſide; ſo that Tiſander looking upon it as the reſt did, he found the Name of Alcionida painted upon it. I would have taken it out of his Hands, ſeeming to be as curious as he was; but he had already diſcovered that which I deſired he ſhould not ſee; ſo that bluſhing extreamly at it, This Javelin, ſaid he, is ſo remarkable, that I doubt not but you know whoſe it was. Since it was painted at Gnidus, replied I, out of a piece of Gallantry only, I do know indeed whoſe fatal Hand it was which uſed it upon this unfortunate Occaſion; but ſince the Hurt which it hath done, ſhall be ere long repaired, it may be forgotten. After this, we entered into Alcionida's Cabin, who had underſtood by her Couſin, and ſhe from Leoſthenes, that I was the Prince of Milete, and a Friend of Tiſanders: But ſince ſhe knew not whether I would tell her Husband that I had been at Gnides, or no; ſhe was a little perplexed, as afterwards Leoſthenes told her Couſin; yet conceiving it better, not to make a Secret of it, we were no ſooner come unto her, but ſhe intreated Tiſander to obtain a Pardon for all the Incivilities which ſhe had done unto me at Gnides, when I landed there only as a Pirate: In her Expreſſion of this Complement, ſhe bluſhed ſo much, and I was ſo amazed at it, that though Tiſander had not been in love with her as he was, yet might he well perceive I was, by the Diſorder of my Soul which appeared in my Eyes: ſo that he could not poſſibly be ignorant of it; and he ſtood between us in ſuch a ſilent Dilemma, that none durſt interrupt him. Alcionida averted her Looks from me, and I did court hers, whilſt Tiſander obſerving us both, did diſcover that Secret which I would have locked up in my Heart. After we had been an Hour with Alcionida, Tiſander impatiently deſiring to clear his Suſpicions, told me in moſt civil Language, that it was convenient to leave her at reſt that Day; and moved me to go out with him into his Cabin. I was no ſooner there, but ſeeing none in Preſence; I beſeech you, my dear Thraſibulus, ſaid he unto me, Tell me one thing truly, which I much deſire to know? Since it was long before I anſwered, and he ſuſpected that I would diſguize the Truth; Nay, do not go about to colour the matter, ſaid he, for perhaps, I do not ſtand in need of your help in the Knowledg of it. If ſo, ſaid I unto him, why do you deſire to know that from me, which you know already? Becauſe, replied he, I deſire to be infallibly certain, whether or no, I am ſo unfortunate as to be the cauſe of this deep Melancholy, which I perceive in your Mind; Tell me, my dear Thraſibulus, Has not the Sympathy of your Humour with mine cauſed us both to love one Lady? and am not

I ſo unfortunate as to deprive you of Alcionida? I do confeſs, that what Reſolutions ſoever I had taken, not to reveal unto Tiſander the Reaſon of my Paſſion, yet now it was impoſſible for me to diſguize it: I was ſo non-pluſt at theſe Queſtions, and my Eyes were ſo troubled, that my Face did ſo betray the Thoughts of my Heart, as this Prince not doubting any longer, did cry out with extream Generoſity, and moſt ſenſible Sorrow; Alas, my dear Thraſibulus, how ſad is my Soul that my Felicity ſhould be your Misfortune! for ſince we both of us do love one and the ſame Lady, we ſhall both of us be miſerable all the Days of our Lives. That would not be juſt, (ſaid I unto him, and ſighed, my Heart melting at his obliging Diſcourſe) and therefore, ask me no more: Believe, if you can, that it is Ambition only which is the Burden of my Soul; Imagine your ſelf happy, and that I am ſtill the ſame inſenſible Thraſibulus, who condemned you for loving the fair Sapho; and quietly enjoy your Felicity in the Divine Alcionida. I confeſs, that being tranſported with the Exceſs of Sorrows, that notwithſtanding the Friendſhip between us, I did not rejoyce at your Satisfaction; all that Reaſon, and remembrance of that Friendſhip could do, was, to oblige me not to diſturb it. I ask your Pardon, generous Thraſibulus; but withal, I beſeech you remember in my Excuſe, that I loved Alcionida before you did, and muſt love her as long as I live, perhaps more then you: for ſince ſhe was the firſt, ſo doubtleſs ſhe ſhall be the laſt that ſhall ever move my Paſſion. But leaſt this Confeſſion ſhould too much incenſe you, let me tell you, that as my Love of her, is ſo purely innocent, that it cannot be offenſive either unto her Vertue, or our Friendſhip, or the Gods themſelves; ſo alſo is it ſo extreamly violent, that I cannot endure her Sight, or yours: for ſo miſerable do I eſteem my ſelf, that now I am paſt all hopes of Alcionida's Love. Since your Paſſion is ſo purely innocent, as you tell me, and ſince alſo I do believe it (anſwered he) I will promiſe you ſo great a Share in the Friendſhip of Alcionida, that though it cannot make you abſolutely happy, yet at the leaſt it may afford you ſome Conſolation; for ſince ſhe knew you, it is impoſſible, but ſhe muſt needs eſteem you, and therefore I ſhall hope ſhe will love you for my ſake. Therefore, my dear Thraſibulus, though you cannot be compleatly happy, yet do not you render your ſelf abſolutely miſerable; nor by your Miſfortunes interrupt my Happineſs. I do once more declare, ſaid I unto him, that the glorious Luſtre of Alcionida's fair Eyes, which has enflamed my Soul, is as pure and ſplendent as the Rays of the Sun: But yet, moſt generous Tiſander, you muſt needs know, if you know how to love, that though a Lover do not always enjoy the Beauty of a beloved and adored Miſtreſs, yet would he have the ſole and abſolute Poſſeſſion of her whole Heart and Mind to himſelf: ſo that ſince I cannot deſire ſo great a Happineſs without a wrong to you, nor indeed, never hope for it; I have no way but to die, and let you live happily. But that I can never do, replied he, if you do not live happily as well as I. Then are we both moſt unfortunate, ſaid I unto him. Time, ſaid Tiſander, may perhaps produce ſome Remedy which you cannot think of. Since thoſe Remedies, ſaid I unto him, are commonly long in curing, I do not think I can ſtay the Iſſue, and I believe Death would ſooner work the Cure than Time. However, I beſeech you think, that if you had not forced me to diſcover my Miſfortune unto you, you ſhould never have known it: But ſince you ſcrewed out that Secret which I deſired to hide, it is but juſt in you to rid your ſelf of a vexatious Rival, who ſhall be always a Diſturber of your Happineſs. When I doted upon Sapho, replied he, I did not think it poſſible ever to be cured of that tormenting Paſſion which poſſeſſed me, yet her Rigour to me, her Compliance with another, and the all-commanding Charms of Alcionida, has made her moſt indifferent unto me. It is not ſo with me, ſaid I unto him, for though I believe Alcionida loves you, and moſt certainly know ſhe will never love me, yet can I not baniſh her from my Heart. But for your part (ſaid I with a moſt incenſed Mind) perhaps you can quit Alcionida for another, as you quitted Sapho for her; and I ſhall perhaps hereafter hear, that the ſame which would be my Haven of Felicity, is not ſo to you. But moſt inconſtant and unjuſt Friend, ſaid I, if ever you leave adoring this Divine Lady, you will be the moſt undeſerving Man that lives. I had no ſooner ſpoken this, but I repented; and found by his mild Anſwer, that he would love Alcionida as long as he had Life; however, he gave me ſuch ſweet and generous Language, that he allayed my Anger againſt him, and I began to long until Night did ſeparate us, that I might enjoy my own private Thoughts, and at laſt we parted. Tiſander was informed by ſome or other of the time when I was at Gnidus; he underſtood from one of Alcionida's Women, how I cauſed her to get haſtily out of my Ship: However, we were both of us the next Day much perplexed; I durſt not ask him how Alcionida did; and yet I could not forbear; nor durſt I go to ſee her: And Tiſander, I think, as generous as he was, had Variety of Reſentments of it, in one and the ſame Day: yet ſince he enjoyed the Happineſs, and was well ſatisfied concerning the Vertue of Alcionida, it was an eaſier matter for him, than for me, to tranſact with Reaſon: He was ſo generous as not to take any Notice of a hundred Follies which I expreſſed unto him, and to ſpeak unto me always with much Affection. But that there might want nothing to make up the full Meaſure of my Misfortunes, it chanced that I being in a Cabbin of his Ship which joyned unto Alcionida's, I ſaw her there, ſhe not knowing I was in that Place, or thinking that all the Partitions of a Ship being made of Planks only, one might eaſily hear all that was ſpoken out of the one into the other.

Since Alcionida was now much better than ſhe was before, Tiſander thought it convenient to acquaint her with my deſperate Condition, to the end ſhe might not hereafter be ſurprized at it, or elſe perhaps to diſcover her real Thoughts of me: I heard him ask her, how I carried my ſelf at Gnides? what ſhe thought of me? whether ſhe really thought I was a Pirate? and as I verily think, fearing leſt ſhe ſhould take a Diſpleaſure at all theſe Queſtions, he told all he knew concerning my Paſſion, which did ſo much ſurprize her, that ſhe could not make any Anſwer: Yet ſince ſhe perceived Tiſander knew more than her ſelf, ſhe told him ſincerely what ſhe believed concerning my Quality, and partly what ſhe knew concerning my Love. Then he deſired her to tell him whether ſhe had any good Eſteem of me or no? and ſhe anſwered ſo obligingly in my behalf, that I thought my ſelf then much more miſerable than I was before. In Concluſion, he conjured her to comply with me, as a Man whom of all the World he loved moſt. Your Deſire, ſaid ſhe unto him, is too dangerous for me to conſent unto; not but that I dare truſt my ſelf well enough with him, but becauſe I dare not truſt you. Tiſander did then proteſt a thouſand times unto her, that he would never be jealous. Yet notwithſtanding all his Importunities, ſhe would not conſent unto it: For indeed, ſaid ſhe, if the Prince Thraſibulus do not love me, he may eaſily forbear my Sight; and if he do love me, he were moſt inhumane to continue his Paſſion: Therefore, Sir, I conjure you to ſolicit me no more. When he was gone out, I heard Alcionida call one of her Women which ſhe loved very dearly, and commanded her to reach a Cabinet, which ſhe opened, and took out many Letters, for I found out a little hole in the Partition of this Cabin, through which I could ſee all ſhe did: amongſt many other Letters, ſhe found that which I had writ unto her, which I knew very well; and ſhe commanded this Woman to take this Letter, and to tear it all in Pieces, and when it was dark to throw it into the Sea. Why Madam (ſaid this Woman unto her, who uſed to be very free with her) is it a greater Fault to keep it to Morrow, then it was Yeſterday? The Reaſon is, replied ſhe, becauſe I muſt baniſh out of my Heart the Remembrance of that Princes Affection, which without a Crime I might have preſerved, when I thought I ſhould never ſee him again; but now, ſince he is here, I muſt not do ſo: I muſt not look upon him as a Lover of Alcionida, but only as a Friend of Tiſanders. What odd Adventures do the Fates produce (ſaid ſhe?) why did they ſend Thraſibulus unto Gnides, only to be miſerable, and to make me reſtleſs? Not becauſe I do not eſteem my ſelf happy in the Marriage of Tiſander, but becauſe I wiſh with all my Heart that the Prince

Thraſibulus were not ſo unfortunate. Yet did they both of them ſee the Secrets of my Heart, Tiſander would be leſs pleaſed, and Thraſibulus would be more miſerable: For the Truth is, the Reaſon why I did oppoſe my Marriage with Tiſander, was, becauſe I had ſome hopes that Thraſibulus would return unto Gnides in ſuch a Quality as he told me; and that I might innocently follow my Inclination not to hate him: Yet as the caſe is now, I muſt ſuppreſs thoſe Thoughts (ſaid ſhe, and ſighed) and therefore do as I bid you; to the end I may if I can preſerve my Heart ſolely for Tiſander, and remember Thraſibulus no more. I leave it unto you, Sir, to judg what Joy and what Sorrow this Expreſſion of Alcionida did infuſe into me: The Sorrow did ſo much triumph over the Joy, and that cruel Reſolution to forget me did ſo pierce my Heart, that againſt my Will I made a great Noiſe; and ſince I was ſo near, that I almoſt touched the ſide of her Bed, certainly ſhe heard me, for ſhe was ſilent preſently upon it, and queſtionleſs was ſorry ſhe had been ſo loud in her Diſcourſe; and I believe, I ſhould have ſpoke to her through the Partition, had I not heard ſome enter into her Cabin: So the Knowledg that I was not hated, yet that I muſt for ever be miſerable, did drive me into ſuch horrid Deſpair, that I ſuffered inexpreſſible Torments of Mind. In the mean time, Tiſander, who did really love me, came to ſee me, and carried me into the Cabin of Alcionida, entreating me, and earneſtly conjuring me, to content my ſelf with her Friendſhip and Eſteem. I went with him, and at my Entrance I heard her charge the Woman whom ſhe ſpoke unto, to do as ſhe appointed her: This made me change Colour, and look ſo ſeriouſly upon her, that ſhe dejected her Eyes. I ſhall tell you, Sir, what our Conference was, for I think there was never three Perſons did love one another ſo well, and were all three ſo diſcontented as we were. Tiſander did moſt paſſionately love Alcionida, and he loved me alſo very well: but yet becauſe I loved her, I perceived, that either out of his Compaſſion unto me, or out of ſome other Conſiderations mingled with it, he did not delight in my Company. Alcionida did queſtionleſs love Tiſander, ſander, and did not hate me; but becauſe my Paſſion could not any longer appear innocent, and ſince Tiſander was not ignorant of it, her Mind was extreamly unquiet. For my part, I had as high an eſteem of Friendſhip for Tiſander as poſſible I was capable of, and I loved Alcionida more then my Tongue can tell; but ſince my Friend was Owner of this ineſtimable Treaſure, and ſince he knew I loved her, and ſince I knew that Alcionida was fully reſolved abſolutely to forget me, I was not able either to begin Diſcourſe, or anſwer unto any: But indeed I went out of the Cabin with ſome kind of Conſolation, though it be not ordinary to leave her one loves without much Sorrow. But, Sir, not to abuſe your Patience too much, give me leave to tell you, that we arrived at Lesbos and Mitilene, where the Joy was a little clouded by the news of that ſad Accident which happened unto the fair Alcionida. Yet ſince ſhe was quite out of all danger, the magnificent Solemnities of her entrance were deferred but for a few Days. The wiſe Prince of Mitilene received his fair Daughter with much Joy; but for my part, when I ſaw her go out of the Ship, it is moſt impoſſible to expreſs my Thoughts. I forgot one thing which chanced, that was a great Addition of Sorrow unto me, which was, That Tiſander, the better to take order that Alcionida might be received into the Port with Ceremony, went out of his own Ship into one of mine, which was an admirable good Sailer, that he might be at Lesbos an hour or two before us, telling and embracing me, that he would commit the Guardianſhip of his only Treaſure unto me. As ſoon as he was gone, I had ſo great a deſire to entertain Alcionida once more in private, that without ſending to ask any leave, I entered into her Cabin; thinking ſince I underſtood from her own Mouth that ſhe did not hate me, though ſhe reſolved to forget me, that I might preſume upon ſo much boldneſs. I found her ſitting upon her Bed, moſt magnificently dreſſed, though ſhe had her Arm in a Scarf: I beſeech you, Madam, pardon me, ſaid I unto her, for aſſuming ſo much boldneſs; but indeed, Madam, I am ſo unfortunate in every thing elſe, that I hope you will not deny me ſo much Conſolation ſolation in my Miſery, as to ſpeak once more in my Life unto you. The Prince Tiſander loves you ſo dearly well, replied ſhe, and bluſhed, that I ſhould incur his diſpleaſure, if I ſhould refuſe you that which Civility only bids me conſent unto. I conjure you, Madam, in the Name of the Gods (ſaid I unto her, ſeeing none with her but that Woman which I knew to be her Confident) to grant me this Honour for my own ſake, and let me not be beholden unto that Prince for this Favour, unto whom I am already ſo much engaged and loaded with his Generoſity : Never fear, Madam, that I ſhall ſpeak any thing that ſhall either offend you or the Prince Tiſander ; No, no, Madam, as violent as my Affection is to you, I am not guilty of any criminal Thoughts ; but ſince I muſt ſhortly for ever loſe you, it is not juſt you ſhould refuſe me that innocent Favour, ſince it is the laſt I ſhall ever ask you. As a Friend unto the Prince my Husband, replied ſhe, you may hope for any thing from me ; but as a Lover of Alcionida, never expect any thing. It is in this laſt named Qualification, Madam, ſaid I unto her, that I hope to obtain my deſire of you : Why, ask me nothing then, ſaid ſhe, for certainly you ſhall be denied, and that with abundance of anger ; Though the Prince were not your Friend, as he is, yet the reſpect which you ought to have unto me, ſhould reſtrain you from any ſuch Expreſſions as theſe. Why, Madam, ſaid I unto her, do you chide me, before you know what I will ask? What you have already ſaid, replied ſhe, is ſufficient cauſe of complaint againſt you. I know not whether I am ill interpreted (ſaid I unto her,) but I am moſt certain that my Thoughts are purely innocent : For indeed, divine Alcionida ; I deſire nothing now, but that you would in my preſence be pleaſed to revoke that unjuſt and cruel Sentence which you pronounced againſt me in the very ſame place you now are in, when in giving unto this Woman here that Letter which I took the boldneſs to write unto you, with Orders to tear it and throw it into the Sea : Moreover, you then moſt cruelly ſaid, you were reſolved to forget me abſolutely for ever : Madam, I heard this unjuſt and dire Doom, and now I hope for a

Revocation. Alcionida was ſo amazed to hear this, and to remember that ſhe heard a noiſe, which made her know I heard her, that ſhe durſt hardly ſo much as look upon me. Did you then hear what I ſaid? (ſaid ſhe.) Yes, Madam, replied I, I did hear; and being more juſt then you, it ſhall never out of my Memory. I ask you not (ſaid ſhe, and was much aſhamed) how you durſt be ſo bold; but methinks, if you well conſider the Senſe of my Words, you may conclude that your procedure ought to diſoblige me. My Reaſon, ſaid I unto her, is not ſo free as to act with ſo much prudence; but I am ſure my Love prompts me to deſire a little room in your remembrance: This Madam, methinks, is no ſuch unreaſonable Requeſt, and you may well grant ſo much unto him who has conſecrated unto you every minute of his Life. After Alcionida was a little more recollected; Sir (ſaid ſhe unto me with abundance of Sorrow in her Eyes) this your Curioſity to diſcover my Thoughts will coſt you very dear, if you love me; for I do profeſs I cannot endure the ſight of you, ſince you know ſo much of me: Perhaps, if you had ſtill continued ignorant of thoſe Thoughts which my Heart had of you, I ſhould have let the Prince Tiſander enjoy your Company, as he deſired me: But ſince you underſtand my Heart ſo well, and have told me of it, it is abſolutely impoſſible for me to conſent unto it: I cannot look upon you without a bluſh; and perhaps I ſhall hate you, out of fear only of loving you too well, and becauſe I cannot be indifferent enough towards you. Alas, Madam (cryed I out unto her) what Injuſtice is this which you do me? Unjuſt Prince, replied ſhe, what reaſon have you to tell me of any ſuch things, as I cannot hear without a Crime, and which I will never hear after this day? That is long enough, ſaid I unto her, for I believe I ſhall not live much longer: Be therefore ſo good as to tell me, that you ſhould not have hated me, if Fortune had done as much for me, as ſhe has done for Tiſander. Alcionida, Sir, was ſo full of modeſty, that ſhe could not conſent unto this deſire: But in concluſion, being moved thereunto by my

Sighs and Tears, I confeſs, ſaid ſhe, that of all the Perſons I know, you are he whom I had the greateſt Inclination to eſteem; and if it had been the Pleaſure of the Gods, I ſhould have thought my ſelf very happy in contributing to your Felicity; yet ſince it is not, but that I am Wife unto a Prince who doubtleſs deſerves all my Affections, I will uſe all the means I can to root out of my Heart that tenderneſs and opinion which I had of you, and which yet, whether I will or no, remains in it. Oh Madam, I conjure you by all that's ſacred, ſaid I, not to do ſo; and I will promiſe you never to importune you any more as long as I live, ſo you will promiſe me ſome little room in your Memory: Let Tiſander ſolely enjoy you; let your Beauty and your Heart be only his; and reſerve only for me one of thoſe ſecret and ſolitary Thoughts which uſeth to beget a pleaſing Melancholy in thoſe who admit of it: Think ſometimes, moſt Divine Lady, that all the while Tiſander enjoys his happineſs, the miſerable Thraſibulus endures as many Torments, as that fortunate Husband taſtes Felicities: Alas, Madam, it is no unreaſonable demand, to ask three or four Minutes in a day in remembrance of a Man who (as I told you before) has devoted every minute of his Life to think on you. Thoſe three or four Minutes which you deſire, is too much for my Honour to grant; and you may aſſure your ſelf, that if I could, I would baniſh you out of my Memory as well as out of my Heart, but one cannot command ones Memory as one will; and perhaps, ſaid ſhe (and bluſhed) you will forget me, and I ſhall remember you whether I would or no. Alcionida pronounced theſe laſt Words with ſo much charming Confuſion in her Face, that I kneeled to render Thanks; but ſhe repenting of what ſhe had ſaid, and did ſo ſeriouſly forbid me ever to ſpeak any more of my Paſſion unto her, and never deſire to have any private conference with her, that I ſaw very plainly it was her real and reſolute Mind to have it ſo: and I obtained yet one quarter of an hours Audience longer, during which time I could hardly move her to return any Anſwer unto me, and during which I did nothing thing but ſigh, and look upon her, and conjure her not to forget me. I had the comfort to ſee ſome ſigns of Sorrow and Tenderneſs in her Eyes, and had ſome Hopes of remaining in her Memory whether ſhe would or no. In the mean while we were come ſo near the Port, that all I could do was to reclaim my Mind, and fit it for ſuch Company as would diſcourſe of nothing but Joy. I ſhall not relate, Sir, all the Paſſages of this Ceremony; for I had no ſhare in this publique Joy, but was rather a very trouble unto Tiſander, who was moſt really ſenſible of my Sorrows, and was a Partaker of my Miſery, eſpecially when he ſaw I was reſolved to depart from Lesbos, and ſtay there no longer. He ſet the Prince his Father upon me, to uſe all Perſwaſions and Motives to cauſe my ſtay in Mitelene, until ſuch time as it pleaſed the Gods to afford me ſome ways to recover my Dominions: but all was in vain; and I departed, not well knowing whither to go, as ſoon as my Ships were furniſhed with all manner of Neceſſaries, and as ſoon as the two Ships of his which he would needs give me were fit to put to Sea. Since my own Miſeries did teach me how to Compaſſionate them in others, I would not ſuffer Leoſthenes to follow my Fortunes; but I left him with Alcionida's Couſin, with whom he was in love, and recommended him unto the Prince Tiſander, as a Man of good Quality, and much merit.

I ſhall not trouble you, Sir, with any Relation of how I parted from this generous Rival, who ſhed Tears; that his good Fortune ſhould be my Miſery: for it would be impoſſible, but I ſhould bluſh for Shame in relating unto you the obduracy of my Heart towards him, though he had obliged me by a thouſand ſweet Expreſſions of Love unto me. Nor ſhall I relate what Adieu I bad unto the fair Alcionida, ſince I had not ſo much as the conſolation to ſee her charming Eyes in taking my leave of her, becauſe ſhe kept her Bed that Day; and ſince there were many in her Chamber, I did ſee her but one Minute, and in much Diſorder: ſo I departed without this ſad Satisfaction, and imbarqued with unequalled deſpair. My moſt tormenting thought was, that Alcionida was enjoyed by one whom I was obliged to love: for had he been my mortal Enemy, I ſhould not have been ſo extreamly Miſerable, ſince then I might have had ſome comfort in Revenge. But the merit of the Prince Tiſander did moſt extreamly grieve me alſo; for I thought it impoſſible, but Alcionida muſt love him, and I wiſhed with all my Heart, that ſhe had married a Man whom ſhe hated. Indeed, there was not one phantaſtical, melancholy, violent, or extraordinary Thought, which Love did not infuſe into my Heart. After this, Ambition became no torment unto me; for ſince I cared not for my Life, I never valued a Scepter: ſo that without any thoughts, but of my Misfortunes, and of the fair Alcionida, I wandred up and down the Seas, until driven by a Tempeſt, I came to Sinope, when the King of Aſſyria was there with the Princeſs Mandana; and there remained until you came and found me on your Enemies ſide, without any Deſign of mine to be ſo. After this, Sir, you know my Life, and that nothing obſervable has befallen it but your own Goodneſs in a thouſand teſtimonies of Affection to me, whereof I am moſt unworthy.

But, Sir, in the Fight the other Night, at the Bottom of the Mountains, I came unto a place where I ſaw a Man couragiouſly defending himſelf againſt ten or twelve Souldiers, who preſſed upon him; I made all the haſte I could up to them, to prevent his being killed; who knowing me, cried out, That Tiſander will yield himſelf unto none, but the Prince Thraſibulus. You may imagine, Sir, that this Name did much ſurprize me, and that I no ſooner heard it, but forbidding the Souldiers to fight any longer, I went unto him, but found him ſo wounded, that preſently after he fell, and I was forced to hold him up. I knew another Priſoner alſo whom the Souldiers had taken to be Leoſthenes, whom I left at Lesbos, and who was not wounded: ſo that promiſing to pay thoſe Souldiers their Ranſom, for thoſe two Priſoners whom they had taken, I cauſed the Prince Tiſander to be brought hither, who expreſſed ſo much Affection unto me, that I were not worthy to live, if I were, not moved with it. Mean while, I underſtood by Leoſthenes, how report is going, that Crœſus King of Lydia would fall upon the Iſlands. The Prince of Mitelene went unto him, intending to diſſwade him from that deſign, as indeed he did: ſo that Pittacus taking his ſide, left the Prince his Son, and Leoſthenes at Sardis, where they made as great preparations of War, as if Crœſus would conquer all Aſia, though none knew what his Deſign was. I underſtood alſo that this Prince had a Deſire to engage the Mileſians to his Party, but the wiſe Thales did oppoſe it: I underſtood alſo from Leoſthenes, that the Prince Tiſander knowing that Crœſus would ſend unto the King of Armenia, deſired that Imployment, and obtained it, chuſing rather to travel, ſince he muſt needs be from Alcionida, then to ſtay in a Court ſo gallant as it was. So that coming to Artaxates juſt as you came thither, ſhe was ſhut up in it; and was forced to follow the King of Armenia into the Mountains, conceiving he might more eaſily eſcape from thence, then out of Artaxates, if he ſtayed in it. And indeed, his Deſign was to eſcape at this time, when he was ſo dangerouſly wounded, and to go and render an Account of his Negotiation unto the King of Lydia. Leoſthenes told me further, that the Affairs at Milete had much changed Faces: for Anthemius, who never ſet up Alexideſmus, but only to ruin him, had brought his Deſign to paſs, having ſtirred all the People againſt him: ſo that he was forced to retire to Phocæus with his Mother, his Wife, and Philodicea: So that now Milete, was as a free Town, where popular Government was begun to be eſtabliſhed: Notwithſtanding Thales, and all my Friends did reſiſt this new Alteration, yet Leoſthenes told me, the fear was, that if the People were once accuſtomed unto Liberty, they would never receive any Maſter again; and he told me alſo, that in the mean time, the Prince of Phoceus was combining with all his Neighbour-Princes to promote the Intereſt of Alexideſmus. But, Sir, dare I after all this tell you, that Leoſthenes, who had married her he loved, told me, that Alcionida was never ſo fair as now? and will you excuſe my Weakneſs, if I neglect negle&#99;t all my State Affairs, to diſcourſe of ſuch things as only concern my Love?

Cyrus ſeeing Thraſibulus had no more to tell him, did expreſs much grief for his Misfortunes; and reſolved to apply all expedient Remedies for the Satisfaction of his Ambition; For as concerning Matters of Love, my dear Thraſibulus, (ſaid he unto him) it muſt be the ſame Hand which wounded, muſt cure you: And though Tiſander be your Rival, yet I find him ſo worthy of Aſſiſtance, that I extreamly commend you for your care of him. As Cyrus was adviſing Thraſibulus of ſuch Expedients, as he thought beſt for the recovery of his Dominions, Leoſthenes entered into the Tent very haſtily: Sir, ſaid he to Cyrus, who underſtood all Languages, I ask your pardon for my bold Interruption; but the Prince Tiſander being at the laſt gaſp, I thought it fit to advertiſe the Prince Thraſibulus of it. At the laſt gaſp, replied Cyrus! Yes, Sir, replied Leoſthenes, for having a great deſire to write, notwithſtanding all my endeavours to diſſwade him, as he ended his Letter, all his Wounds opened, and he loſt ſo much Blood, that he fell into abundance of weakneſs, and ſwounding, is not yet come unto himſelf. Thraſibulus did then ask leave of Cyrus, to go and aſſiſt his moſt faithful Friend, and Rival, whom he could not love in one Reſpect, nor could not hate in another. But Cyrus calling to Mind the high Valour of this Prince, would alſo go himſelf. As they entered into the Tent, the Chirurgions had revived him out of his ſwound, yet with ſuch ſmall hopes of Life, that they told Cyrus, who asked what they thought, he could not out-live that day: yet ſince he had a free Mind, and a great Soul, he was not at all terrified at the looks of Death; and he carried it as one that was worthy to be Son unto ſuch a Prince, who was reputed the wiſeſt in all Greece: He patiently ſubmitted unto the Will of the Gods, and neither asking Death, nor Life, he prepared himſelf for the firſt of theſe with moſt admirable tranquillity of Mind, and was contented to leave the other with unparalleld contentedneſs: he knew Cyrus, as ſoon as he came in; ſo that addreſſing himſelf unto him, Sir, ſaid he, you ſee the Gods have puniſhed me for lifting up my Hand againſt ſo illuſtrious a Life as yours, ſince it had been much more glorious for me to have died by the invincible Hand of Artamenes, than by the Souldiers of great Cyrus. It is alſo more advantagious to the Prince Thraſibulus, ſaid he, that I die, ſince then he would not be ſo miſerable as he is. Cyrus anſwered him with all poſſible Civility, and would have infuſed ſome Hopes of recovery, notwithſtanding all the Chirurgions ſaid: But Tiſander interrupting him, No, no, Sir, ſaid he, I cannot live, and therefore, I beſeech you, let me imploy the laſt Minutes of my Life in remembrance of one, who in cauſing my higheſt Happineſs, has made my deareſt Friend moſt miſerable: In ſaying ſo, he turned his Head towards Thraſibulus, and giving him the Letter which he had let fall after he had writ it, and which was given unto him again upon his coming to himſelf. Here, my dear Thraſibulus, ſaid he unto him, take this, and I make you my Executor of my laſt Will; give it, if you pleaſe, unto our deareſt Alcionida: and ſince I did not murmur, when I heard her beſtow ſome Sighs for your Misfortunes, ſo I beſeech you do not murmur when ſhe beſtows ſome Tears in memory of my Death: ſince I ſhall no longer be an Obſtacle unto your Happineſs, let me have the integrity of your Friendſhip; and look not upon me any more as your Rival. I do acknowledg you merit Alcionida more than I, and I will do that which Fortune would not, I give up all my Intereſt in her unto you. In pronouncing theſe laſt Words Tiſander bluſht, and Tears trickled from his Eyes; ſo that Thraſibubus being extreamly moved with the Generoſity of his Friend, and not being able to contain his Sorrows, he came nearer him, and taking him by the Hand, Live moſt generous Prince, ſaid he, and be aſſured that I will never more envy your Enjoyment of the incomparable Alcionida: Indeed, I ſhall ever love her, but it ſhall be as ſhe is yours without any other pretence unto her. No, no, replied the weak Tiſander, that muſt never be: Live you, and let me die; all the favour I ask, is, that you will ſometimes ſpeak of me unto my dear Alcionida:

Let me have this laſt Satisfaction, my dear Thraſibulus, and I will leave you an unvaluable Treaſure in the Perſon of Alcionida; for her Soul has an hundred thouſand more ſhining Beauties, than her Face: But in recompence of ſo rich a Preſent, promiſe me here in the preſence of the Illuſtrious Cyrus, that you will tell her, I value not the loſs of Life, or Grandure, or Kindred, or any thing in the World, but only Her; and that I find no bitterneſs in Death, but only my Sorrows to leave her; and when you have done this, enjoy her quietly all the reſt of your Life; and live happy longer then I have done. Thraſibulus was ſo grieved to ſee his Friend in this Condition, that his Love, which was wont to triumph over any other thought, was now forced to ſubmit unto his Sorrow; and to lie hid in the bottom of his Heart without any diſcovery upon this ſad Occaſion. He promiſed Tiſander then to perform all his Commands in moſt grieving Expreſſions, and teſtified ſuch real Marks of Tenderneſs, that none would ever have thought Tiſander had been Rival to Thraſibulus. In the mean while, this weak Prince, growing more feeble upon a ſudden, died, and deſiring to ſay ſomething more concerning Alcionida, he pronounced her Name, and left all thoſe who ſaw him die in ſuch Admiration of his Conſtancy, and ſo molified with his Diſcourſe, that had he been a prime Friend unto every one in particular, he could not have moved more Sorrows. As ſoon as the Prince Tiſander had fetched his laſt breath, and no ſigns of Life appeared, Cyrus carried Thraſibulus out of the Tent whether he would or no, and left Leoſthenes to take all requiſite orders for Tiſanders Funeral, which Cyrus would have moſt magnificently performed: Having then carried Thraſibulus into his own Pavilion, he took the Letter which was directed unto Alcionida, and which was open; then, with the conſent of Thraſibulus, he found written theſe Words:

Dying Tiſander to his deareſt Alcionida.

I Am ſo near my Death, that I cannot poſſibly ſay much unto you: Let me in a few Words conjure you to believe, that I did love You beyond all Expreſſions, and that I die full of the ſame Affection, and fuller than ever any, except the Prince Thraſibulus*: You know he is my ſecond-ſelf, and ſo receive him; I give him all my ſhare in your Heart, for he deſerves it; Love him then for the love of me, and force him to love my Memory for the love of you; and as far as it is poſſible, let both of you love that Prince in his Grave, who whilſt he lived loved none but you; and when he died, you were the only thoughts of* Tiſander.

As Cyrus was of a moſt apprehenſive and compaſſionate Soul, ſo his Heart was extreamly tendered at the reading of this Letter; And Thraſibulus himſelf, notwithſtanding all the Hopes he might conceive by the Death of his Friend, was moſt really grieved. All poſſible care was taken, to render the laſt Honours of Burial with all Ceremony befitting a Man of his Quality: Cyrus himſelf, the King of Phrygia, the King of Hircania, and every Prince in the Army, were Mourners, and expreſſed all Teſtimonies of eſteem unto the Honour of Prince Tiſander. After this, Cyrus told Thraſibulus, that both the Affairs of his Dominions, and thoſe concerning his Love, did require his ſudden return unto Milete, and unto Lesbos. Then he went to give out Orders concerning the preſent Affair. In the mean time, the Prince Phaartes returning to the King his Father, found all things in a lamentable Condition, becauſe their Victuals would not laſt above two days, though the King of Armenia to keep up the Hearts of his Souldiers did make a ſhew as if they had enough for a Month, hoping always that Ciaxares would be weary, and draw off from Artaxates. Phaartes then, ſeeing things in that Condition, told the King his Father, that there was a neceſſity of having recourſe unto the clemency of the Conqueror, ſince Force was in vain; and the more to merit his Favour, he thought it moſt expedient to tell Ciaxares with all ingenuity, whether the Princeſs Mandana, and the King of Pontus were in his Dominions or no? That as for the Tribute demanded, though it were juſt to pay what's promiſed, yet he knew that the principal cauſe of the War was the Princeſs Mandana; ſo that if he had her in his Hands, he might eaſily free himſelf from the Tribute, by reſtoring her unto the King her Father; and that if he had her not, then he ought to make it ſo apparent, as neither Ciaxares or Cyrus might doubt of it. The King then proteſted unto Phaartes, that he never knew the King of Pontus or the Princeſs Mandana were ever in Armenia; And that the Princeſs Ariminta being in his Dominions, had certainly raiſed that Opinion of the Princeſs Mandana's being here. Phaartes told the King his Father, that as he had promiſed, ſo he muſt needs acquaint Cyrus with the truth of all this: But the Souldiers being in a great Mutiny, would needs ſee all the Magazines of Victual before the Prince Phaartes departed; there was ſuch a great diſorder amongſt them, that they all forſook their Guards: So that if the moſt generous Cyrus would have violated his Faith, and taken that advantage, he might eaſily have entred the Mountains, and killed all thoſe that fled thither for Sanctuary; for it was eaſy to be diſcerned from the Plains, how they diſperſed themſelves in the Mountains without any Order, or any Arms: But he did moſt inviolably obſerve whatſoever he promiſed; and looked upon this diſorder without taking that Advantage, or knowing the true cauſe of it. But in concluſion, the King of Armenia reſolved to truſt unto the Generoſity of Cyrus, and put himſelf into his Hands. He ſent therefore the Prince Phaartes before, appeaſing the Souldiers, by aſſuring them that he went to make Peace. This Prince returning then unto the Camp, and being conducted unto the Tent of Cyrus, where was the King of Aſſyria, the King of Hircania, the Prince of the Caduſians, the Prince of Paphlagonia, Thraſibulus, Hidaſpes, Aglatidas, and many others; he told him, how extreamly ſorry he was that he was not able to tell him any News concerning the Princeſs Mandana, of whom the King his Father had no knowledg: For Sir, ſaid he to Cyrus, to ſhew you that he is moſt ſincere, I need tell you no more, but that truſting abſolutely in the goodneſs of the Medean King and your Generoſity, I have perſwaded him to deſcend from theſe Mountains, with the Queen my Mother, the Princeſſes my Siſters, the Princeſs Oneſila, Wife of Tigranes my Brother, whom heretofore you have honoured with your Friendſhip: You may very well judg by this, Sir, ſaid he unto him, that if he had the Princeſs Mandana in his Power, he would not have done thus. When Cyrus had well conſidered upon it, he was moſt extreamly grieved, that there was no Hopes of finding Mandana. The King of Aſſyria was as deeply wounded as he; yet imagining that perhaps ſhe might ſtill be in Armenia, though this Prince was ignorant of it, a moſt ſtrict Search was reſolved upon in lieu of a bloody War.

In the mean while Cyrus ſent in all haſte unto Ciaxares, to acquaint him with the Reports of Phaartes, and to ask him whether he ſhould bring the King of Armenia unto him: But Ciaxares being not well that day, ſent him word that he abſolutely referred all unto him, and that he might do as he himſelf thought moſt expedient. Cyrus having this Anſwer, received the King of Armenia, and all his Royal Family, into his Tent; and obſerving a diſcreet Mediocrity in his Civilities, there appeared in his Diſcourſe and Actions all the Sweetneſs of a clement Prince, and all the Majeſty of a Conqueror: The King of Armenia ſeemed a greater Prince in his Miſery, then he did in his better Fortunes; for indeed he ſpoke with much Boldneſs and Generoſity upon this Occaſion: for ſince Cyrus was much perplexed at the bad news which he received, he could not forbear ſome Expreſſions of Anger, for being engaged in this War, and loſing ſo much time as might have been more advantagiouſly employed in the Search of Mandana ſome other way. This being the Condition of things, the Prince Tigranes, who was recovered of his Sickneſs, and underſtanding the bad Condition of the King his Father's Affairs, reſolved abſolutely to truſt unto the Generoſity of Cyrus, and came unto his Tent; where with Sorrow he ſaw the King his Father, the Queen his Mother, the Prince his Brother, the Princeſſes his Siſters, and the Admired Onuſila his Wife, whoſe Beauty did dazle all thoſe Eyes that looked upon her. As ſoon as he appeared, Cyrus received him with many Expreſſions of Civility towards him; yet ſince he was upon a Buſineſs of great importance, he held no long Diſcourſes, but following his Intention, Why, Sir, (ſaid he to the King of Armenia) did you not return a more clear Anſwer unto the King whom I ſerve, when he ſent unto you to demand the Princeſs his Daughter? and why did you make him think ſhe was in your Power? My Reaſon was, replied he, becauſe I thought he did not believe ſhe was in my Power; and that he did but ſeek for a pretence to colour his War, and thereby move me to pay that Tribute which I formerly payed unto Aſtiages. But, replied Cyrus, do you not think that Tribute due, and that you ought to pay it? Yes, anſwered he; but deſire of Liberty, and alſo to leave my Children abſolute and free, moved me unto that Injuſtice, which would have been glorious if it had ſucceeded well. If you were in the King of Medes caſe, ſaid Cyrus, and a Prince your Vaſſal ſhould have done as you did, what would you have done? If I ſhould act according to the Rules of Policy (replied this Prince without any amazement) I ſhould ſo diſable him from having any Power to hurt me, that I would leave him no more but a deſire to do it: But if I would merit that Reputation which at this day Cyrus enjoys, and keep it when I had gotten it, I would pardon that Prince; and of a rebellious Vaſſal, I would make him my grateful Friend. Be it then ſo unto the King of Medes, replied Cyrus; but be ſure you be moſt really ſo, leſt you ſhould find the Fury of a puiſſant and juſtly incenſed Prince. The King of Armenia was ſo much ſurprized to hear him ſpeak in that manner, as he was afraid he had miſunderſtood him: Therefore Cyrus had the leaſure to turn towards the Prince Tigranes, and ſmiling, asked him moſt obligingly in ſpite of his Melancholy, what Ranſom he would give to free the Princeſs Onuſila his Wife? My Life, Sir, anſwered Tigranes haſtily; for ſince there is nothing in the World ſo dear unto me as ſhe, I ought to offer no leſs. Mean while, the King of Armenia perceiving by the Acclamations of the People, that he was rightly underſtood, began to expreſs his Gratitude and Acknowledgments unto Cyrus; who to let him ſee that he was at liberty, began to treat all theſe Princeſſes with wonderful Civility, and appointed Coaches to come and carry them unto Artaxates. Sir, ſaid the King of Armenia unto him, ſince you deal thus generouſly with us, I will not only become a Vaſſal, and a Subject; but I will be ſo faithful and free to you, that you ſhall not only diſpoſe of all my Treaſures which are upon yonder Mountains, but alſo of my Life and Liberty. Cyrus returned a moſt generous Anſwer unto the Diſcourſe of this Prince, and aſſured him, that Ciaxares deſired no more but that he ſhould obſerve the ſame Conditions which his Fathers heretofore had done, and that he ſhould joyn his Forces unto his: We will bring them up, Sir, replied the Prince Tigranes and the Prince Phaartes, and we ſhall with joy be ready to die in your Service, whenſoever any Occaſion requires it. Cyrus then did part from thoſe two Princes moſt civilly: And the Coaches being come, the Queen of Armenia and the Princeſſes her Daughters were carried unto Artaxates, and into the ſame Palace where the Princeſs Ariminta was, becauſe it was more convenient than that where Ciaxares lodged. Thus ſhe who was a Priſoner in Armenia received the Queen of Armenia, as if ſhe had been in the Dominions of the King her Brother. The Prince Tigranes and Phaartes, by the permiſſion of Cyrus, waited upon the Queen their Mother unto the Palace. All the way as they went, they ſpoke of nothing but the Vertues of Cyrus: Phaartes extolled his Valor; the Queen of Armenia, his Generoſity; the Princeſſes his Daughters, his Sweetneſs and Clemency; and Tigranes, who was better acquainted with his heroick Qualities than they, told them a hundred Pieces of Gallantry which he had performed: But obſerving that the Princeſs Onesila his Wife did not ſpeak at all, and conceiving that Cyrus had not yet been ſufficiently commended: Is there any Man in the World, ſaid he unto her, whoſe Behaviour and Perſon is more noble, high and handſom, than that of Cyrus? Truly, replied ſhe, I cannot ſpeak of his Magnanimity, nor at all of his handſomneſs, for I did not obſerve it.

Who then, ſaid he unto her, did attract the Obſervations of my Ontſila, whilſt this generous Converſation laſted? He, anſwered ſhe, who offered his Life for my Ranſom, and whom ſhe prefers before all the Univerſe. This ſo ſweet and moſt obliging Anſwer moved Tigranes to give her Thanks; and then he went on with his Elogy of Cyrus, whom ſince ſhe did not obſerve, he deſcribed him unto her.

About an Hour after, Cyrus carried the King of Armenia unto Ciaxares, who ſince Morning found himſelf a little better: As they entered into Artaxates, never was ſuch loud Acclamations in Commendations of Cyrus, as upon this Occaſion: All the Conquerors that ever were, who led their conquered Kings in Triumph, never had ſo much Glory in the Captivity of their Slaves, as Cyrus had, and deſervedly, in ſetting the King of Armenia again upon his Throne; and after he had vanquiſhed him, let him enter into Artaxates, as if this Tributary King had never been a Rebel, or himſelf a Conqueror of him. Ciaxares, at the Requeſt of Cyrus, received him very well; ſo that in leſs than a Days ſpace, there was no more Wars in Armenia; the Vanquiſhed and Vanquiſhers were all of one ſide; and if the Princeſs Mandana were but found, there was then no more to be wiſhed: but ſince ſhe could not be heard of, the Joy was only on the Armenian ſide. Ciaxares, Cyrus, the King of Aſſyria, and all thoſe who had any Intereſt in this admired Princeſs, were never the nearer any Satisfaction. A general Search through both Armenia's was then reſolved upon: for ſince the King of Pontus his Slave told the Princeſs Ariminta when he was dying, that the King his Maſter was gone into Armenia; and beſides that, ſince Mandana had written as much with her own hand, it could not be believed but ſhe was in ſome unknown Place or other. In the mean while Harpagus came from Ecbatan to advertiſe Ciaxares, that there was a great Diſpoſition amongſt the People to revolt, by Reaſon of his long Abſence; and that it was neceſſary to ſend ſome Perſon qualified with high Authority, to remain there until he came himſelf. Cyrus received Harpagus with much Goodneſs; remembring that he was in ſome ſort a Cauſe both of his Love, and all the Glory he had ob-

obtained: ſince if he had not come unto Perſia, and had given him that Counſel which he did, perhaps he ſhould never have left the Perſian Court. But the buſineſs which he came about, being put into Conſultation, Cyrus deſiring to oblige Aglatidas, did propoſe to ſend him unto Ecbatan, and to confer upon him the Government of the Province of the Araſantines, which Ottanus would not accept of; imagining that ſince he might well hope to enioy Ameſtris after the Death of her Husband, he would not refuſe it. It was then reſolved upon, that Aglatidas ſhould depart the next Morning, and go for Ecbatan; that he ſhould carry Arbatan with him; and that he ſhould aſſure the Medean People, that Ciaxares would make a ſpeedy return. Upon the breaking up of the Council, Cyrus ſent for Aglatidas, to acquaint him with this good News, which doubtleſs he received with as much Joy, as Megabiſes did with Sorrow: He thanked Cyrus in ſuch fit language to expreſs his Gratitude, that it was apparent his Paſſion was high. He made ſhew of ſome Sorrows to leave him, and without doubt, he was as loth to part from him, as any Lover who was going to ſee his Miſtreſs could be: He aſſured him, he ſhould have his Diſpatches that Night, and embracing him, Wiſh (ſaid he, my dear Aglatidas) that I were as near my Happineſs and Satisfaction, as you are when you go to ſee your dear Ameſtris; I wiſh with all my Heart, you may find her as faithful, as you have deſcribed her Amiable and Admirable. Artaban alſo took his leave of Cyrus, and the next Morning theſe two Friends went together to Ecbatan. To chear up Megabiſes, Cyrus gave him one of the prime Offices in the King's Houſe, which then was vacant; yet this Conſolation was but weak to divert his Mind, ſince Aglatidas would ere long ſee Ameſtris, but ſince there was no other, Patience muſt be his Remedy.

There came news that Day to Court, that Craſus was raiſing a very puiſſant Army, and did ſolicit all the People of Ionia to take his part: ſo that Cyrus ſeeing ſo fit an Opportunity to help the Prince Thraſibulus, would not let it ſlip: and the next Day following, he moved Ciaxares, that in caſe Craſus had any Deſigns upon his Dominions, as in all likelihood he had, then it were the beſt expedient to make a Diverſion, and to draw the Lydian Forces unto more Places than one: So that it was reſolved, the Prince Thraſibulus, accompanied by Harpagus, who had much experience, having followed the late King of Medes in all his Wars, ſhould go with ten thouſand Men into Cappadocia, where Artobantes would make new Levies to join unto thoſe Troops which Ciaxares left at his departure from Sinope, to keep that Kingdom in Peace: That Thraſibulus ſhould be General of this Army on Foot; Harpagus commanding under him; and without needing any new Orders, he might in the Name of the King, and Cyrus, puniſh, or pardon, as he thought fit. In the mean while, Cyrus had a conceit in his Mind, which did much vex him, that Mandana might be any where, ſince they could hear no news of her: Love, hereupon which is always very ingenious, made him invent Poſts, which he ſet up throughout all Parts where he had made any Conqueſts; to the end he might in leſs time, and with more Expedition, hear news of Mandana. After Thraſibulus had taken his leave of Ciaxares, the Separation between that Prince and Cyrus was very full of tender Expreſſions; for ſince the firſt Day they fought with one another, they had a moſt high eſteem of each others Vertue, and it was impoſſible but this eſteem ſhould tie a firm knot of Friendſhip between them: The Names of Mandana, and Alcionida, were often pronounced at parting, which was in private. Thraſibulus deſired Cyrus to pardon him, for leaving him before he heard any News of the Princeſs; and he aſſuring him, that if he ſaw any more Enemies to fight with, he ſhould never be able to do it. Cyrus did thank him with all Expreſſions of Civility, and deſired he would excuſe him for not going himſelf in Perſon, to put him in Poſſeſſion of his Dominions, and to perſwade Alcionida to obey the Commands of the Prince Tiſander. However, ſince he thought the Grecians would be very willing to aſſiſt a Grecian, Thimocrates, Philocles, and Leontidas, were choſen for it, and intreated by Cyrus to ſerve him in the Perſon of Thraſibulus: They were too gallant to refuſe any Occaſion of War, yet could they not find Hearts to part from Cyrus without abundance of Sorrow. Thimocrates told Cyrus at parting, that he ſaw his Deſtinies did not change, but that Abſence ſtill muſt be the greateſt torment of his Life, ſince certainly he could not part from him but with Extream Regret. Philocles did moſt obligingly complain, that he was no more beloved of Cyrus, then his Miſtreſs, ſince if he had, he would have kept him with him. And Leontidas, ſuting his Complement to his humour, as his Friends did to their Fortunes, told him, That he did not look upon all thoſe who were to enjoy the Happineſs of the Princeſs, with leſs jealouſy, then he did upon the Lovers of Alcidamia. After theſe firſt Complements of Gallantry, they expreſſed effectual Teſtimonies of their Zeal to ſerve Cyrus in the Perſon of Thraſibulus, who had gotten ſo much Love amongſt all the Kings and Princes in the Army, that there was not one, who did not with much Sorrow bid him Adieu. He went alſo to take his leave of the King and Queen of Armenia, of the Princeſſes his Daughters, of the Princeſs Oneſila, of the Princeſs Ariminta, and of the Princes Tigranes and Phaartes.

After all which he departed with his Forces, which Harpagus commanded under him: which were joined unto the Cicilian Troops, which Leontidas commanded after the death of Prince Artibies; with an Addition of the Cyprian Forces alſo, whoſe Body was ſent unto the Prince his Brother, with all Honours fit to be rendred unto one of his Quality, with a deſire that Cyrus might be as good as his Word, and that his Body might be carried to Thebes, and laid in the Tomb with his dear Leontina. Cyrus ſent a Letter by his Men who were to conduct the Corps, unto the Prince of Cicily, and another unto the Prince Philoxipes, with Orders to paſs into Cyprus, and to aſſure him of the continuance of his Friendſhip, in conducting to Thebes the Corps of the Prince Artibies. Mean while, all Searches for the Princeſs Mandana were in vain: Information was given from ſome Fiſhers in the River Halis, that once upon a time, they obſerved a Boat full of Souldiers, and ſome Ladies amongſt them, but that was all they could ſay: ſo that both Cyrus, and the King of Aſſyria, did endure all the torments that deſperate Lovers could ſuffer; all the Victories of Cyrus could not countervail this horrid Abſence from Mandana: all the Defeats and Loſſes which the King of Aſſyria had, did not diſturb his Mind, which was ſenſible of nothing but the loſs of Mandana: All their thoughts were imployed about this fruitleſs Search; during which time the Chaldeans, which were Neighbours unto the Armenians, which deſcended from their Mountains, were much moleſted by Cyrus, who in four days did quell them, and indeed made them very happy in reconciling them unto the Armenians, of whoſe Friendſhip they ſtood as much in need, as the Armenians did of theirs; ſo that in all places Fortune ſmiled upon Cyrus: every People did yield Obedience unto him without any Contradiction; and either by his Valour, or by his Clemency, he was Conqueror of all the World: yet for all that he could not conquer his own Sorrows, which never gave him any Reſt: ſometimes he went to lament, and he lamented by the Princeſs Ariminta; and for her part, ſhe did not only complain againſt her old Miſeries, but againſt the new Paſſion of Phaartes, which did every Day grow more violent; beſeeching Cyrus not to leave her in Armenia when he went away: Ciaxares alſo did extreamly grieve for the loſs of his Daughter; ſo that it may very well be ſaid, Never Conquerors had leſs joy in their victorious Conqueſts than theſe. Cyrus did often wonder that Ortalques who went with Marteſia, and her Couſin, was not heard of: and he feared ſome Misfortune had happened to that amiable Lady: and though Mandana did take up all his thoughts, yet he was always pleaſingly civil and obliging; but always grave, reſerved, and melancholy. The King of Aſſyria, who was of a more violent Temper, he was not only ſad, and melancholy, but alſo he fretted, and was full of Anguiſh: and if theſe two Princes had not yet had ſome Hopes to find Mandana, doubtleſs they had ended all Differences between them, and ſtaid no longer: for ſometimes when Cyrus conſidered that the King of Aſſyria was the Cauſe of all his Miſery, he had much ado to contain himſelf: alſo when the King of Aſſyria conſidered that perhaps Mandana would not hate him, if Cyrus were not loved: his Heart renewed all imaginable Hatred, as he uſed to have unto him when he thought him only Artamenes, and himſelf ſeemed only Philidaſpes. However, all Intelligence which both of them received from divers parts, did not afford them any Knowledg of what they deſired: and the ſmall hopes which they had, was almoſt quite extinct, when the King of Aſſyria was advertiſed by a ſecret Agent, which he had in Suſa, that Abradates King of the Suſanians was gone with ſome Troops, and none knew whither: That he carried the Queen his wife with him, and alſo a ſtrange Princeſs, and a Prince which no Body knew: and that they went towards Matenes, which joyns upon Armenia, and Cicilia. As ſoon as this Prince had this News, he rejoiced; but ſince every one is apt to believe what they deſire, he made no doubt but this Princeſs which was unknown, was the Princeſs Mandana, and the unknown Prince, the King of Pontus: ſo that going in all haſte to acquaint Ciaxares, he met Cyrus, who perceiving ſo many ſigns of Joy in his Eyes, could not chuſe but ask him the Cauſe. Though it went againſt the Hair to acquaint his Rival with ſuch good News, yet he told him what he knew concerning the Princeſs Mandana, which at the firſt Apprehenſion did ſo joy the heart of Cyrus, that he thought to imbrace his mortal Enemy, and give him thanks; but preſently after, ſome ingredients of Grief did allay his Jollity, when he conſidered that Ciaxares ſhould hear any thing of Mandana from his Rival, and not from himſelf; for he made no Queſtion but it was ſhe, as well becauſe the King of Pontus might think to find Protection from Abradates, who always hated the Medeans, as becauſe the River Halis, on which it was known Mandana was, did run that way. Moreover, it was known that the Matenes were the Allies of Adrabates: So that his thoughts concurring with the King of Aſſyria's, he told him, that it was fit to acquaint Ciaxares with it in all haſte: and to take Horſe the very ſame hour, to the end they might go towards the Frontiers of Armenia, to inform themſelves of Abradates his March, to follow him, and alſo to fight with him. Together then they went unto Ciaxares, who being as Impatient as themſelves, after he underſtood the News, told them, that they ſhould go ſpeedily to Deliver the Princeſs his Daughter: ſo that without loſs of any time, they drew out two thouſand Horſe out of the Medean Cavalry which was the beſt: A thouſand of the Aſſyrian Kings, and a thouſand Homotimes, which were the beſt of all the Perſian Troops. Since they received other Intelligence, that Abradates had with him but two thouſand Horſe in all, they took but four thouſand, that they might ſooner overtake him, and knowing that the March of great Bodies is always Slow: nor would they have taken ſo many, but that they feared they ſhould be conſtrained to divide themſelves, the ſoooner to meet with them they ſought for: All the Princes and Voluntiers in the Army were in this Party, except the King of Phrygia, and the King of Hircania, who ſtaid with Ciaxares. Tigranes and Phaartes failed not: and never were Men ſeen more eager to vanquiſh then they.

Cyrus and the King of Aſſyria had Eyes which ſparkled with extraordinary Fury; and they thought themſelves ſo ſure to deliver Mandana, that they began already to look upon each other as Enemies. Yet did both ſides carry it moſt courteouſly, and with all Sincerity, but their very looks did diſcover whether they would or no the reſentments of their Souls. In concluſion they took their leaves of Ciaxares, and having the Acclamations and Prayers of all the People for a happy ſucceſs of their Enterprize, they marced with incredible haſte to the Frontiers of Armenia, and as far as the Matenes Country, who were in League with all their Neighbours, and notwithſtanding all the Aſian Wars, lived in a ſecure Peace. When they were arrived there, they underſtood that Abradates was already paſt, and was gone towards a corner of Cicilia: they underſtood alſo there were many Coaches full of Ladies which thoſe Troops conducted: So that this News renewing their Zeal, they conſulted upon the beſt Expedient: for all the way Abradates went, there was a River, along which he muſt neceſſarily go; but ſince they could not exactly tell on which ſide he went, and on which ſide Mandana was, becauſe they were informed that Abradates had divided his Troops, one party going over a Bridg, and the other ſtaid on that ſide on the left Hand; therefore they reſolved to divide themſelves alſo. So that Cyrus, generouſly giving half of his Men unto his Rival, drawing lots which Party he ſhould have, and which ſide of the River he ſhould take, Cyrus had that ſide which was furtheſt from Armenia, and the King of Aſſyria the other: But before they parted, they both of them renewed their Promiſes to each other, not to take any Advantage by Delivering the Princeſs until they had fought: So after this new promiſe of mutual Fidelity they parted, each of them wiſhing in his Heart to be happier than his Rival. Cyrus in all impatience to find his dear Mandana, went in the Head of his Men, and would very often be a long way before them, to enquire of all he met whether any Cavalry and Coaches paſſed that way: ſome told him, Yes, ſome again, No; and according to their ſeveral Anſwers, the Soul of Cyrus was either glad or ſad: he ſent upon the left Hand of the River, for he himſelf was upon the right, ſometimes Araſpes, and ſometimes Feraulas with ſome Horſe, to enquire in the Villages what they could hear, and by all reports, he was aſcertained that ſome Cavalry paſſed that way. As for the Coaches full of Ladies, ſome ſaid there was ſuch, and ſome ſaid there was none at all. He was told at a place where he paſſed, that the Cavalry which he followed had left the River, and took upon the left Hand: ſo that he went in all haſte the ſame way, and he came unto a place where the ways were Sandy, and where he could trace the Horſes feet freſhly printed. Then did he march on with much Joy for ten Hours, until he came to a Bridg where he ſtaid, not knowing which ſide thoſe he followed had taken, for now the ways were not Sandy, and no Prints were to be ſeen: He being now at a terrible Dilemma, he paſſed over the Bridg to the other ſide; he ſent out divers Men to ſeveral Places, but all in Vain, for they found many Houſes, but none in them, ſo that he knew not what to reſolve upon: yet at laſt he thought it beſt not to be on the ſame ſide of the River which the King of Aſſyria was; ſo that going back again to the Bridg, he marched along the other ſide. After ſome thirty furlongs march, Feraulus, who was a long way before, did meet a Man, who told him, he ſaw a great Fight on the other ſide of the Water within this Hour, and within twenty Furlongs from the place he was. Cyrus knowing this, with a Mind extreamly inflamed that his Rival ſhould be more Happy than he, returned ſpeedily to the Bridg, and paſſed over, going ſtraight towards the place where the Paiſant ſaid he ſaw the Fight. He had not gone above fifteen Furlongs, but he found ſome Horſes and Men dead; and going a little further he ſaw a field covered with Dead and dying Men, and a Coach which was overturned and broken. This object did infinitely move him: he ſearched and looked all about; and in the end found a Perſian amongſt thoſe that were wounded whom he knew; and being able to ſpeak, he no ſooner ſaw Cyrus, but he called him, Sir, ſaid he unto him, the King of Aſſyria has delivered the Princeſs, and put all thoſe Enemies to Flight which are not killed. Has the King of Aſſyria delivered the Princeſs? (ſaid Cyrus in a great amazement:) Ah my Friend, doſt thou know what thou ſayſt? Yes, Sir, replied he, and has carried her away in her Coach; for this which you ſee here broken is another, and thoſe Women which were in it are all in the ſame Coach with the Princeſs: Since I was wounded after the fight by one of my Companions, who would needs have a Horſe from me which I had gotten, I ſaw very well how the King of Aſſyria did addreſs himſelf unto her in her Coach with all Humility, and Honoured her; which was the Reaſon why the Commander in Chief of the Enemies was not taken, for the King of Aſſyria no ſooner ſaw that Coach in his Power, but he neglected all elſe, and took care of her. Cyrus hearing this News, was both as joyful as poſſible could be, and alſo as ſad as any true Lover could think himſelf: He rejoiced that his dear Mandana was delivered, but ſince it was by his Rival, he grieved exceſſively. Moreover, he underſtood the King of Pontus was eſcaped, and therefore had a good Mind to follow and fight him, yet he could not think that Mandana was in the King of Aſſyria's Power, but he muſt needs haſte after him: ſo that leaving his Deſign of following an unfortunate Rival, he went after him that was the fortunate one. He went immediately unto the Rendezvous which was appointed of at parting, but went with a Mind ſo infinitely enraged, that he was not Maſter of his own Thoughts: The night coming faſt on, did augment his Melancholy, becauſe he could not make haſte enough; but was forced to ſtay; for having left the River ſide, intending to go a nearer way, his Guides loſt their Aim in the midſt of a great Foreſt full of Cypreſs Trees, and in the Obſcurity of the Night: ſo that in lieu of coming nearer Mandana, fearing to wander further off her, he reſolved to ſtay there till break of Day. Moreover, his Horſes were almoſt tired, having had no reſt a long time: he therefore made a halt, and lighted from his Horſe, ſitting down at the foot of a Tree, as if he would reſt himſelf, but indeed it was to perſecute himſelf with the violent agitations of his Mind: Sometimes his reſentmets of Joy would get the predominacy; for ſaid he in his Heart, Mandana is delivered, ſhe is in a place where I ſhall ſhortly ſee her, and her Deliverer ſhall not long enjoy that glorious Title, unleſs my Courage betray me in this laſt and principal Occaſion. But O ye Gods, ſaid he, why muſt my Rival deliver my Princeſs? and why do you put me to the Neceſſity of hating her Deliverer, and grieve for the liberty of Mandana, which I did ſo ardently deſire? I cannot purely reliſh her Deliverance, for doubtleſs my Rival has already ſpoke of his Love unto her, and ſhe has thanked him for what he hath done: and perhaps this laſt piece of Service which he hath done her, (which did not coſt him one drop of Blood) will work more upon her Heart, than all the Combats I have fought for her, than all the Battels I have won, and all the Wounds I have received. O, my Divine Princeſs (cried he out) be a little more juſt, and look upon the Service which the King of Aſſyria hath done you, rather as an effect of his good Fortune, than any extraordinary teſtimony of his Affection. But after all this, he hath delivered her, ſaid he; and methinks thinks I ſee the Princeſs beſtow upon him a thouſand Expreſſions of Acknowledgment: Yes, were I aſſured that this divine Princeſs did wiſh in her Heart that it were I who had done her this good Office, I ſhould be ſatisfied; but Liberty is ſo ſweet, that it is moſt difficult not to love the Hand that gives it. O ye rigorous Deſtinies! ſaid he, why would you not let me have the Honour of breaking her Chains aſunder? Had ye been ſo propitious unto me, I ſhould have thought my Self the moſt happy Prince upon Earth: But now, though I have won ſo many Battels, conquered ſo many Kingdoms; nothing reſiſted me, all obeyed me; the King of Aſſyria himſelf thrown out of his Throne, and compelled to yield unto the Fury of my Fate; yet this unfortunate Prince is now a thouſand thouſand times more happy than Cyrus, who has been reputed the greateſt Favourite of the Gods of all Men living. How dare I appear before my Princeſs? and how can I contain my Impatience to ſee her in his Hands? When he was in Babylon, he was leſs dreadful to me than now; for then Mandana looked upon him as her Raviſher; but now the Caſe is altered, and he is her Deliverer, and all that ever I did for her was not ſo advantagious to her, as this Act of his at this time: Yet I am much to blame to grieve, now my Princeſs rejoiceth, and yet were I mad to rejoice at the Glory of my Rival. Perhaps I am deceived, and my adored Mandana is moſt juſt, and will remember, that though I did not deliver her when I returned from the Meſſagettes, when I ſaved the life of her Raviſher, yet it was becauſe I knew him not; and that though I did not deliver her in the taking of Babylon, it was becauſe the King of Aſſyria did take her away the ſecond time; and though I did her no Service at Sinope, it was becauſe the Prince Mazarus, to his own Miſery and mine, did carry her away: Therefore when ſhe conſiders that the King of Aſſyria has been her Raviſher and Detainer whole Years together, it may be this laſt Adventure of his will have no great operation upon her Heart. But no, no, ſaid he preſently after, let me not flatter my Self; paſt Services are ſmall in Compariſon of thoſe which are at preſent; and a thouſand good Intentions are nothing equal to one real good Office effectually done, though it coſt him who did it but little; and therefore unhappy Man that I am, I may in all Reaſon fear that the King of Aſſyria hath this very Day gained more upon the Heart of Mandana, than I have done in all my Life. Afterwards when he began to conſider, that in drawing Lots which ſide of the River either ſhould take, all his Wiſdom and Piety could not keep him from murmuring againſt Heaven: What have I done, O ye juſt Gods, ſaid he, to merit this Misfortune? Have I not, during all the Wars that ever I made, preſerved your Temples and your Altars? Have I not offered Sacrifices and Oblations unto you? Was I ever unjuſt, cruel or bloody? I loved Mandana it is true, but I loved her with unparallel'd Purity: I loved her moſt paſſionately I confeſs; but ſince you made her ſo highly Accompliſhed, and made me know it, it had been a ſin to do otherwiſe, and I could not poſſibly love her leſs, and yet you inflict upon me as ſevere Torments, as thoſe who are moſt Culpable could be puniſhed with. I would gladly ceaſe my murmur, but I cannot: Fury doth command my Mind; Jealouſy diſturbs my Reaſon, and I cannot endure that my dreadful Rival and my mortal Enemy ſhould be Mandana's Deliverer. After this, being out of all Patience that it was not yet Day, he roſe up; and taking Horſe, maugre all perſwaſions to the contrary, he would have them march; and becauſe he would be exemplary to the reſt, he was the firſt that groped through the thick Darkneſs, having in his Mind a more gloomy Melancholy than the obſcurity of the Night, which was ſo dark, that no Objects could be diſcerned in that great Foreſt.

Part IV. Book I.

AFter a long and blind March, Day did by little and little appear. And Cyrus came to the River ſide, where the Guides being within their aim again, conducted the Prince to the Place where he deſired to be ; at the laſt he came to a Place where he diſcovered Coaches, and Souldiers going before him : This ſight ſeemed ſomething ſtrange, and made ſuch a mixture of Joys and Sorrows, Love and Jealouſy, Hopes and Fears in his Heart, that he knew not what to think on it : He looked upon Feraulus, and pronouncing the name of Mandana, ſhewing him the Coaches, and doubling his Pace ; Come, Feraulus, ſaid he unto him, let us go and enjoy the Happineſs to ſee our Miſtreſs, or at the leaſt diſturb the Joys of my Rival : putting on then very faſt, he overtook ſome Horſemen, which were two hundred Paces behind the Coaches and Troops, and knowing them at the firſt to be Medes ; Is the King of Aſſyria, ſaid he unto them, with the Princeſs Mandana ? We know not that, Sir, replied they ; for preſently after the Combate yeſterday againſt Abradates, when he perceived that in lieu of delivering the Princeſs, he had only taken the Queen of Suſiana, he turned all Fury, and took another way with part of his Men. How, ſaid Cyrus, is not Mandana in this Coach which I ſee before me? No, Sir, replied they, the King of Aſſyria had intelligence that ſhe was on your ſide of the River; ſo that deſiring to come unto you, and ſhare in the deliverance of her, he took a nearer way which his Guides did ſhew unto him, and thereby to ſtop the King of Pontus's way, after he had paſſed the River at a Place, the Name whereof we have forgotten; hoping alſo to overtake Abradates, and meet with you. But ſince we ſee you here, we know neither where he, nor the Princeſs Mandana is, eſpecially ſince it appears you hear nothing of him, but return without meeting with him. Cyrus was ſo aſtoniſhed, and ſad, that the Princeſs Mandana was not delivered, and to know that if he had followed the way he firſt took, he might have done it: and that his Rival might perhaps be fighting for her at that very time whilſt he was ſpeaking on it, that not ſtaying any longer there, nor going to the Coach where Panthea was, he faced about in all haſte, ſending Araſpes to have a care of that Queen; he returned then unto the firſt place where he might have paſſage over the River;and marching almoſt as faſt as if he had been alone, he was ſo much tranſported with anger againſt himſelf, that he had much ado to contain himſelf within the limits of Reaſon: He wiſhed that the King of Aſſyria had met with Mandana, and he deſired alſo quite contrary; and ſince he could not compoſe his diſcordant Deſires, he ſuffered intollerable torment of Mind; eſpecially when it came into his Thoughts that in all pobability the King of Aſſyria had already delivered Mandana, or which was worſe, that neither of them could deliver her. After a long March without any intelligence, he met with ſome Horſmen, which the King of Aſſyria, hearing that he had paſſed over the River, did ſend unto him, to tell him, that he would ſtill purſue the King of Pontus; and alſo to advertiſe him how he underſtood, that he had left the River upon his left Hand, and went as faſt as he could unto another, which he muſt needs croſs over, before he could be in Cilicia.

Cyrus upon this advice, doubling his diligence, though his Horſes were very weary, at laſt he overtook the King of Aſſyria, and out of a phantaſtical humour of Love and Jealouſy mixed together, he was both ſad, and glad, that he had not delivered Mandana. Theſe two illuſtrious Rivals rendred an account unto each other of their Actions; and being forced unto it by Neceſſity, they gave half an Hours time unto their Men to take a ſlight repaſt, and bait their Horſes at the next Village they came unto; after which, they went together with more haſte than before, in purſuance of the King of Pontus, who could not make any great ſpeed becauſe of the Coach which carried the Princeſs Mandana: At laſt after a March until the Sun was ſet, they diſcovered this other River, which I ſpoke of before: But that which did moſt extreamly perplex them, was to ſee a wooden Bridg, over which they were to paſs, quite broken down; and caſting their Eyes upon the other ſide of the Water, they diſcovered in a great Meadow, about four or five hundred Paces off, about fifty Horſes only, and a Coach, which they concluded to be that of the Princeſs Mandana, whom they were in queſt of; for this broken Bridg was a ſtrong Argument of it: Then were they at a Dilemma, to comprehend why they had only fifty Horſes, and what was become of all the reſt; however they made no doubt but that it was the Princeſs Mandana. Since this River was very deep and impetuous, and alſo very broad, there was no poſſibility of paſſing over: Cyrus, and the King of Aſſyria, yet would make a Trial, but all was in vain, and both of them were in danger to be drowned: And it was a long days March unto any Bridg; then to return as far back again; for there was no other between that place they were on, and the Sea, into which this River did empty it ſelf; nor could they paſs over in Boats, becauſe indeed there was none upon the River which was not navigable by Reaſon of the ſwiftneſs of its current; neither was it full of Fiſh, which cauſed few Fiſhers Boats to be upon it. Thus not knowing what courſe to take, the Sight of this Coach which ſtill went further and further from them, did drive the Souls of theſe two Princes into a great and horrid Purgatory. The breach in the Bridg was ſo broad, that only long Planks would be ſerviceable, if they had them. Thus being at their Wits end, and not knowing what to do, they looked upon the Coach, which ſtill was more remote, until the Sun being ſet, and it entred into a Wood of Cedars, upon a Hill beyond the Meadow, they loſt the ſight of it, and almoſt their Lives; ſince all Hopes of relieving Mandana was loſt. For when they conſidered how near they were their Princeſs, and were not able to get any nearer, but were ſtill at a more dire diſtance, their Sorrows were inſupportable, though they teſtified not any viſible Signs of it: But though both of them were in one and the ſame miſerable Condition, yet had they not the Conſolation to condole together, but contrarily, the ſympathy of their Sorrows did more ſeparate them, and make their Miſeries more violent; and had they not both been as highly generous, as they were highly perplexed, it had been abſolutely impoſſible for them to tranſact together as they did; yet notwithſtanding, Cyrus was much more ſad than the King of Aſſyria, who having ſome confidence in the Oracle which he received at Babylon, did never deſpair of his Happineſs: But Cyrus, who had no ſuch Cordial in his Miſeries, was all Fears, and no Hopes. The Prince Tigranes, and the Prince Phaartes, with all the reſt of Quality in the Army, did uſe their beſt Endeavours to chear them up, eſpecially Cyrus, who had the affectionate Hearts of all the World; but yet alas, all was to no purpoſe: Since theſe Princes conceived, that thoſe Troops which had left the King of Pontus on that ſide of the River, might chance not to be far off, therefore they ſtill ſtood upon their Guard, and marched in good Order, unto this Bridg over which only they could paſs the River. In the mean time, Love which prompts all Lovers unto heroick Actions, moved Cyrus, and the King of Aſſyria, (who could not endure ſo ſlow a March as the Body of their Troops was to keep) to take an hundred Horſe only, and went before; commanding the reſt to keep the

Bridg, leſt Abradates, hearing they were following after Mandana, ſhould ſeize upon it. All the reſt of the Princes did follow in this Adventure, and made as much haſte, as poſſibly they could unto the Paſs over the River: They were forced to reſt their Horſes for an hour or two; and then continued their March until the Morning, at the break of Day, they paſſed over this River; and then hoped nothing could ſtop them from overtaking Mandana. Cyrus thought it convenient to ſend Feraulas unto Tarſis, to the Prince of Cilicia, and to acquaint him with the Buſineſs, beſeeching him to ſend unto all the Ports in his Countrey, that no Strangers might be ſuffered to imbarque; after which he continued his purſuit, and took that Rode which he imagined the King of Pontus to have taken. But ſince Night approached, they took up their Quarters at the firſt Village, and there reſted themſelves till break of Day: Then they ſounded to Horſe, and marched not only till Night, but until the next Day at Noon, without any intelligence of what they were in queſt after. Since Cilicia in that part was not large, they were near the Sea, when they ſaw two Horſemen coming towards them, who being far off were unknown; but drawing nearer, Cyrus knew the Horſe of Feraulas, ſo that not ſpeaking a word unto the King of Aſſyria, who followed immediately after, and prompted by his Paſſion, he ſpurred on towards him, and upon a ſudden ſtood amazed to ſee that the other who came with him, was Ortalques, the ſame Man who had Orders to convoy Marteſia, and had been ſo long before he returned; ſince he imagined that Ortalques could tell him no News but only of Marteſia, but thought Feraulas might happily hear ſomething concerning Mandana; though he had an high eſteem of wiſe Marteſia, yet at the firſt he did not enquire of her, but looking upon Feraulus, as if he could divine his News; Well, Feraulas, ſaid he, do you know yet where the Princeſs Mandana is? and will the Prince of Cilicia do as I deſire him? Sir, replied he, I am even deſperate in being forced to tell you, that for all my haſte I could poſſibly make, I came four Hours too late with Orders from the Prince of Cilicia to the Port where the King of Pontus, and the Princeſs Mandana are imbarqued. How, Feraulas, replied Cyrus, is not Mandana in Cicily? No, Sir, anſwered he, ſhe took Ship yeſterday about Noon: The Reaſon of this Misfortune was, ſaid he, becauſe the Prince of Cilicia was in hunting when I came to Tarſis, ſo that I was forced to go after him, which took me up much time, for he was far off: As ſoon as I met with him, and told him the Place where you ſaw the Coach, in which the Princeſs was, he did infallibly conclude that the King of Pontus would imbarque at a Port unto which he immediately ſent me, with the Captain of his Guard, and with Orders to the Magiſtrates of the Town, to ſtop all Strangers which would put to Sea, diſpatching alſo many others into divers other Places with the ſame Commands: What ſhould I ſay more, Sir, I came unfortunately four Hours too late, but by good Fortune I met with Ortalques, who had Orders to come unto you from the Princeſs Mandana. From the Princeſs Mandana, replied Cyrus, how is it poſſible he ſhould know any thing? Sir, replied Ortalques, doubtleſs you will wonder when I ſhall tell you, that having had the Honour of your Commands, to convoy thoſe Ladies which went with Marteſia from Sinope, I ſafely conducted them to the ſide of the River Halis, where having a Deſire to reſt themſelves, and to take the Pleaſure of the Water, they took Boat, ſending their Coach another way unto a Place where it ſhould meet them; and commanding me to come alſo into the Boat; my 200 Horſe was conducted by my Lieutenant along the River ſide. After we had been upon the Water half a Day, the Lady who was Couſin unto Marteſia fell ſick, and ſo extreamly, that we were conſtrained to ſtay at a Caſtle which was built upon the Banks of that River; being come unto that Place, where there was no Town within twenty Furlongs, I deſired to ſpeak with the Commander in chief, but ſince he ſaw Souldiers, he was very unwilling to conſent unto what I deſired of him: He asked from whence I came? whither I went? what I was? and who thoſe Ladies were? But ſince we were in Paphlagonia, where I knew there were Diviſions among the People, I diſſembled the

the Names of the Ladies, and my own alſo, telling him only, that I was a Kinſman of theirs, and had no other Deſign but to conduct them. He was yet very hard to be perſwaded unto my Deſires; but at laſt, telling me that he never uſed to entertain any in his Caſtle but Ladies; and becauſe it was too much Inhumanity, not to aſſiſt a ſick Lady, if without any Danger he could do it, he conſented to receive her in, and at the Requeſt of his Wife, who ſeemed to be a Woman of good Parts, to aſſiſt her. Then I went back to Marteſia, and cauſing her Couſin to be brought in a Chair which the Captain ſent us, I conducted theſe Ladies to the Gates, and afterwards I went to give Orders for the quartering of my Men at the next Town: yet the next Day the Captain of the Caſtle invited me to lodg with him, but I refuſed; contenting my ſelf with Admiſſion into the Caſtle, to viſit Marteſia, and her Couſin, who found very good Helps from a Chirurgion, and Phyſician, which were there, and who would not go away from thence a long time, as I was told at my Lodging. Since Marteſia was moſt admirable Amiable, ſhe had already got the Love of the Captain's Wife; ſo that diſcourſing one Day together, ſhe told her, that they were very happy whenſoever they found any Occaſion to aſſiſt ſick Ladies: and ſince Marteſia knew that her dear Miſtreſs paſſed up this River; ſhe asked her if ſhe had never any Occaſions to aſſiſt Ladies, till now? She anſwered her, that about three Months ſince, there was one of the faireſt Ladies that ever breathed upon Earth, fell ſick, and was in that Caſtle: but preſently recovering, ſhe ſtayed not in it. Marteſia being now more inquiſitive then before, asked her Name, her Quality, and where ſhe was? but ſhe anſwered, that ſhe neither knew her Name, nor Quality: but yet to tell her truly, ſhe was yet in the Caſtle; yet if her Husband knew that ſhe had diſcovered it unto her, he would be extreamly angry: ſhe told her farther, that the Reaſon why they were ſo nice to let them enter, was becauſe this Lady was here: yet ſhe was lodged in a Chamber of the Caſtle far off this ſhe was in, and where none entered but the Men which waited upon her, and a Woman which ſhe brought with her, who never left her: That there was alſo a very handſom Man, who was even at Deaths Door with Grief, whilſt this fair one was ſick: Then did Marteſia deſire her to deſcribe the Beauty of this Lady, and the Stature of the Man ſhe ſpake of, and by the Anſwer of this Woman, ſhe certainly concluded, that the Princeſs Mandana, and the King of Pontus were in the Caſtle. As ſhe was leaning againſt a Window which looked towards the River, ſhe ſpied a great Boat, ſo like that in which ſhe had been with the Princeſs Mandana, as ſhe asked the Captain's Wife, whether that was not the Boat in which the ſick Lady came? and ſhe anſwered, Yes. Then was Marteſia fully ſatisfied concerning the Truth of Mandana's being here. She diſſembled her Joy until ſhe ſpoke with me, which the ſame Day ſhe did: It was reſolved then betwixt us, ſo to gain the Favour of this Captain's Wife by Preſents and good Language, that ſhe might let us ſee this ſick Lady: and ſince ſhe was but very young, ſhe was eaſily perſwaded by ſuch Allurements. To be ſhort, Sir, Marteſia tampered with her ſo handſomly, that the next Morning this Woman, unknown to her Husband, carried her by a back Stair into a Chamber juſt oppoſite to the Chamber of this unknown Beauty, and the Windows being open, ſhe ſaw the Princeſs Mandana, and Arianita, leaning againſt the Window, and talking together very melancholy. Ah Ortalques! cryed Cyrus out, and interrupted him; why did you not releaſe the Princeſs? Have but a little Patience, Sir, replied he, and you ſhall know the Reaſon. Marteſia then knowing the Princeſs, and being extreamly ſurprized without any further reaſoning upon the matter, ſhe thruſt her ſelf half out of the Window, and made ſo great a Noiſe, that the Princeſs turning her Head, and looking that way, did preſently know her, and was no leſs ſurprized at the Sight, then Marteſia was at hers. This Encounter was ſo full of Aſtoniſhment, that it was impoſſible but it ſhould attract Obſervance; but as good luck was, the King of Pontus was not then in the Chamber with the Princeſs, and the Captain of the Caſtles Wife was the only Witneſs of this pleaſant Surprize in both theſe Ladies: But yet ſhe was ſo aſtoniſhed at it, that ſhe would not ſuffer Marteſia to enjoy the Pleaſure any longer: then Arianita hearing the Door of the Princeſs Chamber to open, made a Sign unto Marteſia to retire her ſelf: At laſt, Sir, when we ſaw Mandana was in the Caſtle, I deſired Permittance from Marteſia to deliver her by Force: yet ſhe would try firſt whether or no ſhe could ſpeak with the Princeſs, but all was in vain; for the Captain's Wiſe had no Credit at all with them who were Mandana's Guard. Then we being reſolved to hazard all for the Princeſs's Delivery, I found means to get Ladders, I cauſed our Boat to be ready; and by a place of the Wall which was poſſible to be ſcaled, I deſigned to attempt it the Night following. But as ill luck was, the King of Pontus, while the Princeſs ſtayed in that Place ſick, had ſent unto Abradates to deſire a Retreat in his Court, and alſo a Convoy unto Matenes, which the River Halis ſeparates from him; as ill luck was, I ſay, there came four hundred Horſe from Suſiana, to guard the Princeſs: ſo that the King of Pontus no ſooner ſaw them, but he reſolved to depart the very next Day, which being known unto Marteſia, ſhe acquainted me with it: And notwithſtanding the Inequality of the Number, I reſolved to fall upon the King of Pontus in his March, there being no Poſſibility of forcing the Caſtle, ſince ſo many were in it. However, Marteſia, who was reſolved to follow her dear Miſtreſs, though ſhe could not deliver her, went confidently by the ſame back Stairs unto the Chamber of the Princeſs, and called Arianita as loud as ſhe could, and told her that if her Miſtreſs would not obtain Permiſſion that ſhe might ſpeak with her, ſhe ſhall be abſolutely deſperate. Arianita made Signs unto her to be patient, and afterwards we came to know, that juſt at the ſame time when Marteſia was ſpeaking unto her, the Princeſs was telling the King of Pontus that ſhe was here, and that abſolutely ſhe would have her with her, which the King conſented unto, not knowing that I came from you, but ſuppoſing rather that ſome odd Diſaſter or other had ſtayed her about this River, as Sickneſs did the Princeſs. At length, Sir, Marteſia and her Couſin, who was much minded, and all the reſt of the Women went unto the Princeſs, who received them with Abundance of Joy. In the mean time, it was reſolved, Sir, we muſt depart from thence, and to take Boat until they came to Mantiana, where Coaches would meet them. But to be ſhort, Sir, upon the next Morning I fell upon the King of Pontus his Convoy, and ſince the Number was ſo much unequal, all my Company almoſt periſhed, and I my ſelf wounded in four Places, not being able to hinder the King of Pontus from carrying away the Princeſs, who however had this Conſolation added, that ſhe had Marteſia with her: But as for Marteſia's Couſin, ſince ſhe was married, ſhe obtained ſo much Favour from the King of Pontus, as to ſend her back unto the Place where her Coach waited for her, and he deſired the Captain of the Caſtle to be her Convoy. For my part, though I was much wounded, yet I followed after ſome Horſemen with my Sword drawn, but there came two with Orders from the Princeſs, that they ſhould not kill me, but to carry me unto the Caſtle, with Deſire unto the Captain to uſe me well, and have a Care of me, which indeed moſt civilly he did: Whilſt I was with him, I underſtood that he was born a Subject of the King of Pontus, and as Fortune would have it, was married in that Country, and at laſt was made Governour of that Caſtle, which was ſcituated in Paphlagonia, where the King of Pontus was forced to ſtay that very Morning, when Marteſia and Orſanus were left upon the River-banks; and the Princeſs was ſo exceedingly grieved at it, that thereupon ſhe fell extreamly ſick: However, Sir, as ſoon as I was well recovered, I went unto Suſa; where the Captain, whoſe intimate Friendſhip I had obtained whilſt I ſtayed with him, told me I ſhould certainly find the Princeſs; therefore I went, and indeed found her there accordingly: And ſince the Princeſs had ſo abſolute a Command over the King of Pontus, as, excepting her Liberty, he could deny her nothing, I was ſuffered to be with her, becauſe he thought I was her Servant before, and knew not that I belonged to you. In a few Days after, I underſtood that Creſus King of Lydia, had ſent unto Abradates, and that ſome great Deſign was in hand. Mean while, the King of Pontus fearing, that if you, whom he heard was in Armenia, ſhould underſtand that he was at Suſa, you would draw that way; and ſince Abradates was not able to reſiſt you, therefore he deſigned to depart; and Abradates would not let him go alone. The Queen Panthea alſo, was ſo great a Lover of Mandana, and having a Deſign to viſit the famous Temple of Diana, which is in the Matenes Country, would conduct her as far as the Frontiers of Cilicia, intending to perform her Devotions at her Return. But when they came unto the River, near which ſhe was taken, as well for the Conveniency of their March, as for the more Security of the King of Pontus; They ſeparated themſelves, the King of Pontus conducting Mandana, on that ſide the River furtheſt from Armenia, and Abradates on the other, with the Queen of Suſania, who contimued their March until ſhe was taken by your Troops, for it was the ſtraight way unto that Place where ſhe intended to go. As for us, we marched in ſuch great haſte, that you hardly would have had a Sight of us, as it ſeems you had, from the other ſide of the Water, if Abradates after his Fight and Defeat, had not overtaken us, only with fifteen or twenty of his Men: This Fight did exceedingly perplex the King of Pontus, for he knew that Abradates had been ſet upon, and was beaten, but when he underſtood Panthea was taken Priſoner, his Sorrows then were in the higheſt Extream. I then was behind thoſe Princes, ſo that ſince both of them were in the Depth of Sorrows, they took no notice of me; I heard the King of Suſa ſay unto the King of Pontus, that if he would let him have his Troops, he would go after the Raviſhers of Panthea. Since the King of Pontus had only a thouſand Horſes, and Abradates, of his thouſand, only fifteen or twenty left; he told Abradates, that if he ſhould do ſo, he ſhould expoſe Mandana, and himſelf in vain, to aſſault all your Cavalry with ſo few Men: Moreover, ſaid he unto him, never fear the Queen your Wife, for Cyrus is the moſt generous Prince in the World, and ſince we have the Princeſs Mandana, he will never treat Panthea ill. Therefore, ſaid he unto him, let me go unto the Bridg, which as ſoon as I am over, I will break down, and return unto you to perform your Promiſe unto Cræſus, and wait for the Liberty of Panthea, by the ſame way which ſhall give it unto all Aſia. At the laſt, Sir, after much other Diſcourſe, whereby one might perceive much Incertainty in their Spirits, we came unto the Bridg, where Abradates left this Prince, and bad adieu unto Mandana, who when ſhe knew of Panthea's being taken, did aſſure him, that if ſhe were in your Hands, ſhe were ſafe, conjuring him to move the King of Pontus to reſtore her unto Ciaxares, upon Condition that he ſhould reſtore Panthea unto him. Abradates was ſo full of Sorrow, that he did not well underſtand this Propoſition: ſo that the King of Pontus fearing ſhe ſhould repeat it again, and that Abradates would make ſome Reflection upon it, commanded the Coach to drive on, he taking his fifty Horſes only. When we were over the Bridg, the Men of Abradates on his Side, and we on ours, broke down the Bridg, and went our ways, that is to ſay, Abradates towards Suſa over the Mountains, and the King of Pontus towards the Cilician Sea. But when the Princeſs Mandana, near whoſe Coach I was, diſcovered all your Cavalry, on the other ſide of the River, whilſt we were in the great Meadow, I never ſaw any in my Life ſeem more ſad then ſhe: ſhe looked after you, Sir, as long as ever ſhe could ſee you; for ſhe imagined that you were there in Perſon, and when we were far entered into the Wood, yet ſhe looked ſtill, in hopes of a Glimpſe; at length, Sir, we came to the Port, where the King of Pontus would needs imbarque in all haſte: he found a Ship ready to put out for Epheſus, wherein he was received, he imbarqued the next Day about Noon, which was yeſterday. About two Hours before their Departure, Marteſia called me aſide, and did bid me make an Eſcape away, and give you this Letter, which I was coming to bring you when I met with Feraulas, who was coming out of the Town when I came: In ſaying ſo, he preſented a Letter from the Princeſs Mandana unto Cyrus, who received it with as much Joy, as the King of Aſſyria ſaw it with Sorrow: But not being able to defer any longer the Reading of it, and it pleaſing him to open it before his Rival, he broke open the Seal, and read theſe Words.

The Princeſs Mandana unto Cyrus.

Since I cannot tell whether or no, the King my Father be in your Army, and do not doubt but you are; therefore I addreſs my Letter unto you, deſiring you to let the Queen of Suſiana be well uſed; for it was by her I knew that it was permitted the Illuſtrious Artamenes to be Cyrus: and her Cares have been ſo great to ſweeten my Captivity, that I am obliged to render hers leſs rigorous, as poſſibly I can. I need not tell you, that I am the moſt unfortunate Perſon in the World; for you cannot be ignorant of it. But to acknowledg, in my beſt Expreſſions, your high Generoſity, in expoſing all the Days of your Life for my Liberty: Let me ſincerely tell you, that I am as zealous a Wiſher of the Continuance of your Glory and good Fortune, as I am of a Period unto the Misfortunes of

The Princeſs added this Poſtſcript.

Since I ſent you falſe Intelligence that we were going into Armenia, therefore I dare hardly tell you now, that I think they will carry me to Epheſus.

When Cyrus had read this Letter, he could not chuſe but look upon the King of Aſſyria, whoſe Eyes alſo were fixed upon him, but with ſuch Melancholy, and ſo many Signs of Sorrow, that the Joys of Cyrus were much augmented by it: yet to keep within the Limits of their Conditions, not to make a Secret of any thing which related unto the Intereſt of Mandana, Cyrus did read aloud this Letter from the Princeſs, which was no ſmall Additament of Sorrow unto the King of Aſſyria: for though this Letter was no more than a Letter of Civility, yet it contained in it ſuch civil Expreſſions, eſpecially towards the latter end, that he had much ado to forbear extravagant and violent Teſtimonies of Jealouſie and Deſpair, he changed Colour twenty times; the Actions of his Head and Hands did ſpeak his diſtempered Mind: then lifting up his Eyes to Heaven, and afterwards fixing them on the Eyes of Cyrus: Come, too happy Rival, (ſaid he, and ſighed) let us go unto Artaxates, that we may the ſooner go for Lydia, and there ſee what the Gods have ordained our Deſtinies to be. After this, the King of Aſſyria went firſt, and not ſtaying till Cyrus anſwered, he fell into ſuch a profound penſive Study, that it was eaſie to perceive, his Mind was in extream Torment. In the mean time, Cyrus, who would not loſe a Minute of time, nor go unto Tarſus himſelf, ſent one of his Servants to thank the Prince of Cilicia, who was then preparing to receive him; and going the ſame way he came, they joyned with thoſe Men whom he left to guard the Bridg, and went to overtake Panthea, at a Caſtle which was upon the Frontiers of Armenia, where Araſpes was Governour. Since ſhe was recommended unto Cyrus by very good Hands, he no ſooner ſaw Araſpes, but he appointed him to wait upon her with all due Reſpects, fitting her Quality: And tho he reſolved not to ſee her ſince Mandana was not delivered, and ſince it was ſhe only, and not Panthea, was a Priſoner, yet he changed his Reſolution, and would give her a Viſit: 'Tis very true, he carried it ſomething cloſely, becauſe he deſired the King of Aſſyria might not be there, and that he might with more Freedom ſpeak concerning his dear Princeſs: ſo that as ſoon as he was within the Caſtle, he went unto the Chamber of Araſpes, and pretending ſome Buſineſs with him, they two were alone together: Since it was near the Queen of Suſiana's Chamber, he went thither unſeen, Araſpes and Feraulas only following him. This was it which made all the People ſay, that Cyrus was ſo faithful unto Mandana, that he would not look upon this Queen, becauſe ſhe was the moſt charming Beauty upon Earth. Yet it is moſt certain he ſaw her, but he ſaw her only for the Love of Mandana: he ſent for Permiſſion to wait upon her, and this fair and wiſe Princeſs received him with all Civility, and without any Symptoms of any Puſilanimity. Sir, (ſaid ſhe unto him) The Princeſs Mandana had good reaſon to tell me, that you of all the Princes in the World knew how to uſe a Victory, ſince though I am a Captive, yet you are pleaſed to honour me with a Viſit, and to aſſure me of the Life and Health of the King my Lord and Husband. I would not have you think your ſelf, Madam, ſaid he unto her, at all Obliged for ſo Poor and Inconſiderable a Service: but I beſeech you, take the Pains to read this Letter, (ſhewing her Mandana's Letter to him) and by it you may ſee, there are no Services which I do not intend to do you: for ſince the Princeſs Mandana hath written unto me, I am not Maſter of my own Will, but Subject wholly unto hers. I wiſh, Sir, replied Panthea, that I could handſomly divide my Gratitude between you both; for you both have highly obliged me.

After this, Cyrus enquired concerning the Health and Welfare of his dear Princeſs: And after he had deſired her Pardon, for taking ſo much liberty to himſelf, he conjured her to tell him how the King of Pontus uſed her. Sir, replied Panthea, for the ſatisfaction of your Mind, let me tell you, That the King of Pontus is ſo abſolute a Slave unto the Princeſs Mandana, that it is a great wonder he can retain her as he doth; for, excepting her Liberty, there is nothing which ſhe may not abſolutely command: ſo that I can aſſure you, he gives her no cauſe of any complaint, but ononly that with her he will not part: For my part, I have uſed my beſt Arguments to move him to it; but his Anſwers always were, that he could not; and though he never received other ſatisfaction, than to prevent all Rivals from enjoying her, he would wander about the World, until he found a ſafe place of Retreat, and ſome potent Protector who was able to defend him. O Madam, (cryed Cyrus out) certainly the Gods will never protect the Raviſher of ſo Divine and Innocent a Princeſs. The Truth is, replied Panthea, we are but deſervedly puniſhed for affording him any Protection. Cyrus then ſeemed more civil unto her than before, and told her, that if he did not depend upon the Power of Ciaxares, he would immediately let her have her Liberty. But ſince the Princeſs Mandana is concerned, and ſince the King her Husband had entred into League with her Raviſher, he muſt needs acquaint Ciaxares with it before he releaſed her: yet in the mean time he aſſured her, ſhe ſhould find all due Obſervances rendred unto her. Panthea returned moſt kind Thanks, and both parted well ſatisfied one with another. And indeed, it is no Wonder, that two ſo highly Accompliſhed, ſhould have ſo much eſteem for one another: for as Cyrus was in all things tranſcendent, ſo Panthea was a moſt admirable Princeſs, her Beauty was infinitely taking; it did much ſurprize the Eyes, and inſpire Love; ſhe was of ſo ſweet a Majeſty, and ſo charming a Modeſty, that whoſoever ſaw her, muſt needs intereſt themſelves in her Misfortunes. In the mean while Cyrus commanded Araſpes to conduct her unto Artaxates, leaving him five hundred Horſe for that purpoſe. After which, taking Horſe with the King of Aſſyria, they made ſuch haſte, that in three days they came to Ciaxares; unto whom Cyrus did render an account of his Voyage. From thence he went to wait upon the Princeſs Ariminta, where Phaartes already was. Cyrus did ask the Princes pardon for departing from her without bidding her adieu; aſſuring her, that for her ſake, he deſigned nothing but to deliver the Princeſs, and not to Ruin the King her Brother: and ſhe told him her Fears of receiving ſome ſad Conſequents of his Enterpriſe. As Cyrus was with this Princeſs,news was brought him, that a Poſt came from Ecbatan which moved Ciaxares to go thither. There came alſo another the ſame Day from Ariobantes, who ſent him word, how he received Intelligence, that Craeſus ſent to Conſult with ſeveral Oracles: and imployed in one and the ſame day Men of much Ingenuity and Honeſty, to go unto Delphos, to Dodona, to the Temple of Amphiaurus, to Antredes Triphonius, to Brachides, which is upon the Frontiers of the Mileſians; and into Africa, to the Temple of Jupiter Ammon; to the end he might either be confirmed, or diſſwaded from his Intended deſign: Mean while he raiſed a puiſſant Army, and ſolicited his Allies to arm with him. This being the ſtate of things, it was reſolved, that in Conſideration Ciaxares had not his health very well, he ſhould return unto Ecbatan, and pacify all troubles there: and that Cyrus with all his Army ſhould march towards Lydia; as well to procure the Liberty of Mandana, who was carried unto Epheſus, which Cræſus had conquered, as alſo to oppoſe the deſigns of that Prince: Thus both Ambition and Love, being the legs of Cyrus, he went with as much zeal as thoſe two violent Paſſions could inſpire into a moſt Heroick and amorous Soul. It was alſo reſolved upon, that to keep Abradates within the Compaſs of Reaſon, Panthea muſt be retained, and conducted into Cappadocia, towards the Frontiers of Lydia: for certain Intelligence was received, that this Prince had entred into League with Cræſus, which did very ſtrongly confirm what Ortalques had related. Since the Princeſs Ariminta had no Deſires to remain in Armenia, becauſe of the Prince Phaartes; and ſince moreover, Cyrus had ſome Hopes in her Solicitations with the King her Brother, he was very glad ſhe reſolved to go with the Queen of Panthea; who arrived at Artaxates as theſe Reſolutions were fixed upon, and who was, according to the Deſire of Mandana, treated with all poſſible Honours. And to that end Araſpes received new Orders from Cyrus, to have an extraordinary Care of her: This Prince telling him with a ſmile, which in ſpight of his Melancholy did appear in his Eyes, that he could not more ſafely truſt the faireſt Queen in the World with any, better then with the moſt inſenſible Man upon Earth. The great Separation was within two or three days after; for from that Day Ciaxares prepared to return unto Ecbatan, with two thouſand Men, amongſt which was Megabiſes: Cyrus alſo, accompanied with the King of Aſſyria, the King of Phrygia, the King of Hircania, and all the reſt of the Princes which were in the Army, began to diſencamp, and march towards Lydia, after he had ſubjected a Kingdom unto Ciaxares. The Prince Tigranes out of his Affection to Cyrus, and in gratitude for his ſo generous leaving the Crown unto the King his Father, would needs follow him in this War. Phaartes alſo prompted both by his Generoſity, and alſo his Love to Ariminta, would by no means ſtay behind: ſo that the Providence of that Princeſs was ineffectual. However, to convey the Queen of Suſiana, and the Princeſs of Pontus, more conveniently; Araſpes with five hundred Horſe did begin his journey the Day before the Army: which was the Reaſon why the Meſſenger whom Abradates ſent, found not the Queen his wife at Artaxates, who was come thither to demand her:

but he was anſwered, That a Prince who was allied unto the King of Medes, and who protected the Raviſher of the Princeſs Mandana, could not obtain any thing from thence. Before departure, Cyrus went to bid adieu to the Queen of Armenia, and to condole with the Princeſs Oneſila, in parting from her dear Tigranes. After this, having a thouſand Benedictions from the King of Armenia, and ten thouſand Applauds from the People Artaxates, he went to wait upon Ciaxares ſome thirty Furlongs on his Way. This Separation, was on every ſide moſt tender: Ciaxares ſpoke unto him concerning the Princeſs Mandana, in ſuch Terms, as might let him know, that Cyrus had as great a Share in her as himſelf: and he conferred ſuch an Abſolute Power upon him, throughout all his Empire, that it could not be greater after his Death. The King of Armenia did willingly pay the Tribute which was due, and offered four times more to defray the Charges of this War: but Cyrus refuſed it, contenting himſelf with that only which was due. Mean while, the Remembrance of Mandana was his, and the King of Aſſyria's only thoughts, during the March, and when they were forced to be together, they were always Melancholy, wiſhing they were in Private, and had the Liberty to think of their divine Princeſs without Interruption. They underſtood at their Arrival in Cappadocia, that the Prince Thraſibulus, and Harpagus, ſtaid not there: but Ariobantes adding only thoſe Forces which he then had, unto thoſe which formerly were given him, he departed in all haſte towards the lower Aſia; Love and Ambition not permitting him to ſtay for any new Levies.

Since Cyrus had nothing but Mandana in his Mind, and ſince ſhe had written unto him ſhe was going to Epheſus; to clear himſelf of all Doubts, he reſolved to ſend Feraulus thither Diſguiſed, knowing he could not make choice of a Man more Ingenious, more Diſcreet, or fuller of Affection to that Imployment than he; and eſpecially ſince his Dear Marteſia was with Mandana, it was a double Obligation upon him to endeavour the Liberty of that Princeſs. He accepted of that Commiſſion with much Joy; and whilſt Cyrus ſtaid in Cappadocia a while, to refreſh his Troops, and to be better informed of the Deſigns of Crœſus, he went towards Epheſus with one Servant only. The King of Aſſyria alſo ſent thither a very faithful and knowing Man for the ſame purpoſe. Mean while Cyrus received intelligence from all parts, of great Warlike Preparations which were made at Sardis: But notwithſtanding all their Intelligence, and all their ſending, not a word was ſpoken concerning Mandana, neither any certainty what Crœſus intended. Whilſt he was in this dubious ſuſpence, ſome told him, that the King of Phrygia was earneſtly enquiring for him, becauſe there arrived that morning three Strangers unto his Tent, who brought him ſome News of great Conſequence, at leaſt as they imagined, by his Geſture, and manner of Speech: Preſently after that Prince came in, and as one whoſe Mind was full of great Concernments, Sir, ſaid he unto Cyrus, It is fit and juſt I ſpeak concerning your Intereſts, before my own, and that I tell you, I have brought hither a Man who ſaw the Princeſs Mandana land at Epheſus, and who can aſſure you, ſhe is ſafely paſſed over all Dangers at Sea. Cyrus tranſported with Joy to hear the Name of Mandana, and to hear certainly where ſhe was, asked the King of Aſſyria, where he was who brought the News? And that Prince cauſing him to come near, (for he brought him with him) he preſented him unto Cyrus, who received him with ſuch a Sweetneſs, as did not only ſignify his Love to Mandana, but his own natural Civility to the Man. This Man who was a Grecian, and named Soſicles, being a Man of good Quality, and Wit, anſwered Cyrus very reſpectfully, and made an exact Relation of all he knew: he told him that as he was at Epheſus, he ſaw a Cilician Ship come in: That the King of Pontus was in it; that he ſaw him land, and lead the Princeſs Mandana aſhore alſo; whom the Governour of Epheſus did lodg very Magnificently: he told him further, that this Princeſs going unto the Temple of Diana, to perform her Devotions there, had placed her ſelf amongſt the profeſſed Nuns which dwelt there: that the King of Pontus knowing of it, uſed all Endeavours to get her out from thence; but the People were ſo much incenſed at it, that they would not ſuffer him: ſo that he was forced to be contented with the Favour of the Governour in placing very ſtrong and ſtrict Guards at all the Ports of the Town, and round about the Temple, until ſuch time as Orders was received from Cræſus, unto whom he had already ſent: and that this was the Condition of things when he came from Epheſus. Cyrus asked Soſicles a hundred more Queſtions: after which, thanking him for the Pains he took, he fell into Private Diſcourſe with the King of Phrygia; rejoicing that Feraulas would perhaps ſend him ſome happy News, ſince he was certain to find the Princeſs there. Since ſhe was in a Maritine place, Cyrus durſt not look with his Army that way, remembring the Accident at Sinope, but thought it much better to ſtay until ſhe was at Sardis, there being great probability they would carry her thithrr; yet notwithſtanding, his extream impatience to be nearer her, did almoſt make him alter his Reſolution, and to march that very hour. But the King of Aſſyria told him ſomething which induced him to have three or four days patience: and indeed they two ſpeaking low together, it appeared by the Countenance of Cyrus, that this Prince told him ſomething which did extreamly Surprize him, and did infuſe at the ſame time both Joy and Hope. The King of Aſſyria coming in, Cyrus out of his natural Generoſity to keep all his Promiſes, told him all he knew concerning the Princeſs Mandana, and moſt faithfully acquainted him with the State of things: The King of Aſſyria was wrapt into as high an extaſy of Joy as he. But to do the King of Phrygia right, and to wait upon that Intelligence which he was to receive from him, before any thing was attempted, Cyrus told that Prince, he deſired to know more of that Accident which befel him, and which he would not tell of before; and that it was not juſt he ſhould hearken only unto things which related unto himſelf in particular, but alſo thoſe with reference unto him. The King of Phrygia told him, that Soſicles ſhould ſatisfy him therein when he pleaſed, and make him underſtand the cauſe of that Enterprize, the Effects whereof he muſt wait upon. e to Cyrus, to acquaint him, that the Queen of Su-

well underſtand the Intereſts of all thoſe who

The Hiſtory of the Princeſs Palmis, and Cleander.

PErhaps you will wonder, Madam, that a Grecian ſhould preciſely know all the Intereſts of the Lydian Court: But when I ſhall have told you, that I was brought thither at ten years of Age, and had the Honour to be educated in the Houſe of Cræſus, amongſt the Princes his Children, your wonder will vaniſh, and I become more credible. But for the better underſtanding of what I ſhall relate, I muſt acquaint you, that my Father by Nation, was of the Iſle of Delphos, ſo famous for the renowned Temple of Apollo, though his Predeceſſors were originally of Sardis, and one of the chiefeſt Families in the Town: But the Mutability of Fate beſtowing upon them a conſiderable ſubſiſtence at Delphos, they have reſided there ever ſince; and my Father lived there in a flouriſhing Quality, when a deſire to ſee the Country of his Anceſtors, moved him to go unto Sardis. Doubtleſs you will think it ſtrange, I ſhould uſher in my Relation of the Adventures of a great Princeſs, which things yet ſeem impertinent: But yet I muſt tell you, that if my Father had not gone to Sardis, nothing of what I ſhall tell, had ever come to paſs; therefore there is an abſolute neceſſity of knowing what I ſhal relate: One Morning then when he was at Delphos, walking by the Sea ſide, upon a Tarraſs in his Garden behind his Houſe; and delighting to look upon all thoſe Iſlands which inviron that of Delphos, and which by reaſon of their Scituation, are called the Iſles of Cyclades: he diſcovered a Barque, which floated gently upon the Waves, wherein appeared none but a Women, who endeavoured to guide it, but could not; for my Father perceived that this Barque went one way, and ſhe did ſtrive with all her Power to make it go the other: Both Curioſity and Compaſſion moving him to ſee a Woman ſo extreamly puzzled, he got ſome Mariners who were near that place in a Boat, to go and ſee who it was; which they did, and indeed found none in it but that Woman which my Father ſaw; and at her Feet, in a Cloth of Gold Mantle, a moſt admirable fair Child about three years of Age, who without any cares for its lamentable Condition of Fortune, ſmiled upon the Mariners, as ſoon as they came near it. The extraordinary Beauty of this Child, and its moſt pleaſing Features, moved thoſe dull Sots to conduct that Bark whither ſhe who was in it did deſire ; and looking upon the Woman who held the Rudder, they asked her from whence ſhe came, and whither ſhe would go ? but they were much amazed to find that ſhe was dumb, and could do nothing but ſhew them Delphos with her Hand ; as who ſhould ſay, there it is, I deſire to be carried. Since it was my Father who ſent them out, in lieu of going to the Port, they came to the Foot of the Tarraſs, where he was walking, and where there were Stairs, by which one might go into the Sea : This Woman who was very old, was at the firſt much troubled to ſee they did not carry her unto the place where ſhe deſired, but coming nearer, and ſeeing by my Father's Garb, how he was not like one that would wrong the Child, ſhe was well ſatisfied, and made an hundred Signs of God knows what, ſeeming as if ſhe had much to ſay ; ſometimes ſhe ſhewed the Child ; ſometimes did lift up her Hands and Eyes to Heaven, and neither being underſtood, nor underſtanding what was ſaid unto her, ſhe moved extream Compaſſion ; ſhe ſhewed unto my Father a Paper, in which was written in Greek, in a very bad Character, and no better Orthography,

This Child is recommended unto that God, which is adored at Delphos.

My Father ſeeing the Child ſo fair, ſo amiable, and young ; and ſeeing alſo the Woman ſo ſad, and ſeeming without any other Deſign, but to leave it unto the Providence of the Gods ; and ſeeing ſhe had no ſubſiſtence for this Child, and her ſelf, he reſolved to pity and take care of both. This Mute alſo ſhewed him a Picture of one moſt admirably fair ; dreſſed, as Venus is uſed to be, ſometimes lying upon a Bed of Roſes, with this difference yet, that ſhe was covered with a glorious Mantle, and ſhewed no lower than her Breſts naked; cloſe by her was Cupid preſented with his Quiver and Arrows; under all were theſe two Verſes written,

The Mothers Eyes does deeper wound all Hearts,
Then Cupid can with all his Bows and Darts.

This dumb Woman, ſhewing this Picture to my Father, made Signs for him to keep it carefully; yet he no ſooner viewed it, but he obſerved that the Cupid the repreſented, was the Picture of the Child which was in the Boat; ſo that when he had read the Inſcription, he concluded the Venus there pictured was the Mother of it; and that the Picture was not a meer Phantaſm; ſo that conceiving ſomething extraordinary in the Adventure, and Compaſſion alſo tender in his Heart, he made Signs unto the Woman, that if ſhe would dwell in the Houſe with this Child, he would take care for it, and her; and ſeeing ſhe knew no better courſe, ſhe conſented unto it. Since my Father was a Widower, and had no Children but my ſelf, he took this Child as a Companion for me, for at that time I was but five Years of Age. He then took this Woman, and this Child into his Houſe, and diſmiſſed the Mariners, who had the Bark for their pains. Mean while, my Father endeavoured to diſcover the truth of this Adventure, but could be no better ſatisfied; for the more Signs this Woman made, the leſs he underſtood her; he carefully locked up the Picture and Letter which this Woman gave him, and put the Cloth-of-Gold-Mantle in a Place where it might be ſafely kept, giving her others in lieu of them, and hoping that hereafter theſe things might come to knowledg; he carefully obſerved the prattle of this Child, who already began to pronounce ſome Words, yet he could not collect any thing which might lead him to the knowledg of his Countrey. A while after this mute Woman died, recommending this Child unto my Father by ſo many ſad Signs, and Tears, that he reſolved to have as much care of him, as of me; ſince he imagined that the Bark in which the Child was found, conſidering the ſhape of it, did belong unto ſome of the Cycladean Iſles, he ſent it oft thither in hopes to diſcover unto whom it belonged; but ſince there was ſo many of them, it was no eaſy matter to make an exact ſearch; he divulged it among the Merchants which traded at Delphos, and enquired of every one, but all in vain. Mean while, not knowing the Name of this Child, he called it by a Name which he loved very well, which was Cleander, having a Son died a little before, who was of the ſame. I will not trouble you with Relation of my Fathers tender care over this Cleander, whom indeed he loved as well as me; but give me leave to tell you, that ſince this uncouth Child was recommended unto the God which was adored at Delphos, who is the God of all Sciences, my Father cauſed him to be educated in all Arts that Apollo himſelf could teach: So that certainly this Child became an abſolute Prodigy; and ſince his fifth Year, there was not a Stranger which came to Delphos, who was not moſt inquiſitive after this young Cleander. For beſides his admirable Beauty, he was Owner of ſuch a vaſt Memory, and ſharp Wit, that he paſſed for a Miracle. All this while we lived together like Brothers; my Father, as I told you, making no difference between him and me, telling every one he diſcourſed with him, that both of us were given unto him by the Gods, and therefore he ought not to make a Diſtinction between us: Cleander might then be about eight years old, and I ten, when there was found in the earth an old Plate of Copper, on which was engraved an ancient Prophecy, which ſpeaking to Jupiter, ſaid,

I ſhall make Delphos ſhake, as immoveable as it is.

Then Madam, queſtionleſs you know, that every one conceived this Iſland was a long time overflown with Waters; and that they believed it never to be firm Land, but ſince Latona did lie in there of Apollo, and Diana; ſo that this Prophecy made all the People believe, this Iſle ſhould be overflowed again as at firſt; and many Inhabitants thought to diſſert the Countrey. My Father uſed his beſt Endeavours to perſwade the Minds of Men to the contrary, but could not; and it was above a whole Year, before this Terrour could be diſſipated.

Since at that time, there arrived at Delphos an Embaſſador from Crœſus, who came to bring Offerings unto the Temple of Apollo; and ſince my Father, whoſe Name was Timocreon, received Letters by ſome of his Train, from ſome of his Couſins, who dwelt at Sardis, as inviting him thither, he reſolved to go thither with this Embaſſador, as well to ſatisfy his earneſt deſires of ſeeing the ancient Country of his Predeceſſors, as to diſſipate thoſe Fears out of the Inhabitants of Delphos, which had ſpread almoſt throughout all the Iſles of Cyclades: and deſiring the favour of paſſage from this Embaſſador of Crœſus, whoſe Name was Menaceus, we embarqued in his Ship: During this Navigation, a great League of Friendſhip grew between my Father, and this Embaſſador; for certainly, (if it be lawful for me to ſay as much of him who gave me Life) Timocreon was no common Man. But the wonder was, that Menaceus found ſuch Charms in the Beauty of young Cleander, that he would never ſuffer him to be out of his ſight; and he only was all the diverſion of the Voyage. At the firſt, Menaceus took us both for Brothers, but my Father undeceiving him, and relating how he came to him, his Admiration was the higher, and he could not ſufficiently wonder at the Divine Providence in many Accidents: And ſince naturally the Minds of Men do moſt affect ſtrange and new things, Menaceus loved Cleander more than he did before he knew the manner of his coming to Delphos. When we landed at a Town in Ionia, where this Embaſſador had Occaſions, we went afterwards by Land to Sardis, where my Father was received by his Allies with all poſſible Civility, and Teſtimonies of Joy: The next Morning, after our firſt arrival, Menaceus ſent my Father word, that the King would have him come to Court, and to bring Cleander, and me with him. But Madam, before I further wade into my recital, it is expedient I acquaint you in what Condition the Court of Lydia was at that time: Be pleaſed therefore to know, that Crœſus had two Brothers, the one called Antaleon, and the other Mexaris, who both were yet but young: Moreover, this Prince had two Sons, and one Daughter, the eldeſt called Atis, ſome eleven or twelve years of Age; the ſecond was dumb, and called Myrſiles, about nine or ten years Old; and the Princeſs Palmis his Daughter about five or ſix years of Age; but yet already a very Miracle of Beauty. Since the Court had but newly left off their Mourning for the Queen of Lydia, it was long ſince any publick Diverſions were uſed, only a Horſe-race that ſame day Menaceus preſented my Father unto the King, and brought me alſo with Cleander unto him. Since queſtionleſs, you Madam, are not ignorant of the immenſe Riches of Crœſus, nor of all his vaſt Magnificence; I ſhall not relate unto you the Sumptuoſity of his Palace; let me only tell you, that Cleander and I being of that Age when all that gliſters in the Eye pleaſeth the Mind, we were extreamly charmed with the ſight of ſo much Gold, and ſo vaſt Riches, as we ſaw in all the Chambers through which we paſſed. Crœſus at the very firſt was raviſhed with the Beauty of Cleander, his Grace, and his Boldneſs, but much more of thoſe pleaſing Anſwers he returned unto all Queſtions. For when Crœſus asked him, what he thought of his Palace? This bold and ingenious Child anſwered, that he thought it beautiful enough for a Temple, but much too beautiful for a Houſe, ſince he conceived it not juſt, that Apollo whom they worſhipped at Delphos as a God, ſhould not have ſo much Gold as he had who was but a Man; unleſs it were ſo, that you had more Vertues and more Power than Apollo had. This Anſwer ſo amazed Crœſus, that he bad him come nearer him, and he carried him into a Gallery, out of which he might ſee the Horſe-race in a great Plain under it, in which was all the Glory of the Court, the young Princes, and alſo the little Princeſs Palmis, whom Cleander eyed very attentively. Mean while, Crœſus being much delighted with the anſwers of Cleander, asked him an hundred Queſtions, and amongſt the reſt, Whether he took delight in ſeeing this Horſe-race? To which he anſwered, That he ſhould take more pleaſure in riding himſelf, than looking on. But, ſaid Crœſus unto him, What would you do with the prize, if you won it? and what on the contrary would you do, if you did not win it? If I loſt it (ſaid he without pauſing) I would even die for anger; and if I won it, I would preſent it unto the Princeſs, your fair Daughter, who ſtands by you. To be ſhort, Madam, what ſhould I ſay? Cleander ſo pleaſed the King, that it was his Pleaſure both he and I ſhould continue with the Princes his Children; and alſo knowing the Abilities of my Father, he would needs engage him in his Service. So that he was induced to give order for Tranſportation of all his portable Eſtate from Delphos to Sardis, and to ſet up his reſt in Lydia.

To relate unto you, Madam, the childiſh Years of Cleanders Life, would but abuſe your Patience, and would loſe time, which would be better imployed in relating his heroick Acts; yet let me ſay thus much for his Infancy, that never any did imploy it better then he, nor more improved himſelf in all Exerciſe of Body, or Arts of Mind, Wit, and Judgment. The Prince Atis, unto whoſe Service he was particularly devoted, and who certainly was one of the ſweeteſt Princes in the World, did love him with moſt extraordinary Tenderneſs: And the Prince Myrſiles, though dumb, yet expreſſed all Signs of poſſible Affection that could be wiſhed: for, Madam, this Imperfection did not proceed from any defect in the Ear, but Tongue, and he did underſtand every thing which was ſpoken, elſe it was impoſſible he ſhould expreſs an Affection unto Cleander. But though Atis and Myrſiles were both moſt admirably handſom, yet it muſt needs be confeſſed that Cleander had a kind of Air in his Countenance above them; and though he ſeemed to be below them both in his Quality, yet his Phiſiognomy ſpoke him much above them both. In a very ſhort time he got the Love of the People; the Admiration of all compleat Men, the

Inclinations of all the Ladies; the favour of the Princes, of the Princeſs, and of the King: But that which was obſerved moſt admirable in Cleander, was, that he ſeemed to be infinitely above all his greateſt Favours, not in ſcorning, but in uſing them well, and not ſeeking for them by any baſe and unworthy ways, he enjoyed them without all Pride or Vanity, and alſo did impart them unto ſuch as were meritorious, with as much generous Liberality, as if he had been a King. In the Infancy of his illuſtrious Servitude, as oft as Cleander went from the Princes upon any Complement unto the young Princeſs their Siſter, This little fair one asked him an hundred Queſtions; ſometimes, Whether he was not weary of Sardis? ſometimes, Whether the Temple of Delphos was more magnificent than thoſe he ſaw in Lydia? and by many other pretty Queſtions, ſo as it was eaſily obſerved that Cleander pleaſed this young Princeſs: for when theſe Princes ſent any others which were educated with them, ſhe only returned anſwer unto the Meſſage brought her, without holding any long Converſe; though it is true, that ſeldom any but he was imployed upon ſuch Buſineſs; for when he ſaw any ſuch deſigned, he would deſire the Honour of the Service, inſomuch as he ſaw her almoſt every Day: The great Diſproportion of Years between Cleander and the Princeſs Palmis, was the reaſon that her Governeſs permitted her to ſpeak longer with him, than any other; ſo that as long as Infancy laſted, he was the moſt happy in the World, ſince nothing did oppoſe his Delights. Thus did we live until his ſixteenth Year, when ſome Subjects of Cræſus began to rebel, ſo that now we went to War, wherein Cleander did things beyond belief of all but the Illuſtrious Cyrus, who knows it not impoſſible to be both Young and Gallant: So that Cleander appeared ſo high in the Eyes of all the Army, that every one no leſs extolled his Courage, than before they did his Beauty, Wit and Handſomneſs: He received a ſlight Wound upon the left Arm, in aſſaulting an Enemy as he was ſtriking at the King, which Accident did double the favour of Cræſus towards him; ſo that when we had ſubdued the Rebels, and returned unto Sardis, Cleander was no longer looked upon as a pretty Child, but as a compleat and gallant Man; for though he was very young, yet ſince as much Wiſdom, Judgment and Diſcretion appeared in him, as in all reaſon could poſſibly be expected from his Age, he was not dealt with as others who firſt go into the World, but on the contrary at our return from the Field, the young Cleander was treated as a Man of high and exact Reaſon; the Princeſs her ſelf, who then was thirteen years of Age, began to hold diſcourſe with him in a more reſerved way, and leſs Familiarity, though always with the ſame Sweetneſs. At the ſame time the Prince Atis, who then was about nineteen years Old, fell in love with a Lady in Court called Anaxilea, and ſince Cleander was his deareſt Favorite, he made him the only Confident of his Paſſion, diſcovering the very bottom of his Heart unto him. This Lady was without diſpute moſt fair, but her Condition was ſo much inferior to the Quality of a Lydian Prince, that he imagined Cræſus would not approve of his open Profeſſion to love her. Therefore he endeavoured to diſguiſe his Thoughts, and to appear both more civil and more courtly to all Ladies in general, that thereby he might conceal his true Affection from his Father. Cleander then was for a while much troubled about it, but yet that Buſineſs was not his greateſt Torment; for Madam, be pleaſed to know, that at the King's return unto Sardis, the Princeſs of Lydia appeared ſo admirably fair in the Eyes of Cleander, that ſhe charmed him anew; for certainly had he never ſeen her before, he could not have been more ſurprized: and indeed there was reaſon for it, ſince during the ten Months which the War laſted, her Beauty was ſo prodigiouſly improved, that all the People were forced to acknowledg, never Eyes did ſee ſo perfect a Beauty; ſince therefore ſhe had no leſs Spirit than Beauty, it is no wonder if the Soul of Cleander was not able to reſiſt a Paſſion which had ſo moving a Cauſe; and indeed it was ſo high, that he began to love without Hope, and Love did ſo abſolutely command his Heart, that it was impoſſible for him to reſiſt. At the ſame time there was a Prince at Sardis, named Arteſilas, who was in Love alſo with the Princeſs Palmis, but his Paſſion was ſtuffed with ambitious Thoughts. Thus it may be ſaid that Love did take his original from the War; for at our return from it, the Court did put on another Face, and nothing but Feaſts and Gallantry were ſeen in it, which for a certain time did render it moſt delightful; but towards the end of Winter, a freſh War was talked on againſt the Miſſeans; and the Spring no ſooner budded forth, but Crœſus took the Field: An entire Summer was ſpent in two Sieges, and two Battels; wherein Cleander did ſo eminently carry himſelf, that as he went from Sardis only a Voluntier, ſo he returned Lieutenant-General under the Prince Atis, who commanded the Army, towards the end of the Year, in the abſence of Crœſus, whom ſome indiſpoſition of Body moved to leave the Field: I underſtood ſince by one who belonged unto the Princeſs, and who was my Couſin, that ſhe was much joyed at the good Fortune of Cleander; telling every one that ſhe always foreſaw he was no ordinary Man: After then the Miſſeans, the Chalibes, and the Mariandines were vanquiſhed, we returned again to Sardis, where Cleander began again to be looked upon with other Eyes: For though he was the very ſame he was before, yet according to the common weakneſs of almoſt all Men who put a difference between Virtue Unfortunate, and Vertue in Proſperity, not only the herd of People, but alſo Men of Parts lived with him after another manner; and he himſelf alſo did lead another Courſe of Life, for ſince he was every day faſter in the Fetters of Love, becauſe the Princeſs every day became more Fair and Amiable, therefore he was much more melancholy. Since I did plainly perceive this melancholy Alteration, and ſaw no reaſonable cauſe for it, I deſired him to acquaint me with it: I took this freedom upon me, becauſe the Alteration in his Fortune having no influence upon his Heart, he loved me as well as he did before; yet notwithſtanding he would not open himſelf unto me as I deſired him, Sorrow muſt extreamly ſad his Soul, before he can confeſs he loved, and loved the Princeſs Palmis; and then all came out. I did extreamly chide him for entertaining a Paſſion, which in all reaſon would never permit him any Hopes, conſidering he was ignorant of his original: I uſed all my endeavours to cure him of that Diſeaſe, which pleaſed him, though it did extreamly torment him: I told him a hundred times, that ſince if he pleaſed he might be happy, it were meer madneſs, voluntarily to render himſelf miſerable. But though he acknowledged I had good reaſon for what I ſaid, yet he could do no otherwiſe, and in lieu of reſiſting his Love with violence, he cheriſhed it with care; For he ſaw the Princeſs as oft as he could poſſible; and diſcourſed with her upon all Occaſions; he rendered her all the Services he could deviſe; and fettering himſelf, he groaned under the weight of his Chains, not daring openly to complain; and though he was very happy in appearance, yet he was in reality moſt miſerable: For when he conſidered, that he knew not what himſelf was, and for ought he ſaw never ſhould, his melancholy became ſo inſupportable, that he was not Maſter of his own Reaſon, and related ſuch a miſerable Story of himſelf, that I was no leſs grieved than himſelf. In the mean while the Prince Atis, whoſe Quality was not leſs conſiderable with the fair Anaxilea, than his Merit and Affection, was ſo kindly treated, that a moſt great League of Amity grew betwixt them; and his greateſt care was to hide this ſecret Correſpondency, not only from the Eyes of Crœſus, but alſo from all the Court. This Prince conceiving he had an abſolute Power over the Mind of Cleander, did think the beſt way to deceive all the World, was to move him to counterfeit being in love with Anaxilea: So that ſending one Morning for him, and entertaining him in private; My dear Cleander, ſaid he unto him, I can never be happy without you; and unleſs you help to hide my real Paſſion, by your ſeeming to love Anaxilea, I ſhall never be able to hide my Happineſs, which you know will be ruined as ſoon as diſcovered: Therefore I conjure you, to court her as if you were deſperately in love; and ſo that all the Court may believe it; which if you do (ſaid he, and embraced him) I ſhall be the moſt happy Man alive: for not only all the Court will eaſily believe, that my Thoughts are not upon her; but the King, and the Princeſs my Siſter, will believe you to be in love with her: So that in deſiring this Office from you, which will be honourable, I hope you will not deny it: If you were in love with any, then I ſhould not deſire you to undertake it; but ſince I could never obſerve you engaged unto any in the Court, I ſhall not doubt of this favour. Sir (replied Cleander in a wonder at the Prince's Words) I am ſo bad a Diſſembler of my own Thoughts, that I am afraid I ſhall diſcover, in lieu of concealing yours; and how do you think (ſaid he, hoping to turn it into a Raillary) that a Man whom your ſelf ſays never was in love, ſhould eaſily perſwade others that he is ſo: believe me Sir, to beget ſuch an Opinion, it were requiſite to teſtify the being ſo upon other Occaſions, and I do not think there is a Man in the World ſo very unfit for this Employment as my ſelf. You have ſo much Ingenuity and Eloquence, replied the Prince of Lydia, that you would act it moſt admirably well; for the truth is, there is nothing requiſite, but to diſcourſe often with Anaxilea, principally before much Company, and when the Princeſs my Siſter is preſent: ſince her Society is very pleaſant, and ſince you will diſcourſe of my Love who loves you, I hope you will not be weary of her Converſation. But my dear Cleander, to the end it may the ſooner be divulged, and come quickly unto the King's Ear, I beſeech you let my Siſter perceive as ſoon as poſſible you can, your Addreſſes unto Anaxilea. Cleander bluſhed at the Prince's Words, and ſpeaking more ſeriouſly than he did before, I know Sir, you are not ignorant (ſaid he unto him) that I would with Joy die to do you any Service, whenſoever any occaſion preſents it ſelf; but if I may without any Crime or Offence ſay it, I do not think I am able to perform what you deſire of me. Why, Cleander, replied the Prince in a little Amazement, can you not for my ſake diſcourſe often with the faireſt Lady in the World? Is it becauſe you are afraid to be fettered with the Chains of Love? No, Sir, anſwered he, my Reſpects which I owe you, would prevent that danger: But I have ſo ſtrong an Averſion againſt any Diſſimulation, that if I ſhould undertake it, I am perſwaded I ſhould do it very ill. However, try, replied the Prince, unleſs you will loſe me, or at leaſt tell me ingenuouſly your true Reaſon why you will not: for ſince I am fully perſwaded you love me; and knowing you to be of no phantaſtical Humour, there muſt neceſſarily be ſome ſecret Cauſe which moves you to deny me this Favour. Truly, Sir, replied Cleander, I have no other Excuſe than what I have already told you. Was I not much miſtaken, ſaid the Prince, when I thought you loved no Body? and is there not ſome Beauty or other whom you love, and fear to make jealous? If it be ſo, ſaid he, tell me ſincerely, for if you be upon ſuch Terms with her as to truſt her with a ſecret, I will conſent you ſhall acquaint her with mine, and ſo by that courſe you may colour your own Paſſion as well as mine: for I make no queſtion, but if you love any, it is ſuch a one as hath a reaſonable Soul, and will be perſwaded unto that Toleration: But if you be not upon ſuch Terms with her unto whom you are devoted, then tell me as much ſincerely, and I have done. Cleander then was extreamly non-pluſt; and if ſome had not come in which broke off this crabbed Converſation, I know not how he would have anſwered ſuch preſſing Queſtions, without Vexation to the Soul of the Lydian Prince. But Arteſilas coming in upon a Viſit, Cleander had ſome time to think upon an Anſwer, eſpecially ſince the Prince Atis had not any leaſure all that Day to revive the Diſcourſe; ſo that Cleander looking me out, and carrying me to walk in the Palace Gardens, he acquainted me with all the paſſage; and deſcribed his Vexation of Soul, whilſt he was diſcourſing with the Prince of Lydia, in ſuch ſad Expreſſions, that my Soul alſo was much ſadded in his behalf: For conſider, ſaid he, the croſſneſs of this Adventure, that I ſhould paſſionately be in Love with one to whom I dare not ſhew the leaſt ſign of my Affection, and alſo that I ſhould be required to expreſs a thouſand Teſtimonies of Affection unto one whom I love not: And that which is the moſt odd of all is, that I muſt do this, to the end that ſhe whom I adore, ſhould think I am in love with her with whom I love not; and one whom he who puts me upon it would never have me love: Ah Fortune, cryed he out, is it not Miſery enough to love a Princeſs, whom I dare not acquaint with my Affection, but that I my ſelf muſt perſwade her that I love another? Since it is ſo, replied I, that you dare not acquaint her with your Paſſion, and in all likelihood never will, I conceive it need not much trouble you what ever ſhe thinks of you. Ah Soſicles, ſaid he, certainly you know not what Love is; for you muſt know, that though a captivated and amorous Slave do love a Queen, he loves her yet with this incontinent Wiſh, that ſhe ſhould gueſs at his Paſſion; and ſince I muſt diſcover the very bottom of my Heart unto you, this, my dear Soſicles, is the very period of all my Deſires. I know very well (continued Cleander) that unleſs I abſolutely loſe my Reaſon, I never ought to acquaint Palmis with my Love; yet I know alſo that unleſs ſhe loſe the ſight of me, ſhe muſt needs in time gueſs at my Thoughts; which if once ſhe did, my dear Soſicles, I ſhould think my ſelf moſt happy; and yet it is deſired by this, that I my ſelf ſhould be the only Obſtacle unto my chief Felicity: for how ſhould ever the Princeſs gueſs at my Love of her, if ſhe think me in love with Anaxilea? Ah, no, no; I cannot obey the Prince; and though I ſhould promiſe him, yet I am not able to keep my Word. But, ſaid I unto him, do you not conſider that if you ſhould incenſe him, he is Brother unto the Princeſs Palmis, and not acquainting her with the true Cauſe of his Complaint againſt you, perhaps he will ſpeak unto her in your diſadvantage? What would you have me do? anſwered he. I would confeſs unto the Prince (ſaid I unto him) that I am in Love, and never name with whom. But, replied he, do you not apprehend ſome Fears that Atis would diſcover that Paſſion, which I deſire the Princeſs Palmis ſhould gueſs at? As long as you conceal the Name of her you love, ſaid I, you hazard nothing. I ſhall hazard all, replied he, for conſidering the manner how I adore this Beauty, I ſhall no ſooner confeſs that I am in love, but ſhame will bluſh the ſecret in my Face; and will, in ſpite of my Reſolution, let him ſee the Image of my adored Palmis imprinted on my Heart. For the Prince knows by his own experience, that one may love one below himſelf; and may as eaſily think it poſſible for one to love above ones Quality as below it. Moreover, would it not highly offend him, that I ſhould conceal my Love from him, who ſo very confidently diſcovered his to me? In a word, whatſoever I know, me-thinks, he ought to know it alſo, and to truſt him but by halves, ſeems dangerous unto me. Then, ſaid I unto him, I would play a little falſe with him, and name ſome other Lady in the Court. Then Soſicles, anſwered he, how can the Prince think I love that Lady, when he ſees I never talk with her? and if I ſhould often talk with her, how ſhould the Princeſs ever imagine that I love her? After much debating upon this odd Adventure, we parted without reſolving upon any thing; and the next Morning Cleander was as far to ſeek for an Anſwer unto the Prince, as if he had not any time of Preparation for it: So that ſince Atis could not penetrate into the depth of Cleanders Heart, he grew angry that he could not move him to act as he deſired; not but that Cleander uſed the moſt tender Expreſſions to excuſe himſelf; yet ſince he ſaw he was in Love, and would not impart it to him, he took this refuſal very unkindly, and valued not his verbal Excuſes. Atis then would preſs him no further, but kept at a diſtance, and treated him much more coldly than ordinary; ſo that it became the Court diſcourſe. Since the Princeſs Palmis did very much eſteem Cleander, ſhe asked the Prince her Brother the reaſon of this change? but he gave her ſuch ambiguous Anſwers, that ſhe could not comprehend the cauſe: So that Cleander coming to her about an Hour after, ſhe did ſo preſs him to tell her what was the buſineſs between the Prince and him, and that ſo urgently, as he was no leſs puzled for an Anſwer to Palmis, then he was to the Prince of Lydia. He told her that he knew not the Cauſe of his Diſgrace; but contented himſelf with being certain he never failed in any due Reſpects unto that Prince: yet was ſhe far unſatisfied with this Anſwer. The Buſineſs went ſo far, that Crœſus heard of it, and asked the Prince his Son, why there was a greater Diſtance between him and Cleander than formerly?

The Prince making no Anſwer unto this Queſtion, becauſe he durſt not acquaint him with the Cauſe, Crœſus did read him a long Lecture againſt the Inconſtancy of them, who alter their Opinions upon cauſleſs Grounds, commanding him not to continue any longer at a Diſtance with him. However it chanced ſo, that the Prince Atis and Anaxilea fell at odds; and this Prince being of a violent Diſpoſition, did abruptly caſt her off, and reſolved to leave her for ever: and the Prince had no ſooner broke off with her, but he had a great Deſire to relate this Adventure unto his Siſter the Princeſs Palmis, and the rather, becauſe indeed he knew not whom elſe to open his Heart unto, as he never had done unto any but Cleander, unto whom he did not yet ſo freely ſpeak, as uſually before. So that he being one Day alone with the Princeſs Palmis, and falling inſenſibly into talk of his Change, he related unto her his Fondneſs of Anaxilea, and the Cauſe of his Coldneſs towards Cleander: and wondring in himſelf at ſo great a Change in ſo little a time, I did not think, Siſter, ſaid he unto her, that I ſhould ever have diſcloſed my Follies ſo freely unto you, when Cleander denied to feign a Love of Anaxilea, and returned ſuch ſlender Excuſes for it unto me: but ſince it is ſo now, that I dare open all unto you, I confeſs my Anger of Mind againſt Cleander begins to die, and in lieu thereof, I love him dearly: yet ſince I do not well underſtand what Reaſon he had to reſiſt me ſo obſtinately, I confeſs, that I can hardly ſpeak unto him concerning that Buſineſs which puts us at ſuch a Diſtance. I do conceive (anſwered the Princeſs, not ſuſpecting Cleander was in love with her) that you ought not to think the worſe of Cleander, becauſe he refuſed that Office: nor do I think him ſo culpable as you imagine him; and he would never have denied it, but becauſe he is in Love himſelf; for I am certain he is as much devoted unto your Service as poſſibly can be; ſo that I muſt conſequently conclude, he never would have oppoſed the Will of his Maſter, but out of Fear he ſhould be put to nominate his Miſtreſs. But ſince I named mine unto him, replied the Prince, why ſhould he hide his Affection from me? Becauſe, replied ſhe, and ſmiled, perhaps he is a more diſcreet Lover than you are: and to ſpeak Truth, becauſe it is more ordinary and ſafe for a Prince to truſt his Secret unto his Favourite, than it is for the Favourite to truſt his Prince. But, Siſter, anſwered he, If Cleander be in Love, how is it poſſible that none ſhould perceive it? Since, I am certain, added the Princeſs, he is infinitely impatient to be re-inveſted into your Favour, it is expedient I propound unto him to become his Peace-maker, upon Condition he will ſincerely tell us who it is he loves; or at the leaſt, acknowledg unto us he is in Love with ſome or other. After the Princeſs had ſaid ſo, and being indeed very deſirous to know whether Cleander was in Love, and with whom, ſhe went into her Chamber: So that being willing to divert her ſelf there, to ſatisfie her Curioſity, and reſtore Cleander unto the Prince's Favour, ſhe called for him; Cleander, ſaid ſhe unto him, I found the Prince my Brother ſo diſpoſed to remit you into his former Favour, that I deſired ſpeedily to acquaint you with ſuch News as I ſuppoſed would be very welcome unto you: But in this Reconcilement, there is a Condition to be added, which I conceive you may without any Difficulty obſerve. I ſhall never revoke, Madam, replied he, that Doom which you have pronounced; and I do eſteem my ſelf ſo unhappy in diſpleaſing that Prince, for whom I would willingly have died, that to expiate my Crime, there is no Puniſhment which I would not ſuffer. That which at this time I deſire of you (ſaid ſhe, and bluſh'd againſt her Will) is, That you confeſs before my Brother, and me, whether the Cauſe which moved you to deny him that Favour of counterfeiting Love unto Anaxilea, was not, becauſe you feared to make ſome Beauty or other jealous? How Madam, (anſwered Cleander with Wonder) are you acquainted quainted now with that Secret which the Prince would have kept concealed from you with ſo much Care, at that time when I was unfortunately conſtrained to refuſe his deſired Imployment? Yes, ſaid Atis, and interrupted her, ſhe does know it; and by this you may be aſſured, that I ſhall never reveal your Secret unto any; for ſince I have imparted it unto her, it is a Sign I do no longer love Anaxilea; and ſince it is ſo, you may be aſſured that there is none upon Earth but the Princeſs my Siſter, unto whom I would impart a Buſineſs of this Nature. Sir, replied Cleander, (after he had well recollected himſelf) I am moſt glad that this Diſcourſe which I hear from the Mouth of the Princeſs, does enable me to anſwer ſincerely, and aſſure you, that I never feared making any one jealous by feigning love unto Anaxilea. Your Anſwer, replied the Princeſs, I do believe is more modeſt, than ſincere; and therefore tell us more preciſely, whether you are in Love with any or no, if you will not tell us who it is you adore.

Madam, replied Cleander, Is it not ſufficient to juſtify my ſelf in the Opinion of the Prince, that I proteſt before you, I ſhould never have diſobeyed him, but becauſe it was an abſolute Impoſſibility to do otherwiſe? No, anſwered ſhe, it is not ſufficient: for if it were, he muſt then do you the Favour to pardon you, and to treat you as one that is culpable: whereas on the contrary, if you do as I deſire you, you will juſtify your ſelf as innocent, and needs no Pardon. But Madam, replied he, ſuppoſe I ſhould be in Love with none; yet how durſt I confeſs my ſelf to be ſo inſenſible here at Sardis, where all that can be called Beauty in the World, is to be found? And ſuppoſe it true, that I were in Love with any one, how do you think I could tell that unto two at one time, which perhaps I never told unto Her who is the cauſe of my Paſſion; and which perhaps I never ſhall tell her? If it be only the Number of Confidents, which hinders you from declaring it, replied the Prince, and ſmiled, I am contented you tell your Secret only unto my Siſter. No, no, ſaid the Princeſs, I am not ſo indulgent as you, and I expect that Cleander ſhould acknowledg as well unto you as my ſelf, that he is in Love, otherwiſe I pronounce him guilty and culpable both to you and me. I would it were the Pleaſure of the Gods, Madam, (anſwered Cleander, with much Confuſion in his Face, and looking upon her in a moſt paſſionate, but reſpectful manner) that you could look into my Heart, and there ſee my moſt ſecret Thoughts, ſince if you could do ſo, you would there find, that I ſpeak but what I ought to do. Truly, Siſter, ſaid the Prince of Lydia, Cleander moves my Pity, and I beſeech you preſs him no further; for when I call to mind my own Vexation, when any did but ſuſpect what I deſired to conceal, I cannot chuſe but be ſenſible of his. You are all Goodneſs, replied Cleander, and more indulgent than the Princeſs. I do confeſs it, ſaid ſhe, and ſmiled; and that which does moſt exaſperate my Severity, is, to ſee you do not think me diſcreet enough to truſt me with a common Secret; for to tell me that you are in Love, is not to tell me all your Adventure and Story. Well, Madam, (ſaid Cleander, even tranſported out of himſelf) if there need nothing but that to ſatisfy you, I do confeſs it; but I moſt humbly and heartily beſeech you, ask me no further; for I had rather die a thouſand Deaths than tell any more. When you are fallen out with your Miſtreſs, replied the Princeſs, and ſmiled, as the Prince my Brother is with Anaxilea, we then ſhall know all your Gallantry, as now we do his. I do not think, Madam, anſwered Cleander coldly, that I ſhall ever be ſo far in Favour with my Miſtreſs, as to fall out of it. Time will tell us all, ſaid ſhe; in the Interim, I pronounce you innocent, and beſeech my Brother to receive you ſo. I know not, Siſter, replied Atis very pleaſantly, whether after you have reconciled Cleander and me, it muſt not be his Office to reconcile us; for you have railed ſo bitterly againſt my Weakneſs, that I know not how I ſhould take it. Your Reaſon is now at too much Liberty, anſwered the Princeſs, to take Exceptions without a cauſe: but as for Cleander, ſince he is in Love, we had need be circumſpect how we ſpeak unto him; for I have heard ſay, that melancholy Lovers are ſooneſt angered. By that Mark, ſaid Atis, you came to know the Prince

Artiſilas

Arteſilas is in love with you. You are very apt to revenge, replied the Princeſs, to retort ſuch an angry Piece of Raillery unto ſo mild an Anſwer. Atis could not reply unto this, becauſe Arteſilas would have heard it, if he had; but ſince the Genius and Converſation of that Prince did not pleaſe him, and ſince his Viſit had already been very long, he went away, and carried Cleander with him, who was ſufficiently vexed to leave his Rival in that manner with his Miſtreſs: he was all the reſt of that Day with the Prince of Lydia, who treated him according to his wonted Affability and Freedom; but at Night, when he was at Liberty to confer and open himſelf unto me, I perceived by his Diſcourſe, that he was ſick of ſuch a Diſeaſe which nothing could cure but Death. Am I not moſt miſerable, ſaid he? for I did not deny to feign Affection unto Anaxilea, but only out of Fear, that the Princeſs whom I adored ſhould not think that I was really in Love with her: and by Conſequence could never imagine that I loved her ſelf; yet now I ſee that my Denial of the Prince Atis to do ſo, hath perſwaded the incomparable Palmis that I am really in Love with her, or elſe ſome other in the Court, as I was forced to confeſs; were ſhe not thus perſwaded, ſhe would not have been ſo pleaſant as ſhe was, but certainly if ſhe had any Suſpicion of the Truth, I ſhould have ſeen more Signs of Anger in her Eyes. It ſeems, ſaid I unto him, by your Diſcourſe you would have thought your ſelf happy in her Anger. Cleander made a Pauſe at this, and after a while conſulting with himſelf; I think, ſaid he unto me, that rather than I ſhould die, and leave her ignorant of my Love, I ſhould be contented to ſee her angry. That is a Favour, (replied I, and ſmiled) which you may eaſily obtain. Ah cruel Friend, ſaid he unto me, I ſtill find you more ignorant in Matters of Love. But ſince I muſt open all my Secrets unto you, know, that at one and the ſame time, I wiſh things which are quite contrary to one another; and that I no ſooner ſay I ſhould be contented to ſee her Angry, upon Condition ſhe were acquainted with my Love, but I repent of it, and had rather die than diſpleaſe her. But how were you able, replied I, to tell her that you were in Love? I know not that, replied he, but I know that I had no ſooner acknowledged it, but I wiſhed that I had not; for had ſhe apprehended my real Thoughts, I ſhould have ſeen her Eyes full of Indignation: yet to my Sorrow I ſaw ſhe thought me in Love, but never ſuſpected it was with her ſelf: ſo that I endured moſt miſerable Torment. Ask me not, Soſicles, what I would have her think, when I confeſs I am in Love with her, for I know not my ſelf; but I am ſure of this, that to be leſs than a King, and love the incomparable Palmis, is the greateſt Folly in the World: However, that I do not know ſo much as whether I am the Son of a Free-man, or no, yet I love her, and ſhall do eternally: and I cannot brook the Affection of the Prince Arteſilas.

This being the State of things, abundance of glorious and pleaſant Company came to Sardis; for the Prince Abradates, ſecond Son to the King of Suſiana, who then raigned, and Son unto a Siſter of Cræſus, whom that King had married, came thither; and at the ſame time alſo, the fair Panthea, Daughter unto the Prince of Claſomenes, a Tributary unto Cræſus, came to dwell in the Court of Lydia, with the Prince her Father: ſo that their Arrival revived all manner of Diverſions. There came unto Sardis alſo at that time a Brother of the King of Phrygia, named Adraſtus, who, as it was ſaid, had killed another of his Brothers againſt his Will, and deſired to be purged from that Crime by the Laws of that Country, which between the Lydians and Grecians is ſmall Difference. Since this Prince was admirably handſom, and of much Spirit; and ſince his Baniſhment was rather for a Misfortune than a Crime, Cræſus received him very well, and according to the Cuſtom of Lydia, he was purified in the Temple of Jupiter, and then appeared in the Court as a ſtrange Prince, whom every one did honour. Cræſus allowing him a Subſiſtance befitting his Quality, and promiſing to endeavour a Reconciliation between him and his Brother, the King of Phrygia. It may be ſaid of Cræſus, that he heaped up a greater Maſs of Treaſure together, than ever any did, and was more magnificent than any Prince upon Earth; being therein much different from the young Prince Mexaris his Brother, who was not leſs rich than he, but was more covetous than another of his Brothers, named Antaleon, was ambitious, or Crœſus liberal. The Court being then ſo glorious, as I have deſcribed, Eſope ſo famous for his ingenious Fables, which contained ſolid Morals in pleaſant Fictions, came thither alſo; and notwithſtanding the Uglineſs of his Face, and Deformity of his Compoſure, yet the Beauty of his Wit, and Greatneſs of his Soul, ſhined ſo at Sardis, that he was wonderous welcome: And that this renowned Town might have Men of all Qualities, Solon, ſo famous for his Laws, came thither alſo, who was entertained by Crœſus with all imaginable Honours: So that it may be ſaid, and rightly, that Sardis was never ſo full of illuſtrious Perſons as then; for every one that had any Excellence in Arts throughout all Greece, either came themſelves, or ſent their Works thither: ſo that which way ſoever one turned his Eye, he might ſee ſomething for his Inſtruction, and Diverſion. But though this Court was the moſt glorious in the World, yet Cleander was there the moſt unhappy Lover upon Earth: for though he was adored by all the Court, yet ſince the Princeſs Palmis was ignorant of his Love, and he durſt never acquaint her with it, he lived a Life extreamly melancholy: and whilſt the Prince Atis, Antaleon, Mexaris, Abradates, Arteſilas, and all the reſt of that illuſtrious Crew, were high in all Delights, ſolitary Cleander ſighed in Secret, and wore only Melancholy in his Eyes: The Prince Merſiles, by reaſon of his Imperfection, was alſo very reſerved and ſolitary: However, this Converſation did much delight the Princeſs, who not ſuſpecting Cleander's Love to her, was only curious to learn with whom he was in Love: but with ſuch an odd kind of Curioſity (as I underſtood by my Couſin, who ſince did tell me) that not knowing any Reaſon for it, ſhe was really as fearful to know whom Cleander loved, as in Appearance ſhe deſired it: for this Couſin told me, that the Princeſs diſcourſing one Day with her concerning his Paſſion, and bidding her to enquire concerning it, ſhe began to reckon up all ſhe could think upon, who might in Likelihood be the Cauſe, and though ſhe named all the Beauties in the Court, yet ſhe could not find one who her Mind did think fit for it; ſo that this Couſin of mine, whoſe Name was Cyleniſa, and who was much in Favour with the Princeſs, began to laugh; Madam, ſaid ſhe, you would either have Cleander not in Love at all, or elſe you would have him fix his Affection much above or much below himſelf; for I named all the Ladies who in Reaſon are fit for him, conſidering the preſent Condition of his Fortune, to fix any thoughts upon. 'Tis very true, ſaid the Princeſs Palmis, and bluſh'd, but I do not look out a Miſtreſs for Cleander, proportionable to his Quality, ſince he knows not what it is himſelf; nor ſutable to his Fortune, which is no more than very mean, but according to his Virtue and Merit, which is moſt extraordinary; and this is the Reaſon why I cannot gueſs who it is he loves, becauſe I cannot find any one amongſt all thoſe which you have named that is worthy of his Affection, and therefore I muſt needs conclude that he loves one that is below himſelf.

Thus, Madam, you ſee what Thoughts the Princeſs of Lydia had of Cleander, who yet was oftentimes much puzzled to find Anſwers unto her Queſtions: for when ſhe remembered that ſhe told him, he would diſcover who it was he loved, when his Miſtreſs and he fell out with one another, ſhe would always, when any Opportunities were offered, ask him, Whether he did not yet begin to be out of Favour with his Miſtreſs? and whether ere long he would be in an Humour to reveal his Secret? If I ſhould reveal it unto you, Madam, replied he one Day, doubtleſs I ſhould be out of Favour with her; but as long as I conceal it, I need not fear her Anger. How Cleander, replied the Princeſs, cannot I know your Paſſion, but you muſt be out of Favour with her? and cannot you tell it unto me, but ſhe muſt know it? No, Madam, anſwered he, I ſhould no ſooner confeſs what you deſire to know, but ſhe whom I love would know my Crime, by the Shame which ſhe would diſcover in my Eyes, and would moſt cruelly puniſh me for it. If it be ſo, ſaid ſhe, and ſmiled, then ſtay till you jar, and till you be out of any Fears to incenſe her.

Thus did the Princeſs before ſhe was aware give a handſom Opportunity unto Cleander to diſcover his Paſſion, had he been ſo bold as to have cloſed with it; yet he was extreamly afraid of the Disfavour of Crœſus upon an odd Reaſon. I think I have already told you, that Solon at his firſt coming unto Sardis, was bid very welcome by that Prince: But ſince it is the Cuſtom of all great Princes, to love that one ſhould commend their Magnificence, Crœſus having ſhewed Solon all his vaſt Treaſures, and the moſt prodigious Riches which his Houſe was adorned with, he asked him, Whether he had ſeen any in all his Voyages more happy than he was? Since Solon did not think true Felicity did conſiſt in ſuch things, like a Man of high Wiſdom, but a bad Flatterer, he anſwered, That he knew many more happy than he; and amongſt the reſt he named one Tellus, who winning a Battel, and dying for his Country, ſaid, That none were happy before their Death. Crœſus thought by this ſaying of Solon's, that he preferred the Virtue of Cleander (who was become his great Favourite) before all the King of Lydia's Riches; and that this Prince did enjoy in him a Treaſure which he was ignorant of, and which was to be valued much above all the Riches which he ſhewed him with ſo much delight. Since nothing does more incenſe the Spirits of Men, principally Kings, then to ſcorn what they eſteem, Crœſus could not endure this plain-dealing Sincerity of Solon, but the pleaſant and frolick Humour of Eſope did much better pleaſe him: ſo that this wiſe Solon went diſcontentedly from him. As Cleander had a moſt generous Soul, ſo he did endeavour to hide this Injury as much as he could, and by the Orders of the Princeſs her ſelf had an eſpecial Care of this Athenian Law-maker: He conducted him ſome thirty Furlongs out of Sardis, which Act of Civility did ſo much incenſe Crœſus, that he could not endure Cleander ſhould be ſo bold as to render any good Office unto the Man he frowned upon; and this trivial Buſineſs was like to have brought a great Change upon the Fortunes of Cleander; but yet the Prince Atis, and the Princeſs of Lydia, did ſo intercede, that they did procure his Reconciliation. In the mean while A draſtus became ſo deſperately in love with the Princeſs Palmis, that Arteſilas and Cleander themſelves could be no deeper wounded than he. Atis alſo renewed his old Love unto Anaxilea, in ſpite of his Reſolutions to the contrary: but it was after ſuch a manner, as that he made no Secret of it; and althoug Crœſus did not approve of his choice, yet he expreſſed a hundred publick Teſtimonies of his Paſſion to her. I think it was about this time that Abradates and Mexaris fell in love with Panthea, yet ſince that Buſineſs is not pertinent to the Story of the Princeſs Palmis, I ſhall omit the Relation of it, and only tell you that at the ſame time Cleander was moſt unhappy: Yet had he ſo much Conſolation in his Miſery, as to obſerve that the Princeſs of Lydia was very averſe againſt this new Rival: but yet he knew that the Prince Atis did encourage Adraſtus in his Thoughts of the Princeſs his Siſter: For ſince the King of Phrygia had no Children, and reſolved never to marry again, Adraſtus was in all Appearance to be King: So that conceiving this Marriage would be advantagious unto the Princeſs, he became his Advocate to perſwade her and Crœſus unto it: He preſſed the Buſineſs ſo very violently in Favour of the Prince Adraſtus, that ſince ſhe ſaw that all her Reaſons in excuſe of her Coldneſs to him, would not rid her of his Importunities, ſhe reſolved to employ that Power which Cleander had over the Mind of the Prince her Brother, being ſtill ignorant of the Intereſt which he had himſelf, and not knowing that he had already uſed his beſt Endeavours that way: She ſent then for Cleander, and cauſing him to come into her Cloſet, after ſhe had uſed a Complement or two unto him, to prepare his Conſent unto what ſhe ſhould deſire of him, and after he aſſured her ſhe might abſolutely diſpoſe of his very Life; What I ſhall deſire of you, ſaid ſhe unto him, is not perhaps ſo eaſy a Buſineſs as you imagine, ſince to ſatisfy my Deſires it is to reſiſt with all your Power the Will of a Prince whom you love very well, and who alſo loves you infinitely: Indeed you muſt perſwade the Prince my Brother from ſoliciting me ſo earneſtly in Behalf of the Prince Adraſtus, and that it is enough he protects him in this Court, without any further Importunities upon her: though I know well enough I have no Reaſon for my Averſion to him, ſince I know he is of an illuſtrious Extract; and ſhall in all Likelihood be a King: that he is handſom, and of a great Soul; that he teſtifies much Affection to me; that the King does not diſlike his Deſign; that the Prince Atis does aſſiſt him, and that my Soul is not engaged any other way: But yet for all this, I have ſo ſtrong an Averſion towards him, that being out of hopes to overcome it, nor ever intending to try, I conjure you by all that's dear unto you, to employ that perſwaſive Power which I know you have over my Brother, to prevent him from perſecuting me any further: ſince I never oppoſed his Affection unto Anaxilea, which was not very juſtly grounded; ſo, do you keep him from oppoſing my ſtrong Averſion to Adraſtus, which I do confeſs alſo, it is not well grounded neither. I leave you, Madam, to judg what Joy Cleander had, to underſtand from the Mouth of Palmis her ſelf, that ſhe hated one of his Rivals: But ſince he was deſirous to hear her expreſs as much againſt another, Madam, (ſaid he unto her with much Reverence) I find the Prince Adraſtus ſo unhappy in your Hate, that it were a kind of Cruelty not to pity him; yet I do intereſt my ſelf ſo much in any thing which concerns you, that I muſt needs tell you, there is nothing (without all Exceptions) which I will not do, to deliver you from his Importunities. But, Madam, if after your Goodneſs to command me any thing in your Service, it be permitted me to ſpeak ſincerely, I ſhall tell you, that one thing which moſt moves the Prince to protect Adraſtus, is his Hatred of Arteſilas; and he thinks he cannot do him a more ſenſible Diſpleaſure, than to be a cauſe that you ſhould prefer a Phrygian Prince before him. Therefore, Madam, (if I be not too preſumptuous in ſpeaking thus) it is your part, whilſt I tranſact with the Prince, to tranſact ſo with Arteſilas, that he be no Obſtacle to my obtaining what you deſire. I have already told you, replied the Princeſs, that my Affection is not engaged unto any: So that though there be not ſuch an Antipathy between me and Arteſilas, as there is between me and Adraſtus, yet ſince I am very indifferent towards him, it will be an eaſy matter for me to ſatisfy the Prince my Brother in that; provided he let me have the Freedom to be rigid towards Adraſtus, Arteſilas ſhall have no great Cauſe to commend me for Compliance with him. When Cleander heard the Princeſs expreſs her ſelf thus, he was ſo exceedingly tranſported with Joy, that I wonder he did not make her perceive his Love to her by the Delight which ſparkled in his Eyes. It is very true, this Joy did not continue long: for when he began to conſider that the Princeſs did not ſuſpect any thing of his Paſſion to her; and that by all Appearances he ſhould never be able to obtain from the Prince of Lydia what he deſired, his Melancholy did ſucceed his Joy: But yet his Certainty to know his Rivals were not loved, was ſuch an eſſential Cauſe of Satisfaction, that his Joys did overcome his Sorrows again; and he appeared before the Princeſs very well contented that he had dived ſo deep into her Soul. Yet ſometimes when he conſidered that the Foundation of his Joy was only becauſe the Princeſs was not in love with any, Oh Heavens, ſaid he, am I not out of my Wits to rejoyce at that I ought to lament? for is it poſſible ever to be happy, and not be loved? and is there any hopes of being loved, when ſhe that is loved does not ſo much as know it? It is true, I am aſſured that the Heart which I would be poſſeſſed of, is not enjoyed by any; yet I may be certain that it muſt never be enjoyed by me; ſo that which way ſoever I look, there is no hopes of any Contentation to be found: The greateſt Felicity that I can expect, is only to ſee my Rivals as miſerable as my ſelf. However, he began to be obedient unto the Princeſs; and ſince the Prince Atis was a Debtor unto him for his Life ever ſince the Miſſean Wars; and moreover, ſince he knew that the Prince was much pleaſed with his Diſcourſe, he uſed all his Ingenuity and Favour to diſſwade him from protecting Adraſtus, but yet all his perſwaſive Arguments could not bring it about: For beſides the Averſion which this Prince had unto Arteſilas, he had another predominate Motive to affect Adraſtus, which Cleander in the end diſcovered, which was, becauſe Adraſtus was he who had reconciled Anaxilea and him together. So that this Lady being deſirous to Gratify ſo good an Office, kept him ſtill in Favour with the Prince, ſo that all the Wit, Cunning and Credit which Cleander had with him, could not alter his ſetled Reſolution: he attempted to win Anaxilea unto his Deſign, but it was impoſſible, for ſhe had a ſecret Grudg to him in her Heart, becauſe he refuſed to Counterfeit a Love unto her, and ſo expoſed her Fortunes unto Danger; beſides, ſhe did conceive it to be a kind of Scorn of her, when he refuſed that Office. Cleander then being out of all Hopes to obtain any thing for either of them, was in a hundred Minds to quarrel with Adraſtus, and ſo rid the Princeſs of him by a way move Violent then ſhe deſired: but knowing ſhe would not approve of that Action, and that then he ſhould loſe her for ever, he reſtrained his Jealouſy and his Choller, and ſuffered an incredible Anguiſh of Mind.

Whilſt he was negotiating this Buſineſs, the Princeſs, according as it was reſolved betwixt them, did treat Arteſilas ſo roughly, that Cleander would have been infinitely well pleaſed at it, if the bad Succeſs of his Buſineſs had not cooled his Joys. However, it was fit he ſhould give her an Account of what he had done; and he went one morning with ſo many Signs of Sorrow in his Eyes, that ſhe knew what his Anſwers would be as ſoon as he came into her Chamber: I ſee Cleander (ſaid ſhe, and came near him, leſt her Women ſhould underſtand what was ſpoken) that the Prince my Brother prefers Adraſtus before my Quiet, or your Prayers, and will not alter his Opinion. I am even deſperate, Madam, replied he, that I am forced to tell you, I have Negotiated all in Vain; and then he made an exact Relation of what he had both done and ſaid to bring his Deſign about: But, Madam, ſaid he, Adraſtus perhaps has ſome Secret Enemy in Court, who would quickly Diſpatch him, if he were aſſured it would not diſpleaſe you. Oh! no, Cleander, ſaid the Princeſs, I would not have anothers Revenge include Mine; and they will extreamly Diſoblige me, if they attempt any Violent Act againſt that Prince: Perhaps I ſhall find out a Way to Puniſh him for his Obſtinate Importunities without the need of any others help; and if what you tell me be true, that the Reaſon why the Prince protects Adraſtus is, becauſe he hates Arteſilas, I ſhall treat the Rival of the one, and the Enemy of the other, ſo well and kindly, that perhaps I ſhall divide the Troubles which they procure me amongſt themſelves. Oh, Madam (ſaid Cleander, and was amazed at this Anſwer) is it poſſible that the wiſeſt Princeſs in the World ſhould be revenged upon her Self, by wiſhing it upon another? For, Madam (ſaid he with a double Addition of extream Melancholy) did you not once do me the Honour to tell me, that Arteſilas was very Indifferent unto you? Yes, ſaid ſhe unto him, but it is better to chooſe where one is Indifferent, than where one Hates. In the name of the Gods, Madam, ſaid Cleander unto her, take up no ſuch Reſolution, which if I dare ſay it, will cauſe you to be cenſured for one that is Phantaſtical: for ſince all the Court has been a Witneſs of your Severity to Arteſilas, what will they Cenſure when they ſee you Change ſo ſuddenly? Certainly there is ſome Reaſon for what you ſay, replied ſhe, but I had rather be thought Light and Phantaſtical, then be continually perſecuted both by the Prince my Brother, and by Adraſtus: I do confeſs, Cleander, that this kind of Revenge is Phantaſtical, and that I do croſs my Self as much as others by it; but yet I know not what Courſe elſe to take. Madam (ſaid he, and interrupted her Speech, not being able to Conſent unto her Reſolution, of uſing Arteſilas kindly) allow me firſt ſome few Days to conſult whether I can contrive ſome better Expedients to do you Service. No, no, ſaid ſhe unto him, deceive not your Self and me; I have long ſince diſcovered, ſaid ſhe, and ſmiled, that you love Arteſilas no more than you do Adraſtus, therefore perhaps for your own particular Revenge you would not have me Revenge my Self this Way: But, Cleander, ſince you are very Generous, you muſt not do thus, but on the contrary you ought to prefer my Intereſt at this time before your own. Your Intereſt, Madam, replied he, ſhall ever be ten thouſand times dearer unto me then my own; but upon this Occaſion I dare tell you, that if you knew all the Evil which you do in Favouring Arteſilas, perhaps, I ſay, you would not do it. Cleander pronounced theſe words with ſo much confuſion in his Face, that the Princeſs was extreamly ſurprized; and ſince ſhe underſtood not the Sence of them, I cannot unriddle your Words, ſaid ſhe unto him, nor will I trouble my Self about it, therefore ſpeak more plainly, if you would have me underſtand you, or elſe ſpeak not at all, if you think it fit I ſhould not underſtand you. I think that it is the latter of theſe two which beſt becomes me, replied he, and without any Expoſition of thoſe words which ſlipped from me unawares, I ought to thank the Gods that you did not underſtand them. The Princeſs bluſhed at this Diſcourſe, and by the Diſorder which appeared in her Eyes, ſhe let him know, that ſhe began to underſtand his meaning. But ſince he feared ſhe would treat him Ill, if he gave her any time to deſcant upon his Words; Madam, ſaid he unto her, what is your Pleaſure I ſhould do to give you Satisfaction? That you tell me no more of any ſuch things as I neither do, nor ought to underſtand, replied ſhe; and that you keep within the Limits which I have preſcribed, in doing me that Office unto my Brother whenſoever Occaſion ſhall preſent it ſelf. I ſhall be moſt Obedient, Madam (anſwered he with a profound Reverence,) and then ſo many infallible Signs of his Paſſion appeared in his Face, that unleſs ſhe had no Eyes, it was impoſſible but ſhe muſt needs perceive it: and indeed ſhe did ſo clearly perceive it at that time, as ſhe could not ſufficiently wonder ſhe perceived it no ſooner: for when ſhe called to Mind all Cleander's Actions, ſhe accuſed her Self of Stupidity, that ſhe could not ſee the only Reaſon why he denied the Prince Atis to counterfeit Love unto Anaxilea, was, becauſe he loved her. Afterwards when ſhe called to Mind, with what Joy he undertook to prejudice Adraſtus, and with what Sorrow he heard her ſay, ſhe would uſe Arteſilas kindly, ſhe was ſo fully perſwaded of the Truth, that Cleander could not wiſh ſhe ſhould know it better. Afterwards when ſhe remembred, how urgently ſhe preſſed him to tell her whether he was in Love, and with whom, ſhe accuſed her ſelf of Simplicity that ſhe did not underſtand the ſecret cauſe of his Paſſion: yet the great Inequality betwixt her Self, and him, made her ſometimes to doubt of it: For (ſaid ſhe to her ſelf, as ſhe told my Couſin Cyleniſa, who afterwards told me) if I believe him in Love with me, then I muſt be offended at him; then muſt I deprive my Self of his Converſation and Sight, which I confeſs does infinitely pleaſe me, therefore I will not believe it, ſaid ſhe: but in an Inſtant, after a thouſand Paſſages coming into her Fancy, ſhe could not chuſe but believe it, and ſhe reſolved to receive thoſe Reſpects, which the Duty of Cleander obliged him to perform in ſuch a manner, that he ſhould never forget it: Yet conſidering after all this, that Cleander had ſpoken nothing which might juſtly incenſe her, ſhe thought that in Reſpect of her Honour, it were better not to let him know ſhe ſuſpected any thing of his Paſſion; ſo that ſhe reſolved to carry her Self towards him as formerly ſhe uſed.

Thus did the Buſineſs depend for ſome certain Days, during which time ſhe was affable enough unto Arteſilas, according to her Reſolution. But that ſhe might no longer doubt of Cleander's Love, Cyleniſa came to her in her Cloſet, where ſhe was retired the better to hide that Melancholy which hung upon her Soul; and ſince ſhe ſaw as much blithneſs in the Eyes of this Woman, as ſhe her ſelf had diſpoſition unto Melancholy; What is it, Cyleniſa, ſaid ſhe unto her, which makes you ſo pleaſant? Madam, ſaid ſhe unto her, ſuch an odd Accident has happened unto me this Day, that if I did not fear it would Anger you, I would relate it. Is it poſſible, ſaid the Princeſs unto her, that this odd Accident which would Anger me, can divert you? You ſhall judg, Madam, ſaid ſhe unto her, when you know it. The Princeſs, who uſed ſometimes to ſuffer Cyleniſa to relate what News ſhe heard, was pleaſed to hearken unto her, rather out of Cuſtom and Indulgence, then any Curioſity. Speak than, ſaid ſhe unto her, for I ſee you have ſo great a Deſire unto it, that it were pity to hinder you. Since you are pleaſed to give me leave, Madam, replied ſhe, be pleaſed to know, that one of my Companions being Sick, and kept her Chamber, I went one afternoon unto her, where I found divers with her, and amongſt the reſt Eſop: as ſoon as I came in, You became the Subject of our Diſcourſe; for you are not Ignorant, Madam, that the Love of Adraſtus, and Arteſilas, makes a great noiſe in the Court: and ſince theſe two Princes have both of them many Partakers, a hundred thouſand Arguments aud Conteſts do ariſe thereupon, eſpecially ſince they perceive you treat Arteſilas with more Affability than before you uſed: ſo that this Diſcourſe went on, ſome ſaid the Protection of the Prince Atis would have a Croſſing Influence upon Arteſilas: others were of a contrary Opinion, and ſaid, your own Choice would be the Deſtiny of thoſe two Lovers: ſome added, that the Quality of a Stranger would be an Obſtacle to Adraſtus; others, that the being a Subject unto Crœſus would choak the Deſign of Arteſilas. Indeed every one had his Vie, and vented his Opinion, divining the Succeſs of theſe two Princes, and their Deſigns. During all this long Diſpute; Eſop leaned upon the Table cloſe by me, and ſaid nothing, but had an Ear unto what every one ſpoke, and a certain kind of ſubtile Smile in his Face, which moved a Belief that he ſpoke not ſo much as he thought; ſo that I turning towards him, How comes it to paſs, ſaid I unto him ſmiling, that Eſop who can make the moſt ſalvage Beaſts ſpeak ſo well, will not himſelf ſpeak upon this Occaſion? He, I ſay, who is the moſt ſociable and pleaſant Companion of all Men living? This flattery, Cyleniſa, ſaid he unto me in a low Voice, deſerves that I tell you, after my manner, a Truth concerning the Subject now in Diſcourſe: for if I be not very much Miſtaken, all your Opinions are beſides the Mark. In ſaying ſo, he took a piece of Paper, and after a little Study, where he leaned upon the Table, he writ ſomething, and gave it unto me, which I have brought you to reade. The Princeſs then taking the Paper which Cyleniſa preſented unto her, read theſe words.

The Fable of Eſop.

T*WO Hunters were told, there was a white Hind in a Wood: they both went out to Catch her with all their Nets, Dogs, Swords, and Darts, but making over-great a Noiſe, they frighted her away, and forced her to flie: and in her Flight ſhe ſtumbled upon a young Shepherd who was aſleep, whom ſhe wounded before ſhe was aware. The Shepherd awaked, and purſued her with his Staff, but much better than the Reſt, for he followed her by-paths more cloſe and covert: We ſhall one Day know whether he has taken her. But for my part* Cyleniſa I wiſh he may, and hope he will.

As ſoon as the Princeſs had read the Letter, ſhe bluſhed, and looked upon Cyleniſa: Well Cyleniſa, ſaid ſhe unto her, what do you underſtand by this Fable? and what did he mean by it who compoſed it? Madam, replied ſhe, I had no ſooner read it, but all the Company was deſirous to know what it was, with ſuch earneſtneſs as every one uſed to have for any thing that came from Eſop: but he told them it was for me alone he writ it; ſo that ſeeing he was abſolutely reſolved not to ſhew it, they were quiet: and I began to read what now I ſhew you: After I had read it, I confeſs, ſaid I unto him, that the beginning of this Fable is very pleaſant, and eaſy to be underſtood; for I conceive the white Hind does repreſent the Princeſs, and the two Hunters, Adraſtus and Arteſilas; that the Nets and Dogs, and the Swords and Darts, and alſo the great noiſe, does ſignify the Actions of thoſe two Princes, who with all their Ingenuity, Policy, Force, and Magnificence, endeavour to obtain their Deſires; yet doubtleſs they are very ſtupid: I underſtand alſo, by the Hind which flies away, you mean the Princeſs will not be taken by thoſe two Hunters who court her. But as for this young Shepherd who was aſleep, whom the Hind wounded before ſhe was aware, and who followed her with the reſt, but, as you ſay, much better then they, I do confeſs, I know not whom you mean. But you do know him very well, ſaid he, and ſmiled. Upon this the Prince Myrſiles came in. Eſop no ſooner ſaw him, but he would needs take the Paper from me: but I was ſo reſolved to ſhew it unto you, that I would by no means part with it. The Prince Myrſiles, who obſerved the Action of Eſop, and who imagined it to be ſome freſh Production of his Wit, came towards me, and making me to underſtand by his Ordinary Signs, he ſeemed very deſirous to ſee it; and notwithſtanding all the diſſwaſions of Eſop, I gave it unto this Prince, who ſmilingly did read it to the end, and teſtified by the Action of his Head, that he thought it very pleaſant. Well, Sir, ſaid I unto him, it ſeems you do underſtand all this Fable, whereas I underſtand only the beginning of it, I beſeech you help out my Dulneſs to interpret it: I had no ſooner ſaid ſo, but the Prince Myrſiles, who you know uſed always to carry an Inkhorn about him, the better to expreſs himſelf unto thoſe who were not accuſtomed unto the Language of his Eyes and Hands, did take the Paper; and juſt in the place where he found theſe words, But in flying ſhe ſtumbled upon a young Shepherd; he writ under theſe words, named Cleander: and as ſoon as he had ſhewed it unto me, he blotted it out again, as you may yet obſerve, if you will be pleaſed to look upon it. I do confeſs, Madam, that I was amazed, to ſee that Eſop who was a meer Stranger, and a Prince who could not ſpeak, ſhould tell me Court-news. For indeed, Madam, ſaid Cyleniſa and ſmiled, if I be not much miſtaken, this Fable does comprehend that Truth. I ſee you are eaſy to be perſwaded, ſaid the Princeſs unto her, ſince a Man whoſe profeſſion is to tell Lies, and another who cannot be very well inſtructed with News, can in ſo ſhort a time perſwade you of a thing which is never like to be. The Princeſs Palmis ſpoke this ſo faintly, that Cyleniſa knew ſome Angry thoughts did trouble her; and ſince the Princeſs did always love her: Madam, ſaid ſhe, I am afraid I have committed a Fault in troubling you with

Trifles and Follies, at a time when perhaps you had more Serious Matters of Importance in your Mind: but the Honour which you have often done me, in truſting me with your moſt Secret Thoughts, made me believe you were not very Serious, ſince I knew it not. The Princeſs, who was ſo full of Diſquiet Thoughts, that her Heart could not contain them, reſolved to make Cyleniſa, her Cabinet confident: ſo that ſhe acquainted her with all her thoughts concerning Cleander's Paſſion. However, ſaid ſhe, ſince I do eſteem him very much, and ſince I believe in reſpect of my Honour, he would not have me know his Folly, I am reſolved to live with him as I uſed to do, and as I have already begun: But yet for all this which I have told you, Cyleniſa, there is ſomething more to be conſidered; for ſince Strangers and Dumb Men can perceive it, many others will ſhortly do the like, therefore it is good to begin in time to carry my Self ſo, as there ſhall be no Suſpicion that I contribute any thing unto the Extravagancies of Cleander, if it come to be known. Madam (ſaid Cyleniſa, after a little time of conſideration) I do leſs wonder then I did before, that the Prince Myrſiles and Eſop ſhould ſooner diſcover things than other Men; for beſides that both of them are more Ingenious than others are, they have alſo more Leiſure to obſerve the Actions of others; one as a Stranger, who has nothing elſe to do in the place where he is, and the other nothing elſe but to hearken and obſerve. However, Cyleniſa, ſaid the Princeſs, they do know it, and they can make others know it alſo; beſides, how can I know but that Eſop compoſed this Fable by the Appointment of Cleander, who I know has ſent him many Preſents. This cannot be, replied Cyleniſa, for he could not gueſs when he came into the Company, what things would be diſcourſed upon, which would give him ſuch a Subject to work upon as this. Moreover, Madam, you ſee this Fable is not Hiſtorical, ſince he ſpeaks towards the end of it, as if he knew perfectly that Cleander ſhould one Day win your Heart from Adraſtus and Arteſilas. That's it which affrights me, Cyleniſa, and offends me both, replied ſhe, for truly I find Eſop very bold in daring to think this of a Man whoſe Quality he knows not; And I alſo find him very Incomprehenſible, ſaid ſhe, and bluſhed, to ſee he ſhould penetrate ſo into the Bottom of my Heart, as to know that if Cleander's Condition were the ſame that Adraſtus and Arteſilas is, he ſhould perhaps make his Fable as true at the end of it, as the beginning is: but ſince it is not, I muſt deceive Eſop; make the Prince Myrſiles change his Opinion, and Cure Cleander, if it be poſſible. The laſt of theſe will be the moſt Difficult, replied Cyleniſa. I do not think it, ſaid the Princeſs, ſince Cleander has a reaſonable Soul. He ſhould not be in Love, if he had ſo, replied Cyleniſa. But from whence comes it, ſaid the Princeſs to her, that you are ſo much perſwaded of the greatneſs of Cleander's Paſſion: you, I ſay, who within this Day did not ſo much as ſuſpect it. The reaſon is, Madam, anſwered ſhe, becauſe I could never apply my Obſervations until now; but now, when I call to mind a hundred things which he hath ſpoke unto me, and as many other things which I have ſeen him do, I think that I was then blind in not ſeeing the Cauſe. I remember one Night, when my Companions and I moved Eſop to relate unto us his Love of that Beauty which was called Rhodopha, who was with the Philoſopher Zanthus, at the time when he dwelt there alſo, Cleander who was preſent at that Relation after it was ended, and every one commended him. For my part, ſaid ſhe unto him, I think you ſo Happy to have worn the Fetters of the fair Rodopha, that I could Envy you: for certainly it is a great Miſery unto thoſe in Love, when they muſt lift up their Eyes too high, when they look upon her they adore; and doubtleſs it is an infinite Happineſs to meet the Party loved upon equal Terms, and where his Services may be valued when they are rendred unto the Party adored: I do confeſs, that then I hearkened unto this Diſcourſe, and took no notice of it: but now I know the hidden Myſtery of it, and can apply it. I remember again, one Day when the Princeſs Claſomina came to Sardis, one Day I ſay, when you were ſo admirably dreſſed, and when all the Eyes in the Court were dazled at your luſter, Cleander was very pleaſant with my Companions and my Self, who were ſpeaking of your Beauty, and we told him that it was a great Happineſs for all Men of his Rank, and for all Beauties who ſe aims were to conquer Hearts, that your Quality was ſo much above them, as you would not hinder them in Captivating Lovers, and cauſing them to break their Chains to aſſume yours: and why Cyleniſa, ſaid he unto me, do you think there is none but Kings and Princes have Eyes to admire what is fair, and that have Hearts to love them? I ſay not ſo, replied I unto him; but I ſay, that ſince the Daughters of Kings muſt not look upon other Hearts than thoſe of Kings; none will preſume to offer theirs that are not ſo. Beauty, ſaid he, makes Subjects of all Conditions; and as the fair Anaxilea has made the Son of her Sovereign a Slave; ſo Queens may make their Subjects their Adorers. I do confeſs, that I heard Cleander then ſpeak, as one that only helped on with Diſcourſe; but now I call to mind the Air in which he expreſſed himſelf; and now I ſee his Paſſion, not only in his Eyes, but in his Heart. I am very Angry, ſaid the Princeſs; and ſhe ſpoke this after ſuch a manner, as to let Cyleniſa know, that if there were none but ſhe who could perceive it, and that Cleander would not ſuſpect ſhe had any knowledg of it, perhaps ſhe would not have been incenſed againſt him: But ſince the Prince Myrſiles, Eſop, and Cyleniſa knew it, ſhe could not endure it, but reſolved to treat Cleander very ſeverely, though ſhe eſteemed him very much, and though doubtleſs ſhe did already love him more than ſhe thought ſhe did. In the mean while, Cleander, who yet knew not what the Princeſs Palmis had determined againſt him, though it grieved him to ſee Arteſilas more kindly treated than Ordinary, yet he had ſome minutes of Conſolation, to ſee that after he was ſo bold as to tell her what he did, yet ſhe did not treat him worſe than uſual: for though ſhe feigned not to underſtand the Ambiguity of his Words, yet ſhe was not deceived; and he thought many times he diſcovered in the Eyes of the Princeſs, that ſhe did perfectly underſtand him:

but he enjoyed this Conſolation not long; becauſe ſince ſhe knew the Thoughts of the Prince Myrſiles, and Eſope, ſhe changed her way of Behaviour towards him, and lived with him, in much more coldneſs, and reſerved than before; but yet ſhe could never bring her ſelf to that rigid ſeverity which ſhe reſolved upon: however, as mild as ſhe was, Cleander did ſo reſent it, that he thought he ſhould have died with Sorrow: Mean while, Adraſtus having ſtill the Prince of Lydia's Protection, and alſo gained the conſent of Craeſus; the Marriage between the Princeſs and him, was talked on, as a thing almoſt abſolutely done; it was not openly reported, but every one whiſpered it in the Ear. Indeed it might be ſaid, that it was one of thoſe publick Secrets which are often in Court, whereof every one makes a myſtery, yet none are ignorant of it; ſo that Cleander and Arteſilas were not a little puzled as well as the Princeſs, who could not by any means reſolve upon this Marriage. During which time Cyleniſa did often ask Eſope in raillery, whether he thought ſtill the Shepherd would take the Hind? I know not well yet whether he will catch her or no, anſwered he, but I know very well the Hunters never will. Things ſtanding upon theſe Terms, and Craeſus loving the Prince Atis ſo very well, that he did not ſo much oppoſe his Marriage with Anaxilea, many prodigious Signs did appear, which ſignified that this young Prince ſhould die by a Dart. Craeſus alſo had a dream, which paſſed for an Apparition amongſt thoſe who profeſſed knowledg in ſuch things, which ſhewed him the Body of his Son dead, and run through with the point of a Javelin, with ſo many other ſuch ſad and frighting Objects, that this great and wiſe Prince was aſtoniſhed at them; ſo that all the Court looked ſad upon the matter, yet the Soul of the Prince was not at all diſmayed, neither did it interrupt his Gallantry: Every one was buſy in divining which way this Diſaſter ſhould happen; for Peace flouriſhed throughout all the Kingdom, and the Prince was hated by none. Thoſe who knew the ambitious humour of Antaleon, Brother of Craeſus, did apprehend ſome cloſe Conſpiracy, and for many Days nothing elſe was ſpoken of but theſe diſaſterous Predictions : Cræſus cauſed all the Arms, Darts, Spears, Javelins, to be taken out of his Palace; and he was as vigilant as many Men are, who by their own Prudence think to prevent the predeſtinate Will of the Gods; he forgot nothing with which he thought fit to preſerve the Prince his Son, whom he looked upon as his only Succeſſor, making no account of the Prince Myrſiles, becauſe of his Imperfection. A long time paſſed on, and no Misfortune befel the Prince Atis, ſo that all Cogitations of Danger were huſht, except the Mind of Cræſus, who was ſo extreamly poſſeſſed with Apprehenſions of fear, that he began to think of marrying his Son immediately. But the grand difficulty was to chuſe a Wife, for none but Anaxilea would pleaſe him, and Cræſus would have choſe another. Yet notwithſtanding the Prince Adraſtus began to ſtagger a little in his Mind: My Father did him very great Service at the requeſt of Cleander, who thought it would be advantageous unto him, to give an Example of unequal Alliance; to leſſen the value that was ſet upon Adraſtus, and to ſatisfy the Prince Atis.

In concluſion, Sir, this Marriage was ſolemnized with much magnificence, but not with much Joy unto any, except the two Lovers, and Adraſtus : Cræſus did but give half a conſent; The Princeſs Palmis was much unſatisfied to ſee the Daughter of an Inferior to ſit above her: Artaleon and Mexaris who ſhould not have been very glad that this Prince had married a Queen, could not be glad to ſee him marry his Subject: Arteſilas and Cleander, who conceived this Marriage would authorize Adraſtus, were angry at it, for Cleander did but ſerve him out of cunning, and becauſe he could not help it : The Prince Myrſiles was ever melancholy for his own Misfortune, ſo that a far more illuſtrious Alliance than this could not rejoice him. Abradates only and the Princeſs of Claſomenes were abſolutely unconcerned, and took no part, only as Lovers of the Princeſs Palmis. But Cleander was he who had greateſt cauſe of Sorrow, for it was talked aloud, that the Marriage of Adraſtus would preſently be ſolemnized

zed. About four or five Days after the Marriage of Anaxilea, the Miſſians ſent to advertiſe Cræſus, that they had in their Country about the Mountain Olimpus, a Boar of an extraordinary and prodigious Greatneſs, which waſted all their Corn, and made their Fields even deſolate, beſeeching the King to ſend ſome couragious Men, with all fit Accoutrements for the Chaſe, to deliver them from this terrible Animal, which might paſs rather for a fearful Monſter, than a Boar: Cræſus conſented to their deſires, but as he was ſpeaking unto his Officers about it, the Prince Atis who heard of the Buſineſs, came in; Adraſtus, Arteſilas, Abradates, Cleander, and many others followed him; Atis told the King his Father, that he intended to be at the Chaſe: Cræſus, who ſtill was poſſeſſed with his old Fears, did oppoſe againſt his Deſign with much obſtinacy; but ſince the Prince could not endure to paſs in the Opinion of his People, for one that never would hazard himſelf in any Dangers, was reſolute, and would needs go. Yet he had hardly prevailed with Cræſus, had he not bethought of one way which convinced him. You ſay Sir, ſaid he, my Death is threatned with an Arrow, but I go not unto a place where any will be thrown at me: Had the prediction been, I ſhould have been pulled in Pieces by a wild Beaſt, then you had reaſon to prevent my going unto the Chaſe: but ſince it is not, what cauſe of Fears have you? The Prince Adraſtus, ſaid he, and ſmiled, will not kill me, no more Artiſilas, Abradates, or Cleander; ſo that ſince there is none to fight againſt but a wild Beaſt which throws no Darts, nor has any Arms, but what nature gave him; Me thinks, Sir, you ſhould not command me that thing, which would be obeyed, but againſt my Will: What will your Subjects ſay, Sir, when they ſee, I dare not go unto a poor hunting? Can they ever think I dare fight and win Battels, when I dare not ſo much as fight with a poor Animal? At the laſt, Madam, Cræſus did conſent; and every one prepared for this Chaſe: But when the Prince was ready to depart, the King took Adraſtus aſide, and told him, that ſince the Prince his Son was his Protector, ſo he deſired him to be his upon this Occaſion. Sir, (ſaid Adraſtus to him, extreamly rejoicing at this confidence which Crœſus put in him) if I do not ſafely bring back the Prince, and victorious, deny me all the Favours that ever I ſhall ask, or can hope for from you. After this, Madam, they went unto this Hunting, in the moſt magnificent Manner that ever was ſeen in Lydia: Cleander went to take his leave of the Princeſs Palmis, but there was ſo much Company preſent, that the adieu was not private, nor any thing paſſed which was obſervable; The Prince Myrſiles, and Meaxaris alſo, went unto this Hunting: and as Eſope ſaw them depart, Cyleniſa asked him again, whether the Shepherd was amongſt the Hunters? Yes, ſaid he unto her, but they go not to hunt the Hind, though it were much better for them they did. When this gallant Troop of Princes and Grandees, which deſerted the Court, came to the Mountain Olimpus, they began to be in queſt of this Boar, and when they had diſcovered his Den, they compaſſed him about on all ſides, and every one ſtrove to get the firſt blow at this terrible Beaſt, which by his monſtrous greatneſs did affright all Beholders; they came near him, and threw all their Darts: That which the Prince did throw did miſs the Beaſt, ſo likewiſe did the Darts of Adraſtus, Meaxaris, Abradates, and others, but Cleander's Dart did hit him, and mortally wounded him; whilſt he was drawing his Sword againſt this wild Beaſt, Adraſtus being envious of Cleander's Honour, and miſſing his aim at that time, did throw a ſecond Dart, which as all Aſia knows, pierced through the Heart of the Prince Atis, who had changed his place, ſince Adraſtus looked upon him: The fall of this Prince cauſed all thoſe who ſaw him to cry out; ſo that Cleander (who was buſy with the Boar, and by giving him a great blow in the Body, which made him fall, turned his Head, thinking the cry had been for joy of his Victory, but diſcerning better the doleful Tone of thoſe ſorrowful Voices, he left his fierce Enemy rowling in his own Blood, to go where the reſt of the Company were: But he was extreamly diſmayed to ſee the Prince Atis dead, and Adraſtus ſo furious and deſperate, that never Sorrow was ſeen comparable unto his; Cleander hearing it was Adraſtus which killed him, and being tranſported with Grief, went towards him with his Sword drawn; but ſeeing that all the reſt of the Princes, who were more intereſted in the loſs than he was, did pity him, he did pity him alſo; and indeed to ſpeak the truth, Adraſtus was in a Condition fitter to move Compaſſion than Choler; for I never in my Life ſaw one in a more ſad and lamentable Condition: he had ſuch a furious Sorrow in his Countenance, and ſo many ſigns of Deſpair in all his Words, that his pitiful Eſtate is neither expreſſible, nor imaginable: The truth is, Madam, he offered ſeveral times to kill himſelf, and they were compelled to take away his Sword, and watch him. They ſent to advertiſe Crœſus of the Accident, and we all followed the Coach which carried the Prince of Lydia's Corps; never return from hunting was more ſad than this; nor never Accident more mournful and amazing. Crœſus was ſo grieved, no Man could be more; he called upon Jupiter the Expiator for help; He invoked the Gods of Friendſhip and Hoſpitality, whom Adraſtus had violated: he complained that ever he ſhould receive into his Court the Murtherer of his Son, thinking he had entertained a grateful gueſs: he invoked the God of Friendſhip, becauſe he met with his moſt mortal Enemy in him, to whom he truſted his Son, and to whom he would have married his Daughter: The Princeſs Anaxilea, and the Princeſs Palmis, were exeeeding grieved. In the mean time we brought the Corps of the Lydian Prince to Sardis: Then did Crœſus ſee it come into the Court of his Palace, the Man who killed him following, for he would never be out of ſight of it: At this ſight Crœſus reſented more ſorrow than can be told or thought: The Conditions of Cleander and Adraſtus were quite different, Cleander had killed the Boar which was the cauſe of the Hunting, and would have deſtroyed the Province: Adraſtus killed the Succeſſor of a great King, the Son of his Protector, and his Protector himſelf; and which was moſt diſmal of all, the Brother of that Princeſs whom he loved, and hoped ere long to have married : he had ſo much Sorrow, ſo much Rage, and ſo many ſeveral Confuſions in his Eyes, as I never ſaw the like : They would gladly have kept him from the ſight of Cræſus, but he eſcaped from them that would have reſtrained him, and ran to preſent himſelf unto the Prince, but in ſuch moving Language, that he melted the Hearts of his very Rivals ; he asked what Puniſhment he would appoint him ? he deſired him to pronounce that which was moſt rigorous, and conjured him to make haſte, and he ſpoke indeed as if he did really deſire Death ; he called upon the Name of the Princeſs amidſt his Complaints againſt himſelf, and without any Deſign at all to live, he ſaid as much as poſſible could be to move Cræſus not to pardon his Crime, which indeed was not a Crime, but a moſt ſad Misfortune, and worthy of pity ; Cræſus himſelf was moved unto Compaſſion, and like a great and generous Prince did pardon him, deſiring him only to leave him at liberty to lament his Misfortune.

Adraſtus then did leave him, and was conducted unto his Lodging, where they guarded him ; but the next Morning, he underſtanding that they would carry the Corps of the Prince Atis unto a ſtately Tomb, which Aliate had cauſed to be built upon the Banks of a Lake, called the Lake of Giges, he ſtole from his Guards the Night following, and run like a mad-Man to this magnificent Tomb, where he was no ſooner come, than he got up unto the top of a Pinacle which was amongſt the Statues, and fell from thence with open Arms upon the point of his Sword which he had taken with him, in the ſight of thoſe which followed him, who there overtook him juſt at break of Day. Thus puniſhing himſelf, he deſerved the Laments of all them who had greateſt cauſe to accuſe him for their Misfortunes. Cræſus conſidering his Royal Birth, his Repentance teſtified by his Blood, and his extraordinary Misfortune, cauſed his Corps to be laid in the ſtately Tomb with Prince Atis, with an inſcription ſuitable to ſo ſtrange an Adventure. After this fatal Accident, Cleander began to grow in favour with Cræſus, who looked upon him as the only Man who was fit to eſtabliſh the Scepter after his Death, in the Hands of the Prince Myrſiles. Artaleon oppoſed theſe Thoughts; for this ambitious Prince, in prejudice of his Nephew, pretended to the Crown. However, ſince there are no Sorrows ſo ſad but Time does cure them, or at the leaſt mitigate them, every one began to chear up himſelf for the Death of Atis; and Cleander having now no more Rivals, was ſomething leſs unhappy than before. Moreover, the Princeſs Palmis, having no Thoughts of revenge for her Brother the Prince Atis, or ſcorn for Adraſtus, began to treat Arteſilas as at firſt, that is to ſay, with much more rigor: but ſince ſhe had uſed much coldneſs towards Cleander, ſhe knew not what to think, or could ſhe contrive it handſomly how to bring her ſelf unto the ſame Terms with him; ſhe ſaw him ſo infinitely reſpective unto her, that ſhe could not in juſtice accuſe him; nor had any deſires of uſing him rigorouſly. In the mean while, the ſeveral Intereſts of Crœſus did beget him ſeveral Cauſes of War againſt the Epheſians, and he raiſed a puiſſant Army, whereof Cleander was Lieutenant-General: For ſince Abradates could not engage himſelf, not knowing when the King his Father would call him back, and ſince the Prince Myrſiles, by reaſon of his Imperfection, was not fit for that Employment, the illuſtrious Cleander had the Honour; the King for divers ſecret Reaſons of State, having no mind to employ either Antaleon, or Mexaris, or Arteſilas, who did extreamly murmur at it. But how great ſoever this Honour was, Cleander did but imperfectly enjoy it, when he conſidered that the Princeſs did not yet certainly know that he was in Love with her: or if ſhe did ſuſpect ſome ſuch thing, ſhe neither would nor could approve of it; he knew not well whether he ſhould dare to take ſo much boldneſs upon him, as to diſcover his Mind a little more plainly unto her; and he was very much unreſolved upon it, when Eſope, who loved him extreamly well, came to ſee him, and to ſhew him in private before he departed all the Story of the Court, which he had compoſed in Fables with Morals upon them; for though this Work was his Maſter-piece, yet he had ſhewed it unto very few, becauſe ſince it contained all the Privacies and Gallantries of the Court, he did not think it fit to expoſe it unto publick view : Eſope then being come to ſhew Cleander this pleaſant Work as eſteeming his Approbation above all the Court beſides ; after he had read over many ingenious Fables relating unto ſeveral paſſages, Cleander found that which Eſope had made for him ; and given in a Paper to Cyleniſa ; and ſince he underſtood it not, he asked the meaning of it : Sir, ſaid Eſope unto him, I do not think it difficult ; for ſome who come ſhort of your Wit, and who have not ſo much knowledg of the things it repreſents, have perfectly found out the Myſtery of it. Cleander became much more inquiſitive than before, and did ſo urge him to the Interpretation of it, that at the laſt he moved him to tell the true meaning of it, and all the paſſages ; yet he no ſooner knew it, but having no power to diſſemble his Thoughts, O Eſope, ſaid Cleander, what have you done ? I have done that, replied he, which perhaps you never durſt do. I do confeſs it (replied Cleander, who after he had recollected himſelf would have diſguiſed his Thoughts,) for I do not know ſo well as you, how to diſſemble a Truth, and I have no mind to tell a Lie : However Eſope, ſaid he, if Cyleniſa did believe you,and acquainted the Princeſs with your Error, into what a Condition have you brought me ? But, Sir, replied Eſope, if perhaps it be ſo, that you really are in love with the Princeſs Palmis, and did never acquaint her with it, nor ever would, what Condition were you then in ? was it not a happy turn for you, that Eſope was ſo bold as to diſcover that which you your ſelf never durſt ? No, replied Cleander, for ſuch a Man as I, who knows not what himſelf is, and who has nothing but what is in the Hands of Fortune, may very well ſuppoſe, that the Princeſs Palmis will think he cannot love her without a moſt manifeſt wrong unto her. Believe it, Sir, ſaid Eſope unto him, that one never wrongs a fair Lady in loving her, of what Quality ſoever ſhe be, and of what Quality ſoever he be that adores her, provided he goes no further than love her. But, anſwered Clea- der, Eſope by his own Confeſſion did love one that was only a Slave. But, replied he, Cleander in loving a Princeſs, loves a fair Princeſs, and whoſoever is fair, Sir, is certainly one whoſe greateſt delight is to be thought and reſpected ſo: Yes, Sir, I will maintain, that a fair Queen does always prefer a Slave of her Beauty, before all her Subjects which birth only gave her; and a Conqueſt gotten by her Eyes, will be a hundred thouſand times more dear unto her than all the Victories ſhe can get with a hundred thouſand Men: therefore, Sir, though I have made Cyleniſa believe you were in love with the Princeſs of Lydia, and though ſhe hath perſwaded her of as much, yet I warrant you, you will never be worſe in her eſteem. Yet I perceived, ſaid Cleander, that about the ſame time you ſay you compoſed this Fable, the Princeſs did treat me with more coldneſs than ever ſhe did before. That is a ſign, anſwered Eſope, you are more in her Heart than ever you thought of; for if ſhe did not fear you, and if ſhe did not indeed fear her ſelf, ſhe would never fly from a Man whom ſhe eſteems very much. I pray think, Sir, ſaid he and ſmiled, that ſince I have taken ſo much pains to find out the Natures of Foxes, Tygers, Bears, and Lions, I am not altogether ignorant in the Phyſiognomies of fair Women, which are a million of times more delightful Objects than any wild Animals can be; and therefore be aſſured from me, that ſhe hates you not, and that my Fable will one day prove as true in the end as in the beginning of it. Though Cleander knew very well that Eſope was both wiſe and ſubtile, yet he never had power to confeſs unto him that he loved the Princeſs: He only deſired him not to ſhew this Fable unto any, nor to ſpeak any more of his Errors, leſt he ſhould perſwade others to believe them. As they were thus in diſcourſe, I came in; and as ſoon as Eſope was gone, Cleander acquainted me with all their Conference; and told me, that certainly he was the cauſe of the Princeſs being ſo reſerved and cold towards him; he was extreamly deſirous to know the truth; for though her coldneſs to him was an intolerable Torment, yet if he were once certain ſhe knew his

Paſſion, it would be ſome eaſe unto him; for yet he ſerved ſhe uſed neither any Incivility nor any Scorn him: So after he had well conſulted with himſelf; reſolved to go and take his leave of the Princeſs, at ſu a time as when few were with her, and to be cleared his doubts: He was ſo circumſpect to enquire the fitt opportunity, that indeed he found her alone: After th firſt Complements, which related only to his Voyage and after the Princeſs had recommended the Perſon the King, and the Perſon of Myrſiles unto his care Madam, ſaid he unto her, doubtleſs you will think moſt preſumptuouſly bold, in beſeeching you to hono me ſo far as to tell me, whether ever I committed a Fault againſt thoſe due Reſpects which I owe you, a which moved you to leſſen your obliging Goodneſ wherewith heretofore you were pleaſed to honour m withal. It plainly appears, replied ſhe, that I put abu dance of confidence in you, ſince I have recommende unto your care two Perſons whom I eſteem moſt dear all the World. Without all doubt, Madam, I am inf nitly obliged unto you for it, replied he; but Madam ſince I am perſwaded, that he who loſeth an ineſtimab Jewel, and never miſſeth or complaineth of his lo ſeems that he did very little eſteem it; and I thi you cannot in reaſon be offended, if I lament the Chang which I obſerved in my happineſs; yet in all my Co plaints and Lamentations, I do not accuſe you of a Injuſtice, but do moſt humbly beſeech you to tell m what Crime I have committed, which might merit th Misfortune? Cleander has ſo much Wit (replied ſhe, a both ſmiled and bluſht) that if he have committed Crime, doubtleſs it was with his own conſent, and b conſequence not eaſy for him to repent of it, or neceſſ ry to accuſe himſelf: But, ſaid ſhe, with a more ſer ous Countenance, I do not know that ever you did m any ill offices; and if you did obſerve any Alteration i my Humour, it was only ſince the Death of my Brothe when I could not have the ſame Diſpoſitions to a Joys, as before I might have. Madam, anſwered Cl ander, my Miſfortune did precede that of that unhapp

Prince. Then perhaps, replied ſhe, I had one Fault more than I knew of; and this may be added unto the Number of my others, that I am of an ill Humour. The Gods preſerve me, ſaid he, from accuſing the moſt accompliſhed Princeſs upon Earth, of the leaſt Imperfection. No, no, Madam, you do not, or will not underſtand me: for I do not accuſe you of any thing; but if you find me culpable, I conjure you to accuſe me, that I may repent and correct my ſelf, and that I may ask you Pardon for it. Truly Cleander, replied ſhe, I do not think there was ever any ſo earneſt and deſirous to be thought criminal, as you: but for your Satisfaction and mine both, take notice of one thing I pray you, which is, that if I do not tell a thing the firſt time that any one ask me, they ask me ever after in vain, for I will never tell it. Then Madam, anſwered he, ſhall I never know my Fault? Search in your own Heart for your Satisfaction, ſaid ſhe, and not in my Words: If you be innocent, reſt quiet, for I never do any Injuſtice; if you be not, repent and correct your ſelf, but however let us talk no more of it; and be aſſured, that whether you be innocent or culpable, I heartily wiſh you may bring back the King my Father victorious over his Enemies, and that your Honour may every Day grow greater. Since there never ſhall be any thing more dear unto me than to obey you, replied he, command me ſomething, I beſeech you, wherein I may do you Service. It is enough, anſwered ſhe, that I deſire you to have a care of the King my Father, and the Prince my Brother: if it be not, I conjure you further to have a Care of your own Perſon, and not to expoſe it unto too many Dangers, ſince it is ſo dear unto them. The Princeſs upon theſe Words roſe up, and Cleander was forced to leave her, not having any Power to ſpeak more plainly of his Love unto her: yet had he ſo much Conſolation from this Viſit, to know ſhe underſtood his Paſſion, and to find her much more affable than ordinary. He departed then with as violent Deſires to merit the Eſteem of this Princeſs by his high Actions, and to render his Life as glorious, as his Birth was obſcure, that it is no Wonder he performed ſuch gallant

things in the Epheſian War. I ſhall not make a Relati unto you, Madam, of all the Paſſages there; for all A knows, that many Battels were fought, wherein Clean had all the Glory: That afterwards he went to beſieg Epheſus; and though the Inhabitants thought themſelv moſt ſafe by a ſuperſtitious Ceremony of drawing a Li from the old Town to the Temple of Diana, as putti themſelves under her Protection, yet they were com pelled to render themſelves, maugre the ſtout Reſiſtan of a couragious Stranger who was in the Town. B certainly, to relate things as really they were, the taki of Epheſus was ſo particularly the Act of Cleander, th Cræſus had no ſhare in the Honour of that Conqueſt; fo
he being faln ſick, it was Cleander who did all at th Siege, which was one of the moſt memorable Acts th has been heard of: Arteſilas neither had the good Fortu to be there, becauſe he was much wounded at the fir Battel which was given unto the Enemies: Cleander on had the Glory of it all, whereof Cræſus himſelf ſent t advertiſe his Daughter in a very advantagious manner fo him: But as the time of keeping the Field was almoſt an end, and as he was in hopes to return unto Sardis, t reap the ſweet Fruits of his Victories in the favourab Looks of the Princeſs, the Miſſeans, the Dorians, and th Pamphilians did all confederate together againſt Cræſ who reſolved to prevent them: He ſent then to the Ki of Phrygia for Aid; but ſince he was engaged at that tim with the King of Pontus, he denied him, ſo that he wa forced to go upon his own Legs. But Madam, the Valou of Cleander was become ſo terrible unto all theſe Peopl that he ended this War as happily as the other, thoug it was in the Winter time. Since Cræſus ſaw that Fo tune ſmiled upon him, he would not ſtay there: bu whilſt the King of Phrygia was buſy with the King of Po
tus, he entered at the Beginning of the Spring into th Dominions of that Prince, preſently after thoſe two King had loſt two Battels in one Day. So that the King o Phrygia with his broken Troops was conſtrained to retur for Defence of his own Kingdom, and leave that of hi Allies. As this Prince was very gallant, Cræſus foun

greater Reſiſtance from him than he did before, and the Valour of Cleander did find a glorious Subject to work upon. Since Phrygia is not very full of Towns, almoſt all this War was performed in Skirmiſhes and Battels; but they were ſo frequent and ſo glorious for Cleander, that Crœſus could not chuſe but admire how extreamly he was obliged unto Mineceus and my Father, for giving him a Man of ſo heroick a Courage: The King of Phrygia did fight in Perſon with Cleander, who thought once to have killed him, but as he lifted up his Arm a Thought came into his Mind, which made him change his Blow, and turned it upon another next the King of Phrygia, whom he killed at that Blow, ſaying in himſelf, Perhaps I am born a Subject unto that King. In ſhort, Madam, after the King of Phrygia was forced to retreat into Apamea, and the Seaſon of the Year growing very bad, Cleander, after he had put his Troops into their Winter-Quarters, returned unto Sardis, after a compleat Year ſince he had been there: 'Tis true, Renown did ſpeak ſo high in his Behalf to the Princeſs Palmis, that ſhe could not forget him; yet ſhe would not admit of his Paſſion, and I know not whether or no ſhe had ſome kind of Fears that Abſence had changed his Heart. Crœſus was received with high Magnificence, and Cleander was looked upon as the Conqueror of many Nations, and in that Poſture wherein he came to Sardis, there was none could come in Competition with him, but every one eſteemed himſelf happy in his favourable Looks. But Madam, in the midſt of all theſe Triumphs, Love did triumph over the Heart of Cleander: And he was more terrified that Day he was to ſee the Princeſs, than he was in all the Days of Battel: for he went to fight in hopes to overcome, but he expoſed himſelf unto the Looks of his Princeſs in Certainty to be overcome, and in Uncertainty of being kindly treated. The firſt Addreſs unto her was in the Preſence of the King, who in Favour of Cleander told the Princeſs his Daughter, that ſhe ſhould regard him as the only Conqueror, and as the greateſt Stay of his Empire. Cleander anſwered unto this with much Modeſty, and the Princeſs did ſecond the King her Father with many obliging Civilities. But the next Morning Cleander went himſelf alone to wait upon her, and ſhe entertained him, neither with her former Freedom, nor her latter Coldneſs: As ſhe was grown more fair, ſo he more amorous; and as Victories does elevate Souls, and infuſe a kind of handſom Boldneſs, which is very much becoming if it be mixed with Modeſty, ſo Cleander was grown incomparably more amiable than ever he was; and on the contrary, Arteſilas, much leſs, for his Envy at Cleander's Glory, did make him of ſo bad an Humour, that every one ſhunned him: ſo that he coming unto the Princeſs as Cleander was with her, ſhe did ſo palpably perceive the Difference between them, that ſhe could not chuſe at Night, in ſpeaking unto Cyleniſa, but wiſh, that Cleander had the Birth of Arteſilas, or that Arteſilas had all the good Qualities of Cleander. However, though ſhe ſaw he was infinitely honoured by all, and Cræſus eſteemed him exceedingly, the Prince Myrſiles loved him moſt tenderly, and thought he was adored by all the World, yet for all this he eſteemed himſelf very unhappy: for when he began to conſider, that he knew not who himſelf was; and that in all likelihood this Incertainty of his Birth would be an invincible Obſtacle unto an happy Succeſs in his Paſſion, he grew paſt all Conſolation, and all Additaments of Honour did rather increaſe than diminiſh his Sorrows. But, Madam, theſe great Favours upon Cleander eclipſing Antaleon, that ambitious Prince, who thirſted after the Crown, did ſecretly treat with Arteſilas, unto whom he promiſed the Princeſs Palmis his Neece in Marriage, if he would help him to kill Cræſus and the Prince Myrſiles. This Conſpiracy was ſo horrid, that I will not trouble you with a particular Relation of it: for when I conſider that a Brother would murther a Brother and a Nephew, and that a Lover ſhould embrew his Hands in the Blood of a Father unto his Miſtreſs, I apprehend ſuch Horrors, that I muſt needs paſs them over very ſlightly, and tell you, that Eſope, who was yet at Sardis, having ſmelt out this Conſpiracy, did acquaint Cleander with it, who went ſo prudently to work, that he did not only diſcover the whole Plot, but alſo quaſh it: Antaleon was forced to fly for Refuge to the Phrygian King, but he never reached ſo far, for in his going thither he fell down a Precipice, and ſo hurt himſelf, that within a few days after Death became his Sanctuary; for it ſeems the Gods would defer no longer the Puniſhment of ſo black a Crime. As for Arteſilas, nothing could be proved directly againſt him; and though afterwards it came to light that he was of the Conſpiracy, yet he ſtayed in the Court as if he had been innocent: 'Tis true he durſt not any louger ſhew himſelf openly as a Lover of the Princeſs, for if ſhe would have harkened unto any Profeſſions of Love, Cleander would have been near his Happineſs: For Cræſus thought himſelf ſo infinitely obliged unto him for this laſt Piece of Service, that he eſteemed all his Treaſures too mean a Recompence for it: The Prince Myrſiles for his part, being a Debtor unto him for his Life, thought him worthy of all things; ſo that though he knew Cleander was in love with the Princeſs his Siſter, yet he would never take any notice of it. In the mean while Cleander, not being able to live and not have Liberty to publiſh his Love to her who cauſed it, did lead a moſt melancholy Life; and the Princeſs alſo, not being able to forbear an Expreſſion of too high an Eſteem of Cleander, was extreamly troubled: For ſaid ſhe one Day to Cyleniſa, Though this Eſteem do me no other Hurt, but to hinder me from loving him whom my Father would have me marry, is not that too much? and ought I not to wiſh that I had never ſeen him? As I think, ſaid Cyleniſa, that would be an unjuſt Wiſh, and Cleander perhaps has more Reaſon than you, to wiſh he had never ſeen your Beauty. You know, Madam, that the King is his Debtor for many Victories, and you your ſelf do owe him for the Lives of two Princes who are moſt dear unto you; but as for him, I do not ſee that he is obliged unto you at all, for truly you uſe him very coldly, becauſe you are obliged to him; and you wiſh you had never ſeen him, becauſe he is very handſom and amiable; there is not much Reaſon or Juſtice in theſe Wiſhes. I believe, ſaid the Princeſs, and ſmiled, that Eſope has ſuborned you to help to make his Fable true. As Cyleniſa was about to anſwer, the Captain of the Guard unto Cræſus, who always loved Antaleon very well, though none perceived it, and who by that Conſequence had not over-much Love for Cleander, came to the Princeſs to tell her a Piece of News which he thought deſerved a Recompence, though perhaps it would not be pleaſing. Madam, ſaid he unto her, I beg your Pardon for coming to tell you a thing which doubtleſs will much trouble you, but ſince by knowing it in time you may perhaps find a Remedy, I therefore no ſooner knew it, but I came to acquaint you. The Princeſs thinking it to be ſome new Conſpiracy, thanked him for his Zeal unto her Service, and deſired him to ſpeak the Buſineſs. Madam, replied he, the Buſineſs is ſo ſtrange, that I dare hardly tell you, for truly I was told by an Officer of the King's Houſe as a very great Secret, that the King has a Deſign to marry you unto Cleander, to the end he may aſſiſt the Prince Myrſiles, to ſupport the Scepter after his Death: He ſeemed to be fearful you would not conſent unto it, becauſe the Original of Cleander was not known; this Refuſal of yours he ſaid would anger him very much, but he would never force you unto it. Therefore, Madam, conceiving you might prevent ſo great a Miſery by a couragious Reſiſtance, I came in all haſte to tell you what I knew concerning this ſtrange Deſign; for knowing your great Soul, as I do, I believed you would never conſent unto ſuch a thing as would be ſo diſhonourable unto you as this. The Princeſs Palmis, being extreamly ſurprized at this Man's Diſcourſe, and not knowing what to think of it, thanked him for his Zeal, and told him ſhe would ſee him recompenced: but ſhe conjured him to obſerve two things; the one, not to ſpeak unto any one whatſoever of this Buſineſs which he told her; the other, not to accuſtom thoſe who are under his charge, to dive into the Secrets of Kings, or at leaſt not to diſcover them; that in the mean time he might believe, ſhe would carry her ſelf in the Buſineſs, as Reaſon and Vertue required. Here Madam, may be admired the capricious Humour of Love, eſpecially in the Spirits of the wiſeſt Perſons. The Princeſs Palmis did infinitely eſteem Cleander, and perhaps did love him with Tenderneſs enough: Yet as ſoon as ſhe underſtood that Crœſus would have her marry him, the Obſcurity of his Original did ſo much trouble her Mind, that ſhe knew not what Reſolution to take: She would not have Cleander leave loving her, and yet ſhe would not have him tell her that he did love her; and ſhe could by no means conſent to marry one that was not known what he was; yet his Vertue is ſo tranſcendent and apparent, (would this Princeſs ſay) but his Birth is ſo obſcure, that he himſelf knows not what it is: For all that, Madam, (would Cylenisa ſay) you know he is worthy of all things; he is Owner of as many Virtues as the greateſt Prince upon Earth can wiſh to have; his Valour has ſet him above all the King your Father's Subjects; if all his Conqueſts were really his own, as all the Glory of them is, he would be one of the moſt puiſſant Princes in all Aſia: The firſt Kings, Madam, ſaid Cyleniſa, perhaps were not extracted from ſo good a Houſe as Cleander; for truly, I have heard ſay, he was found in a moſt rich Mantle, made of the pureſt Cloth of Gold; the Picture of his Mother and himſelf was ſet in a moſt magnificent Border, which are ſtrong Arguments his Original cannot be baſe. He may perhaps be born of Parents rich enough, replied the Princeſs, yet that is not enough to ſatisfy me: I know Cyleniſa, that Birth and Death is alike to all, both Kings and Subjects; and that the Vanity to boaſt of Predeceſſors, has but a bad Foundation; but yet for all that, this illuſtrious Chimera, which flatters up the Hearts of all Men, is ſo univerſally eſtabliſhed throughout all the Earth, that it is not contemptible. But yet, Madam, ſaid Cyleniſa, it muſt be confeſſed that Birth only is not very conſiderable; for if the Son of the greateſt King in the World were in love with you, and ſuppoſe he had all imaginable Faults, and not one good Quality, certainly you would never love him: All the Grandeur of his illuſtrious Grand-fathers, and all their Vertues, would not invite you to eſteem him. 'Tis very true, ſaid the Princeſs, I ſhould ſcorn him and hate him more than another who had not the ſame Vices, yet upon ſome Reaſon of State I could marry him; yet Cleander being ſo accompliſhed as he is, does doubtleſs merit my Eſteem, but yet being no

Prince

Prince, nor knowing ſo much as whether he be of a noble Race, I could not chuſe, according to the common Maxims of the World, but allow ſome Place in my Friendſhip, yet never ſhould have any Thoughts of marrying him. I know, Madam, ſaid Cyleniſa, that all the World thinks as you ſay; but you, Madam, who have a Soul above the vulgar Reach, and who can ſee things as really they are in themſelves, not as the Multitude look upon them, what do you think? may you not well imagine that Cleander's Vertue and the King's Command will prevent all Blame, when you obey him without Reſiſtance? Ah Cyleniſa, ſaid ſhe unto her, what Queſtions do you ask me? and how do you think I ſhall anſwer you? My Heart and my Reaſon are at ſuch odds, that I need ſome time to conſider which of theſe two I ſhould ſatisfy; therefore for the preſent I cannot tell you which I ſhall chuſe, or what I ſhall do: for truly, Cyleniſa, I do not know my ſelf. This was the Conference between them; for though Cyleniſa did not make me her Confident concerning the Intereſts of her Miſtreſs, yet, being my Couſin, we were very friendly one to another; and ſhe bore a particular Affection unto Cleander for my ſake, becauſe ſhe knew that my Fortune and Timocreon's did inſeparably depend upon his, and therefore he rendred in common between us both his Liberality, and his good Offices. Cleander alſo, though he knew it not, had a good Solicitor of her to the Princeſs Palmis, and her Advice was always in Advantage of Cleander, in ſo much as her Coldneſs towards him, which was his greateſt Torment, did inſenſibly leſſen, ſo that flattering up himſelf, by this happy change, the Cauſe whereof he was ignorant, his Hopes began to revive and comfort him; and preſently after, growing more bold in the Buſineſs, he rendred his Complements unto the Princeſs with leſs Circumſpection, tho ever with equal Reſpect: he viſited her very often, and talked to her with leſs Fear: yet I do not think that he would ever have been ſo bold, as openly to declare himſelf unto her, if the illuſtrious Cyrus, who at that time was only Artamenes, had not given him an Occaſion, and thus it was. Cræſus, knowing all the Paſſages of the Pontean tion and Bithynian War, and all the glorious Acts which the famous Artamenes did there, he had alſo a greater deſire to enquire of what Nation a Man of ſuch extraordinary Valour was. Thoſe who had this Commiſſion, told him, that it was not known; and further told him, how he cauſed the King of Pontus to be releaſed; and how the Princeſs Mandana was carried away by a Stranger called Philadaſpes, who was unknown as well as Artamenes, and who alſo was very gallant; adding further, that it was ſaid this Philadaſpes was Son unto the Queen of Aſſyria, and diſcovered by a Letter which he had written unto one of his Intelligencers; which Letter was intercepted. Crœſus told all this unto the Princeſs Palmis, as News which was ſomething pleaſant, ſpeaking unto her with much admiration of all the great Things done by the Illuſtrious Artamenes.

As ſoon as he was gone from the Princeſs, Cleander came in; and ſince her Mind was full with what the King had told her, ſhe began diſcourſe with him, and asked him many Particulars which ſhe had not asked the King, conceiving that he was preſent when all this News was told unto the King: For my part, ſaid ſhe, I wiſh this Philadaſpes, though he be ſaid to be the Son of a King, were puniſhed for the Violence he hath done; and I would have Artamenes (though it be not known what he is) recompenced for his Vertue. Methinks, Madam, ſaid Cleander, I ought to thank you for him, being unknown as he is, and I conceive this Conformity ought to intereſt me in what concerns him. His Condition (ſaid the Princeſs) is not equal with yours; for as I underſtand by the relation made unto the King, he knows where he was born, and you neither know where you were born, nor what you are. Cleander ſighed at this Diſcourſe of the Princeſs, who fearing ſhe had incenſed him, made haſte to ſpeak again. No, no, Cleander, ſaid ſhe, grieve not ſo much at your Misfortune; for though you do not know your Quality, yet all the World knows you deſerve the higheſt: And I wiſh to the Gods, for the Honour of our Houſe, that you were my Brother; and I am ſure the Prince Myrſiles will not be offended at my Wiſh; it would be moſt glorious and obliging for me. Madam, replied he, but for all that, Heavens forbid it ſhould be ſo, for I had rather be as I am, than be Brother unto the adorable Palmis. Do you know what you ſay? replied ſhe; and do you not fear to offend me? Yes, Madam, I do fear, and fear it much more than you have reaſon to do: But, [illegible], ſince I am reſolved to be ingenuous, I muſt needs confeſs unto you, that I had incomparably rather be all my Life a Slave unto the Divine Palmis, than to be her Brother, or to be the greateſt King upon Earth: Yes, Madam, I think thoſe Fetters, which enchain me, ſo ſweet and glorious, though heavy, that I would not change them for all the glittering Diadems of the Univerſe. Cleander, ſaid the Princeſs to him, it ſeems you know me no better than you do your ſelf; for if you knew who I am, you would not uſe ſuch Language. Pardon me, Madam, I beſeech you, replied he, I know you are the Daughter of a great King; that you are the faireſt Princeſs in the World, and the moſt vertuous; but I know alſo that I am the moſt miſerable Man upon Earth, becauſe I am the moſt amorous. If I did not think you were beſides your ſenſes, ſaid ſhe unto him, I ſhould treat you after another manner. No, Madam, ſaid he, do not deceive your ſelf, the Love which I have to you, permits me the uſe of my Reaſon, and my Senſes clearly, and I know moſt certainly that I ought to hope for nothing, nor do I ask any thing but a little compaſſion; for I dare not be ſo bold as to ask that which would be a Remedy unto my Miſery, but that only I ask which would comfort, not cure me. The King, my Father, ſaid the Princeſs unto him, is ſo much your Debtor, and I alſo, that I am reſolved not to argue againſt you, though in Reaſon I ought to do it: but let me tell you, in leſs Anger than I could, that if what you ſay be not true, though your Boldneſs deſerves, I ſhould forbid my ſelf ever ſpeaking with you again, yet I will forget your Crime, and pardon you; but if to your Misfortune there be any Truth in your Words, I ſhall not treat you ſo favourably. How, Madam, replied he, will you puniſh me more ſeverely for telling an inſolent Lie, than for telling you a moſt reſpective Truth? I ſhall do no more than that, anſwered ſhe, for I ſhall puniſh my ſelf for your Crime, though I am not acceſſary to it. Alas, Madam, replied he, if I am culpable, you have made me ſo; but in the Name of the Gods, Madam, do not condemn me upon ſo ſlight a ground: You have heretofore had ſo earneſt a deſire to know whether I was in Love, and whom I loved, when the Prince Atis told you, that I would not feign Affection unto Anaxilea; that I did not think it ſo great a Wrong to tell you the Truth once in my Life: Conſider, Madam, I cannot in juſtice be accuſed of what I now diſcover unto you; for can it be a Crime to be overcome by one who is able to overcome the whole Earth? You ought at the leaſt to hide your Defeat, replied the Princeſs. I hid it from all the World, replied he, knowing well that my Misfortune is ſo great, that it is a ſhame unto my Illuſtrious Conqueror: But for you, Madam, I do confeſs I had a very great deſire to diſcover it to you. But, Madam, if I can obtain ſo much from your Goodneſs, as to pardon me this firſt Crime, I will promiſe you to regulate my Life ſo for the future, as it ſhall pleaſe you, and to ſhut up the violence of my Love in my own Breaſt. Do ſo then, ſaid ſhe unto him, and be ſure, that not one of your Actions, Words, or Looks, may ever call into my Memory the Fault which you have committed this day: And I am reſolved to forget and forgive it, if you will do as I would have you, and as I ſhall appoint you. I ſhall do the utmoſt of my Endeavours to obey you, Madam, replied he; but in the Name of Heavens do not treat me as one that is Innocent, but as one that was Criminal, and you have pardoned him.

The Princeſs not being able to tolerate this Conference any longer, took her leave of Cleander, being not leſs incenſed againſt her ſelf than againſt him, becauſe ſhe thought ſhe had not ſpoken ſharp enough unto him: Since he does not know, ſaid ſhe, that the King has a Deſign in his Advantage, what will he think of me, for hearkning unto him with ſo few ſigns of Anger? And have I not ſome reaſon to fear that my over-indulgence has blotted out that Eſteem which he had of me? Yet, ſaid ſhe, and reprehended her ſelf, I being his Debtor for the King my Father's Life, and for my Brother's, it were not juſt to be ſo ſevere unto him as his Boldneſs deſerves: But indeed, ſaid ſhe further, whoſoever is Cleander's Father, perhaps he may be of ſuch a quality, as would make me bluſh for ſhame, if I knew him, that he ſhould be ſo bold as to tell me he loved me, and I not baniſh him for ever: Ah, my Heart, cried ſhe, thou haſt betrayed me, for the truth is, I do love Cleander more than I thought, or ought to have done; but ſince it is ſo, I ought to learn, by my own Experience, that Cleander is not ſo much to blame; for ſince I cannot hate him when I would, he is excuſable, if he cannot leave loving me when I deſire him. Let him love me then, ſaid ſhe, ſo he love me in ſecret, and tell me no more of it: But yet, though ſhe was not well reconciled with her ſelf upon this Point, yet ſhe was ſo ingenuous as to confeſs ſo much unto Cyleniſa, unto whom ſhe related all her Thoughts when they were together. The truth is, Madam, the Illuſtrious Cleander did carry it ſo judiciouſly, and with ſo much reſpect and diſcretion to the Princeſs all that Winter, as indeed ſhe was conſtrained to let her Heart yield unto that innocent Paſſion which would needs command it; yet ſhe did not let it appear unto Cleander, but under notion of ſolid and ſincere Friendſhip; alway telling him, that it muſt be always carried ſo, becauſe there was an invincible Obſtacle unto his Happineſs: For (ſaid ſhe to him one day, after he had obtained a revocation of that cruel Sentence, to ſpeak no more of his Love) if you did meet with no other hinderances of your good Fortune, but becauſe I do not eſteem you; or, but becauſe I eſteem another more than you; or, becauſe I am inſenſible; time very well might alter all theſe: for I do ingenuouſly confeſs, that I find in your Perſon, and in your Mind, all that is requiſite to obtain my eſteem: You have rendred me an hundred thouſand Services in the Perſon of the King, and in my own; and ſeeing I am perſwaded you love me, my own Inclination is not to hate you; and every thing, except one only, contributes to faſten our Friendſhip: But, Cleander, after all theſe, all Aſia knows, that you know not who you are, and it were a Miracle if you ever ſhould; therefore we muſt engage no farther, but keep within the limits of Friendſhip; not that I eſteem you leſs, or think that your Original deſerves not to be high, but I do acknowledg unto you my Weakneſs: Since all the World is not of my mind, I can baniſh out of my Spirit ſome fears of being blamed, if it ſhould come to be known that I reſerve a private Room in my Heart, for one that is not known who he is: Therefore, Cleander, in regard unto my Honour, content your ſelf with my Friendſhip and Eſteem: Love me in the Secret of your Heart as much as you will, (ſaid ſhe, and bluſh'd) but never expect any more from Palmis than Offices of Friendſhip. I find ſo much Reaſon in your Expreſſions, Madam, replied he, and ſo little Satisfaction to my ſelf, that I know not how to anſwer For as concerning my Original, Madam, I have no Index: to find it out, but only a moſt ſtrong perſwaſion that it is not baſe, becauſe I am ſo bold as to love you, and to love you without any manner of Scruple: Yes, Divine Princeſs, I find in my Soul ſuch a kind of noble Pride, as perſwades me that I may adore you, and do you no wrong: Yet ſince this Proof is only convincing unto my ſelf, I ask no more than what you are pleaſed to conſent unto; and as long as you do not forbid me loving you, I ſhall never complain: for, Madam, the eſteem which I have of your Merit is ſo great, that though I were the Son of a great King, I ſhould not think my ſelf worthy to ask your Affection but upon my Knee.

Things ſtanding upon theſe Terms, although the Princeſs did carry her ſelf towards Cleander with extream Reſervedneſs, yet talking with him ofner than uſual in private, and Love being of ſuch a nature as cannot be long hid, eſpecially where there is inequality between the Parties, Arteſilas began to perceive, that there was ſome alteration between them, and within a few days after he did not queſtion, but Cleander at the leaſt was in love with the Princeſs Palmis, ſince he himſelf was but courſly treated: Jealouſy did rouze up his Heart in a very violent manner: he kept the Buſineſs cloſe, becauſe he would firſt clear his Suſpitions: But after an obſerving Eye upon Cleander's Actions, and aſſuring himſelf that he was his Rival, conceiving alſo that he was the only Cauſe of the

Princeſs her ſcorn upon him; he began to have a moſt ſtrong averſion to Cleander, and intended to put Affronts upon him, and to quarrel with him upon the firſt Occaſion: That which was a quicker ſpur unto his Deſign, was, becauſe he knew Cleander would e're long go to command the Army, and finiſh the Phrygian War: But how hot ſoever he was to quarrel, yet for ſome days he could not bring it about, becauſe Cleander was ſeldom with any but the King, or the Princeſs, unleſs ſometimes with the Princeſs of Claſomena. As he was one day coming from her, Arteſilas met him, and ſpeaking very coldly unto him, I have ſought you ſeveral days, ſaid he, but I could never meet you, unleſs with the King or Princeſs, in whoſe Preſence you are continually. Had I known your Intentions, (replied Cleander with the ſame boldneſs, though very civily) I ſhould have come to you to know your Pleaſure. Perhaps if you had known it, anſwered Arteſilas, you would have been ſo far from coming to me, that you would not have come to the Princeſs of Claſomena. Since I do not uſe to ſhun, either my Friends or my Enemies, anſwered Cleander, I know no reaſon you ſhould ſpeak in that manner unto me. I know leſs reaſon you have, replied Arteſilas, to carry your ſelf as you have done of late. Since I have ever followed the Rules of Reaſon, anſwered Cleander, I do not know how I have misbehaved my ſelf. When you came firſt unto Sardis, replied Arteſilas, it was not eaſy to foreſee that your frequent Viſits of the Princeſs would afterwards prejudice me, or that a Man of your Quality ſhould be ſo bold as to oppoſe ſuch a one as my ſelf. My Quality (replied Cleander, much incenſed) is indeed unknown to me; but I had rather be received by the Princeſs for my own Vertue, than for my Quality only, though it were higher than yours. You may do well to think of your own, replied Arteſilas, and let mine alone; if you do not, I ſhall find out ways to remember you; therefore let me find you no more with the Princeſs, if I do——How, Sir, ſaid Cleander, and interrupted him, force me not to lay aſide thoſe Reſpects which perhaps I ſhould have paid unto your Quality, and remember that Men of Courage cannot not brook to be threatned by any but the Gods only. But you ſhall ſuffer the Threatnings of a Man, replied Arteſilas, and perhaps find ſuch Effects thereof as ſhall not pleaſe you, unleſs you correct your ſelf. Provided that our Swords be equal, replied Cleander fiercely, the inequality of our Conditions ſhall not hinder me from preventing you; but, Sir, do not prophane the Name of the Princeſs in ſuch an Occaſion, as ſhe ought not to be introduced: If you have any ſecret hatred to me, revenge your ſelf generouſly, and do me the honour to tell me, with your Sword in your Hand, whether it be Nature or Fortune which puts a difference between us. You ſhall know that preſently, replied Arteſilas, and drawing his Sword, (as well as a Servant that was with him); ſo that Cleander having his Servant with him alſo, the Fight was upon equal Numbers, though with unequal Succeſs; for Cleander being animated by his Love, by his Jealouſy, and by the angry Language of Arteſilas, did fight with ſuch Fury, that this Prince, as gallant as he was, had a hard task to reſiſt him; ſince Cleander feared, leſt ſome ſhould come in to part them, he dallied not; but driving Blow after Blow upon his Enemy, without any defending himſelf, he preſſed ſo hard upon him, that he loſt his Judgment, and could neither defend himſelf, nor aſſault his Foe: Not that Arteſilas wanted any Courage, but becauſe the miraculous Valour of Cleander ſurprized him, and put him into diſorder: He was wounded at the firſt in two places, without any touch upon Cleander; who after he had given him two other Wounds, he cloſed with him, threw him upon the Ground, and took away his Sword. Then after he had diſarmed him, Do you acknowledg, ſaid he, that you have ſome cauſe to think my Birth is not inferior unto yours? or do you not at the leaſt confeſs, that if there be any difference between us, it is Fortune only which made it? Arteſilas was ſo wounded, and aſhamed at his Defeat, that he had not power to anſwer. At the ſame time ſome Women which belonged to the Princeſs of Claſomena, ſpied them out of a Window at the beginning of the Combat, and ſent ſome Men to part them, but they came not in till all was done; Cleander's der's Servant wounded the Servant of Arteſilas, whoſe Sword was broken. Abradates came in alſo, who cauſed the Prince Arteſilas to be carried unto his Houſe, and who went with Cleander unto his Lodging; not letting him go unto his own until he knew the Cauſe of the Combat, and how the King would receive the News; ſince Craſus loved Cleander very well, and never loved Arteſilas at all, it was no hard matter to perſwade him that Arteſilas was the Challenger; ſo that he ſeemed to be much incenſed againſt him for affronting one who was ſo dear and high in his eſteem. The Friends of Arteſilas did ſweeten the Matter, and told the King, that the Anſwers of Cleander did exaſperate him; and ſince neither of theſe two Rivals did name the Princeſs, ſome ſcornful words which Arteſilas ſpoke concerning the Birth of Cleander, paſſed for the Ground of the Quarrel.

In the mean while all the Court came to viſit him, excepting the Kindred of his Enemy, and ſome of them alſo forſook him, and offered themſelves unto Cleander, whom the Princeſs ſent privately to viſit and rejoice that he was not wounded, not knowing yet what was the Cauſe of the Combat, every one thinking that it was becauſe Arteſilas did treat him as an unknown Man from whence he had his Original: Nothing elſe was talked of; thoſe who had heard a hundred times how he was found, ſtill enquired and related it. The Princeſs her ſelf deſired my Father to make an exact Relation of it; How he ſaw him floating in a Boat with one Woman, ſhe could not ſteer it; how he ſent Sailors to ſuccour him; how he ſaw the Child in a Mantle made of Cloth of Gold; how ſhe who was with him was dumb; how ſhe held in her Hands a Picture, where this Child was repreſented, as Cupid is uſed to be drawn, and with him a fair Lady, which ſeemed to be his Mother by thoſe Verſes which were written underneath; and how this dumb Woman died. The Princes, who never durſt ask to ſee this Picture, did prevail with the Oppoſites to her Curioſity, and deſired Timocreon to ſend it unto her; which he did, and it was I who carried it, unknown to Cleander, for he ſtaid with Abradates, until ſuch time as it was known whether Arteſilas would recover of his Wounds, one of them being very dangerous. The Princeſs bluſh'd when ſhe took the Picture, not being able doubtleſs to receive the Picture of him ſhe loved without confuſion, though it was only the Picture of a Child, yet a Child pictur'd like a God: As ſhe was always uſed to admire all beautiful Things, ſo ſhe admired at this Picture, (which indeed was very admirable) and obſerved how Cleander ſtill retained a great reſemblance of what he was then; but ſhe was charmed with the Beauty of the Mother, whom ſhe Commended with leſs Scruple than ſhe could the Son; though ſhe could not commend the one without the other, becauſe there was a moſt perfect reſemblance: ſhe thought the Invention of the Picture and the Verſes very Pleaſant; and I obſerved, that ſhe looked upon the Magnificent Border of that Picture with much Delight, becauſe it was an infallible Teſtimony that the Birth of Cleander was not Mean: and always extreamly commending the Limner who drew this Picture, ſhe asked me, Whether Timocreon would truſt her with it for a few days, that ſhe might ſhew it unto ſome of her Friends? You may imagine, Madam, that I denied her not, and that it was not long before I acquainted Cleander, that the Princeſs deſired to keep his Picture: But he anſwered me, that he ſhould think himſelf much more happy if ſhe would give him hers, ſince the one was only a bare effect of her Curioſity, and the other would be an Argument of her Affection.

Whilſt things ſtood upon theſe Terms, News was brought that the King of Phrygia was drawing into the Field: So that Cræſus commanded Cleander to prepare himſelf for a March; which he did the very ſame Hour, ſending his Train before him; the King, by virtue of his Supream Authority, did reconcile Arteſilas and him the next Morning. At the ſame time, a Phrygian Man of good Quality, who was an Exile, came unto Sardis to treat concerning the Ranſom of a Priſoner of War; and ſince his Name was known, and that he was a Man of Spirit, Cræſus received him very well, and aſſured him, that if ever there was a Peace made between him and the King of Phrygia, he would make his in particular w that Prince.

Thimettes (that was the Phrygian's Name) had not be long at Sardis, but he went to preſent his Service unto t Princeſs: And coming to her one day when ſhe was in h Cloſet, whilſt they went to acquaint her he deſired to ſe her, he ſaw, upon the Table in her Chamber, this Picture o Venus and Cupid which I told you of before; yet he no ſooner ſaw it, but taking it up, he ſeemed to be extreamly ſurprized: He read the Verſes, he obſerved the Border, an looked upon it moſt preciſely; and having no power t leave it, he asked Cyleniſa who gave this Picture to the Princeſs? She, knowing it was not a thing to be made a Secret on, told him the whole Truth in few words; where he ſeemed much moved. But Cyleniſa imagining that hi Surprize was only at the Novelty of the Adventure, ſh made no Reflection upon it: Thimettes contenting himſel alſo with telling her, that this Picture deſerved to be carefully kept. When he was told the Princeſs was at leiſure, he went to ſee the Princeſs, but his Viſit was no long. As ſoon as he came out from her, he went unt Cleander, who was returned to his own Lodging ſince Arteſilas grew better, and ſince they were reconciled: Ye he could not go ſo ſoon as he intended, becauſe he me with a Man in the way, who acquainted him with grea News, as afterwards we came to know. But after his Buſineſs was done with this Man, he went to Cleander, who imagined that Thimettes came to viſit him only as the King's Favourite; and when he deſired to ſpeak with him in private, he ſuppoſed it was to ſpeak with him concerning his Intereſts with the King of Phrygia, knowing that he was the next day to go unto the Army. As ſoon as they were together in private, Sir, ſaid Thimettes unto him, I have ſuch ſtrange News to tell you, that I know not whether I ſhall be believed at the firſt, though I do aſſure you, that the Illuſtrious Cleander, as unknown as he is unto all the World, and to himſelf, is yet the Son of a great King. Thimettes, ſaid Cleander, (much amazed, and not daring to believe him) If I ſhould credit my own Heart, I ought to give credit unto your Words; but if I look upon all appearances, I muſt needs doubt of what you ſay. It is moſt certain though, replied Thimettes, that you are Son to the King of Phrygia, and as certain as I am his Subject. How, ſaid Cleander, am I Son to the King of Phrygia whom I fought with, and whom I am going to fight with again? Yes, Sir, anſwered he, you are ſo; and ſo certainly, that you ſhall not doubt of it, if you will but take the pains to hear me. Speak then, Thimettes, (ſaid Cleander haſtily) for you tell me ſuch welcome and ſuch ſtrange News all at once, that I cannot too ſoon know the Truth, and that I may know whether Joy or Sorrow be my Fate. Sir, replied, Thimettes, I cannot utter ſuch great things as I have to tell in few words; and the Crown which I bring you may well allow me a quarter of an Hours patience. Be pleaſed to know then, Sir, that the King, your Father, who reigns at this day, who whilſt the late King lived, was called the Prince Artamus, being deſperately in love with a Lady whoſe Name was Elſimena, who was of a Noble Blood, but not a Princeſs; and he uſed all his Endeavours to make his Affection acceptable: But ſince this Lady was as Vertuous as Fair, and yet as Fair and fairer than any in either High or Low Phrygia, ſhe refuſed the paſſionate Addreſſes of this Prince with much conſtancy, ever telling him, that as his Love was Vicious, ſo he ſhould find her Rigorous. I ſhall not relate unto you, Sir, all the particulars of this Love, only tell you, that the Prince Tydeus, Brother unto the King your Father, and unto the Prince Adraſtus who died in this Court, though then at that time a Child, was his Rival, and were obnoxious one unto another; and this Lady behaved her ſelf with ſo much prudence between them both, that her Wiſdom was admired by all the World: I had then the honour to be in favour with the Prince Artamus, and to be the Confident of his Paſſion. I happened one day to be with Elſimena, who was then at Apamea, when theſe two Rivals were both there, and when, without any diſſimulation of her Thoughts ſhe told them, that he whom ſhe would prefer, ſhould doubtleſs be him who gave her the beſt teſtimonies of a vertuous Paſſion; which they might have time enough to do, ſince both of them told her, that they could not marry her during the Life of the King their Father. However, ſince ſhe loved the Prince Artamus, better than ſhe did the Prince Tydeus, ſhe made a Vow to ſend Offerings unto Delphos, if it would pleaſe the Gods (whom they adore) to inſpire him with a Deſign to marry her: So that whether it was the Vertue of this Vow, or that the Prince Artamus grew more in love, he reſolved to marry her ſecretly: And I was a Witneſs of the Marriage, with four others of Quality who lived there: It was ſolemnized in the ſame Temple where the Gordeon Knot is kept, this Amorous Prince reſolving that this Union ſhould be more indiſſolvable than it. The Buſineſs was very ſecretly done, and the Sacrificer was abſolutely gained, that no Rumors of it ſhould be divulged: And Elſimena treated the Prince her Husband before the World, as if he were not ſo much as her Lover. But to free her ſelf from the Perſecution of the Prince Tydeus, and to enjoy in more freedom the Converſation of the Prince Artamus, who was much more amorous after Marriage than before, ſhe went to dwell with her Mother at a Caſtle on the Sea-ſide, whither the Prince came often unto her, unknown unto any, feigning divers ſmall Journies, or Huntings, to colour his Abſence; and I often went with him. Never was Paſſion more violent than his, nor better grounded, for certainly Elſimena was a Miracle of Beauty, Wit, and Vertue. But, Sir, e're long this Princeſs was with Child, and preſently after gave you Life. The Prince Artamas was overjoyed to have a Son. Some Reports went about the World of his Marriage. The Prince Tydeus had two or three fallings-out with his Brother about it. The King had heard of it, and abſolutely forbad Artamus from ſeeing Elſimena, ſo that he could not viſit her without much difficulty; for he had ſo many watching Eyes upon him, that he was not maſter of his own Actions. However, Sir, you live, and have ſuch a perfect reſemblance of the Princeſs your Mother, that I never in my Life ſaw two Faces more like, that were of a different Sex and Age. Since the Prince Artamas could ſee Elſimena but very ſeldom, he appointed me to procure her Picture; ſo that carrying an excellent Painter unto the place where ſhe was, ſhe would ſend him the Picture of her Son as well as of her ſelf; the Device of the Drawer was to paint a Venus and a Cupid, the one to reſemble her, the other you: The Conceit did ſo pleaſe the Princeſs, that ſhe cauſed two to be made, intending to ſend one unto the Prince, and to keep another her ſelf; but ſince the Prince was ſtill a Lover as well as a Husband, he cauſed thoſe Verſes which you have ſeen to be written at the bottom of both Pictures; the Verſes were writ in Greek, becauſe the Princeſs then learned that Language, which was much in uſe among the Ladies of Quality in Apamea, who had any Reputation of Wit.

Mean while the King of Phrygia died, and the Prince Artamas, being elder than either the Prince Tydeus, or the Prince Adraſtus, ſucceeded in the Throne, and was in a condition to crown Elſimena his Queen: As ſoon as the Funerals of the King his Father were ſolemnized, he publiſhed his Marriage, and and magnificent Preparations were made to receive the Princeſs at Apamea; to acknowledg her Queen before all the People, and by Conſequence to declare you his legitimate Heir and only Succeſſor. This great Feaſt was ſo near, that the ſtately Coach which was prepared for the Princeſs at her Entry was gone unto her, and I ſent every thing requiſite, and neglected not ſo much as a Mantle made of Cloth of Gold, in which you were to be wrapped that day of his Ceremonies; but alas, Sir, the day was pitifully diſturbed: for two days before her departure, ſince all things were in readineſs for her ſtately Entry, and the King your Father joyed beyond all Expreſſions, being gone towards the Princeſs, to teſtify his Satisfaction unto her, I met upon the way Men who came to advertiſe the King, that ſome had ſurprized the Caſtle the Night before; had carried away the Queen your Mother, and you, and alſo all which was of value in that place, where there were things of great conſideration, for all the Jewels of the Crown were there, Artamas having ſent them unto his dear Elſimena, ſince he was King: I leave you to judg, Sir, how I was amazed: Since I was not far from the Caſtle, I went unto it; and I underſtood by the Mother of Elſimena, who died for Grief within a few days after, that Men in Arms who were unknown had ſurprized it, and had carried the Princeſs and you, with all the rich Booty, into a Ship, but none knew which way theſe Raviſhers went, becauſe it was Night, having plundered the Caſtle ſo clean, that they left almoſt nothing in it: However, this ſad News muſt be carried unto the King, who received it ſo ſadly, that I thought he would have loſt both his Life and Reaſon; he cauſed a moſt ſtrict ſearch to be made every where, to ſee if it could be diſcovered who were the Actors, but all in vain: He ſent ſeveral Ships at random to ſeek about. He much ſuſpected the Prince Tydeus, both as his Rival and as an ambitious Man, who had in one day taken from him his Succeſſor, and the Perſon whom he loved as well as he did; but having no Proofs againſt this Prince, who never had ſtirred from Court, nor ſo much as any pregnant Conjectures; he could not accuſe him: Tydeus ſeemed to be much troubled at the loſs, and the King your Father was forced to endure a Miſery, without having ſo much Conſolation as to know whom he ſhould be revenged upon, nor of whom to complain. After this he ſtill made a diligent Enquiry, and continually grieved for his dear Elſimena, never giving Ear unto any that mentioned him to a ſecond Wife, and having no other Comfort but in the Picture of his deareſt Elſimena. However, he could never have any Confidence in the Prince Tydeus ſince that time, who often left the Court, made many Journies, and at the laſt went to dwell in the lower Phrygia. I ſhall not tell you, Sir, how the Prince Adraſtus going to viſit him, had the Misfortune as he was ſhooting in his Park, to kill him with an Arrow, without any deſign of it, for I know you are not ignorant of it; and thus the Juſtice of Heaven, which ſees that Crime no Man could ſee, did puniſh him in ſuch an extraordinary way. But give me leave to tell you, that ſome of my Enemies, with much Injuſtice falling upon me in the King's Preſence, and procuring his Diſpleaſure, I was forced to abſent my ſelf for ſome time, and I had not come into this Court, but only to endeavour the liberty of a Nephew whom you took Priſoner in the laſt Battel, and not with Intentions to bear Arms againſt the King my Maſter. Mean while, Sir, I no ſooner ſaw you with the King of Lydia, but I found ſome Features in your Face which did ſo freſhly revive the Image of your Mother in my Mind, that me-thought I knew you; yet the longneſs of the time ſince, and the little appearance of any Truth in my Thoughts, cauſed me to make no further Reflection upon it; for I had heard you were one whom Fortune had raiſed, but I never did particularly know you, nor who you were. But, Sir, as I was with the Princeſs, I chanced to ſee that Picture which I cauſed to be made, and which that dumb Woman gave unto Timocreon; this did ſo extreamly amaze me, that I knew not well what the Princeſs thought of my odd Converſation, my Mind being at ſuch diſtraction at it: At my coming out from her, as if this day were a day of Prodigies, I met an old Man who knew me, and who at the firſt I knew not, he deſired to ſpeak with me in private concerning ſome matters of conſequence; after a ſerious look upon him, I remembred that I had ſeen him about the Prince Tydeus, ſo that wondering to ſee him at Sardis, I gave him hearing. Then, Sir, he told me, that ſince he had already one foot in the Grave, and ready to render an account unto the Gods of all his Crimes, he would endeavour to merit a Pardon by an ingenuous Confeſſion, which he would make unto me. After this he diſcovered, that the late Prince Tydeus his Maſter, was the Man who cauſed the Princeſs Elſimena and you to be carried away, out of ſome Humours of Jealouſy, Rage, Ambition, and Revenge, finding ſome Sweetneſs in depriving his Rival of the only Perſon he loved; and much more in taking away from him a Succeſſor, by that means to aſſure himſelf of a Crown, or at leaſt render himſelf more conſiderable in the Kingdom, ſince he ſhould be looked upon as one who hereafter ſhould be King; for he believed the King his Brother could never forget Elſimena, nor would every marry again. This Man told me then that he was the chief in the Enterprize: That the Prince Tydeus appointed him to go and dwell in one of the Iſles of Cyclades which was leaſt peopled, and to keep Elſimena from ſpeaking unto any whoſoever, intending to put neither her, nor you to Death, becauſe he thought that if his Crime ſhould be diſcovered, he had a moſt certain way to ſave his Life, being Maſter of yours, and of the Queen your Mothers.

This Man, whoſe Name is Acrates, told me then, that obeying his Maſter, he carried away the Princeſs Elſimena and you, and that he took with him all the Riches in the Caſtle, but leſt he ſhould be diſcovered, he took but one Woman of the Queen's to wait upon her, and placed none about her but a dumb Slave which he had, who was not able to reveal his Secrets. He confeſſed that when he was come unto one of theſe Cycladean Iſlands with this deplorable Princeſs, he ſold the Ship in which he brought her: and he remained Poſſeſſour of all the Riches which ſhe had, with three of his Complices. He did proteſt unto me, that he did not treat her rigorouſly, but that Sorrow did ſo change her Countenance that ſhe was hardly knowable; he further told me, that the Prince Tydeus, ſeeing he was not accuſed of his Crime, and that in all Likelihood the King his Brother ſhould never know it, he changed his Mind, and reſolved to put the Princeſs Elſimena and you to Death, fearing leſt in Tract of Time, that which once he thought would ſave him, ſhould now ruin him: ſo that he ſent Orders unto Acrates to put you both to Death: giving all the Treaſures to him in Recompence, and to his three Complices. As for the Souldiers and Mariners which helped to carry her and you away, they were all Strangers, and knew not about what they were imployed. The Souldiers being a kind of Moſstroopers, and the Mariners Pirats; Men eaſily invited to any bad Imployments without ſo much as asking what it is. So theſe wicked Villains, after they had ſeized upon all which reſiſted them in the Caſtle, and brought you to this Iſle, they diſperſed themſelves, having received their Wages before they committed the Crime, and left none with Elſimena, but a dumb Slave, and theſe four Men. Acrates then having received theſe Orders, did aſſure me that he reſiſted his Companions as much as he could, yet being but one againſt three, he could not prevail with them, and could do no more but acquaint Elſimena ſecretly, that they had received Commands to put her, and her Son to Death; and that theſe Men maugre his Reſiſtance, would ere long execute it: he added further, that this unfortunate Queen being ſick, did not take care for her ſelf, but all her Thoughts was to preſerve your Life: That ſhe took you in her Arms, and after ſhe had kiſſed you with Eyes ſwimming in Tears, ſhe put you into the Hands of the dumb Slave, making Signs unto her, that ſhe ſhould go and carry you to Delphos, for Elſimena being lodged by the Sea-ſide, they could ſee that Iſle out of their Window: Moreover, that ſhe took the Picture, which they had left her, and writing ſome Lines upon it in haſte, ſhe gave it unto this Slave: He ſaid, that this mute Woman, finding a Mantle of Cloth Gold (in which you ſhould have been carried that Day on which your Mother ſhould have been crowned) and wrapt you in it: that going haſtily out in the Beginning of the Night, Acrates following her at a Diſtance, ſhe came unto an old Fiſherman, conjuring him with all her Signs to carry her unto Delphos, giving him for his Wages a Jewel which ſhe had. In the mean time, the unfortunate Elſimena did ſo grieve at her Misfortune, that her Jaylors did not need either Sword or Poyſon to make her die; and ſhe fell into ſuch a mortal Paſſion, that ſhe never revived: The Funeral of this deplorable Princeſs was the next Day performed without any Ceremony. Acrates further ſaid, that the Abſence of this Child did much perplex them: and upon Enquiry they could hear no more, but that the mute Woman had taken Boat, wherein was only an old Fiſherman to guide it: who being put off a good way from the Shore (where the Wife of this Fiſherman ſtood) he reached to the Rudder ſo far that he fell into the Sea, and was drowned, becauſe he was too old, and too weak to ſwim: ſo that the Boat was left to the Wind and the Waves. Acrates related further, that when his Companions returned to the Houſe, and could not find neither the Child, nor the Slave, they ſuſpected him as acceſſory to her Flight; but he ſaid, he diſſembled it ſo well that they altered their Minds; alſo flattering themſelves in their Crimes, they believed this Infant would periſh in the Boat which had no Pilot to guide it: ſo that after they had divided the Treaſures, and ſent unto the Prince Tydeus, that the Mother and the Child were dead, they parted one from another, and every one took his ſeveral Courſe. As for Acrates, he came to Sardis, where he has lived a moſt diſcontented and melancholy Life, notwithſtanding his Riches: he added further, that ſince the Combate between Arteſilas, and you, hearing of the Obſcurity of your Birth, and likewiſe underſtanding in what manner Timocreon found you, he made no doubt but that you were Son to the King of Phrygia; but he ſaid, he could not reſolve to confeſs his Crime unto you; yet ſeeing me, he could not hold, but muſt needs diſcover it, to the end he might find the King of Phrygia a Succeſſour, ſince there was no more of his Family left. So Sir, ſaid Thimettes, I have no more to ſay, but to deſire you that I may have the Favour to ſee the Paper which this Princeſs writ, for I underſtand that Timocreon hath it. Cleander was ſo amazed at this Relation, that he could hardly anſwer him: yet at laſt ſending for my Father, and that he ſhould bring the Paper which the mute Slave gave him, he inſtantly came, and gave it unto Cleander, who gave it unto Thimettes. But he no ſooner ſaw it, then crying out, and holding up his Hands; Ah Sir, ſaid he, I need not open it, to know whether it be the Hand of the Princeſs Elſimena; for I know this Seal which I ſee upon it. In ſaying ſo, he opened it, and reading theſe Words, This Infant is recommended unto the God which is adored at Delphos: he read it over again; Doubt it not Sir, ſaid he, make no Queſtion but you are Son to the King of Phrygia: Theſe Characters are ſo exactly the Hand of the Princeſs Elſimena, that nothing in the World can be more certain, ſince I know her Hand, and her Orthography: for I think I have carried an hundred Letters from this Princeſs to your Father, who was often-times pleaſed to ſhew them unto me, delighting to ſee me admire at the Wit of Elſi- mena, who writ admirably well in any ſtrange Language. Moreover, Sir, I may perhaps ſhew you one thing which is very ſtrange; be pleaſed to know, Sir, that a while before he married her, ſince he was pleaſed to give her ſome Aſſurances of his Affection in Writing, he writ upon a kind of Paper, the Invention whereof was mine, which is not common: For, Sir, after that one hath written what one pleaſeth, one may cover the Characters with a certain Compoſition put upon the Paper, which will make it ſeem as if nothing were writ upon it, yet when one pleaſeth, one may eaſily take that off which covers them, and cover it again at ones Pleaſure; ſo that if my Memory fail me not, it was this Paper which I carried unto the unfortunate Elſimena, which contained the firſt Aſſurance which the Prince Artamas gave her, that he would marry her: ſince it was her Cuſtom to cover again all the Letters which the Prince did write unto her, after ſhe had read them, that ſhe might thereby keep them more ſafely: It is requiſite that I ſhew it unto you, then going to the Fire, he took away that which hid the Characters of the King of Phrygia's Letter unto this amiable Lady, and he read aloud theſe Words:

The Prince Artamas unto the incomparable Elſimena.

AT the laſt, Love hath overcome all cruel Reaſons of State, which did oppoſe my Happineſs: And though I were aſſured, that by marrying you, I ſhould loſe that Crown which I am to wear, yet would I reſolve upon it, and bid the other adieu; for I make no Compariſon betwixt you, and all the Crowns in the World: yet I hope the Gods will preſerve it for me, that I may make you a Queen. In the mean time Thimettes hath Orders to ask that Lady who gave you Liſe, and is to diſpoſe of you, when it is her Pleaſure I ſhall be happy: The Sacrificer of Apollo*'s Temple has promiſed me to be ſecret and faithful: and I do aſſure you, my dear* Elſimena, that the never to be untied Knot which is kept there, will ſooner be looſed, than that which ties my Heart unto your Service.

Artamas.

After that Thimettes had read this Letter, See, Sir, ſaid he to Cleander, whether you can wiſh any more to inform your Knowledg; look upon the Writing of the King your Father, and of the Queen your Mother, which will remove all Scruples of Doubt. Moreover (ſaid he in looking upon the Paper a little nearer) I perceive ſome dim Line of the Queen's own Hand, which is diſcovered in coming near the Fire, which doubtleſs was covered by the ſame ſubtle Compoſition, without any Intention, which by ſome chance was poured upon it, and warmed by the Heat of the Sun, when the Slave had it in the Boat: And indeed, looking upon that Place, where it was written; This Infant is recommended unto the God which is adored at Delphos: there was to be ſeen following; Who without doubt will reſtore him to the King of Phrygia his Father. Cleander was ſo aſtoniſhed, Timocreon was ſo glad, and Thimettes eſteemed himſelf ſo happy, at the Diſcovery of ſuch an important Buſineſs, that all three knew not how to expreſs themſelves. My Father cauſed the Cloth-of-Gold Mantle to be brought, in which the Child was found in the Boat, and which he carefully preſerved; but Thimettes before he ſaw it, deſcribed it ſo preciſely, and all things found ſo exactly as he had ſaid, that there was no Scruple nor Objection to be made; and as oft as Thimettes minded the Reſemblance between Cleander and Elſmena, he wondered that he did not at the firſt know him to be Son unto the King of Phrygia. But, Sir, ſaid he unto him, after I have told you your Quality, it is requiſite I let you know your firſt Name; and that I tell you it was your Father's Pleaſure, to give you the ſame with himſelf: ſo that you muſt change the famous Name of Cleander, for that af Artamas, which is your own.

After this, Cleander would needs ſee Acrates, and heard from his own Mouth the Relation of his Crime; aſſuring Thimettes, and him alſo, that he would pardon him: However, ſince there was War between the King of Phrygia and Crœſus, it was not thought expedient to divulge the Buſineſs: And Cleander, who had ſecret Deſigns, which Timocreon was ignorant of, after he had embraced him, and told him, that he was no leſs a Debtor unto him for his Life than he was unto the King his Father; after, I ſay, a thouſand thankful Expreſſions unto Thimettes and him, he deſired them to leave him at Liberty unto his private Thoughts, not intending yet to treat Thimettes as a Subject unto the King his Father, nor look upon Timocreon but with his accuſtomed Reſpects. Since I knew not what had paſſed, I came into the Chamber, when theſe Perſons went out, and ſince he had truſted me with all his Secrets, and diſcovered unto me all his ill Fortunes, it was his Pleaſure I ſhould participate both of his good and bad Fortune: So that ſtaying me with him, and after he had in ſhort related all unto me, as I began to rejoice that he was the Son of a great King; Ah Soſicles, ſaid he unto me, how heavy do I think this Crown, though yet it be not upon my Head? for truly I ſee many croſs and many agreeable Conſequences of it. I conceive, replied I, that ſince the Princeſs Palmis can deſire no more in you than an illuſtrious Birth, you have Reaſon to be ſatisfied, and hope to be happy. You do not conſider, Soſicles, ſaid he unto me, that as ſoon as I tell I am the Son of a King, ſo ſoon do I tell her that I am the Son of her Father's Enemy: Moreover, do you not conceive that Cræſus thinks I ought to depart within theſe two Days at moſt to go and fight the King of Phrygia? and Soſicles, how do you think I can go and tell him, that I neither can nor ought to go? May I not expect after this, that he will look upon me as Nephew to the Murtherer of the Prince his Son? and indeed, Soſicles, is there not more cauſe to fear that this ſeeming good Fortune will cauſe me real Miſery, than there is to hope for any end of my Miſeries? If I go unto the King my Father whom I have fought againſt, whom I have overcome, and whom I thought to kill with my own Hands, is there not ſome Reaſon to think, that he will expect the ſame Valour which has been ſo fatal unto him, ſhould reſtore him that which it hath gotten from him? and yet can I ſo much as think of fighting againſt my Benefactor, and which is more than that, the Father of the Princeſs Palmis? Alſo, knowing as I do, that I am the King of Phrygia's Son, ſhall I ſtay any longer in the Country of Crœſus? May not the King my Father diſclaim me, and not acknowledg me his Son, if I ſhould continue fighting, not only for my Enemies, but alſo againſt him? Yet, Soſicles, I am put to this croſs Neceſſity: Oh, I wiſh to the Gods that my Princeſs, who does not hate me as unknown, would not hate me when I am known unto her: But, Soſicles, if my Princeſs cannot find a way to reconcile all theſe Contraries, but ſhall think, that to be her Lover, and the Son of her Enemy, are two Qualities incomparable, I am reſolved to renounce the Throne, and without ever aſſuming the Name of Artamas, continue Cleander eternally. But, Sir, ſaid I unto him, as long as you are Cleander, you muſt fight againſt the King your Father. Ah, Soſicles, ſaid he, the Combates already with him, have cauſed ſuch Horror in me, that though I would fight again againſt him, yet I think my Hand would not obey me: Did I not tell you, that I was not ſo happy as you thought me? Oh moſt cruel Fortune, canſt thou not preſent me with any Benefits, but thou muſt poyſon them? Do but admire my Fortune, Soſicles: The King of Phrygia and the King of Lydia never had any Wars between them until within this Year: ſo that if my Birth had been diſcovered at any time before this, I had been abſolutely happy. Moreover, do you not conſider, my Deſtinies would needs have me to be the Son of that King only, againſt whom Crœſus had declared War? Therefore muſt it not needs be confeſſed, that my Fortune is very odd and ill, and that it is not eaſy to foreſee it any better? But whatſoever fall out, I ſhall for ever love my Princeſs, and ſhall think, that good Fortune conſiſts only in the Enjoyment of her Heart.

As Cleander was thus thinking, a Meſſenger came to tell him that Crœſus asked for him, and had received News that the King of Phrygia was entered into his Dominions. I leave you to judg, Madam, how this went againſt his Mind; yet muſt he go unto this Prince, and did ſo; but he was ſo puzzled to anſwer him, that Crœſus perceived ſomething did trouble his Mind, and asked what it was? but Cleander did not tell him; for ſince yet he had not ſeen his Princeſs, he knew not whether it would be her

Pleaſure he ſhould: he anſwered him then in obſcure Words; yet ſince the Phrygian War did wholly take up the Mind of Crœſus, he took no Notice of them; he told him that he muſt needs depart within this Day or two to vanquiſh his Enemy, who ſeemed to have a Deſign to conquer his Conqueror: But Cleander, ſaid he unto him, I would have you remember, it is the laſt Victory which gives the Prize to all the reſt; and for your part, I know you have ſo much Glory and Honour to preſerve, that you are no leſs intereſted than my ſelf in the good or bad Succeſs of this War. After this he took his leave of him, and told him, that he would go and bid adieu unto all his Friends. Cleander being glad to be rid of a Converſation which was ſo troubleſom, went unto the Princeſs, who believing that he came to bid her adieu, no ſooner ſaw him enter into her Cloſet, where ſhe was alone with Cylenisa, but addreſſing her ſelf unto him, Though I do not doubt, ſaid ſhe, but you go to overcome your Enemies, ſince you go to fight them; yet ſince you cannot do that without Hazard of your Life, and without leaving me, I cannot ſee you depart without much Sorrow. Madam, anſwered he and ſighed, Victory is ſuch a thing as I ought not to think upon, and when you ſhall know what I have heard, ſince I had the Honour to ſee you, I am ſure you will be of my Opinion. How, Cleander, ſaid ſhe unto him, have you offered any Sacrifices unto the Gods which have not been accepted? or, has the Gods forewarned you by any ſiniſter Preſages of ſome bad Accident? The Gods, Madam, replied he, have let me know the beſt and moſt agreeable News in the World in Appearance, ſince they have let me underſtand by a marvellous Accident of what Quality I am: But in the Name of the Gods, Madam, I do beſeech you, do not hate me when you ſhall know it. The Princeſs was much amazed at this Diſcourſe, and knew not how to anſwer him: yet imagining that his only Reaſon was becauſe he had found himſelf of ſome mean Quality, ſhe anſwered him in theſe Terms, though in much Impatience: Since your Virtues are the ſame ſtill, of what Quality ſoever you are, I do aſſure you I ſhall always eſteem you the ſame; and though the Knowledg of what you are, may make me change my manner of living with you, yet it ſhall never change my Heart. Since it is ſo, Madam, ſaid he unto her, I ſhall not fear to tell you, that I am Son to the King of—— How, Cleander, ſaid ſhe, and interrupted him, what Pleaſure can you have in making me ſad? Why would you have me buy ſuch welcome News with ſo much Sorrow? You ſhall ſee, Madam, replied he, that the Buſineſs is not ſo well as you imagine, when you ſhall underſtand that the Prince who gave me Life, is the ſame King of Phrygia whom you commanded me to vanquiſh, and that it is not lawful for me to fight againſt him. And then he told her in as ſhort a method as he could, how Thimettes had ſeen the Picture of Venus upon her Table; how Cylenisſa had told him in what manner it was found; and made Relation of all he knew from Thimettes and Acrates, and neglected not any Circumſtance which might juſtify his Quality unto the Princeſs, who did hearken unto him with much Attention and Joy, though mingled with ſome unquiet Thoughts.

After he had ended his Relation; As terrible an Enemy as you are, ſaid ſhe unto him, I eſteem you ſo much, as that I would not have you unknown Cleander again, but much rather you were the Prince Artamas; Not but that I do foreſee the angry Conſequences which this glorious Quality may bring upon you; but yet the King of Phrygia and the King my Father may happily conclude a Peace, and then you could not poſſibly be the Son of a King unleſs you had been born ſo: But, ſaid ſhe, what do you deſign? for I conceive that the Thoughts of the Prince Artamas will not concur with the Thoughts of the unknown Cleander. The Thoughts of Cleander, ſaid he unto her, are not changed, ſince he knew he was the Prince Artamas: But I do not know whether the Princeſs of Lydia's Mind be changed or no. Doubtleſs it is, replied ſhe, for I ſhall be more civil towards the Prince Artamas, than I was to Cleander. That is not the Queſtion I ask (ſaid he unto her) I only deſire you would be pleaſed to continue the ſame goodneſs unto me, as you did before, and that you adviſe me what to do; for truly I ſtand in great need of it. They ought to be more prudent, and leſs intereſted than I am, anſwered ſhe, who can give you any good Counſel. Then abſolutely command me what is your Pleaſure I ſhould do, ſaid he unto her, for I make no queſtion but that you will have a care of my Honour in your Commands; and therefore, my Divine Princeſs, I will preſcribe no limits unto you, but abſolutely refer my ſelf to your Commands: Speak then, Madam, I conjure you, and tell me, what is your Pleaſure ſhall become of me? How can I diſobey Cræſus, who would have me go and fight, and vanquiſh the King of Phrygia? how can I do all this, ſince I have the Honour to be Son unto that Prince? The Gods preſerve me, ſaid ſhe, from giving you any ſuch Counſel. I expected no leſs from your Virtue, ſaid he unto her, and give you Thanks for not putting me unto ſo dangerous a Teſt, nor force me to diſobey you, nor becoming the moſt criminal amongſt Men: And ſince Madam, you are pleaſed to conſent that I ſhould not fight againſt the King my Father, I am fully reſolved never to fight againſt yours. I do conjure you to do ſo, ſaid ſhe unto him, by the Affection which you have promiſed me. There needs not ſo ſtrong a Conjuration, anſwered he, for certainly I ſhould never have done it, though I had never promiſed you: But Madam, I ſee very well what I ought not to do, but I do not yet ſee what I ought to do, and yet I muſt do ſomething, and reſolve upon it preſently, for the King will needs have me depart within this day or two; all my Men are already on their March: and the Troops which I muſt command are perhaps already near the King of Phrygia; and the leaſt delay may prove fatal unto me. Tell me then Madam, would you have me diſcover my ſelf unto the King your Father? or would you have me go and make my ſelf known unto the King of Phrygia? and that I endeavour to move him unto a Peace, whilſt you tranſact the ſame with Cræſus? Pronounce my Doom, I beſeech you, but whatſoever it be, do not baniſh me from your Heart, nor exile me a long time from your Preſence. Then ſaid ſhe, and ſighed, I muſt know how to do Miracles, ſince without them there is no Poſſibility of contenting you: for ſince the Condition you are in permits me with more freeneſs to open my Heart unto you, I ſhall tell you one thing which will make you wonder, and which will grieve you both, which is, that if you had ſtill continued in uncertainty of your Birth, at your return from this Battel, it was the King my Father's Pleaſure, that he who ſhould marry me, ſhould help the Prince Myrſiles to govern after his Death, and ſupport the Scepter after his Death, and was reſolved, if I can tell it you without a bluſh, to make choice of you, and engage you unto it by his Alliance. Oh Madam, ſaid Cleander, ſince it is ſo, let me not be a Son unto the King, ſince I do not wiſh to be ſo, but only to obtain that Honour. No, ſaid the Princeſs, and though ways could be deviſed to prevent your fighting againſt the King your Father, none could be deviſed to hide your illuſtrious Birth, Thimocreon, Thimettes, Soſicles, and Acrates would never keep that Secret which would deprive you of a Crown, neither do I my ſelf deſire it: But that which moves me to tell you this, is to let you ſee it would be in vain to diſcover your ſelf unto the King my Father; for I underſtand this Morning from the ſame Perſon who gave me the firſt intelligence of it, that ſeveral ſtranger Princes have made offers of Marriage unto him; and his Anſwers to them all was, that he was reſolved, as I told you before, to marry me unto one, who ſhould hereafter aſſiſt my Brother to govern. How, Madam, cryed out Cleander, is the Quality of a King's Son, which I ſo much wiſhed, becauſe I thought it abſolutely neceſſary to obtain that happineſs which without it I could never hope for, is it then an invincible Obſtacle unto my Felicity? Ah Madam, if it be, then I reject a Crown, and had much rather be Cleander then Prince Artamas. I do not directly tell you, replied ſhe, that this Obſtacle is invincible; but I ſay it is a great one: Moreover, ſince it is permitted me to diſcover my Weakneſs unto you, I muſt confeſs, I could hardly reſolve to marry a Man whom all Aſia thought to be of a mean Original: Therefore let us tranſact as we ought, and leave the reſt unto the Providence of the Gods. This abſolute Reſignation, replied Cleander and ſighed, denotes thus much unto me, Madam, that all my Affection, all my Cares, and all my Services, have obtained nothing from you but this, that you permit me to love you, without your hating me: But, Madam, if you will with a little more Tenderneſs towards me, conſider it, you will find, that it is not ſo eaſy a matter to do what one ought, or to know what ones Duty is. Yet I think, replied ſhe, that as long as you neither fight againſt the King your Father, nor mine, you cannot be much blamed. But, Madam, anſwered he, I do not ſee how I can do that, unleſs I diſcover my ſelf unto the King, and by his conſent ſend unto the King of Phrygia. It would be difficult, replied ſhe, for the King your Father to know you are his Son unleſs he ſee you, eſpecially not knowing you to be in his Enemies Countrey: Moreover, do you think that the King my Father will be contented to loſe both the Conqueror and the Conqueſt in one Day? Do you not apprehend more Probability that he will incline more unto Policy than Generoſity in this Buſineſs? No, no, ſaid ſhe, I will not counſel you to that. What will you then adviſe me unto, Madam? replied he: Since Timocreon, replied ſhe, knows the ſtate of your Fortune, diſcover unto him the ſtate of your Affection unto me alſo: I know him to be wiſe and generous; and he will not adviſe you unto any thing which ſhall be diſſerviceable either to the King his Maſter, or your ſelf.

At the laſt, after much ſuch diſcourſe as this, Cleander ſent to ſeek my Father; and alſo let the Princeſs ſee Thimettes and Acrates ſecretly; and he ſhewed unto her the Letters of the King of Phrygia, and the Queen his Wiſe. After much Conſultation upon the beſt Courſe, it was reſolved that Cleander ſhould depart without diſcovering any thing unto Cræſus; that my Father and I ſhould accompany him; that Thimettes and Acrates ſhould go this Vogage alſo; That after one days Journey from Sardis, Cleander ſhould ſend one of his Servants unto Meneceus, with a Letter for him, and another for the King, which he ſhould preſent unto him, by which he ſhould diſcover his Birth, and aſſure him that he will never act any thing againſt his Service, nor forget his Benefits: That he ſhould write alſo unto the Prince Myrſiles, unto Mexaris and Abradates, that they ſhould addreſs themſelves to the King in his behalf: That in the mean time they ſhould ſtay upon the Frontiers of Phrygia, and ſend Timocreon towards the King his Father, to acquaint him with the Story, and to beſeech his favour unto Thimettes and Acrates, who was as generous in his Repentance, as he was weak in committing his Crime, by the Commands of his Maſter: That Cleander when he was made known ſhould endeavour to move the King his Father unto Peace; and that the Princeſs, as well as Meneceus, ſhould on their ſide endeavour the ſame with the King of Lydia. After theſe Reſolves, ſhe reſtored the Letters back unto Timocreon, who loving Cleander no leſs than if he had been his Son, was ready to engage his utmoſt in his Service. Since all theſe Conſults and Meetings could not be, but ſome Spies which the Prince Arteſilas always kept about the Princeſs would perceive it, he was preſently acquainted with it. Moreover, ſince Cleander had not bid his laſt adieu unto the Princeſs Palmis, he endeavoured to obtain leave to ſpeak in private with her: And in order to that, the next Morning at her return from the Temple, Cleander went unto her, and talked near two Hours with her, where ſuch paſſionate diſcourſe paſſed, and ſhe returned ſuch generous and obliging Anſwers, not derogating from that exact Virtue whereof ſhe made Profeſſion, that Cleander, as amorous as he was, could not complain, though all he could obtain from her, was, That ſhe engaged her ſelf to eſteem him as long as ſhe lived. This Separation was ſo tender on both ſides, that it was impoſſible for Cleander to purge his Eyes from that profound melancholy which had ſeized upon him; ſo that thoſe who obſerved it by orders from Arteſilas, acquainted him with what they had ſeen. Then he knowing of all theſe ſecret Meetings of Timocreon, Thimettes, Acrates, Cleander, the Princeſs, and my ſelf, he conjectured that there was ſome cloſe Deſign in hand: he employed all Inventions that he could poſſibly deviſe, to diſcover what it might be: He ſuborned one of my Father's domeſtick Servants with Money, and by him he underſtood that my Father was preparing for a Voyage, and carried with him all his beſt Things: Alſo he found out that Cleander had ſent in all haſte to command his Men back which were gone into the Army: He learned further, that he had layed Poſt-horſes in five or ſix places which was not the way unto the Army: Indeed, he had gathered ſo much, as he perſwaded the King by one of his Friends, that Cleander had ſome Deſigns to betray him; that my Father and I did the ſame; and that this Conſpiracy was plotted by Thimettes, who ſeemed (as this Friend of Arteſilas ſaid) to be out of favour with the Phrygian King, that he might be leſs ſuſpected in this Court, and that he gave out he came only about the Ranſom of his Nephew: That it was apparent Acrates, that Phrygian, had ſome great Deſign in hand, ſince Thimettes and he were gone from Sardis before he had releaſed his Nephew, which he ſaid was all his Buſineſs: That Timocreon did not think his Goods ſafe here during his Abſence; yet Arteſilas ſpoke not a word againſt the Princeſs, but acquainted the King with all he could againſt my Father: but, Madam, the Buſineſs was managed with ſo much ſubtilty, that he built a moſt apparent Conſpiracy upon theſe Grounds. The next Morning Cleander being ready to take his leave of the King, having already bid adieu unto the Prince Myrſiles, Mexaris, Abradates, and alſo Arteſilas, and as he was embracing Eſope, who came to receive his Commands, Timocreon, Acrates, and my ſelf being in his Chamber, that ſame Captain of the Guard, who had heretofore advertiſed the Princeſs of the King of Lydia's Deſign, came and arreſted Cleander, Thimettes, Timocreon, Acrates, and my ſelf. I leave you to judg, Madam, how we were all amazed: Cleander deſired to be carried unto the King, but it was not permitted; but they carried him with us into the Cittadel of Sardis, lodging us in ſeveral Chambers. In this great diſorder, my Father was ſo prudent and happy, that he appointed one of his Servants, unperceived by any, who carried thoſe things which might be uſeful for the Manifeſtation is Cleander, and ſecretly put them into the Hands of the Prnceſs : However, the Impriſonment of Cleander was an excellent ſalve to cure Arteſilas, who began to ſtir abroad within few Days after. I will not inſiſt upon Relation of the great Amazement of the Princeſs, or of Cleander: Nor will I tell you the wonder of Cræſus, that he ſhould believe a Man ſo generous as Cleander was, and one unto whom he was ſo much obliged, ſhould betray him. But I ſhall tell you, that Cleander, enquiring of thoſe about him, what Crime would be laid unto his charge, underſtood how the Reports in Sardis were, that he intended to bettay the King ; to forſake his Countrey, and revolt unto the King of Phrygia. Knowing then what the Crime which would be charged againſt him was ; and knowing alſo that his innocency could not be known, but by acknowledging the truth ; and ſince he could not deny a great part of thoſe things which would be charged againſt him, he reſolved upon it, and ſent word unto the King by him who commanded the Cittadel, that he beſeeched him to ſend ſome Perſon unto him whom he might truſt with a Buſineſs of importance : Cræſus conceiving it advantagious for him that Cleander ſhould repent and confeſs his Crime, ſent Meneceus unto him, ſuppoſing he would diſcover all the particulars of his Deſign unto him more freely than unto the other.

Since Meneceus did ever love Cleander, and in ſpite of all the Gloſſes which Arteſilas and his Friends did put upon their Accuſation, did never think him culpable, but was fully perſwaded of his innocency ; Cleander did juſtify himſelf, and related all the truth ; he diſcovered unto him his Birth, and acquainted him with all Circumſtances, not mentioning any thing of the Princeſs. And when Meneceus asked him where the Picture and Letters were, and all other things which might juſtify what he ſaid ? he acquainted him that Timocreon had them, and he deſired him to ask him for them. After this Meneceus returned to Cræſus, and related unto him all that Cleander had ſaid : but ſince this Prince had a prejudicated Opinion, he gave no great credit unto Cleander's Words ; yet at the Solicitation of Meneceus, he appointed him to go unto Timocreon, mocreon, for the Letters eſpecially which he ſpoke of: becauſe Cræſus had heretofore ſeen two Letters under the King of Phrygia's own Hand, and by comparing them together he might judg better of the Truth. Meneceus went out to find out Timocreon, who was then forced to truſt him, and confeſs that the Princeſs knew ſomething of Cleander's Deſign; for thinking that he unto whom he had given all thoſe things to carry unto the Princeſs, had doubtleſs not failed, he was forced for the Juſtification of Cleander's Birth unto Cræſus, to intreat Meneceus that he would go unto the Princeſs Palmis for them, and to tell Cræſus that it was a domeſtick Servant belonging to Timocreon, had given them unto her. Meneceus, who loved my Father very well, promiſed him he would, and kept his word: but he was extreamly ſurprized when he came to the Princeſs, that ſhe never ſaw nor heard of this domeſtick Servant, and conſequently never received any of thoſe things, which ſhould have been delivered unto her. Meneceus ſought out for this Man with all care, but all in vain, for none could tell what was become of him; ſo that not being able to produce any thing of what he had promiſed to ſhew unto Cræſus, he would not permit him to ſpeak concerning Cleander, as Son to the King of Phrygia, but looked upon it as an Impoſture, and a Lie, expreſly charging Meneceus not to ſpeak of it unto any, ſo that no Reports of it went about the Court. You may imagine in what a ſad Condition my Father was when he had loſt that which would not only have juſtified Cleander unto Cræſus, but which ſhould have made him known unto the King of Phrygia. When Cleander heard of it, he was extreamly grieved at it; and the Princeſs was ſo full of ſadneſs, that ſhe could not poſſibly hide her Melancholy. However, Arteſilas being recovered of his Wounds, triumphed over the Miſeries of his Rival. The Prince Myrſiles, and Abradates, did verily believe that Cleander was not culpable, but there was ſo much obſcurity in his Juſtification, that they could not perſwade Cræſus he was innocent. As for the Prince Mexaris, though he did not think him criminal more than others did, yet it was thought he was not ſorry for his Diſgrace, by reaſon of ſome ambitious Thoughts; for he imagined that if Cleander were in Diſfavour when Crœſus died, he might more eaſily exclude Myrſiles from the Throne, and get the Crown himſelf. There was none then which openly tranſacted in the behalf of Cleander, and us, but Menecius: The Princeſs not daring to be ſeen in it, only doing her beſt in ſecret, and by clandeſtine ways. Eſope yet muſt be excepted, who always ſpoke with boldneſs worthy of much Commendations. Thus you ſee, the unfortunate Cleander (guilty in appearance, but really innocent) the moſt miſerable Man alive. But what Sorrows ſoever he had to ſee he had loſt all Hopes of making himſelf known unto his Father, or of ever coming out of Priſon, the abſence of his dear Princeſs tormented him above all; and when he thought ſometimes how near he was unto her, and yet to have no Poſſibility of ſeeing her, he was not able to ſupport his Miſery with Patience: Hovever, Arteſilas who deſired that Puniſhment might follow Impriſonment, and who was of their Mind that ſtood in fear of chained Lions; did every Day invent Impoſture upon Impoſture to ruin Cleander, and ſuch ſcandalous and unworthy Reports were ſpread up and down the Town, that the Princeſs was ſtrangely alarm'd at them. She conceived that if ſhe had ſo good a Heart as to tell the King ſhe had ſeen theſe things, which would juſtify the Birth of Cleander, it might do ſome good in the Buſineſs; but ſince ſhe could not do ſo, unleſs ſhe diſcovered that innocent League which was between them, ſhe could not reſolve upon it: but for all that, ſeeing his Enemies were not ſatisfied with his Impriſonment, but aimed at his Life; ſhe overcame her ſelf, and reſolved to do it. But then the difficulty was how to advertiſe Cleander of her Intentions to ſpeak unto the King, in caſe he ſhould put it to the laſt Extremity; for ſhe feared, that if he were not acquainted with it, he might contradict what ſhe ſhould ſay, and ſo be himſelf an Obſtacle to his Juſtification: ſo that conſulting with Cyleniſa upon this Subject, that Lady ſeeing her Miſtreſs in ſuch a well-grounded unquietneſs; after ſhe had a while thought upon it, told her ingenuouſly, that the Son of him who commanded the Cittadel in Sardis, had a long time ſhewed himſelf one that was far from hating her; and therefore ſhe verily believed that if ſhe deſired him to do her any good Office, ſhe ſhould find him very well deſpoſed unto it, what Danger ſoever there might be in the Attempt. The Princeſs at the firſt did make ſome difficulty on it, to truſt a young Man, and a Lover; but at laſt ſince ſhe knew no better Expedient, ſhe conſented to employ him. Since Cyleniſa was my Couſin, I muſt be the Pretence of that Service which ſhe required from her Lover; and ſince I could not be juſtified unleſs Cleander was, and every one knew that his Intereſts were mine, ſhe imagined that Tegeus (for that was the Name of Cyleniſa's Lover) would not think it ſtrange ſhe ſhould deſire to ſpeak with him. The truth is, Madam, Cyleniſa knew ſo well how to order the Mind of Tegeus, that what Difficulties ſoever there were to ſpeak with Cleander, he would endeavour it, and indeed kept his Word: And he came to tell her the next Morning, that if ſhe pleaſed, ſhe might ſpeak with him the Night after. At the firſt Cyleniſa could not reſolve upon it, but afterwards Tegeus told her the Buſineſs was not ſo difficult as ſhe imagined, becauſe the Gardens of the Palace join cloſe almoſt to the Counterſcarpe of the Cittadel, there being a back-Door on that ſide, and juſt there ſhe might go and ſpeak with Cleander out of a barred Window, and very low, which looked that way, only letting down a Draw-bridg which was over the Moat, and under the Window, where ſhe might talk with him very conveniently, without being perceived by any, becauſe he himſelf had the guard of that ſide. Tegeus having made the matter both poſſible and eaſy, Cyleniſa agreed with him, that ſhe would walk very late in the Garden with one of her Companions; and when it was the juſt Hour which they ſhould agree upon, they would come unto the end of this little Bridg; and to give a ſign that it was they, ſhe would bring a dark Lanthorn, which will hide the light when they pleaſed: The way being thus reſolved upon, Cyleniſa returned unto the Princeſs, to tell her what ſhe had done: but ſeeing the Deſign ſo near, ſhe repented; pented; yet conſidering the Danger wherein Cleander was, and that if ſhe ſhould neglect this Opportunity, ſhe might perchance not have another, becauſe Tegeus might change his Guard, ſhe reſolved to ſend Cyleniſa to acquaint Cleander with her intentions to ſpeak for him, and that they might not contradict one another in their tales. But when ſhe began to conſider that Cyleniſa might not go alone unto that place, ſhe almoſt changed her Mind, becauſe ſhe durſt not confide in any other of her Women: Madam, ſaid Cyleniſa, fear and recompence will make any faithful, therefore I beſeech you, let me tamper with one of my Companions; and ſuborn the Porter of the Garden towards the Cittadel, that after ſhe and I have walked together late there, we may go with a dark Lanthorn through the great Cypreſs walk cloſe by the Gate which is oppoſite to that Bridg, over which I muſt paſs to ſpeak with Cleander.

Ah, Cyleniſa, ſaid the Princeſs, your Expedient is dangerous: There is no other, Madam, replied ſhe, unleſs you will write, and truſt your Letter with Tegeus: Yet ſince I am a Couſin unto Soſicles, there is leſs danger in my ſpeaking with Cleander, then there is in writing unto him. The Princeſs did grieve extreamly, and not being able to conſent unto what Cyleniſa did propound, ſhe reſolved upon nothing. But, Madam, ſaid ſhe unto her, it concerns the Life of Cleander. But Cyleniſa, ſaid the Princeſs, it concerns my own Honour. I do not conceive it concerns your Honour, or your Vertue either, anſwered Cyleniſa; and I know not why Generoſity ſhould hinder you from doing a good Act, out of Fear to be ſuſpected for doing a bad One: And the Act, Madam, though it ſhould come to be known, would rather paſs for an Act of Charity, than a Piece of Amorous Gallantry. And after all this, Madam, ſince you are reſolved to ſpeak unto the King, and you know that he would marry you unto Cleander; and that you may well make it known you would ſave him, I cannot ſee there is any ſuch hazard in the Buſineſs. The Princeſs then thought to write her Mind, and truſt the Letter with Tegeus, to give it unto Cleander: But when ſhe conſidered of the many Matters ſhe had to ſay, and that if by any Misfortune this Letter ſhould be loſt, ſhe might prejudice both her ſelf and Cleander, ſhe gave over that Deſign, and would neither write, nor let Cyleniſa go, but remained extreamly perplexed: But Eſope coming to ſee her, and telling her, that ſo much Ill was ſpoken of Cleander, as he took upon him ſo much boldneſs as to beſeech her, ſhe would protect ſuch an Illuſtrious Man as he was. And after this he went away, but ill ſatisfied with her Anſwer, ſhe began to reſolve with her ſelf, and told Cyleniſa, ſhe was contented ſhe ſhould go unto Cleander, and that ſhe left it unto her diſcretion to chuſe which of her Women ſhe would have with her. But to abridg my Diſcourſe, ſince it hath been already too long; Cyleniſa made choice of her Companion, and Tegeus ſent a dark Lanthorn: And after ſhe had received full Inſtructions what to ſay, they went into the Garden with a dark Lanthorn, which gave no Light but when they pleaſed; and went unto the Cypreſs Walk, cloſe by the back Door, towards the Bridg which Tegeus mentioned unto Cyleniſa: But as ſhe told me afterwards, they trembled at every ſtep, and thought twenty times to return back: Yet they went on, and being come unto the end of the Bridg, after the Gardner (whom they had ſuborned) had opened the Door, Cyleniſa opened and ſhut the dark Lanthorn two or three times, as was appointed between Tegeus and her, (for they paſſed through the Garden only by the Light of the Stars); immediately after the Bridg was let down, the Window opened, and Cleander appeared, or (to ſay better) was heard.

Since this Window was very low, Cleander ſpeaking in a low Voice; Is it poſſible, ſaid he unto her, that I ſhould have the happineſs to ſpeak with you, or is it a Dream? Speak Cyleniſa, that I may know you, and tell me who is that which is with you? Sir, ſaid ſhe unto him, you may well imagine, ſince ſhe is here, that ſhe is faithful; therefore not to loſe a minute of precious Time, let me haſte to tell you, that the Princeſs is reſolved to ſave your Life, and to tell the King your Father, that ſhe knows of your Birth; ſhe deſired to advertiſe you of it, Sir, leſt you ſhould differ, and contradict one another i your Relations of it; then Cyleniſa acquainted him with all that the Princeſs gave her in charge, both what ſhe would ſay unto the King her Father, and what Cleandr ſhould anſwer. How Cyleniſa (ſaid he, after very ſeri-attention) does that adored and admired Lady take an care for my Life, and trouble her Self with ſuch Difficulties as theſe? Ah Cyleniſa, I could never imagine it: But if ſhe cannot preſerve it, by any ways but by prejudice to her Self, tell her I conjure you, that I had much rather Die then be any Cauſe of Harm unto her. But, Sir, ſaid ſhe, do you think that your Death would be pleaſing to her? No, replied he, I think her too good to have any ſuch thoughts; but my Life is ſo uſeleſs, and will cauſe her ſo many Sorrows, that I think it in ſome ſort juſt not to preſerve it by any way which may expoſe her unto the Anger of the King her Father: aſſure her therefore that I can die without murmur; tell her Cyleniſa, that I ſhould not be ſenſible of my Miſery but for the Love of her; and that I do not think my Priſon tedious, but becauſe I cannot ſee her; and provided I do not loſe her Love, I can contentedly loſe my Crown and my Life alſo. As they were thus talking, a Soldier chanced to hear the Voice of a Woman, and went to acquaint the Governor, who preſently took out a Party, ſome went to Cleander's Chamber, others to the Window. Tegeus would have oppoſed them, but was not able, and his Father cauſed him to be taken: Mean while Cyleniſa and her Companion hearing a Noiſe, would have fled, and got into the Garden, but they could not poſſible: Then Cleander, ſeeing the Princeſs's Women taken, and could not help it, he both ſpoke and did ſuch things, as might have diſcovered that which he had ſo long concealed. When Cyleniſa ſaw the Souldiers come unto her, and that there was no poſſibility to eſcape, ſhe turned the Light of her Lanthorn, and made her Self known unto them: They then were much Surpriſed, and turned their Violence into Civility; not one of the Souldiers but had ſeen her a hundred times with the Princeſs, when ſhe came to walk in the Cittadel. Cyleniſa, who certainly had an excellent Spirit and Wit, told them, That the Danger wherein I was for the Love of Cleander, was the cauſe of her coming thither; that they need not think it ſtrange ſhe ſhould endeavour to ſave her Couſin, by adviſing with him who was the Cauſe of his Miſery, which way they might make his Innocency appear. The Souldiers did hearken unto her patiently, and did not contradict what ſhe ſaid: yet they carried her and her Companion before the Governour, whom ſhe would have perſwaded to let her go unto the Princeſs, and not to acquaint the King with her being there, but ſhe could not prevail: but on the contrary, ſince he was evry exact, after he had placed theſe two Women with much Civility in one Chamber, and given Orders to guard the Priſoners very carefully, and his Son alſo, he ſent to acquaint the King with the Paſſage; and ſent alſo to the Princeſs, to ask her Pardon for detaining her Women, ſuppoſing that ſhe would not acknowledg them after ſuch an Act as this. Since it may eaſily be imagined what apprehenſions all theſe Parties had upon this Accident, I will not ſtay to relate them: but you may be ſure the Princeſs was extreamly ſurprized and ſad; Cleander was deſperate; poor Tegeus who loved Cyleniſa, feared ſhe would think he betrayed her; Cyleniſa was at her wits end as well as her Companion; Cræſus was aſtoniſhed to hear of it; and ſent Orders unto the Governor, whoſe Name was Pactias, to ſend her and her Companion preſently to him; and he did ſo: When Cyleniſa came before him, Is it poſſible, ſaid he unto her, that my Daughter ſhould keep one about her, that would do ſuch an Act ſo far unbefitting the modeſty of her Sex? Sir, ſaid ſhe unto him, Appearances are often fallacious; and this boldneſs of mine which ſeems ſo criminal, will perhaps appear commendable, when you ſhall hear thoſe Truths which I ſhall tell you: for Sir, I am a Couſin unto Soſicles. 'Tis true (ſaid the King and interrupted her,) but it was unto Cleander with whom you ſpoke. I do confeſs it, replied ſhe, for ſince it is by him that Soſicles may be juſtified, I might well ſpeak unto him who might make his Innocency known. However it be, ſaid he, do you think my Daughter would allow you to go from her at midnight? and do you think I can be perſwaded that you ſpoke unto Cleander only concerning the intereſt of Soſicles? Speak Cylenisa, ſpeak, I ſay, and tell me ingenuouſly who ſet you awork? Then Paetius whiſpered the King in his Ear, and told him, that the Souldiers who heard them ſpeak, and diſcovered it unto him, did often hear the Name of the Princeſs both in the mouth of Cleander and hers. The King ſeemed to be much moved at what Paetias told him; for preſently remembring the Sorrows which the Princeſs teſtified at the impriſonment of Cleander, and her Endeavours to juſtify him, he made no doubt but that there was ſome ſecret Buſineſs which Cyleniſa would not confeſs, ſo that he ſpoke more ſharply to her than before; yet ſay and do what he could, he could not make her ſpeak a word againſt the Princeſs: But her Companion who was with her, being neither ſo Witty, nor ſo Bold, nor ſo Affectionate as ſhe (the King being adviſed to ſeparate them) he got her by Promiſes and by Threatnings to tell all ſhe knew: ſhe confeſſed then ingenuouſly, that the Princeſs did know of their coming; but thinking to juſtify her, ſhe proteſted that it was only out of Compaſſion to the Priſoners, that ſhe ſent Cyleniſa to ſpeak with them. The King would have made her confeſs what ſhe heard of Cyleniſa's and Cleander's diſcourſe, but ſhe would not anſwer a word to that, for ſhe ſaid ſhe was ſo affrighted to be at that time in that place, that ſhe heard their Diſcourſe but very confuſedly, yet confeſſed that the Name of the Princeſs was often uſed. There needed no more to diſturb the Soul of the King, who now made no Queſtion but that there was a Secret Correſpondency between Cleander and the Princeſs his Daughter: He went unto Cyleniſa again, but with ſuch Fury in his Words, and ſo much Anger in his Eyes, that ſhe ſtood in need of all her Conſtancy to be undaunted. However, ſhe was carried back to the Cittadel, and the King ſent unto the Princeſs (for by this time it was day) to come unto him, which immediately ſhe did: He no ſooner ſaw her, but he commanded all to withdraw; then looking fiercely upon her, I never thought, ſaid he unto her, that you had a Heart ſo baſe, as to beſtow any private Affection upon a Man that is unknown; upon a Man, I ſay, who certainly is of a baſe Original, ſince he hath no ſhift but an Impoſture to fly unto to ſave his Life, as if he could make the World believe he was a King's Son; a Man who after abundance of Benefits which I conferred upon him, would in recompence betray me, and ruine Me and my Dominions. When the Princeſs heard her Father ſpeak in ſuch manner, ſhe thought that Cyleniſa had confeſſed all: ſo that having no diſpoſition to deny a moſt innocent Truth, nor injure it by telling Lies, reſolved to diſguize the matter no longer; Sir, ſaid ſhe unto him, it ſeems you think me to be very much in Fault, but thanks be unto the Gods I have this Satisfaction of Conſcience, that I am certain I am not ſo. How, ſaid he, are you not infinitely in Fault to hold a Secret Compliance with a grand Delinquent to the State? Should any of my Subjects do as much, he ſhould infallibly die for it: and judg whether your Crime be not greater than any Subject's can be; you who are my Daughter, and intereſted in the Glory of my Kingdom, and good of my People, and ought to have no other Intereſt but what is mine. Sir, ſaid ſhe unto him, if I had any other than ſuch, indeed I ſhould think my Self moſt Culpable; but ſince I have not, I moſt humbly beſeech you, to give me one quarter of an hours Audience to juſtify my Self. The King with much ado kept ſilence, and ſuffered her to ſpeak. This wiſe Princeſs began her Diſcourſe with the Affection the King had to Cleander in his Infancy; likewiſe with the Affection of her Brothers; and the Eſteem which ſhe her Self had of him, repeating in few words, and much art, all the Services which he had done for the King; his Victories, his Conqueſts, and all his Heroick Acts; yet relating all this after ſuch a manner as no Suſpicion might be ſhe affected him, but only as if ſhe aimed at his Juſtification and Truth; Yet, Sir (ſaid ſhe unto him, after ſhe had called into his Memory whether he would or no all his Obligations unto Cleander) this Man, ſo Illuſtrious in every thing, to whom the Prince Atis owed his Life, unto whom I am a Debtor for yours; he, I ſay, ſhould never have moved my Heart ſo much at this time, but by two moſt powerful Conſiderations: the one is, becauſe I know you had a Deſign to marry me unto him at your Return from this War; the other is, becauſe I underſtand his Original is equal unto mine: beſides all this, I am moſt certain, than he never had any intentions to betray you; nor ever had a more violent deſire to acknowledg all your Benefits.

The King wondering and raging that his Daughter ſhould know of his Deſign concerning her Marriage, ſaid unto her, and interrupted her, You ought however to have ſtaid until I had commanded you to marry Cleander, before you gave him any Teſtimonies of your Affection: But ſince you are ſo Obedient unto my Will, that you would have Married him if it had been my pleaſure, pray alſo hate him when I would have you; and know, that I will puniſh him for his Crime, and adhere unto no other Intereſt but mine own. Were he guilty, Sir, I ſhould with all my Heart do ſo, replied ſhe; but ſince he is Innocent, and the Son of a great King, I think, Sir, that I ſhould do you good Service in reſtraining you from incenſing the Anger of the Gods againſt you, by deſtroying a Prince who did never juſtly offend you: For truly, Timocreon, Thimettes and Atrias told no Lies, when they aſſured me that Cleander was Son unto the King of Phrygia; I my ſelf have ſeen all thoſe things, which ſhould have juſtified his Birth: and moreover, I do moſt certainly know, that he would never have took part with your Enemies to fight againſt you. It ſeems you know very much indeed, ſaid Crœſus, and interrupted her, but though you had committed no other Crime then this, to know ſo exactly the ſecret thoughts of ſuch a Man as Cleander is, a Stranger, and a Delinquent, it were enough to deſerve no Pardon. But, Sir, ſaid ſhe unto him, ſince I cannot juſtify my Self in your Opinion, unleſs I juſtify Cleander alſo, and letting you ſee his real Right and true Quality, why will you not be pleaſed to allow me ſo much Patience as to hear me out? Why, ſaid he unto her, would you have me believe your words, becauſe you have lightly given Credit unto the deceiving words of Cleander? Do I not plainly ſee you are his Confederate in this groſs Impoſture, by which he would make himſelf the Son of a King, juſt now when he is accuſed of a Crime which brings his Life into danger? Where are all the convincing Proofs of it? You tell me you have ſeen them, but you ſhew not one: As for this Picture which all the Court has ſeen, and I my ſelf alſo have ſeen, that argues as much as nothing, nor any thing elſe except the King of Phrygia's Letter: as for that, I confeſs, I have ſeen, and know his Character, and it may be of ſome conſideration; but they will ſhew it, it ſeems, only to you who does not know it, and will not produce it unto me, becauſe I ſhould diſcover its Forgery.

In a word, Cleander is unknown, and you ought to look upon him no otherwiſe; neither ought you to believe that I would have married you unto him, unleſs I had told you ſo my ſelf; and if by reaſon of ſome Reaſon in State, I ſhould have married you to him, I know not whether or no you would have willingly obeyed me: Moreover, admit Cleander were the Son of a King, yet you ought not to hold any ſecret Intelligence with him; but ſince he ſaid himſelf he is the Son of my Enemy, was it juſt in you to conceal it from me one minute? Might you not well ſuppoſe, that this very Circumſtance of Enemy was enough to prevent all Alliance with him? Which way ſoever then I conſider your Actions, I find you ſo culpable, and in ſo deep a manner, that I cannot endure the ſight of you; therefore retire unto your Chamber, and obey my Orders without medling any more in his Juſtification. Since my own Juſtification is inſeparably linked unto his, replied ſhe, methinks, Sir, your Command is not juſt. Go (ſaid he unto her) be gone, and anſwer no more; but without inſiſting upon your pretended Innocency, go and pray unto the Gods, that they will pardon you; for my part I cannot. The Princeſs Palmis would have replied ſomething, thing, but he would not ſuffer her; and commanded the Lieutenant of his Guard to carry her unto her Chamber, and be reſponſible for her Perſon. The Princeſs then ſeeing ſhe could not prevail with the King her Father, obeyed with Tears in her Eyes, and returned to her Lodging, without having the Comfort of her dear Cyleniſa, with whom ſhe might condole her Miſfortunes. Her Chamber becoming now a Priſon, none were admitted, nor permitted to ſee her, no not ſo much as the Prince Myrſiles, becauſe he ſeemed always very affectionate unto Cleander: The Princeſs of Claſomena deſired it, but was denied: Abradates endeavoured very much to do her Service, yet all in vain; the Prince Mexaris, though glad perhaps of theſe Diſaſters, yet ſeemed very angry at it; the Princeſs Anaxilea, Widow of the Prince Atis, remembring what an Obſtacle the Princeſs had heretofore been unto her Marriage, ſhewed not much Generoſity: But as for Eſope, he was conſtant, and ſpoke boldly unto the King, in behalf both of the Princeſs and Cleander: Meneceus alſo was very generous, and ſpoke high, ſo that the King grew angry with him, and employed him no more in his Counſels, expreſly forbidding him to publiſh that Cleander was the Son of a King. As for Arteſilas, though he was a Lover of the Princeſs Palmis, yet her Priſon was no great Grief unto him, becauſe he hoped that this diſaſterous Courſe would make her repent of her Affection unto Cleander, and was in hopes to tranſact in her behalf ſo cunningly, as that ſhe might think her ſelf in ſome ſort a Debtor unto him for her Liberty.

In the mean while Cleander hearing the next day by ſome of the Guards, that the Princeſs Palmis was a Priſoner; all the Sorrows that ever he ſuffered in all his Life, were not comparable to his Sufferings then; he ſaw his Fortune was in a pitiful condition; for he knew certainly that he was the Son of a King, and had no power to juſtify himſelf; he appeared ungrateful and guilty towards Crœſus, and was not able to produce any convincing Proofs to the contrary; he was in love with the Princeſs, and knew ſhe loved him again, but acording to all appearances, he ſhould never be in a condition to enjoy her, or himſelf; he heard ſhe was a Priſoner for the love of him; and this laſt Conſideration made ſo deep an Impreſſion upon his Spirits, that he valued not all the reſt; until then he ſuffered his Fetters without any deſires of breaking them; but when he heard ſhe was a Priſoner, he thought upon nothing but his Liberty, to the end he might releaſe her: He deſired the Guards to go unto the King, and beſeech him that he might immediately die, upon condition ſhe might be ſet free, and expreſs'd ſo many ſigns of real Love, and in ſo moving a manner, that one of the Guards did offer him all his Endeavours for his Comfort at the leaſt, if he could do nothing for his Liberty. Cleander did accept his Offer, and conjured him to go unto the Palace, there enquire very exactly, what Orders and Guards were upon the Princeſs, that afterwards he might judg whether there was any poſſibility of ſending her a Letter. This officious Souldier did as Cleander deſired him, and went unto the Palace; but being not ſo wiſe as well-affected, ſome Men that were ready to do any ill Offices, eſpied him, and knowing him to be one of Cleander's Guard, did acquaint the King he was there, who did command him to be ſeized upon: and ſince he gave no good Reaſons for his coming to the Palace; and ſince Information was given that he enquired what Guard was kept over the Princeſs, they clapt him up in Priſon, and the King imagined there was ſome deſign to releaſe her: ſo that to put her in a place which he conceived inviolable, and to ſend her further from Cleander, whom he would not yet put to death, as much incenſed as he was againſt him, therefore he ſent the Princeſs the next Morning unto Epheſus, unto the Temple of Diana, appointing her who commanded the vowed Veſtals there, not to let her ſpeak unto any whoſoever, cauſing the Companion of Cyleniſa to be realeaſed; and likewiſe the Son of Pactias, becauſe of his Father's Fidelity, to have his Liberty. This wiſe Princeſs deſired to take her leave of the King, but the favour was denied her: then ſhe deſired to have Cyle- niſa with her, that alſo was not granted; ſo that the day following, none having the liberty to ſee her, ſhe departed from Sardis, guarded by five hundred Horſe unto Epheſus, which was three days Journy from thence. But, Madam, the way thither was of neceſſity behind the Garden of the Palace, and by the Citadel, under the Window where Cleander did ſpeak with Cyleniſa. It happened that this unfortunate Prince, walking in his Chamber, and contemplating his Misfortunes, chanced to ſpy the Princeſs as ſhe paſſed, and knew her; ſhe alſo, looking up, ſaw him: To tell you, Madam, the Thoughts of theſe two illuſtrious Perſons at that inſtant, and how ſad this ſight was unto both, is not an eaſy matter. Cleander would have broke the Grates: the Princeſs wiſhed the Coach might go more ſoftly, yet ſhe made ſigns with her Head and her Hand, to let him underſtand ſhe lamented his Misfortunes; and he did let her ſee, by his violent and diſordered Actions, though full of reſpect, how great the trouble of his Soul was. Mean while the Coach went on, and they loſt the ſight of one another: But the Princeſs, as I was told afterwards, looked a long while after upon the place where Cleander was a Priſoner. After this, Madam, the Court of Lydia was as dull, as it was delightful before. In the mean time Arteſilas did not bring his Deſigns to paſs, for he could not move Cræſus either to put Cleander to death, or call back the Princeſs Palmis: Cræſus alſo knowing that the King of Phrygia was entered into his Dominions, was forced to go himſelf in Perſon unto the Army; and that was one of his Reaſons why he ſent the Princeſs his Daughter unto Epheſus; having no mind to leave her in that place where Cleander was a Priſoner. The general ſtate of things did change faces; for you know, that the King of Aſſyria, who had carried away the Princeſs Mandana, ſent to ſolicit theſe two Kings who were his Allies, to enter into his Country; and in order unto that, they made a Truce between themſelves, and did ſo: going both of them to aid the King of Aſſyria, and to oppoſe the King of the Medes whom they feared, or rather indeed the valour of the illuſtrious Cyrus under the Notion of Artamenes, who was ſo terrible to all Aſia. The King of Phrygia notwithſtanding the Truce, deſired that his Troopes might not mingle with the Troops of Lydia. The truth is, Madam, you know ſo well what paſſed in all Aſia ſince that time, as I need not ſpeak of them, nor of Cleander, who being ſtill a Priſoner, had nothing to do amongſt them; for after the King of Aſſyria's firſt Defeat, Cræſus out of ſome Diſcontent retired and returned unto Sardis, ſtill keeping us and the Princeſs Priſoners. However Arteſilas was not a whit more happy, ſince neither being able to ruin his Rival, nor ſee his Miſtreſs, it may be ſaid, that he himſelf was puniſhed for their own Crimes. As for Cleander he being of a very obliging Diſpoſition, he got the Love of all the Guards; and ſo far that they let him have liberty to write and receive Letters, in ſpite of Pactias forbidding them to do ſo; ſo that he writ unto Eſop, to the end he might acquaint him with all News concerning the Princeſs, which Eſop accordingly did, though I know not which way he went to work: However, Cleander, Thimettes, Timocreon, Acrates, and my ſelf, did live moſt melancholy Lives; and ſo we lived until Cræſus, who was reſtleſs to hear of all the prodigious Victories of the illuſtrious Cyrus, ſent unto all the famous Oracles in the World, though I know not what he intended to enquire of, becauſe there was no return of them when I came from Sardis. But during the Voyages of all theſe Embaſſadors who were ſent to conſult with the Gods, he ceaſed not from making great Levies; he imployed divers Envoys to ſeveral Princes, and was ſo buſied in ſome very great Deſign which he had in his Mind, that he thought the leſs of Cleander. Then, Madam, to ſhorten my relation, I will make haſte to tell you, that Cræſus being gone to muſter his Troops, Tegeus the Son of Pactias, and a Lover of Cyleniſa, plotted with Meneceus: and found out ways to releaſe us, Love being predominate over all other Conſiderations; perhaps his Aims and Deſires were only to releaſe Cyleniſa: But Meneceus, of whom he ſtood in need, denying him any aſſiſtance, unleſs Cleander, Timetes, Timocreon, Acrates, and my ſelf, were releaſed alſo, he conſented unto it. So that one night, when I little dream'd of Liberty, Tegeus, who had ſuborned the greateſt part of Cleander's Guard, and Gariſon of Pactias, entered into the Cittadel, and going unto Cleander's Chamber, he told him that he was at liberty; and afterwards coming where we were, he told us the ſame. That which did make the buſineſs more eaſy, was, becauſe Pactias was gone two days Journy from Sardis: and Arteſilas was with the King. Moreover, Meneceus who had the Conduct of the Buſineſs, had provided fifty Horſe ready to guard us: ſo that without Fight or Tumult we went out of the Cittadel, at the ſame Door by which the poor Cyleniſa entered. I forgot to tell you that Tegeus went not unto the Chamber of Cleander to releaſe him, till after he had been with Cyleniſa, for whom he had provided a Coach ready at her coming out of the Cittadel. However, ſince Meneceus had many Friends in Epheſus; and ſince beſides, that it was a place where they might more eaſily hide themſelves than any other, by reaſon of many Strangers which reſorted unto the famous Temple of Diana; and more then that, it was eaſy to fly away when one pleaſed, by reaſon of the Seas nearneſs, it was reſolved to retire thither; and indeed Cleander would not go any where elſe, becauſe of the Princeſs Palmis, and there was none that would leave him. The Governour of Epheſus was alſo an intimate Friend of Meneceus, who though he ſhould know him to be there, yet he did not fear that he would do either him or his Friends any hurt: Then, Madam, when he had gone a days Journy from Sardis, we diſguiſed our ſelves as well as we could, Cyleniſa alſo, with a Woman which waited upon her, and would not leave her, did the ſame; ſo that we came unto Epheſus as Strangers which come to viſit the Temple of Diana: Meneceus alſo, cauſed thoſe Horſes which guarded us, to enter at ſeveral Gates, and reſolved to have them always with him in caſe of any need of them. The firſt thing Cleander did, was to go about the Temple of

Diana, deſiring to ſee the place at leaſt where the Princeſs was, though he could not ſee her. In the mean while, Madam, one Chance moſt extraordinarily happened to the great Comfort of theſe illuſtrious Lovers, which was, That ſhe who commanded the Veſtals, whoſe Name was Ageſiſtrata, proved to be Siſter unto a Lady in Epheſus, with whom Meneceus in his younger days had been in love, and whom he ſhould have married, if her Friends had not oppoſed it; ſo that there being this Obligation then between them, there continued ſtill a great Friendſhip between them, though they had not ſeen one another of a long time: Meneceus haviug done many conſiderable Services towards Crœſus, in behalf of her Husband, whom afterwards ſhe married, and ſince was dead: Meneceus then confiding in her, and ſetting forth the Injuſtice of Crœſus, in that he would not ſuffer Cleander to clear himſelf, and that the Princeſs his Daughter was ſenſible of his Innocency, he negotiated ſo well with her, as ſhe obtained of her Siſter, that Cyleniſa ſhould be entertained in the Temple, and placed with the Princeſs, not daring to ask leave for Cleander to ſpeak with her, for fear of being refuſed, and leſt it ſhould prejudice her, in lieu of ſerving her. You may eaſily imagine what Joy this was unto the Princeſs Palmis, to ſee her dear Cyleniſa again, and to hear Cleander was out of Priſon, and come unto Epheſus; though ſhe was ſtill very fearful he ſhould be diſcovered, and taken again: But when Cyleniſa told her he ſeldom ſtirred out, except Mornings and Evenings unto the Temple, and that he was well diſguiſed, ſhe was more at quiet. 'Tis true, the liberty of Cleander did make the Priſon of the Princeſs more cloſe (if I may call that ſacred place a Priſon.) For as ſoon as Crœſus heard that Cleander was releaſed, he ſent new Orders unto Ageſiſtrata, to take more care of the Princeſs Palmis, and that ſhe be better guarded: But ſince the Friend of Meneceus was for us, the doubling of Guards was to no purpoſe. One ſtrange and happy Accident more happened, which was, that Cleander found in the Houſe where he lodged, all thoſe things which ſhould teſtify what he was; and thus it came about: Be pleaſed to know that the domeſtick Servant whom my Father had truſted with all thoſe things, and many others, ſeeing that his Maſter was a Priſoner, reſolved to ſteal all that he had of his, and embarqued for Epheſus: That he being acquainted with a Servant in this Houſe, he left with him many of thoſe things to keep, and amongſt the reſt, all thoſe things which would ſerve to clear Cleander; declaring unto him, that if he died, he gave him all thoſe things which he left in his Hands, and telling him, that he durſt not return until his Maſter were out of Priſon: But the Truth is, he thought that Crœſus would put my Father to Death, and then he might return to Epheſus, and enjoy the Fruits of his Theft: yet ſince he was gone no further than the Iſle of Chio, his Friend heard often from him; but indeed at laſt he underſtood that he was dead, when Cleander came to lodg with his Maſter, who was a very good Friend unto Meneceus: So that deſiring to ſee what was given him, he looked upon all thoſe things which my Fathers Servant had left unto him, and there found all thoſe things which I told you of; and not being able to conceal his Wealth out of Joy that he had to poſſeſs it, he ſhewed the Picture unto his Maſter's Wife, who finding ſome Reſemblance between it and Cleander, let him ſee it, as ſome extraordinary Piece; ſo that to recover all that he had loſt, he recompenced him who had them, and received them again.

I leave you to judg, Madam, what Joy this was to Cleander in finding a Crown, when he had no hopes to enjoy it; he made the Princeſs Palmis acquainted with this prodigious Accident: But do what could be, Meneceus could not obtain Permiſſion for Cleander to ſee the Princeſs: All that could be done was by the Contrivance of Cyleniſa, to convey Letters unto her, which ſhe out of her Goodneſs was pleaſed to anſwer. In the mean time we knew not what courſe to take, becauſe Cleander would not go and make himſelf known unto the King his Father, and leave the Princeſs Palmis at Epheſus; he durſt not think of taking her away, though ſhe ſhould conſent unto it, not knowing where to find any Place of Security for her, or whether he ſhould be known for what he was; neither durſt he make it known unto Cræſus that he had found things which would maniſeſt what he was, underſtanding by a Letter from the Princeſs, that the Quality of the King of Phrygia's Son would not at all advantage him in the Opinion of the King her Father. Cleander being thus unreſolved what courſe to take, he was advertiſed of two things in one Day, which moved him unto that Reſolution, which I ſhall tell you of; The firſt was, that I informed him of a Cilician Ship come into the Port, in which was the King of Pontus and the Princeſs Mandana: The other was, that abſolute Orders came from Cræſus, that the Princeſs his Daughter ſhould enter into Orders, and take upon her the Habit of a Veſtal. You may imagine how much this Severity of Cræſus concerned Cleander, and how much it grieved the Princeſs Palmis, for ſhe had no Inclination unto that Courſe. Ageſiſtrata proteſted unto the Princeſs, that ſhe would not receive her into Orders, though ſhe would have her, becauſe her Will was forced, which was poſitively againſt their Cuſtoms. This being the State of things, the Princeſs Mandana ſtole away from thoſe who watched her, and put her ſelf into the Temple of Diana as a Sanctuary; and the King of Pontus could not get her out again, becauſe the People would have riſen againſt him, if he had attempted it. But, Madam, ſhe was no ſooner there, but Cleander thought he had found an undoubted means to obtain an inviolable Sanctuary for his Princeſs, if in getting away the Princeſs Palmis, he could get away the Princeſs Mandana alſo, and carry her unto Ciaxares from the King of Pontus, or elſe, in the Abſence of Ciaxares, unto the illuſtrious Cyrus: For ſaid he, If this Deſign proſper, although the King my Father who is with him, ſhould not acknowledg me, yet the Service of reſtoring the Princeſs Mandana would be acceptable to the King, that I ſhall obtain from Cyrus a Protection for the Princeſs Palmis; and it may well be hoped, that the Heavens will favour ſo juſt a Deſign, ſince I do only reſcue an innocent Princeſs out of the Hands of her Raviſher, to reſtore her unto the King her Father. This Project ſeemed ſo full of Reaſon, were it but once executed, that neither Thimettes, Meneceus, Tegeus, my Father, nor I, did at all conteſt concerning it. We ſpeedily then ſought out ways to execute what Cleander had imagined: We had already ſome Men with us, but not ſufficient to do it by open Force; therefore Policy muſt be the Way: Meneceus did ſo well employ the Power which he had with his ancient Miſtreſs, that he moved her to ſpeak unto her Siſter, who is one of a great Virtue, much Spirit, and greater Soul: he ſet forth the Injuſtice of Cræſus, and alſo the King of Pontus, in ſuch a moving manner, as he forced her to acknowledg that whoſoever could ſet the Princeſs Mandana and the Princeſs Palmis in any Places of Security, would do an Act which would be acceptable unto the Gods. She had no ſooner ſaid ſo, but, uſing her own Words, he told her, that it was ſhe who was beſt able to do an Act ſo generous: Yet for all this he could not move her to truſt thoſe two Princeſſes in his Hands; But ſhe told him, that they had a Cuſtom amongſt them, that thoſe who were to be received into Orders, it was permitted them to go once out, to the end it might appear they came in without Conſtraint: ſo that if the Princeſs Palmis pleaſe, ſhe may ask that Favour, and carry the Princeſs Mandana with her at the ſame time; and that ſhe would give Ordrrs, it ſhould be upon ſuch a Day, when the King of Pontus did not know of it: and that it ſhould be at a back-Door, where no ſtrict Guard was kept, becauſe it was never almoſt open; and then if they would conſent unto it, they might truſt themſelves with Cleander. After this, having obtained leave to ſpeak unto Cyleniſa, and Cyleniſa having prepared the Mind of the Princeſs Palmis, and ſhe the Princeſs Mandana, which two had contracted a great League of Friendſhip in a few Days, it was reſolved, that the Princeſs Palmis ſhould feign Obedience unto the Will of the King her Father; and that according to the Cuſtom, ſhe ſhould ask to go out, accompanied with Mandana, and her Women; that within three Paces of the Temple there ſhould be a Coach ready for the Princeſſes; That Cleander, Meneceus, Timocreon, Tegeus, and their Men, ſhould guard them to the next Port, where a Barque ſhould be ready to waft them unto Phrygia, and from thence they ſhould come by Land hither: So that when I came away, the Barque was ready, and all things fitted for Execution of the Deſign, which in all likelihood took Effect. That which would more facilitate the Enterprize was, the King of Pontus was hurt with the fall of a Horſe in his Thigh, in going from the old Town unto the new, where the Temple of Diana ſtands: So that though their Flight ſhould be noiſed about, yet he was not able to follow, for he was in great Pain, and kept his Bed. The Princeſs Palmis deſired Cleander to promiſe her by Letter, that he would let her continue always with the Princeſs Mandana, until he had made his Peace with Cræſus, and until he had made himſelf known unto the King of Phrygia. However, to go more ſurely to work, Meneceus moved Cleander to ſend Thimettes, Acrates, and my ſelf, to the King his Father, with all things requiſite, to manifeſt he was his Son, and to prepare him for his better Reception; alſo to acquaint the illuſtrious Cyrus with that Service which the generous Cleander would render him, thereby to merit his Protection. I had forgot to tell you, that whilſt we were at Epheſus, Thimettes heard accidently that his Friends had made his Peace with the King his Maſter, ſo that preſenting himſelf unto him without Fear, that Prince no ſooner ſaw him, but he received him with many Expreſſions of Tenderneſs. But when after this he had told him all the Story which I have told you, and ſhewed him the Picture, the Letters, and all other things concerning that Buſineſs; and when that Prince had read his own Letter, and the Note from his dear Elſimena, whoſe Hand he knew at firſt Sight, he apprehended ſo much Joy and ſo much Sorrow both together, that his Soul could not determine which of thoſe two Paſſions to chuſe. Since it was I who had the Honour to relate the Story, which he hearkened unto with extream Attention, I was the Witneſs of this pleaſing Irreſolution: but after that, his Joy of having a Son, and a Son ſo illuſtrious, had a little mitigated his Sorrows for the Loſs of his dear Elſimena, he deſired to ſee Acrates, who by his generous Repentance did eaſily obtain his Pardon. The King had a Mind to compare this Picture with that which he always kept, and which was made at the ſame time; and looking upon that Note which Elſimena writ, he knew the Hand ſo perfectly, that he doubted not at all who was the Writer; but expreſſed a hundred Signs of Gratitude and Acknowledgment unto Thimettes and me: and being full of Impatience to acquaint the illuſtrious Cyrus with this welcome News, he went immediately unto him, and commanded me to follow, leaving Thimettes and Acrates at Liberty to reſt themſelves. So Madam, I hope that within this two or three Days they will receive certain News, that this great Enterprize has a happy Proceeding.

Soſicles having ended his Relation, the Princeſs *Arimint*a thanked him for the Pains he took in ſpeaking ſo long together, and compoſing the Method of this extraordinary Hiſtory in ſo neat and elegant a manner. Cyrus for his part gave him moſt obliging Language: after which Soſicles withdrew; and then, Sir, ſaid the Princeſs *Arimint*a unto Cyrus, can it be expected you ſhould be ſo highly generous, as to promiſe me, that when the Gods have reſtored the Princeſs Mandana unto you, you will not look upon the King my Brother as your Rival? Yes, replied he, and I will promiſe you more than that, ſince I will promiſe you to ſerve him, whether he will or no, as his Friend, which I am reſolved to be, and to reſtore him to the Crown of Pontus: As for the Crown of Bithynia, ſaid he, and ſmiled, I muſt let it alone in the Hands of Arſamones, to the end that the Prince Spitridates may hereafter give it unto you. As they were thus in Diſcourſe, the King of Phrygia entered, unto whom the Princeſs *Arimint*a expreſſed her Joys, that he had found a Son ſo illuſtrious; and then calling to mind the moſt conſiderable Paſſages of his Life, they could not enough admire at the wonderful Providence of the Gods in all things. For my part, ſaid the King of Phrygia, as oft as I remember my adverſe Inclination to this War againſt Cræſus, I cannot doubt but that the Gods did ſecretly advertiſe me, that I ought not to do it: however, if I can but be ſo happy as to ſee my Son reſtore the Princeſs Mandana unto the illuſtrious Cyrus, I ask no more at the Hands of Heaven. That Happineſs is too great for me, ſaid Cyrus, and ſighed, and I never can hope for it. But yet you may very well hope it (replied the Princeſs Ariminta) for according to the Relation of Soſicles, the thing ſeems to be out of Doubt. When I was at Sinope, replied Cyrus, he who ſhould then have told me, that I ſhould not have releaſed the Princeſs Mandana, I ſhould not have believed him: and when I took Babylon, I could not imagine ſhe ſhould poſſibly get out. Then after a while of ſuch Diſcourſe as this, ſince it was late, Cyrus took his leave of the Princeſs Ariminta, and returned to the Camp with the King of Phrygia, and with a Mind divided between Hopes and Fears, and abſolutely taken up with Thoughts of his dear Princeſs; having alſo appointed Araſpes before to let the Queen of Suſiana know, that he was ſorry ſhe found her ſelf not well, and commanding him again to have all imaginable Care of her.

ARTAMENES,

OR THE

GRAND CYRUS.

Part IV. Book II.

NEver did Hopes flatter miſerable Men with more pleaſing Minutes; nor ever did Fears infuſe more cruel Torments, than theſe two contrary Paſſions did procure unto Cyrus, and the King of Aſſyria: Mandana releaſed, or Mandana a Captive, was the whole Buſineſs of their Minds; and according as theſe did preſent themſelves unto their Imaginations, ſo were they either ſad or glad; though both of them had always a Mixture of Diſpleaſure amongſt their higheſt Satisfaction, to think that though ſhe be at Liberty, yet it was not by their Aſſiſtance: yet ſince ſhe was to receive this good Office from a Prince who was not yet their Rival, the Thought of it did not leſſen their Joys; and ſometimes, not doubting but ere long they ſhould bleſs their Eyes with a Sight of their Princeſs, they both of them began to think of vanquiſhing one another by Combate, according to Agreement. Three Days, thus paſſed on; during which time, Cyrus diſcourſed often with Soſicles, becauſe he had ſeen his Princeſs at Epheſus; and during which time alſo, the King of Phrygia entertained Thimettes and Acrates with much Satisfaction, by Reaſon of the hope which they had given him to ſee in the Face of Cleander ſo perfect a Reſemblance of his dear Elſimena, that he could not poſſibly doubt, but that he was his Son. The Princeſs Ariminta alſo was full of Joys and Hopes, believing that ſince the King her Brother had Mandana no longer in his Power, he would become a Friend unto that Prince who offered to ſet upon his Throne; and ſo ſhe might one Day be in a happier Condition than ever. The Queen of Suſiana, though a Captive, and not very well in Health, had yet the Comfort to be ſerved with the ſame Reſpect, as if ſhe were at Suſa: for Araſpes was punctual in the Obſervation of Cyrus his Commands, and was very aſſiduous and obſervant of that fair and wiſe Queen, whom Cyrus much honoured, and grieved he could not after ſee her. When thoſe three Days were thus paſſed, Timocreon arrived, and ſought for his Son Soſicles, to underſtand from him, how the King of Phrygia had received thoſe things which Thimettes and he had related unto him: after he underſtood the Truth of all, he went unto the King of Phrygia's Tent, into which Cyrus entered, preſently after Thimettes who met him, had preſented him unto the King of Phrygia: ſo that this Prince no ſooner ſaw Cyrus, but addreſſing himſelf, Sir, ſaid he unto him, This is that Timocreon who preſerved my Son; and who brings us News of what we ſo much deſire to know; but I know not whether it be good or bad, becauſe he is but newly come. Queſtionleſs, the News is but bad for me, replied Cyrus, for I do not look to be ſo happy as to hear the Princeſs Mandana is at Liberty. 'Tis true, Sir, ſhe is not at Liberty, replied Timocreon: but it is not long of the illuſtrious Cleander that ſhe is not: ſince he has done things moſt difficult to bring it to paſs: and had it not been for one Misfortune which we could not foreſee, doubtleſs the Princeſs Mandana, and the Princeſs Palmis, both had been at Liberty.

Tell us, however, replied perplexed Cyrus, how Fortune did hinder our Happineſs. Sir, anſwered Timocreon, ſince I underſtand by Thimettes, you know all Paſſages ſince his Departure from Epheſus, I ſhall relate nothing what has already been told, but I do aſſure you, never was Buſineſs better managed than it; for when Ageſiſtrata had had advertiſed Meneceus of the Day on which the Princeſs Palmis was to come out; and the Princeſs Mandana was to follow her, with two Women who waited upon her, and one upon the Princeſs of Lydia: Meneceus made the Barque ready, whereof he was aſſured: the fifty Men which we had in the Town, lying in Ambuſcado, at all the Advenues by which one could come unto that Gate, out of which the Princeſſes were to come; beſides theſe, above thirty Friends of Meneceus joyned with Cleander, who kept himſelf in the Head of twelve or fifteen only; for all were divided into little Troops, leſt thoſe which paſſed ſhould ſuſpect any thing: he placed himſelf as near as he could unto the Door of the Temple, having a Coach there to carry the Princeſſes unto the Sea, which was not far off, and where the Barque waited. Since there was none but Sentinels ſtood in that Place, becauſe it was a Door out of which ſeldom any did come, that could be no hinderance in the Enterprize; and without killing them, it was an eaſy matter to ſecure them without being perceived by the neareſt Court of Guard: Thus Sir, all things being rightly ordered to execute our Deſign; the Barque ready, the Coach come, all our Men placed at all the Advenues unto the Temple: Cleander waited for the opening of the Doot: and the Buſineſs came ſo far that the Door did open; and I ſaw the Princeſs Palmis, who cauſed another Lady of an admirable Beauty to paſs before her, whom I ſuppoſed to be the Princeſs Mandana: and I did but ſee her; for as theſe Princeſſes were coming out, and we advancing to receive her, there came out of a Houſe cloſe by, two hundred Men in Arms, in the Head of whom was the Prince Arteſilas: yon may imagine how Cleander was ſurprized (who looked for no other Reſiſtance but from the King of Pontus) when he ſaw Arteſilas in the Head of them, whom he thought had been with Cræſus. But though the Wonder of Cleander was great, yet that of Arteſilas was no leſs, to ſee Cleander with a Sword in his Hand, ſtanding between him and the Door of the Temple: However, as ſoon as the Princeſs Palmis ſpied Arteſilas, ſhe went back, and carried the Princeſs Mandana with her: The Door of the Temple was ſhut in an Inſtant: ſo that Cleander not being able to releaſe his Princeſs, nor Arteſilas to carry her away, as he deſigned; theſe two Rivals went one to the other with as much Fury as their Paſſions were violent; they ſpoke one to another, but I think were not underſtood. In the mean time, all our Men, who were diſperſed into ſeveral Parties, gathering together about Cleander, who thought our ſelves in a Condition not only to reſiſt Arteſilas, but alſo to overcome him; and Cleander fought with ſo much Courage, that he killed his Rival with his own Hand, and many more: ſo that after the Death of this Prince, the reſt of his Men diſperſed themſelves, and vaniſhed in a Moment: ſo that if they had opened the Gate of the Temple again the very ſame Hour, we had releaſed the Princeſſes: we knocked at the Door, but I think the Noiſe was ſo great, that the Women durſt not open it: Preſently, all the King of Pontus's Men, and all thoſe belonging to the Governour of Epheſus, came up to us; and we were ſo ſurrounded with a Multitude, that it is an abſolute Miracle to ſee we are eſcaped; for Cleander could not reſolve to ſave himſelf by the Barque which waited for us, but would ſtill be near the Gate of the Temple; yet in the end, ſeeing an abſolute Impoſſibility to reſiſt ſuch a Multitude, and thinking he had received a Wound in his right Hand, reſolved to retreat fighting until we came to the Barque, unto which we entered in ſpite of all thoſe who purſued us, and made all haſte away: for they threw many Darts at us, and we kept them off us with our Shields: But when we were out of their Reach, we looked whether the Wound of Cleander was conſiderable, and found it to be more troubleſom, than dangerous: Afterwards we muſtered to ſee whether we had all our Men, and except ten or twelve Souldiers whom we had out of Epheſus, and thoſe would not imbarque with us, we loſt not a Man: but making a ſtrict Search, I found amongſt us a Servant belonging unto Arteſilas, who in this Tumult choſe rather to enter into our Bark, then to fall into the Hands of the Egyptian Governour: I no ſooner ſaw him, but I knew him, and when I ſhewed him unto Cleander, Sir, ſaid he unto him, I beg your Pardon for ſeeking Sanctuary under you. Friend, ſaid Cleander to him, my hatred to thy Maſter is dead with him, and ſhall not revive to hurt thee; but however tell us, by what ſtrange Accident we met to Day. Sir, replied the Man, none can tell you better than my ſelf what the deſign of that Prince whom I ſerved, was; ſo I have had but too much knowledg of his Secrets, ſince the flight of the Prince Antaleon.

And then, ſince he thought to merit much from Cleander, by defaming his Maſter, in lieu of anſwering to what was asked, he told us that which we asked not; and related unto us, how the Prince Arteſilas was of that odious Conſpiracy with the Prince Antaleon; not but that we knew it already, in going between Sardis and Epheſus; but he related it unto us more exactly: Afterwards, he told us, that this Prince knowing of the Orders which Crœſus had ſent unto Ageſiſtrata, by which he appointed the Princeſs his Daughter to take upon her the Habit of a Veſtal, he became ſo deſperate, that ſince he had committed ſo many Crimes in vain, he was reſolved to venture upon one more, which would be profitable unto him; ſo that his Plot was to carry away the Princeſs; and in order to that, he left the King upon ſome pretence or other, and diſguized himſelf and his Men in Habit of Paiſants, and kept them in that Houſe out of which you ſaw us ſally, the Maſter of which had heretofore been his Servant: He told us further, that Arteſilas reſolved to wait there until that Door of the Temple was open, and then to ſeize upon the Princeſs Palmis, and carry her unto a Ship which he had provided ready, with Intention that if the Door of the Temple did not open within ſix Days, then to force it in the Night, and execute his Deſign, as he would now have done, if he had not been prevented. So that we collected thus much from the diſcourſe of this Man, that Cleander, at leaſt, preſerved the Princeſs from being carried away by Arteſilas, whom the Gods by his own Hands did puniſh for being in ſuch a horrid Conſpiracy, as that of the Prince Antaleon was. In the mean time, night drawing on, we went to lodg in a little Village, where we cauſed Cleander's Wound to be dreſſed, and alſo three or four Souldiers more, who had been wounded alſo, and whom we left there with Men to have a care of them. Afterwards, quitting the Sea, and taking Horſes, which we expected to wait for us in that Town, and which we ſent thither, in caſe our enterprize ſhould fail, we are come hither; we ſtayed two Days by the way, by reaſon we ſent to know ſome News of the Princeſs; and we underſtood by a Man whom Meneceus ſent unto his Friend, that the Guards were now extreamly much more ſtrict about the Temple, and that there was no Poſſibility of attempting any thing in the like manner again. And Ageſiſtrata her ſelf was reſolved to favour the going out of the Princeſſes no more; ſhe conceiving that this ſad Accident did manifeſt the Gods were not pleaſed at her connivance at it before; yet we underſtood at the ſame time, that the Princeſs Palmis was fully reſolved not to do what the King her Father appointed; and Ageſiſtrata ſent word unto the King, that ſhe could not receive her: We alſo underſtand, that the Princeſs Mandana and ſhe are reſolved, and have promiſed not to part from each other, until better Fortunes did ſmile upon them. In concluſion, Sir, Meneceus and I, after we knew this, waited upon Cleander hither. After Timocreon had done ſpeaking, Cyrus, as ſad as he was, did teſtify unto the King of Phrygia, that he was much obliged unto his Son, for what he had done concerning the Princeſs Mandana; deſiring a Pardon, for not being ſo ſenſible of Joy at the receiving of his Son, as he ſhould have expreſſed any other time: Not but that I conceive my ſelf intereſted (ſaid he) in what relates to you; but the truth is, as long as Mandana is Captive, I am not capable of any Joy whatſoever. As he would have gone out, the King of Aſſyria came in; who came to enquire what news Timocreon had brought, for he had heard he was come: But as ſoon as Cyrus ſaw him, and being impatient to have him grieved as well as himſelf: Your hopes are broken, ſaid he, as well as mine, and our Princeſs is more captive than ever, as you may underſtand by Timocreon. The King of Aſſyria drawing nearer him, cauſed him to repeat all that he had told unto

Cyrus, who was gone unto his Tent to lament his Miſfortunes with more liberty. He ſent one notwithſtanding to Cleander, to aſſure him from him, that he ſhould find a moſt inviolable Sanctuary with him, and deſired that he himſelf might have the Honour to preſent him unto the King his Father: And after he had ſpent two Hours in conſidering the obſtinacy of his Fate, and had ſent to acquaint the Princeſs Ariminta with this ill Succeſs, one came to tell him, that Cleander, Meneceus and Tegeus were arrived: Making then a Truce with his Sorrows for a while, or to ſay better, ſhutting them up in his Heart, to welcome a Prince, whoſe Reputation was ſo high, he commanded they ſhould enter, and he himſelf went to meet him. This firſt Congratulation paſſed very well on both ſides: And as doubtleſs Cleander was as handſom a Man as was in the World, and of as good a carriage, Cyrus was charmed with him at the firſt ſight, and one mignt ſee them look upon one another with ſo many ſigns of Admiration in their Eyes, that it was eaſy to foreſee they would love one another moſt tenderly. I am very unfortunate, Sir, (ſaid Cleander unto him, holding his Arm in a Scarf by reaſon of the Wound he received at Epheſus) that I am forced to appear before you, having failed in that Service which I deſigned to do you. It is rather my part to complain, replied Cyrus, ſince I fear my Misfortune is contagious, and is a cauſe of yours. I have more cauſe of Fears and Sorrows than you, anſwered Cleander, when I apprehend my Misfortunes may chance follow me in your Army. I know not, replied Cyrus, whether your bad Fortunes will follow, but I am ſure high Fame goes before you; and the name of illuſtrious Cleander has been long known unto me, ſo that I am in Love with his Glory and Honour; in Love, I ſay, moſt pure, without any Envy or Jealouſy. Happy Lovers, replied Cleander ſmiling, are never jealous; and they who poſſeſs Honour, and deſerve it, as the moſt illuſtrious Cyrus does, will eaſily permit others love it alſo; yet, Sir, at this time, I ſhall deſire nothing but the Honour to ſerve you. You are ſo loaded with Honours and Glory, replied Cyrus, that you have no reaſon to wiſh more than you have; yet give me leave to oppoſe your deſire of it at this time, ſince I am already ſo much obliged unto you, that I muſt needs endeavour to pay unto the Prince Artamas, that Debt which I owe unto the illuſtrious Cleander. I have ſo little merited the firſt of thoſe Names, replied he, that I dare hardly take it upon me, though the King my Father ſhould appoint it. Then I muſt go and move him to command you by his abſolute Authority, replied Cyrus: and ſo he carried Cleander unto the Tent of the King his Father; and preſenting him, Receive here with Joy, Sir, ſaid he unto him, a Prince who is worthy to be your Son, and deſerves more Crowns, than Fortune (as prodigal as ſometimes ſhe is) knows how to give. The King of Phrygia would have obſerved the ſame ceremonious Reſpects which he was uſed to render unto Cyrus; but that Prince being deſirous he ſhould embrace Cleander, and natural Affection being ſtronger than all Rules of Civility, he embraced him with unimaginable delight; for as ſoon as he perceived Cleander, he ſaw ſo perfect a reſemblance of his dear Elſimena, that he changed colour, ſo that his Heart, as well as Eyes and Reaſon, telling him that he was really his Son, he received him with all the Teſtimonies of a dear Affection which a generous Father could expreſs unto an illuſtrious Son. Sir, ſaid Cleander unto him, can you acknowledg me for your Son, after that which I have had the Misfortune to do againſt you? Yes, replied the King of Phrygia, and ſmiled; and it is moſt advantagious for me to do ſo, otherwiſe I muſt acknowledg you to be my Conqueror. If your Goodneſs can pardon me this Crime, anſwered he, I beſeech you let it be no more remembred. It is a Crime ſo glorious, ſaid Cyrus, that I make a queſtion whether or no the King your Father does wiſh it had never been committed; for as you are a Debtor unto him for your Life, ſo, as he hath told me, you preſerved his in this laſt War: However, Cleander, if you will diſclaim from what you have already done againſt the King of Phrygia, I ſhall oblige him to remember nothing but what the Prince Artamas ſhall do in the future. I conjure you, Sir, replied he, I command you, ſaid the King of Phrygia (if I may command in the preſence of one whom I will ever obey) that you prefer the Intereſts of the illuſtrious Cyrus before your own. This is a Command ſo unjuſt (replied the invincible Prince of Perſia) that I will not give Prince Artamas time to anſwer it: Aud I declare unto him before you, that I deſire no more from him, but what I will render unto him firſt, that is, a firm Friendſhip; ſo that amidſt my Misfortunes I may have the happineſs of finding an illuſtrious Friend the ſame Day the King of Phrygia finds an illuſtrious Son.

The King of Phrygia, and the Prince Artamas (whom we will no longer call Cleander) anſwered Cyrus with all poſſible Civility; and ſince this Conference had continued ſomething long, the King of Phrygia grew impatient to talk with his Son in private; and therefore they retired: Yet in their paſſing, the King of Phrygia carried him unto the King of Aſſyria, and unto the King of Hircania, who received him very civilly; the firſt of theſe not daring to teſtify that Secret diſcontent which he always had againſt the King of Phrygia. In the mean while all the Princes and Men of Quality in the Army came to viſit the Prince Artamas, who doubtleſs would have thought himſelf extreamly happy, if his love of the Princeſs Palmis had not tormented him. Cyrus then ſeeing no Hopes of releaſing Mandana but by Force, called a Council of War the Day following; where the Prince Artamas took his place with much Honour, ſpeaking unto every thing which was propoſed with as much Spirit and Judgment, as if a long experience had fortified his Reaſon; and it plainly appeared, that he who learns to conquer betimes, is exact in the knowledg of things, when others who have not that experience are ignorant in them; and that it is not impoſſible, but that a young Conqueror may be more able than an old Captain, who hath not ſeen ſo much as he, though lived longer. The Reſult of this Council was, that ſince the Seaſon of the Year was far ſpent, and Cræſus had attempted nothing, to ſend unto him, and demand the Princeſs Mandana, before fore any open War was declared. The Prince Artamas inſiſted moſt upon this Reſolution, becauſe he could not forget his Obligations unto Cræſus, notwithſtanding the ill uſage he had from him; and he uſed all his Rhetorick to perſwade Cyrus unto a Trial of all fair means before recourſe was had unto the laſt Remedy of War. Cyrus had much repugnancy to that Reſolution, alledging for reaſon his ill Succeſs of ſending into Armenia, and his Repentance in ſending. But he was anſwered, that the Caſes were not alike, ſince the King of Lydia could not deny, that the Princeſs Mandana was in his Dominions, and therefore he muſt needs anſwer directly. Moreover, 'twas further objected, that it was impoſſible to beſiege Epheſus conſidering the Seaſon of the Year, and alſo conſidering he had no ſtrength at Sea, therefore the Attempt ſeemed to be unreaſonable; eſpecially ſince if Cræſus would protect the Raviſher of Mandana, he muſt have a more plauſible Pretence for the War in the Eyes of the People. However Cyrus deſired that Feraulas might return before he ſent unto Cræſus, yet fearing he might ſtay too long, he reſolved that Hidaſpes ſhould go thither within two or three Days; and in the mean time that the Army ſhould advance, and march through part of Phrygia, and enter into Lydia that way, if the Anſwer of Cræſus was not Satisfactory.

In the interem, he had intelligence that Abradates was gone unto Sardis; and he acquainted the Queen his Wife with this News, who ſeemed to be very angry at it; yet he went to viſit her, and told her very obligingly, that he was very ſorry the King of Suſiana would not rather releaſe her by becoming his Friend, than vainly endeavouring to do it by declaring himſelf his Enemy, though he aſſured her ſhe ſhould ſtill be treated with the ſame Reſpect. This great Queen thanked him with Civility anſwerable to his Generoſity: And ſhe commended Araſpes ſo exceedingly, that Cyrus at the going out of her Chamber told him, that he could not pleaſe him better, than in pleaſing Panthea. From thence he went unto the Princeſs Ariminta, who deſired him to contrive it ſo, that ſhe might go and ſpeak with her Brother: So that it was reſolved ſhe ſhould advance towards the Frontiers of Lydia; and that the Queen of Suſiana ſhould go this Voyage with her, theſe two Princeſſes having contracted a great Amity one with the other: So that it was to be hoped this Queen might perhaps be ſerviceable unto her, ſince the King her Husband was in the Enemies Country. This Reſolution being pitched upon, and approved of by the King of Aſſyria, Cyrus returned to the Camp; and as ſoon as he came there, Feraulas was returned, and alſo the Man whom the King of Aſſyria had ſent: but both of them related, that it was a thing impoſſible for them to convey a Letter unto the Princeſs Mandana: They would have made a full Relation of the whole ſtate of things, but underſtanding that all had been related before they came, they forbore; yet they did relate how the Town and Temple were at this preſent ſtrictly guarded; how not only all the Souldiery were in Arms, but a great part of the Townſmen alſo; how they had ſent again unto Cræſus for new Orders; how the King of Pontus recovered; how a Prophecy of the Helleſpontick Sibyl, which none could interpret, made a great noiſe about the Town, ſince it would admit of a double Interpretation; how this Woman was admirable in Prophecies, and ſeldom was miſtaken in the Event; how all the Town of Epheſus knew not whether to Rejoice or Mourn, becauſe this Prophecy promiſed either great good Fortune, or menaced very great Miſery unto it. Feraulas and the other Man ſaid, they endeavoured both of them to procure this Prophecy, but could not poſſibly obtain it; for being Strangers and Importunate, it could not be gotten: So that their Voyages thriving no better, nor effecting any thing but Vexation to their Maſters, they durſt hardly look upon them: Cyrus did treat Feraulas never the worſe; but the King of Aſſyria being of a more violent Compoſition, could not believe but that the fault was in him he ſent. Cyrus then ſeeing the return of Feraulas was ineffectual, he was ready to diſpatch Hidaſpes, when he received intelligence that Cræſus at the return of his Embaſſadors from the Oracles, had declared himſelf, and done the firſt act of Hoſtility againſt Ciaxarus:

res: This News ſaved Hidaſpes a Journey, and haſted the march of the Army, which the next Morning began to move.

The Princeſs Ariminta fearing leſt thoſe firſt Occaſions of War ſhould prove fatal to her Brother, moved the Queen of Suſiana to begin their Journey, and haſte unto the Frontiers, that ſhe might ſpeak with the King her Brother, before he fell into the Hands of Cyrus: So that Araſpes by Orders from that Prince, guarded them unto a Town of Phrygia, towards Lydia, where the Army of Cyrus was to quarter, and where by Conſequence they might be in Safety.

Cyrus diſpatched a Meſſenger unto Ciaxares to acquaint him with all things; and received News from Thraſibulus, which aſſured him in general, that he was in great hopes to be happy both in his War and Love. Afterwards marching as faſt as it was poſſible, an Army of above an hundred thouſand Men ſhould march towards the Enemy, the Weather and Ways were ſo very bad, and Marches ſo long, that it was not expedient either to beſiege Places, nor give Battels; ſo that Cræſus who deſired no more then to have the Glory of the firſt onſet, did block up himſelf ſo advantagiouſly, that it was not poſſible for Cyrus to give the firſt Aſſault, nor hinder him from putting his Troops in their Winter-quarters: So that all which was to be done, was only to make ſome Incurſions into the Enemies Country, and Skirmiſh, which did ſo exceedingly vex Cyrus, that he ſtood in need of all his Conſtancy to ſupport his exceſſive Sorrow. He could not wonder enough at the Proceedings of Cræſus, who had begun a War at ſuch a time; and could not chuſe but think, that he was prompted to follow ſuch military Policies, ſo contrary to all Reaſon, by ſuch evil Deſtinies as would ruin him. Sometimes he reſolved to diſguiſe himſelf, and go into Epheſus, to ſee if all Attempts to releaſe the Princeſs were as difficult, as they were reported: Sometimes again he would go and force the Lydians in their entrenched Quarters, notwithſtanding the ill Weather; but when he conſidered, that though he ſhould do ſo, yet if he did not releaſe Mandana, but ſtill the King of Pontus might carry her away from Epheſus; then he hearkened unto Reaſon, and reſolved to wait, until there was ſome more Probability of good Succeſs in the War. However being much diſcontented with the incertainty of his Fortune, though he never had any deſire to enquire what Succeſs the future would produce; yet hearing the Helleſpontick Sibyl cried up with ſo many Elogies, he reſolved to ſend unto her; and indeed, ſent Ortalgues with Orders to enquire when he might hope for any reſt; and to bring back her Anſwer in writting under her Hand. At this time Ariminta put him in mind of his Word, and his Deſires concurring with hers, he diſpatched Aduſius to the King of Pontus, to deſire him he would obtain liberty from Cræſus to ſpeak with the Princeſs Ariminta, who much deſired to confer with him upon ſome important Buſineſs. That Prince received Aduſius very civilly; and ſent unto Sardis to obtain that favour from Cræſus, which was granted unto him. The King of Pontus then, and Aduſius agreed, that their meeting ſhould be in the Temple, which was a days Journey from Epheſus, having only five hundred Horſe apiece for their Guards. Aduſius had Orders to enquire of Mandana's Health; and, by the Information of Meneceus, he underſtood ſhe was very well, but he could not poſſibly ſpeak unto her: He being returned to the Camp, and the day when this meeting ſhould be being ſet down, Aduſius who had negotiated before, did guard her; Araſpes was excuſed, and Ariminta deſired that the Prince Phraartes might not accompany her, as he deſired. Before her departure, Cyrus and the King of Aſſyria did viſit her, and furniſhed her with ſuch Inſtructions, as ſuch an importent Buſineſs could inſpire them withal. As Cyrus was there the firſt, he had the Opportunity to tell her, that ſhe might aſſure the King of Pontus, that he would engage his Honour to remember all his Obligations, and that he would promiſe to reſtore him his Crown, if he would reſtore the Princeſs Mandana: Moreover, Cyrus let this Princeſs underſtand, that he would moſt firmly engage himſelf to be a Protector unto Spitridates, if ſhe ſhould negotiate well for him in this Buſineſs; but ſhe interrupting Cyrus, Sir, ſaid ſhe unto him, I beſeech you, do not mingle my Intereſts with yours, and let me have the Honour to negotiate that which concerns the illuſtrious Cyrus, and the King of Pontus, my Brother. Cyrus was about to anſwer her, when the King of Aſſyria came into the Princeſs Ariminta's Chamber; and adding his Prayers with the Prayers of his Rival, they conjured her to tranſact her beſt in that Negotiation. Both theſe Princes conducted her ſome two hundred Paces from the Army, after ſhe had bid adieu unto the Queen of Suſiana, who was exceedingly grieved to part from her, though it was but for a ſhort time. The King of Pontus alſo prepared himſelf for this Parley, and came unto the Temple according to the Appointment between him and Aduſius; he arrived there ſome two Hours before the Princeſs his Siſter. Since they had not ſeen one another ſince the loſs of their Dominions, this meeting did revive the Memory of their Misfortunes in both their Minds. As ſoon as the Princeſs came, ſhe was carried into a great Arched Hall, where commonly they uſed to keep their Feaſts at extraordinary Sacrifices, which for the magnificence of the Structure, and Beauty of the Furniture, did well become the meeting of two ſuch illuſtrious Perſons: After the King of Pontus had ſaluted her with many Expreſſions of tender Affection, they did ſit down, and all the Company withdrew.

Is it poſſible, Sir, ſaid ſhe unto him, that after all theſe unfortunate Diſaſters I ſhould have the Happineſs to ſee you again? The Condition wherein you ſee me, anſwered he, is ſo miſerable, that I make a queſtion whether this meeting will grieve or comfort you; and whether that which you take for a Happineſs be only ſome device of Fortune to make us more miſerable. Indeed, dear Siſter, to what purpoſe is this Enterview, unleſs to make you grieve at my Miſeries, as I do at yours? You may eaſily conceive by what I ſay, that I am not now the ſame Prince who condemned in you that innocent Affection which you had, and I believe ſtill have unto the Prince Spitridates: His Virtue and my own Paſſion have taught me not to cenſure Love ſo ſeverely: The truth is, I was much to blame to condemn that in another, which is ſo predominate in my ſelf: for ſince I ſaw you, I have loſt Battels, I have loſt my Liberty, I have loſt Crowns and Kingdoms; yet for all theſe, before I complain againſt Fortune, I muſt complain againſt Love. Sir, ſaid ſhe unto him, you are in this much to be blamed and pitied, ſince if you can but overcome this Paſſion, you may yet be happy. Ah Siſter, ſaid he, I ſhould not know how to love, if I ſhould imagine there can be any other Happineſs in the World but in being loved by the Princeſs Mandana. But however, I beſeech you tell me what Conſiderations did move ſuch earneſt Deſires in you to ſee me? was it only out of your Tenderneſs, and natural Affection? or, was it to pity me, and your ſelf? or elſe, does it relate unto ſome Intereſt of Spitridates, or Cyrus, or your own, or mine? I beſeech you acquaint me with your real Deſign, that I may the better know in what manner to ſpeak unto you. Sir, ſaid ſhe unto him, though all theſe Conſiderations which you have named, may claim ſome ſhare in my deſign to ſee you; yet, to ſpeak ſincerely, it is your own intereſt which moſt induced me unto it: for, Sir, I muſt tell you, it is only your own fault if you be not happy, and if you do not one of the moſt heroick Acts that ever was done. Certainly, ſaid he, I am a very great Lover of Honour; and provided that I muſt not quit the Princeſs Mandana in acquiring it, I ſhall do any thing in the World you will propoſe unto me. Sir, ſaid the Princeſs Ariminta, Mandana does not love you, nor ever will. 'Tis true, ſaid he, but as long as ſhe is in my Power, her Affection ſhall never make any of my Rivals happy. Do you not conſider, Sir, anſwered ſhe, that by making your Rivals miſerable, you make her you love ſo alſo; and that you augment your own Misfortunes ſo much the more? For I have Authority to tell you, that if you could reſolve upon ſo much Equity, as to render up a Princeſs who loves you not, unto Cyrus who only hath her Heart, and unto whom you are a Debtor for your Life, he would in exchange reſtore you a Crown, which in all Probability you never will get without him; ſince it is not ordinary to find Protectors who will conquer Kingdoms, and render them unto thoſe they protect. Siſter, ſaid that Prince and ſighed, I do verily believe that Cyrus would do as much as he ſays, for I know his Generoſity better than you, and before you knew him: But though I do eſteem this illuſtrious Rival as much and more than ever I did; and though notwithſtanding my Love, I am very ſenſible of my Obligations to him for uſing you ſo well ſince he had you in his Power; and alſo though I do confeſs I owe my Life unto him; yet for all this Cyrus is not the ſame to the King of Pontus that Artamenes was. But, Sir, this Artamenes, ſaid the Princeſs, whom you loved ſo tenderly, was then not only on your Enemies ſide, but alſo got Victories from you, and alſo oppoſed your Love; and yet though he did diſpute with you for the Glory, and won ſo many Battels from you, ſtill you loved him, and acquainted him with thoſe Conſpiracies which were plotted againſt his Life; and commanded that none ſhould fight againſt him: Since that, Sir, he reſtored you your Liberty, he rendred back what he had conquered in your Dominions, and gave you Forces to ſuppreſs thoſe who rebelled againſt you; and now he offers you a Kingdom, upon Condition you will reſtore Mandana, whoſe Love is impoſſible to be obtained by you. All this you ſay, Siſter, replied he, I confeſs is full of Reaſon; and if I had more Ambition than Love; or, to expreſs my ſelf better, if my Love were not ſtronger than my Reaſon, certainly I ought, in point of Generoſity, of Policy, and Ambition, to hearken unto this Propoſition you make: But in that Condition which my Soul is, it is impoſſible for me ſo much as to think of it; and I wonder how the Princeſs Ariminta can imagine, that any one can ſo eaſily part with what one loves; ſhe, I ſay, who is ſo juſt as to love a Prince whoſe Father was a declared Enemy of my Houſe. Sir, replied ſhe, and bluſhed, Spitridates loved Ariminta, but Mandana never loved, nor never will love the King of Pontus. If I ſhould love that Princeſs, replied he, becauſe ſhe loves me, then my Love would ceaſe when ſhe ceaſed loving; but ſince the Foundation of my Love, is, becauſe ſhe is the moſt amiable in the World, I ſhall eternally love her, though ſhe never love me: Had I then known, when I had the good Fortune to ſave her Life at Sea, that Artamenes was Cyrus, and that Cyrus was my Rival, perhaps, as the temper of my Mind was then, I ſhould have reſtored her unto him: I was then ſo newly caſt out of a Throne, that I thought no Prince could live without it: But now ſince the Charms of the Princeſs Mandana have enchanted my Heart, and I am unaccuſtomed unto Soveraignty, Love has quite aboliſhed Ambition out of my Soul; and if I could paſs away all the Days of my Life with this incomparable Princeſs, though it were in ſome deſert Iſle, where neither Soveraign nor Subject did inhabit, I ſhould eſteem my ſelf moſt happy. Come not then to increaſe my Miſeries by awakening a Paſſion, which one more ſtrong than it hath caſt into a Sleep; and which, if diſturbed by ſuch Propoſitions as theſe, would but augment my Miſery. But, Sir, replied the Princeſs of Pontus, what can you ever hope for by detaining her? Could I but hope for any thing, anſwered he, I ſhould not be ſo miſerable as I am; but I do profeſs unto you, that I can hope for nothing by it, and do expect every Day one Misfortune after another: Yet you may aſſure Cyrus, in anſwer unto his Generoſity, as far as I am able, that when I firſt did underſtand I was his Rival, I grieved as much at it, as I did at the loſs of two Crowns: But ſince it is injuſtice to deſire things impoſſible, oblige him, I entreat you, not to accuſe me of Ingratitude, in not rendring up the Princeſs Mandana unto him, for I loved her before he knew her, and ſhall love her till Death. Had I any thing in my Power, ſaid he and ſighed, which I could offer him by way of Ranſom, I ſhould with Joy preſent that any thing unto him: But, dear Siſter, ſince Fortune hath deprived me of all, and left me nothing but Mandana in my Power, I beſeech you pardon me if I do not redeem your Liberty by my own Ruin. You are in the Hands of a generous Conqueror, and I do not fear he will revenge the Injuſtice I do unto him, upon you; and to excuſe me in what I do, conſider I beſeech you what Love hath moved Spitridates unto: he, for your particular intereſt, hath left his Father, refuſed Crowns, and wanders unknown throughout the World; he hath done more for you, than I have done for Mandana: Therefore, my dear Siſter, pity me, and do not perſwade me unto any Impoſſibilities, which I cannot do.

But, Sir, ſaid ſhe unto him, I did not hate Spitridates, as Mandana hates you: Moreover, if there were any apparent probability, that you keep this Princeſs for any Advantage, I ſhould not ſo much oppoſe your Deſign, but pity you for the Misfortunes which ſhe is the Cauſe of; yet conſidering the State of things, I am fully perſwaded, that all the Power of Cræſus will ſink, and that you with her will ſink under it: for do but call to mind all the prodigious Acts which Artamenes and which Cyrus hath done, and you will find the Number of his Victories ſo many, and his Conqueſts ſo great, that they cannot be remembred without wonder. And can you think the Gods did raiſe him unto that Height, only to caſt him down? Has Fortune, contrary to her Cuſtom, followed him ſo conſtantly, purpoſely to forſake him afterwards? to forſake him whoſe Power doth every day increaſe, and ſeems to hold the Deſtiny of all Aſia in his Hands. So that plainly foreſeeing you will love Mandana, were it not much better then to reſtore her, and gain a Kingdom by it, then to ruine your ſelf by keeping her, and at length loſe her too?

Doubtleſs it had, replied he, if I were able to do it; but ſince it is not in my Power, I muſt not ſo much as think of it any more. Therefore Siſter, I beſeech you, diſcourſe no more upon this Subject: for if any upon Earth could perſwade me to reſtore Mandana, it ſhould be Mandana her ſelf: and ſince I have denied her Tears and Prayers, pardon me, Siſter, if I deny your Propoſition with Adundance of Eaſe: and it is not ſo difficult to deny a Crown, as it is to deny Liberty unto one who is adored. This divine Princeſs hath offered me a thing more precious then a Crown, ſince ſhe hath offered me her Friendſhip, if I would give her Liberty: Judg therefore, if after this I can hearken unto your Propoſitions from Cyrus. But Siſter, I beſeech you, do me the Favour as not to let my Rival know how conſtant the Princeſs Mandana is unto him: but doubtleſs he is already ſufficiently perſwaded of it, and there is no need that I my ſelf ſhould confirm him in a Truth ſo advantagious unto him. Uſe not my own words to make that Prince, whom I ought to hate more then I do, to hate me; for really I do eſteem him ſo much, that ſometimes I curſe my Fortune for forcing me to be his Enemy, ſince I owe him my Life: you may aſſure him from me, that if the Diſpute were about nothing but a Crown, I would lay it at his Feet, yea and my Honour alſo, which is a thing more dear unto me: but as for Mandana, abſolutely I cannot do it. Moreover, Siſter, the Power of Cræſus is not ſo inconſiderable as you imagine it. The King of Aſſyria, ſaid ſhe, and interrupted him, was much more puiſſant then he, and he ſubdued him. Cræſus, ſaid he, is ſtronger than the King of Aſſyria was, becauſe more united; and ſince his Endeavours are to prevent Cyrus from lording it over all Aſia, our Souldiers fighting for their Country and Liberty, are no leſs exaſperated than my Self, who fights for Mandana.

The Princeſs Ariminta, ſeeing ſhe could not prevail with the King her Brother, could not reſtrain her Tears, and began to add her Prayers unto her Reaſons, but both to no purpoſe, for ſhe was compelled to part from him without obtaining her deſired end: ſhe perceived that he was ſomething aſhamed to be ſo unjuſt and ungrateful towards Cyrus, whom he eſteemed ſo much, and unto whom he was ſo great a Debtor: yet Love was more predominant than his Reaſon, and rul'd his Soul which was ſenſible of nothing but that Paſſion. The Sacrificers of that Temple prepared a very Magnificent Collation for the Princeſs Ariminta: But ſhe only looked upon it, and thanked them, for her Soul was ſo ſad that ſhe could not eat: ſhe departed from thence, and went to lie in a Caſtle, ſome fifty Furlongs from thence. The parting was very ſad, for this Princeſs imagining, that perhaps ſhe ſhould never ſee the King her Brother again, or if ſhe did, it would be as a Priſoner, and vanquiſhed, ſhe could not reſtrain her Tears. Heſionida, who ſaw into her thoughts, wept as well as ſhe: and the King of Pontus himſelf ſeemed much dejected as ſoon as he had put her into the Coach; and turning himſelf towards Aduſias, Tell your Illuſtrious Maſter, ſaid he unto him, it is not the Princeſs Ariminta's fault that I do not ſatisfy him; nor is it long of my own Reaſon, which tells me, I ought to do it: But tell him, generous Aduſius, it is only the Princeſs Mandana, whom he muſt accuſe for my Crime: yet aſſure him, that I ſhall diſpute with him for her, with ſo much Courage, that though I be overcome, it will be without ſhame, ſince my Death and my Defeat will not be unworthy of my Princeſs, and my Conqueror. Aduſius promiſing to obey him, the Coach went on; and the King of Pontus taking horſe, the Princeſs returned towards the Camp, and the King her Brother towards Epheſus, with both their Minds filled with various thoughts, but all melancholy.

Cyrus, and the King of Aſſyria, during the abſence of Ariminta, had many a reſtleſs thought; for their Hopes were not ſtrong enough to make them think that this meeting would procure the Liberty of Mandana; ſince though the King of Pontus would have conſented, yet Cræſus perhaps would not: But ſince Fears and Hopes are the Life of Lovers, they feared and they hoped, ſucceſſively one after another. The day in which the Princeſs Ariminta was expected back, being come, they went to meet her; many Perſons of Quality, amongſt the reſt, the Prince Phaartes did follow then. Theſe two Illuſtrious Rivals, riding alone ſome diſtance before the reſt, after a while of ſilence, and tranſported with their Paſſions, began to diſcourſe. Can you believe, ſaid the King of Aſſyria unto Cyrus, that our Rival will ſo much as hearken unto the Princeſs Ariminta? Since I know him to be affable and civil, ſaid Cyrus, I am confident he will lend her a hearing. But ſince I know him to be in Love, ſaid the King of Aſſyria, I am confident he will refuſe the Propoſition which you make: at the leaſt, I am certain, tain, that though you ſhould offer to reſtore unto me Babylon, and all my Dominions, which are more conſiderable than the Kingdom of Pontus; and though I were certain to be vanquiſhed in the Combate which we are to fight, I had rather die in keeping Mandana, than mount the Throne, by parting with her unto you. This thought, replied Cyrus, is worthy of your ſelf, and of the Princeſs whom we adore, and ſpeaks ſo much violent Affection, as it muſt needs be concluded after this, that they who maintain Love is the Cauſe of Love again, are much deceived; ſince if it were ſo, the Princeſs Mandana ſhould have divided Hearts, being ſo infinitely loved and adored as ſhe is, both by the King of Aſſyria, the King of Pontus, and the unhappy Cyrus: for, Sir, ſaid he, and looked upon his Rival, ſince you are able to refuſe one Crown, rather than part with Mandana, I would loſe an hundred, if I had them, and aſſume as many Fetters as I quitted Scepters, rather than alter my thoughts of her. As they were thus in diſcourſe, they eſpied the Horſes, and immediately after, the Coach of the Princeſs Ariminta: and riding before the reſt, they went to meet her: The Coach ſtaying, they lighted from their Horſes, and came towards her with beating Hearts; yet they no ſooner ſaw her put up her Hood, but they perceived by her Eyes that her negotiation had not taken effect; and knew by the firſt word ſhe ſpoke, that they had more reaſon to fear than hope: yet both of them did moſt civilly thank her, eſpecially Cyrus, who having no Mind to ſtay her any longer in that place, told her, that they ſhould have better conveniency to acknowledg their obligations unto her at her own Lodging. She had a great mind to have them with her in the Coach, but there were ſo many Women, that it could not be, therefore theſe Princes took horſe, and went with her unto her Lodging, whither the Queen of Suſiana came, being conducted by Araſpes, who almoſt never left her. When they were come thither, this wiſe Princeſs told them what ſhe could not conceal, that the King her Brother would not reſtore the Princeſs Mandana : but ſhe expreſſed her ſelf with ſo much prudence, dence, and ſuch good Language, that ſhe did rather leſſen, then augment their reſentments againſt the King of Pontus her Brother. Aduſius acquainted Cyrus as he lighted from his Horſe, with what the Prince did charge him withall: who out of his reſects unto the Princeſs Arimanta, ſeemed not tranſported with it, but ſaid, I am extreamly Sorry, that I am thus conſtrained to be an Enemy unto ſo great a Prince; yet notwithſtanding, Madam, I promiſe you, that though the fortune of Arms does favour me, yet I will not imploy the Power of a Conqueror againſt him any further, than ſhall only concern the intereſt of the Princeſs Mandana: and do here declare unto you, that he ſhall never be further captive, than as the Princeſs Mandana makes him: that Hand which hath offered him a Crown, ſhall never fetter him. But the King of Aſſyria, who was naturally of a more violent temper, had much ado to contain himſelf; and could not chuſe, for all his Reſpects unto Ariminta, but caſt out ſuch ſharp language as contained many Menaces, and much Anger. After this, Cyrus, and the King of Aſſyria withdrew, and Phaartes only, when all the Company was gone, continued his viſit.

Since the return of this Princeſs, Cyrus did ſo beſtir himſelf, that though Winter was not yet paſt, he began to annoy his Enemies: Not a day did paſs wherein he did not ſend out ſome ſhirmiſhing parties, and ſometimes went out himſelf. He received intelligence upon intelligence from all parts; and imployed his time in informing himſelf how Mandana did: what forces Cræſus had, which way his Deſigns aimed; how he might croſs them, and by what means he might releaſe his Princeſs: he gave Orders for all neceſſaries fitting for a great Siege, not knowing whether he ſhould be put unto it: he diſpatched away towards Thraſibulus, for proviſion of a Fleet, in caſe he was to beſiege Epheſus. But as the Spring-time of the Year was near, he received ſuch news as much joyed him, which was, That Cræſus hearing Fame ſpeak loud in behalf of Artamenes, whom he knew by the name of Cleander, That he was really the King of Phrygia's Son, and ſo acknowledged, he reſolved to recal the Princeſs his daughter unto Sardis, and to bring the Princeſs Mandana with her, as thinking that a place of greater ſecurity then Epheſus. This news was wondrous welcome unto Cyrus, as well becauſe Mandana would be far from Sea, as becauſe he had Hopes to releaſe her in the Way as ſhe came. As Artamus was very well acquainted with that Country, ſo he told him, that he knew an infallible way to place an ambuſh in a Wood, cloſe by the way, where they muſt of neceſſity paſs in going from Epheſus to Sardis, which their Enemies could not poſſibly avoid, and where in all likelihood he might intercept and releaſe the Princeſſes. So that their only buſineſs was to be informed of the certain time when they would ſet out of Epheſus, and what number their Convoy conſiſted of. Feraulas was diſpatched thither with Letters from Meneceus unto Friends there. Timocreon ſent alſo to Sardis, ſo did Tegeus, to the end they might every way receive Intelligence, and not be miſtaken. This freſh Hope put ſuch an impreſſion of Joy into the Heart and Eyes of Cyrus, that he ſeemed more freſh and lovely than ever; his Converſation being now not ſo melancholy as before, it did exceedingly delight the Queen of Suſiana, and the Princeſs Ariminta: as for the laſt of which, the condition of the King of Pontus, the abſence of Spitridates, and the Courtſhip of the Prince Phaartes, all theſe Conſiderations did procure her many angry Hours. Panthea alſo was not without her ſhare of Sorrows, yet the Civilities of Cyrus, his pleaſant Addreſſes, and his Spirit, did often-times ſuſpend them; for he endeavoured as much poſſible he could to make their Captivities leſs tedious unto them.

Whilſt this was the State of Affairs, and whilſt all Aſia was in Arms, waiting for nothing but until the Sun had dried up the field of Battel, and produced freſh Palms to Crown the Conqueror: Cyrus, being full of pleaſant impatience, ſince he hoped e're long to releaſe Mandana, and acquire new Glory, ſaw Artaban arrive, whom Ciaxares had ſent unto him; and who informed him, that all Media was in Peace, that Ciaxares was in health, and that he would ſend Aglatidas back unto him with freſh Supplies. At the name of Aglatidas, Cyrus imbraced Artaban, and enquired very earneſtly how he did. Sir, ſaid Artaban unto him, I have Orders from him to relate unto you the Sequel of his Hiſtory, which is no leſs full of Admiration, than that part you know already was Extraordinary. It is Megabiſes then, replied Cyrus, who diſturbs his Happineſs. It is in vain, Sir, replied he, for you to gueſs at his Adventures, for they are ſo ſtrange that it is impoſſible they ſhould be imagined. However, ſince Artaban ſeemed very weary, Cyrus would then keep him no longer from his reſt, but deferred the Relation of it until the next day. And in the mean time he managed his time ſo well, and took ſuch Orders for all things that were neceſſary, as the next day he came unto Artaban, with intention to hear this Story. Since Cyrus and he were alone, Artaban put that Prince in memory of Arbates and his Cheat; of Aglatidas and his Jealouſy in ſeeing Megabiſes and Ameſtris together in the Garden; of his Deſpair and Exile; of his feigned Paſſion unto Anatiſa at his return, of the Sorrows which this feigned Paſſion cauſed in Ameſtris, becauſe ſhe thought it real: how ſhe knew Aglatidas was jealous, but knew not of whom; of the odd Reſolution ſhe took to juſtify her ſelf in his Opinion, by marrying Ottanus, of whom ſhe was certain he was not jealous, nor could be; of her Marriage; of her, and his own Deſpair, when they knew their reciprocal Innocency; and alſo their laſt parting. After a ſhort Rivival of all theſe paſſages, Cyrus turning himſelf towards Artaban, I do very well remember them all, ſaid he unto him, the Misfortunes of my Friends do not ſo eaſily ſlip out of my Memory; and therefore I pray ſatisfy my Curioſity, and relate all that concerns Aglatidas. Then Artaban obeying his Commands, began thus.

The Sequel of the Hiſtory of Aglatidas and Ameſtris.

FOR your better underſtanding the Story of Aglatidas, and the Accidents happened unto him ſince his return into Media, I muſt acquaint you, Sir, with the Adventures of Ameſtris ſince her Marriage with Ottanus, and ſince that ſad Separation of Aglatidas and her, wherein both Love and Vertue did eminently appear, and reſide both at a time in the Heart of Ameſtris. But that you may judg of her Sufferings, it is requiſite I ſhould make a particular Deſcription of the Perſon, Humour and Spirit of Ottanus: for ſince it was Aglatidas who ſpoke of him unto you at Sinope, and ſince I know him to be as wiſe and reſerved a Man as lives, doubtleſs he would not aggravate his Faults. Imagine then Ottanus to be very tall, but far from handſom; of a ſullen, fierce and ſubtile Aſpect, and an unpleaſing and forced Action, of a rude and boariſh Converſation; with theſe Qualities imagine him to be of as much Spirit and Courage as ever any had: So that if an Art could have been found out to have ſeparated the good Qualities of Ottanus from his bad, there was enough to be found in him to have ſufficiently furniſhed a compleat Man, and alſo a very Monſter: However, ſince that Spirit which he had was of a turbulent and reſtleſs Temper, it had been better both for himſelf and for Ameſtris, if he had been a dull Blockhead, as I ſhall hereafter let you know; for if he had been ſo, he had not ſo much tormented himſelf, nor perſecuted her. You may remember, Sir, how ſuddenly he became happy, by reaſon of the odd Humour in that fair Lady; his Happineſs was ſo great, that at the firſt he thought upon nothing elſe, but of enjoying her he loved; and ſo ſolely devoted his Heart unto Joy, as I believe he did not obſerve the Melancholy of Ameſtris on the Marriage-day; and I think it was a long time after, before he began to take any notice whether ſhe was pleaſant or diſcontented. The truth is, his good Fortune ſeemed to be as great as poſſible, for he had married with her own Conſent, the faireſt, the moſt vertuous, and the richeſt Lady in all Ecbatan, who in her own choice preferred him before all the compleat Gallants of the Court: Moreover, the two Rivals who were moſt to be feared, were out of Town, to wit, Aglatidas and Megabiſes; ſo that conſider his Felicity in that reſpect, it could not but be imagined very great: Alſo, he was ſo exceſſively ſenſible of it for a while, that he ſpoke of nothing elſe: and whilſt Ameſtris was weeping in ſecret with her dear Menaſta, Ottanus was publiſhing his Joy unto the World. This prudent Lady was ſo wiſe as to hide her Diſcontents from her Husband: But ſince it was an intolerable Torment, to be always in a conſtrained Mode, ſhe ſhunned the Company of all others as much as ſhe could, and forced her ſelf only in the preſence of Ottanus. She always delighted in Solitude more than Company; and Ottanus did ſeem far from any Jealouſie: But after the firſt Edg of his Joy was taken off, and he returned unto his accuſtomed dull Humour,he began to conſider, among the reſt of his ſullen Muſings, what reaſon Ameſtris had, after ſhe had ſo long a time treated him rigorouſly, to change upon a ſudden, and make him happy; he reſolved to ask her the reaſon of her ſudden Alteration; he preſſed her very earneſtly to tell him her Reaſons, why ſhe hated him, and why ſhe loved him; for, ſaid he unto her, I am certain the change was not in me, but your ſelf.

The unexpected Queſtion did ſo ſurprize Ameſtris that ſhe bluſh'd,and gave him no ſatisfactory Anſwer; yet told him, that as long as her Father lived, the Diſpoſition of her ſelf was in him: and after his death ſhe was reſolved to marry according to her own Affection; but ſhe ſpoke this with ſo much diſorder in her Countenance, that Ottanus changed Colour as well as ſhe: Then urging her no further, he went to walk by himſelf, as one of my intimate Friends, who was alſo a Friend of his, did tell me, and revealed all his Secrets unto me: But O Heavens! what odd phantaſtical Thoughts did come into his Mind during this Walk? and how ſeverely did he puniſh himſelf with his own capricious Fancy? Then he called to Mind all the Severity which Ameſtris expreſſed towards him; he remembred all her Scorning of him, and the great difference which ſhe made between him and Aglatidas or Megabiſes, and did not forget any Act which this fair and vertuous Lady did either in contempt of him, or in advantage unto any of his Rivals. Hower (ſaid he, after a Memory of all these things) I am the Enjoyer of Ameſtris, and all my Rivals, which in appearance were then more happy, were yet really more unfortunate: What then would I have, ſaid he, and what do I want to compleat my Happineſs? Then would he walk a while in a more calm Temper; and thinking he had ſetled himſelf in more Tranquillity of Mind, he gave over the thoughts of theſe things, and began to delight himſelf in the variety of Flowers which grew in the Garden where he walked; he quitted that ſhady melancholy Walk which he made choice of at firſt, and took one of a more open Air; but notwithſtanding the enamelled Beauty and variety of Flowers, as ſoon as he had changed places, he began to make Compariſons betwixt himſelf and his Rivals, and he could find no reaſon in the World why Ameſtris ſhould make choice of him before them: and though it be the cuſtom of all the World to flatter themſelves, and ſeldom to do Juſtice when they are their own Judges; yet Ottanus in this buſineſs did cenſure himſelf with all Severity poſſible; he concluded then, that Ameſtris ought not to have made choice of him, ſince ſhe had no prepoſſeſſed Opinion of him, or Affection to him, as he knew ſhe had not: For (ſaid he) the very day before my Happineſs, ſhe was intolerably incenſed againſt me, I never found her more cruel or uncivil towards me in her Life than that day; and the next Morning the Fa took her to marry me, and did ſo, though I could never conceive any Reaſon why ſhe ſhould think of ſo much Happineſs for me: But what matter is it which way our good Fortune comes, ſo we enjoy it? Ameſtris i mine, and all my Rivals go without her; nor is there any likelihood they ever had any ſhares in her Heart, ſince ſhe made not choice of any amongſt them, as if ſhe had pleaſed ſhe might have done, but preferred one whom they loved not before them all: Yet for all this, ſaid he, Ameſtris did not love me two days before ſhe married me; and I am moſt certain I uſed neither any Charms nor Enchantments to change her Heart; nor did I ſo much as ask that Favour from the Hands of Heaven, becauſe I ſaw ſo little probability of obtaining it, yet upon a ſudden I became happy and ———. Then he ſtayed a while, and went no further: Afterwards repenting himſelf of what he had ſaid, and what he thought to have ſaid; but I am very well aſſured that I am happy! and is it not ſo that I have only changed Misfortunes? And indeed Ottanus (as my Friend, whoſe Name was Artemon, of whom I already ſpoke, ſince told me) after he had well examined the matter, and ſufficiently tormented himſelf, could never reſolve with himſelf whether he was happy or unhappy; but he went home very reſerved and melancholy: He reſolved to get the Maſtery of his Mind, and wreſtle with thoſe Thoughts which diſturbed his good Fortune; and indeed for ſome certain days did endeavour to be contented. As for Ameſtris, her Thoughts were as far from any calm Serenity, as the Spirit of Ottanus was; and ſhe thought her ſelf the moſt miſerable Woman upon Earth, eſpecially ſince ſhe knew the Innocency of Aglatidas; for before that, though ſhe had an extream Averſion towards Ottanus, yet ſhe had ſome Conſolation in her hopes to undeceive Aglatidas in the Opinion he had of her, and if he were once undeceived, then had ſhe cruelly revenged her ſelf upon him: But as the ſtate of things were, knowing that if ſhe had not married Ottanus, ſhe might have been happy, and Aglatidas contented, ſhe ſuffered unconceivable Torment of Mind; ſhe could find no Conſolation in condemning him who was the cauſe of her Sufferings, nor in any thing elſe but condemning her ſelf. However, Aglatidas at parting having ſent a Letter unto Menaſta to give unto Ameſtris, ſhe quitted her ſelf very faithfully, and gave it unto her, though with much ado, to move her unto a reception of it: For ſince Ameſtris was as vertuous as fair, ſhe conceived it ſomething againſt the Rules of Vertue to receive any Expreſſions of Love from Aglatidas; yet after Menaſta promiſed her it ſhould be the laſt ſhe ſhould be troubled with, ſhe read it; and this was the Contents.

The miſerable Aglatidas unto the unfortunate Ameſtris.

I Can never conſent to go far from you before I have asked Pardon for being a Cauſe of your Sorrows: I would I were able, for your Tranquillities ſake, to wiſh you would abſolutely forget me; but I do confeſs my Weakneſs, and acknowledg that I cannot be ſo generous; but on the contrary, I deſire that the remembrance of my conſtant Paſſion may be the greateſt Torment of your Life. As for mine, I do promiſe you it ſhall be ſo miſerable, that unleſs you be the moſt inhuman Woman in the World, you will have ſo much Goodneſs as to let me know you pity me, leſt I ſhould die with Deſpair.

Aglatidas.

After Ameſtris had read this Letter with Tears in her Eyes, though ſhe refuſed to receive it at the firſt, yet ſhe kept it at the laſt, and would not give it again unto Menaſta; and talking together concerning the Croſſes of theſe Accidents, Menaſta told her, that ſince things paſt and done cannot be recalled and undone, the beſt way was to make the beſt of things one could, and to comfort ones ſelf. Ah, Menaſta, ſaid Ameſtris, how difficult is this Counſel to be practiſed? and how hard a matter is it to find any Comfort, when one is forced to ſee him continually whom one hates, and never to ſee him one loves? and I aſſure you, that ſince the time Aglatidas did juſtify himſelf in my Opinion, the Averſion which I ever had towards Ottanus is ſo much augmented, as I cannot tell which is the greater Torment, never to ſee Aglatidas, or continually to ſee Ottanus: for when I do not ſee Ottanus, I have but the Moiety of my Miſery, becauſe then I think very often upon Aglatidas without any remembrance of Ottanus: But as for Ottanus, I do confeſs, my dear Menaſta, with Shame, that I never look upon him but I think upon Aglatidas, and at the ſame time look upon Ottanus as the only Obſtacle of my Felicity, and likewiſe the Felicity of Aglatidas; I uſe my beſt Endeavours to choak ſuch Thoughts, but cannot hinder them: Ottanus never does any Act, or ſpeak any Word, that pleaſeth me, and which does not make me remember how Aglatidas was wont to tell me of an hundred thouſand pleaſant things: However, tho I cannot be Miſtreſs over the ſecret Motions of my Heart, yet I ſtrive to ſet the beſt Face I can upon them in his Preſence, and knowing that ſince he is my Huſband, both the Gods, and Vertue, and Decency, do all require my Obedience unto him, and that I be complacential towards him, this Duty and Complacency I do pay; but it is with ſuch a horrible Repugnancy, and by doing ſuch extraordinary Violence to my ſelf, that I wonder it doth not coſt me both my Reaſon and my Life.

But, ſaid Menaſta unto her, the only way to find Reſt and Remedy, is to divert your ſelf ſometimes, and ſee the World as heretofore you have done; for when you are in Company, and walking abroad in the Converſation of Wits, and pleaſant Men, you would leſs think upon either Aglatidas or Ottanus, ſince the Noiſe and Tumult of the World does at the leaſt take up the Mind, if not divert it, the variety of Men which one ſhall ſee; News, Walks, Wit, Muſique and Diſcourſe will inſenſibly expel melancholy, and make one delight in Company. Thoſe who uſe theſe Remedies, replied Ameſtris, do certainly complain but of common Sorrows; but they who uſe ſuch as I do, do know Menaſta, that all theſe things which you propound unto me as Remedies, are ſo far from that, as they are Multiplications of Miſeries; and indeed, how do you think I can care for dreſſing my ſelf as I was accuſtomed, when I deſire to pleaſe none, and when all the World diſpleaſeth me? How can I endure to be perpetually in the Converſation of Men, who would but importune me, and greive me more in lieu of comforting me? You know that all I can ſee, are either Friends or Enemies unto Aglatidas: So that the ſame which you think would make me forget him, will revive the remembrance of him: Should I go unto any Balls, conſidering the Humour I am in, they would be ſo far from diverting me, that I do not think I ſhould know ſo much as the difference of Tunes: Muſick would but make my Heart more heavy in lieu of eaſing it: As for News, which you preſcribe as a Remedy, ſince it pleaſeth none but a certain ſort of Men, who love to buſy themſelves in things which concern them not, it cannot by conſequence delight me, ſince I never think upon any thing but what concerns my ſelf, and never care for the reſt: Let it therefore be concluded Menaſta, that ſolitary Walks is the only Recreation I can take, and not upon the Banks of Orontes, where none walk but ſuch as would only ſee and be ſeen: Certainly I ſhould ſee nothing there that would pleaſe me; and if I ſhould do ſo, perhaps Ottanus (to augment my Miſery if it were poſſible) would become jealous of me. But then, ſaid Menaſta, how do you intend to live? I intend to live, replied ſhe, as one that would quickly die. This Reſolution, replied Menaſta, is moſt lamentable, however I beſeech you do not baniſh me from your Company. Ah, my dear Menaſta, ſaid Ameſtris, I cannot have ſuch a Thought; but ſince you cannot be much in my Company, unleſs you baniſh your ſelf from the reſt of the World, I ought not to deprive my ſelf of my only Conſolation, which is your Company.

Menaſta then made new Proteſtations of Friendſhip unto her, and ſo they parted; but yet Ameſtris was as good as her Word, and lived a moſt retired Life. And though it be the Cuſtom of new married People to be moſt gay, and more expenſive at that time, than any other of their Lives, yet ſhe on the contrary was more negligent of her ſelf than ever; ſhe feigned her ſelf not well, to the end ſhe might avoid all Places of Pleaſure; ſhe never made any Viſits, but ſuch as were of abſolute and obliging Neceſſity; nor would permit any to viſit her; ſo that ſhe who of all the Court was moſt viſited and courted, became the moſt ſolitary, and leaſt frequented: ſhe was ſo early every Morning at the Temple, that not only all the Ladies, but all the Gallants of Ecbatan were aſleep when ſhe was there: So that never Husband had more Reaſon to be at reſt than Ottanus; and the way of living which Ameſtris uſed, was certainly enough to have ſatisfied the moſt jealous Lover in the World: Yet Sir, all theſe Antidotes againſt that Poyſon, was ſo far from ſatisfying him, that they augmented his Malady, as the like was never heard: Yet notwithſtanding, at the firſt he was glad of that which did ſo much torment him afterwards; and thought, that to have a fair Wife whom none ſaw but himſelf, was no mean Happineſs: But yet this Reſervedneſs of Ameſtris did make ſo great a noiſe in the World, that nothing elſe was talked on; and ſince it was obſerved, that neither ſhe nor Aglatidas were to be ſeen, none could underſtand the real cauſe of it; but they thought that Ameſtris lived in that manner, becauſe Ottanus was jealous, and had commanded her ſo to do: ſo that he had a hundred Curſes every Day, for cauſing ſo fair a Lady to live ſo miſerable a Life. And ſince no Subject is ſo fit an Anvile to forge a hundred thouſand extravagant Tales upon, as a jealous Husband; Ottanus was the Mark that every Wit and Tongue did ſhoot at; and in leſs than eight Days, long Hiſtories were made of his Jealouſy: In ſo much as Artemon, of whom I ſpoke before, who was his Friend and Couſin, reſolved to acquaint him with the Voice of the People, thinking to do a good Office both unto him and Ameſtris: and though he knew the Spirit of Ottanus to be very odd, and that the Buſineſs it ſelf was ſomething difficult to tell, yet he reſolved upon it, and one Day went unto him: After a while of talk upon things indifferent, he asked how Ameſtris did; and as he anſwered ſhe was very well, Artemon told him, all her Friends complain that they can never ſee her; or to ſpeak more ſincerely, ſaid he unto him, They complain againſt you, for they ſuppoſe ſhe would not forſake them but by Orders from you: Then did he acquaint him with ſome Reports of him, yet concealing the bitter part of them. Ottanus was amazed at the Diſcourſe of Artemon, and ſeriouſly proteſted unto him, that he never deſired Ameſtris ſhould ſo retire from Company, but that her Reſervedneſs was voluntary, and proceeded from her ſelf only. No, no, ſaid Artemon, you cannot perſwade me to believe it; but ſince you know I am your Friend, you may very well make an ingenuous Confeſſion of your Weakneſs unto me: after you have done ſo, I ſhall ſay you have a Mind to ſatisfy the World: But to make me believe, that Ameſtris, who all her Life lived in the Company of compleat Men, and delighted her ſelf with Variety of Recreations, ſhould change her Courſe the very next Day after her Marriage, unleſs you had commanded her, or at the leaſt unleſs ſhe knew that living ſo would pleaſe you; this, I ſay, is a thing which I cannot believe. I do proteſt unto you, ſaid Ottanus to him, that I am no cauſe at all of her Alteration: And I do proteſt unto you, ſaid Artemon, that I do not believe you; yet to ſpeak ſincerely and plainly unto you, think Ottanus, that Ameſtris is yet too young to begin ſo ſevere a Courſe of living; and I have heard many ſay, that a Husband who is jealous without Cauſe, may afterwards have Cauſe to be ſo, and thank himſelf for it: I know the Vertue of Ameſtris is ſo great, that you are not in any Danger of ſuch a Miſery: but for all that, there is no great Pleaſure to be taken in being the common talk of the World; and the more vertuous a Wife is, the more fooliſh the Husband is, and more Tales are told, if he be Jealous: Therefore, if you will take my Advice, be not ſo; or if you needs muſt be, at the leaſt hide it handſomly. A Lover, I do confeſs, may be jealous without Diſhonour; and ſeldom is Love long without ſome ſparks of it: yet a Husband cannot ſeem to be ſo, but he expoſeth himſelf to be the Mock of all the World. I know it is ſome Injuſtice to excuſe the one, and condemn the other; but ſince it is grown to be the univerſal Opinion of the World, you cannot alter it; therefore alter your ſelf, if you can.

Ottanus ſeeing he could not perſwade Artemon to believe him, and being vexed to the Soul that ſuch Tales ſhould be commonly told of him, he carried Artemon whether he would or no unto the Chamber of Ameſtris, to ask her before him, whether ever he did ſo much as ſeem to deſire, ſhe ſhould retire her ſelf from the World. Artemon thinking Ameſtris would perhaps be pleaſed, if he could contribute any thing that might cauſe an Alteration in her Life, went with him. As ſoon as they entred, ſeeing ſhe was alone in her Cloſet: I pray, Madam, ſpeak, ſaid Ottanus to her, whether ever I deſired you to forbear any Viſits, or to go any more unto Walks, or Balls? Did I ever forbid you any handſom Dreſs, or refuſe any Company that ever came unto you? or did I ever bid you go unto the Temple by break of day, as it is reported over all Ecbatan? Sir, anſwered Ameſtris, and bluſhed, I cannot think there are any who have ſuch an ill Opinion either of you or me, as to ſay any ſuch thing: Ask Artemon, replied he, who will tell you, that becauſe you are more ſolitary than heretofore you uſed to be, it is ſaid that I am jealous. I had rather, anſwered Ameſtris, they ſhould ſay, you are jealous, and that I obey you, then ſay I go to Balls and Walks againſt your Commands. But ſince it befits me to juſtify you, Know Artemon, (ſaid ſhe, and turned towards him) that this change which is obſerved in me, is not properly a change, ſince it was always my Natural inclination, which I was forced to hide as long as Artambares and Hermaniſta lived, becauſe they were not ſo indulgent towards me as Ottanus is, who ſuffering me to be Miſtreſs of my own will, I can now live without any forcing my Self, as before I did. It muſt needs be confeſſed, replied Artemon, and ſmiled, that if you did force your Inclination, you did diſſemble it admirably well: but however, (ſaid he further, thinking to pleaſe Ameſtris whom he much eſteemed) ſince you did heretofore force your diſpoſition to obey a Father in expoſing your ſelf unto the view of the World: doubtleſs you can do no leſs now to preſerve the Honour of a Husband, who is accuſed of much injuſtice. I do not think (ſaid Ameſtris much puzzled) that ever Ottanus will be perſwaded by ſuch ill-grounded reports: for I have ſeen none ſince he was married of whom he can be jealous, and therefore I hope, that in ſpite of all malicious Rumours, he will permit me that Freedom to prefer the Tranquillity of my Cloſet, before the Tumult of the Court, of which I am weary. Then I beſeech you, tell me (ſaid Artemon, who imagined that Ameſtris ſpoke ſo only to pleaſe Ottanus) what you would have me Anſwer unto thoſe who ask me how you live, and what you do? You may tell them, replied ſhe, that ſometimes I imploy my ſelf in works of Gold and Silver, ſometimes I limb, and draw Pictures; and ſometimes I enjoy my Solitude in remembring all the Follies of many Men, who think themſelves very Wiſe, and are not ſo. Whilſt Ameſtris was thus talking, Ottanus walked up and down, and ſaid nothing; and obſerving that ſhe was angry at what Artemon had ſaid unto her, Madam, ſaid he, I hope you will not refuſe to juſtify me, and my Honour in the Opinion of the World; therefore I do conjure you to look upon it, and vindicate me: for I cannot endure to be any longer accuſed for keeping you up as a Priſoner.

Sir, ſaid ſhe unto him, if you let your Felicity depend upon the Opinion of others, I think my Self in an ill Condition; and if I ſhould expoſe my Self unto the World again, I know not whether the ſame Men that unjuſtly report you to be jealous, will not report me to be too Gallant and Free, therefore it is much better not to run the Hazard of that Danger. Then ſome came into the Cloſet, who had buſineſs with Ottanus, ſo that he could not make a reply unto Ameſtris: but he went out, and Artemon with him, leaving her alone in much wonder at the Paſſage. Menaſta came to her preſently after; and obſerving ſome diſorders in her looks, What's the matter, ſaid ſhe unto her, ſince yeſterday when I left you? I am ſo angry, replied Ameſtris, that I can hardly tell you the Cauſe of it; for truly, Menaſta, excepting your ſelf, I had but one comfort in the World, which was my Solitude, and which I thought I ſhould have enjoyed quietly until my Death, yet they will deprive me of that: then ſhe related unto her the whole Paſſage: But Menaſta, ſaid ſhe, is it true, that all the World reports Ottanus to be jealous? It is certain, anſwered ſhe, that ſuch a rumour runs about the Town, and more certain, that I never went about to undeceive them who report it, becauſe as long as they believe that to be the Cauſe of your Retiredneſs, they would never look after the true Cauſe; and conſequently, never find it out. And why, ſaid Ameſtris, did you not acquaint me with theſe things? Becauſe I ſaw you ſo ſad, anſwered Menaſta, that I ſcrupled whether I ſhould tell ſuch unpleaſant news: yet ſince you do know it, I wiſh it may be a means to reſtore you again unto your friends. No, no, anſwered Ameſtris, deceive not your ſelf, for I ſhall never do ſo; and were it for no other Reaſon, but the having ſuch a Husband as Ottanus is, I will never ſee them again: but Menaſta, I ſhall have further cauſe not to love him; for he will by all means expoſe me to the view of the World. For my part, ſaid Menaſta, I do not think that Ottanus did preſs you unto it ſo much as you think; and he would never have ſpoke as he did; but becauſe Artemon was preſent: however, for your diverſion a little, let me tell you, that Anatiſa hearing of your marriage with Ottanus in the Country where ſhe is, is rapt into a little Heaven of joy: and makes no Queſtion but her own marriage would be next with Aglatidas, as ſoon as ſhe came to Ecbatan: but afterwards hearing that he was vaniſhed, and had ſettled all his Affairs, as one that would not return again, her Sorrows were as great as her joys were before: and ſince Tatlers do ſeldom get love either from ſuch as themſelves, or others, every one had a Vie in Diſadvantage of Anatiſa, who did ſo boaſt of her Affection unto Aglatidas before, and of her Anger againſt him now, that I believe ſhe will never be able to make any great Conqueſts, though perhaps ſhe will endeavour to repair her loſſes by hopes of ſome other Victory. Ameſtris did hearken unto Menaſta with ſome Delight, becauſe the Anger of Anatiſa, did evidently prove the fidelity of Aglatidas: for though ſhe fully reſolved never to ſee him again, yet ſhe had a ſecret Deſign in the root of her Heart, to love him as long as ſhe lived.

Mean while, after Artemon was parted from Ottanas, and

Ottanus had diſpatched his buſineſs with thoſe who came to ſpeak with him, he was alone with his own thoughts, and calling all theſe Paſſages into memory, which before tormented him, he found his Soul in a worſe condition then before: and that which at the firſt, afforded him ſome minutes of tranquillity, was now a perpetual turbulency unto him. For (ſaid he to himſelf, as he related afterwards) from whence ſhould this ſudden alteration in the humour of Ameſtris proceed? What may be her reaſon to leave hating me? why ſhould ſhe begin to hate all the World? which way ſhould I find out the true cauſe of all this? After he had reſtleſly reaſoned upon it, and that which Artemon told him ſticking in his Stomack, he ſpoke unto Ameſtris at night, and conjured her, not to neglect her ſelf ſo much, but to make ſome Viſits: yet as ſhe refuſed it, though with much reſpect, ſo his mind became much exaſperated; and he very roughly moved her to dreſs her ſelf, and to walk abroad, and frequent Balls, and all other places, whither a jealous and angry Husband would have forbid his Wife; Inſomuch as ſhe told him, that ſhe would do all ſhe could to obey him; and in order to that, ſhe dreſſed her ſelf the next morning more handſomly than ordinary, and went unto the Temple at the ſame time which other Ladies uſed, but yet it was with ſo much melancholy in her Eyes, that ſhe infuſed no joy into any of thoſe Friends which ſaw her: and as ill luck was, two or three Perſons having ſeen her ſo ſad, and afterward meeting with Ottanus, told him, that they would ask no more why Ameſtris was ſo long unſeen, ſince it appeared by her Face ſhe had been ſick. But Ottanus, knowing that ſhe had not been ſo, did conclude, that there was ſome ſecret matter in her Mind which was the cauſe of it, and which he could not diſcover. Ameſtris yet was leſs ſolitary for three or four days, but with ſo much forcing of her ſelf, that ſhe was not able to endure any longer: for if ſhe ſaw any friends of Aglatidas, her ſoul was in a very hell: if they were indifferent Men ſhe met with, they gave her ſome ſuch touch concerning the pretended jealouſy of Otta-

nus, as did not pleaſe her; or if they were any of the diſcreeter ſort of People, they entertained her with diſcourſes ſo oppoſite to her preſent humour, that they were extreamly troubleſom to her: if any compleat Man was commended, then the image of Aglatidas appeared in her Fancy: if any was blamed, then the thoughts of Ottanus would direct her Eyes: She thought all thoſe that looked upon her, did blame her for marrying Ottanus: So having lived three or four days thus, and not being able to endure it longer, ſhe feigned to be ſick, that ſo ſhe might not go abroad, nor receive any more viſits. But ſince ſhe could not deceive Ottanus ſo eaſily, as ſhe could the World, who ſaw her not, his Torments did double upon him; and not knowing what he would have, he endured all the Pangs of a Jealous Man, and much more than common Jealouſy could infuſe: for they who are jealous have at the leaſt ſome ground for it, though he could not ſo much as imagine what the Cauſe of his Torment was: And not being able to contain all his trubulent Cogitations within the compaſs of his own Heart, he diſcovered all his Secrets unto Artemon; who after he had obſerved the Raptures, the Reaſons and Complaints of his Couſin, could not determine what his Malady was: for ſaid he unto him, It cannot be ſaid you are jealous, ſince there is no imaginable Reaſon for it; for Ameſtris neither ſees, nor will be ſeen by any; Ameſtris, when ſhe was free, made choice of you, and married you, what would you have more? I would gladly know, ſaid he, why upon a ſudden ſhe reſolved to marry me; and why upon a ſudden ſhe will not look upon the World.

I do confeſs, ſaid Artemon, that the laſt of theſe is very ſtrange unto me, ſince you aſſure me it is not long of you: yet however, it concerns us who have loſt her, to complain of that, and not you, ſince you ſee her oftner, and diſcourſe more freely with her. Not at all, replied Ottanus, for ſhe perſwades me to live as I was accuſtomed to do; and that I ſhould allow of her Alteration: I know very well that heretofore ſhe did not hate Aglatidas, but there has been ſuch jars between them ſince that, as I cannot conclude any thing upon it. But why ſhould you torment your ſelf, ſaid Artemon, ſince your Wife deſires not to ſee Aglatidas more then any other, and indeed cannot ſee him, ſince he is abſent? The reaſon why ſhe lives thus (replied he, after a little ſtudy upon it) is perhaps becauſe he is Abſent. And why did ſhe marry you, replied Artemon, if ſhe loved Aglatidas? That is it which I know not, ſaid he, but gladly would know her Reaſon for it. Aglatidas, replied Artemon, is indeed a very gallant Man, but he is ſo inconſtant, that I cannot think he ever had any ſhare in the Heart of Ameſtris. The pittiful Complaints which Anatiſa makes againſt him, does ſufficiently argue his inconſtancy. How, ſaid Ottanus, do Aglatidas and Antiſa jar? Yes, anſwered Artemon, and that extreamly. Ah Artemon, ſaid Ottanus, this which you have told me, does much more perplex me. I do not ſee any cauſe you have, replied Artemon; Aglatidas when you married Ameſtris, did love Anatiſa, as every one thought; ſince then he has caſt her off, and gone away, and what does all this concern you? I cannot untangle my thoughts, anſwered he, but I wiſh Aglatidas had continued yet in love with Anatiſa. So would ſhe too, anſwered Artemon and laughed, but ſince he is glad with a pretence to break with her, why ſhould it offend Ottanus? Then having a Mind to chide him after ſuch a manner as ſhould not make him angry; Well Ottanus, ſaid he unto him, I pray reſolve me, are you Jealous, or are you only Phantaſtical? I know not well what I am, replied he; but I am moſt certain my Mind is moſt unquiet; and I find all Symptomes of Jealouſy in my Self. Then this is the firſt time, anſwered Artemon, that ever a Wife made her Husband jealous, by neglecting her Self, by never going abroad, nor ſeeing any Body, and by hiding her Beauty with as much care as others take to ſhew it. Therefore I am the more to be pittied, replied Ottanus, for I ſee no remedy for my Miſery; If Ameſtris had a gadding Mind of going unto Balls, and I diſliked it, then I could hinder her from going any more; but as the Diſeaſe is, I know not where to find a Remedy.

If you will follow my Advice, ſaid Artemon unto him, you ſhall never ſeek for any, ſince certainly ſmall Diſeaſes do commonly grow greater by Remedies. My Diſeaſe, replied he, is none of thoſe which can be called ſmall. Truly, ſaid Artemon, I know not how you ſhould term it a great one. Can a greater be imagined, replied Ottanus, than to ſee the ſame which ſhould have been my chief Felicity, become my greateſt Miſery? But why are you not Happy, replied Artemon? is not Ameſtris moſt fair? is ſhe not richer than any of her quality? has ſhe not as much Wit as Riches and Beauty? and has ſhe not much more Virtue than either Wit, Beauty, or Riches, altogether? is ſhe not Affable and Complacential unto you? what then would you have more? I would ſee, replied he, into the very Bottom of her Heart; and ſee if there be no Secret there, which ſhe has not already told. What, replied Artemon, what would you have her tell? I would have her tell me (replied Ottanus, half Angry) a likely Lie, rather then tell me nothing.

Artemon ſeeing Ottanus begin to be Angry, would incenſe him no further, leſt he ſhould deprive himſelf of means to be ſerviceable unto Ameſtris for the future: for though he was his Couſin, yet it was his Generoſity which made him his Friend,and which ſide to take,either hers or his was no Queſtion, ſince Reaſon would not allow him to take the part of Ottanus. However, conceiving it requiſite to hold ſome Hand of complacency with him, he as'd him whether he would have him ſpeak unto Ameſtris? but the Commendations which Ottanus gave of her, would not permit Ottanus to give that Commiſſion: for he was of ſuch a Humour, as he could not, without Anger, hear his Wife extolled, nor I think could he endure to hear any ſpeak in her diſpraiſe. Artemon, not being able to regulate his Mind, went away, and left him to champ upon his own Sullen, and Melancholly Humour; yet he was no ſooner gone, but the Mind of Ottanus altered; and as it is uſual with unquiet and jealous Spirits, he writ an intreating Letter unto him, deſiring him to ſee Ameſtris the next day, and endeavour to diſcover the Bottom of her Soul. The Letter did contradict it ſelf in two or three ſeveral places, and it was eaſily perceived, that the mind of him who writ it was not at reſt. Artemon failed not to do as Ottanus deſired him, who in the mean time had given Orders, that they ſhould let him enter, though Ameſtris ſaid ſhe was not well, and would ſee no Body. When he came to her, he asked her Pardon for interrupting her Solitude; and really deſiring to do her Service, he did not keep the conference which he had with Ottanus, as a Secret: but on the contrary, he truly told her the State of her Husband's mind, to the end ſhe might contrive ſome ways how to cure him, leſt his reſtleſs diſpoſition ſhould reflect upon her ſelf. Since Ottanus had rather you ſhould tell a handſom Lie, than tell nothing at all, I beſeech you invent one, and ſuch a one as may cauſe quietneſs, both to him, and your ſelf, if it be ſo that there be any Secret Truth in your Heart which you would not have him know. I am much obliged unto you, replied Ameſtris, for your Expreſſions of Sincerity towards me: yet, generous Artemon, I have nothing to tell him, which I have not already told him: my Humour, it is true, is changed, but I cannot tell the reaſon of it; yet ſince, in changing, it is for the advantage of Ottanus, what does he complain of? Look for no Reaſon of his Complaints, repli'd Artemon, for he has none: though, Madam, I am forced to confeſs your Retiredneſs is very ſtrange: and it is not ſtrange that Ottanus ſhould wonder at that which does aſtoniſh all the Court and Town: Yet ſince I am not ſo full of Curioſities as he is, but being very full of real Reſpects unto you, I will believe that all you do is well; nor do I deſire to penetrate into the Secrets of your Heart. But in the name of the Gods, Madam, if you can, tell Ottanus ſomething which may ſatisfy him; and if it be poſſible be not ſo devoted unto ſolitude. I am able to do but the one half of what you deſire me, ſaid ſhe unto him, which is, to ſhew my Self unto the World a little more than I do: But as for inventing any Lies, and telling them unto Ottanus, is a thing I cannot do: for I ſhould tell them ſo ſcurvilly, that he would never believe me; yet Artemon, let me tell you, that in following your Counſel, I ſhall expoſe my ſelf unto much Miſery, it being more likely, that ſince Ottanus is jealous, and knows not of whom, and at a time when my Cloſet is my Priſon, and when I ſee no Body, he will be much more when I haunt Company. Yet however, ſince it is the Pleaſure of the Gods he ſhould become my Husband, it is my Duty to follow his Will, and to force my own: You may aſſure him that I will be obſervant unto him in all things, and ſhall pleaſe him in this, ſo he will promiſe, that as ſoon as ever he repents of his deſire I ſhould frequent the World, he will do me the favour to tell me of it; for I make no queſtion but it will be very ſhortly. Afterwards Artemon aſſured Ameſtris that he would be ready to ſerve her in all things; and he went to carry this News unto Ottanus, who was ſomething better ſatisfied than before: but yet he was not fully contented, becauſe ſhe would not tell him her reaſon why ſhe married him ſo ſuddenly, nor why ſhe began to affect ſolitude as ſoon as married; yet finding ſo much Obedience in the Heart of Ameſtris, all his fantaſtical Humours could not find out a reaſonable Pretence of complaint againſt her.

Thus did Ameſtris, though with extream Repugnance, ſuffer her ſelf to be ſeen again; and within four days, the Noiſe being divulged about the Town, that ſhe was viſible, all the Court and Town came to viſit her; and though ſhe was much more melancholy than heretofore, yet ſince ſhe could not chuſe but be very fair and ſprightly, and ſweet and civil, there was an univerſal Joy throughout all Ecbatan, for finding an ineſtimable Jewel which was thought to be loſt: There was not a Wit about the whole Court and Town, which had not invented ſome Diverſion for her, and who were not very forward to teſtify ſome Marks of that eſteem they held of her: It might well be ſaid, that ſome Magnetick Beauty was newly come to Town, who by her ſecret Charms attracted all about her: all other Houſes were deſart and ſolitary places in compariſon of hers. Thoſe who had any deſign to pleaſe her, did not arrive at their deſired ends; for ſhe thought her ſelf ſo miſerable, in living continually a forced Life, that ſhe could not chuſe but complain of it unto her dear Menaſta. Anatiſa, amongſt the reſt, came to viſit her with other Ladies, and as there is always in the World a ſort of indiſcreet Men, who take as much delight in talking of angry Subjects, as others do in pleaſing; there was a Man amongſt them, who having a Mind to perplex theſe two Ladies, began to talk before them concerning Aglatidas, and his Abſence, asking aloud, whether any knew the cauſe? Ameſtris and Anatiſa both began to bluſh; one out of Anger, the other out of Modeſty; and ſince the Queſtion was addreſſed rather unto Ameſtris, than any elſe, ſhe anſwered, that it was ſo long ſince Aglatidas left Ecbatan, that ſhe knew nothing of his Deſigns, but perhaps (ſaid ſhe, and turned towards Anatiſa) this fair one can better inform you; I cannot tell whether it was her Cruelty to him which we muſt accuſe for the loſs of ſo gallant a Man, ſince it is to be thought her Rigour baniſh'd him, and drive him unto Deſpair. Anatiſa was ſo nettled at this crafty Raillery of Ameſtris, that ſhe anſwered in ſuch a faint Tone, as did apparently manifeſt, ſhe knew her Cruelty was not the cauſe of Aglatidas his Abſence. And ſince ſhe was not ignorant, that all the World knew it was Aglatidas who quitted her; ſhe made no Secret of it, but looking upon Ameſtris, however, ſaid ſhe, you are obliged unto me for taking the Heart of Aglatidas from you, ſince he was ſo unconſtant as to break off your Chains, and enter into mine. But, replied Ameſtris, ſince it is always the good Intention which ſets the Value upon any good Office, I beſeech you pardon me if I do not thank you for it, ſince I know you had not any ſuch complacential Humour towards me in doing it. I do confeſs, ſaid Anatiſa, I did not intend to oblige you by it; confeſs alſo, replied Ameſtris, that you have no cauſe to vaunt of a Conqueſt which you kept ſo ſhort a time; however, ſince Aglatidas, perhaps cares neither for you nor me, I think we have done him a great deal of Favour to ſpeak ſo long concerning him: Ameſtris ſpoke this after ſuch a manner as did much ſurprize Anatiſa, who thought that ſhe was a little too tart againſt Aglatidas, conſidering how ſhe had lived with him heretofore; and ſhe could not think that Ottanus could recompence ſuch a loſs, and ſo ſhe went home with an unquiet Mind.

This was the courſe of Life which Ameſtris led for a while: But ſhortly after Ottanus ſeeing ſuch a great concourſe of Viſitants, and obſerving there was many who addreſſed themſelves unto him much more complacentially than uſual, he conceived their extraordinary Care, and Complements to pleaſe and divert him, was done unto him rather as the Husband of Ameſtris, than out of any Affection to himſelf, ſo that his Perplexities of Mind were higher than ever: he did not intend to ſignify as much openly, yet do what he could, it was preſently perceived; he received the Civilities done unto him after a conſtrain'd manner; and made but hollow Returns, and contrary to his Cuſtom, he kept home ſo conſtantly, that in a few days his Jealouſie was known unto all the World, and more notice taken of it, than when Ameſtris would not be ſeen; for then they did but ſuſpect him to be jealous, but now they made no queſtion of it; his Looks, his Words, his Actions, and all his reſtleſs Agitations were apparent and convincing Proofs of the ſecret Turbulency of his Heart: and ſince commonly Domeſtick Servants are the Spies which reveal the Secrets of their Maſters unto all the World; it was known by the Servants of Ottanus, that never any came unto his Houſe, but he asked his Porter, Who came to enquire for his Wife? Whether they were there then? Whether he came alone? How long he ſtayed? and an hundred ſuch Queſtions, which cauſed more Rumors of his Jealouſy than ever: he began to ſhew ſome ſigns of his Anguiſh to Ameſtris, who made her Complaints of it unto Artemon, who always did very much eſteem her, deſiring him to know of Ottanus what it was which troubled his Mind, aſſuring him, that if his Mind did alter, and that he did not think it good ſhe ſhould frequent the World any longer, ſhe would obey him, and retire again with abundance of Joy. Artemon did promiſe her, to know what the matter was; but ſince he could not give his Conſent or Advice Ameſtris ſhould be mued up again, he would take another way; and remembring that Ottanus, to prevent all Reports of his Jealouſy, reſolved to permit his Wiſe to entertain all the Gallants of Ecbatan; he thought that by telling him again how his way of Behaviour had expoſed him to the ſame Misfortune, he would correct himſelf the ſecond time. But yet it did not; for as ſoon as Artemon told him that his daily keeping home with his Wiſe; his extraordinary Curioſity to know what every one ſaid of him, and who came to ſee her when he was abroad; ſuch things as theſe had got him the ſame Reputation he had before, when Ameſtris did not expoſe her ſelf unto the World. Since it is ſo (ſaid he unto him, in a very angry Tone) that whether Ameſtris frequent Company or not, I muſt be looked upon as a jealous Man, my beſt courſe is to rid my Houſe of all Company, ſince it is continually ſtuff'd with a number of idle and flattering Fellows, who ſpend their time in telling Tales, and talking of nothing but Vanity. Artemon was ſo ſurprized to hear Ottanus ſay ſo, that two contrary Thoughts came into his Fancy almoſt at one time; for he could hardly forbear laughing at the Phantaſtical Humour of Ottanus, and yet he could not chuſe but be extreamly ſorry, to ſee what Perſecution was towards Ameſtris: he uſed all his Rhetorick to bring the Heart of Ottanus unto Reaſon, but could not. For deferring it no longer than the very ſame Night, Madam, ſaid Ottanus unto Ameſtris, I am well pleaſed with your complacency in quitting your Solitude at my requeſt: but ſince I find you have paſſed from one extream unto another, and ſince you did but force your ſelf to frequent Company, I ſhall take it kindly if you follow your own Inclination, and retire your ſelf from all Company again. Sir, ſaid ſhe unto him with much Joy in her Face, you do a very notable Favour in releaſing me from that trouble which I put my ſelf unto, by obeying you before: But, Sir, that it may be carried more handſomly, I conceive it would do very well, to make a Journey into the Countrey, to the end that at my return, I may aſſume my Solitude under a pretence of not being accuſtomed unto the Countrey. Ottanus wondred that Ameſtris ſhould ſo willingly deprive her ſelf of all the good Company, and Gallantry which ſhe ſaw; and in lieu of being well ſatisfied with it, he grew more reſerved, and unquiet, inſomuch as he thought of changing his Mind again: yet notwithſtanding he took her at her Word, and within two Days after they went into the Countrey, Ameſtris carrying her dear Menaſta with her, to comfort her in all her Sorrows. Artemon hearing of Ottanus his Deſign, came to him with Intentions to divert him, but he could not poſſibly; and about two Days after Ameſtris, not bidding adieu unto any, went into the Countrey, with Intention, if ſhe could, not to return of a long time, as well, that ſhe might more conveniently enjoy her ſolitude, as alſo the better to hide, if ſhe could, the phantaſtical Humours of her Husband. She went with ſome kind of Joy; but as for Ottanus, change of Air did not change his Humour; for although he ſaw Ameſtris was not only as complacential as any vertuous Wife ought to be unto her Husband, but alſo was as obedient unto him as any Slave could be, (though ſhe could not be ſo tender of him as if ſhe had eſteemed and loved him) yet he was not ſatisfied with her, and all her Reſpects of him did rather incenſe than pleaſe him. It was therefore but a melancholy Voyage which they made; yet when they were come unto the end of their Journey, and ſetled, Ameſtris was at a little more reſt, for Ottanus did paſs away many of his melancholly Hours by walking in a great Wood behind the Houſe, ſo that ſhe had more freedom to talk with her dear Menaſta, and diſcourſe often concerning Aglatidas: She did at the firſt make ſome ſcruple of it, and reſolved never to ſpeak more of him as long as ſhe lived; but conſidering that her Affection to him was innocent, and ever ſhould be, ſince ſhe reſolved never to ſee him again, ſhe thought to preſerve the Teſtimonies of his Affection in her Memory, which indeed ſhe could not poſſibly forget: but notwithſtanding all her tenderneſs towards Aglatidas, latidas, ſhe determined to burn all thoſe Letters of his which ſhe had in keeping. Menaſta and ſhe diſcourſing one day upon this ſubject, and being willing to give them their laſt ſurvey before ſhe committed them unto the flame, ſhe opened her Cloſet to take them out, but could not find a little Cabinet in which they were: ſhe was ſo much ſurpriſed at it, that ſhe was not able to ſpeak unto Menaſta; in the mean while ſhe ſearched all about her Cloſet, and all in vain: then ſhe asked one of her Servants, who was ever very faithful, whether Ottanus did at any time come there? and was anſwered No; afterwards ſhe asked her if ſhe knew what became of the Cabinet, which ſhe thought ſhe had put up when ſhe came from Ecbatan? and ſhe anſwered, that ſhe ſaw it upon the Table of her Cloſet at Ecbatan, but knew no further what ſhe had done with it. Ameſtris then recalling into her Memory all that ſhe did before her coming away, remembred how ſhe intended to put it up, and Ottanus coming in, ſhe covered it with her Hood upon the Table, reſolving to pack it up when he was gone, and ſo ſhe concluded, that ſhe left it there upon the Table. But after Ameſtris had conſidered that Ottanus was with her, and her Women had the Keys of her Cloſet, ſhe was in leſs fear; yet at night Ottanus told her that he muſt return unto Ecbatan upon ſome important Buſineſs; at which ſhe bluſhed and looked upon Menaſta. I ſee (ſaid this jealous Husband in mocking kind of Raillery) that you envy my well-being. Pardon me, Sir, ſaid ſhe unto him, but indeed I had much rather you remained here than go unto Ecbatan: however it be, anſwered he, I perceive that my Journey is not indifferent unto you; but your bluſhes imply either Sorrow or Joy at it. Certainly the reaſon of it is (ſaid Menaſta and laughed, to the end ſhe might break off this diſcourſe) becauſe ſhe imagines that you will have her return with you, and becauſe ſhe is ſorry to leave a Place ſo ſoon which pleaſeth her. Ottanus did not reply unto this, farther than ſome muttering Words which were not underſtood, but did go away to Ecbatan very ſad; for though he left his Wife in a very ſolitary Place, yet was he very unquiet in his Mind, and could not for his Heart interpret the bluſh of Ameſtris, nor why ſhe ſhould look ſo upon Menaſta, who, from that time he ſuſpected, though he knew not for what.

In the mean time, Ameſtris was not a little troubled that Ottanus ſhould go unto that place where thoſe things where, which ſhe feared he might come unto the ſight of: She knew not what to reſolve upon; for ſince all the domeſtick Servants were as ſo many Spies upon her Actions, ſhe durſt not attempt to ſuborn one of them, and truſt him with the Keys of her Cloſet, to take out that little Cabinet which ſo much troubled her; nor could ſhe imagine whether Ottanus would break it open, therefore ſhe reſolved to put it to the hazard. Menaſta was perſwading her to move her Husband, that he would be pleaſed to carry her with him; but Ottanus prevented her, and ſaid that his Buſineſs was ſo urgent and haſty, that he could not go in Coach; ſo that he went himſelf, and left Ameſtris exceedingly troubled, and certainly not without cauſe; for as ſoon as Ottanus came home, he had a phanſy to make a ſtrict ſearch in the Chamber of Ameſtris: The Houſe-keeper opened all the Doors but only of that Cloſet, of which he ſaid he had not the Key. Then Ottanus, pretending to take ſomething out which he would keep for Ameſtris, he broke open the Door, and went in only with a Servant of his, called Dinocrates, whom he truſted with all his Secrets; he ſearched in all the Drawers and Boxes in the Cloſet; he lifted up all the Hangings, and looked in every Corner; he was ready to go out again very well ſatisfied that he found not what he ſought for: but Dinocrates lifting up the Hood upon the Table, he found this little Cabinet, in which were the Letters of Aglatidas. Denocrates cryed out as if he had found ſome great Treaſure, and Ottanus coming towards him with a panting Heart, took it, and opened it with all haſte and violence: But O Heavens! when he ſaw the Letters and the Names of Ameſtris and Aglatidas upon them, he was in ſuch a Fury at it, that it was a whole Hour before he read them: yet at laſt he began, but was ſo much tranſported, that he knew not what he read; he ſent immediately unto

Artemon, who coming preſently unto him, See, ſaid he, whether I have not reaſon to be troubled! Then he told him how he broke open the Cloſet, and how he found the Letters, and gave him one of the Letters which he had found. Artemon perceiving it was writ whilſt Artambares the Father of Ameſtris lived, and when it was thought Aglatidas ſhould have married her, told him, that he could not find any fault at all in Ameſtris for this. How (replied Ottanus) do you think her innocent in keeping Letters of Gallantry and Courtſhip, after ſhe was marryed? No, no, Artemon, ſaid he, ſhe cannot excuſe it, for ſhe that would keep the Letters of Aglatidas, would doubleſs keep the Affection of her Heart for him alſo. Then he ſhewed him that Letter which Aglatidas writ at his departure: Here, ſaid he, is that which ſpeaks me the moſt unhappy Man in the World: I do but too well ſee the cauſe of Ameſtris her being ſo reſerved. Artemon perceiving that the Letter was writ ſince the Marriage of Ottanus, and that conſequently there muſt needs be a correſpondency between them, was ſilent a long while, and could not ſpeak a word: Mean while, Ottanus talked faſter than a Man that was not jealous could think in a whole Day. But at laſt, Artemon ſtopping the fury of his frivolous Language; Is this all the Crime of Ameſtris (ſaid he unto him?) if it be, you are not ſo unhappy as you talk of; for I cannot find by any Circumſtance in the Letter, but that ſince Aglatidas prepares himſelf to be miſerable, it is Ameſtris which hath baniſhed him: Moreover, do you not ſee that none knows the cauſe of his departure? therefore I muſt needs think the Vertue of Ameſtris to merit much Commendation. I can conceive no ſuch thing, replied he: or it was the Duty of Ameſtris to refuſe all manner of Love-Letters, ſince ſhe was my Wife, much leſs ought ſhe to keep them. Artemon uſed all his Arguments to excuſe Ameſtris, but all would not appeaſe Ottanus, who without any Thoughts of his Buſineſs, which brought him to the Town, returned into the Countrey the very next Morning; however, Artemon would not leave him, but whether he would or no went with him. In the mean while Ameſtris, was full of

Fears, and when ſhe ſaw him, returned ſo unexpectedly before it was poſſible he could diſpatch the Buſineſs he went about, her Heart drooped, and wanted but a little of falling into a Sound. As ſoon as Ottanus lighted from his Horſe, though Artemon would have hindred him, yet he went ſtrait unto the Chamber of Ameſtris, and coming to her in a moſt furious Manner, Madam, ſaid he unto her, You are beholden to me for bringing you ſo quickly that which doubtleſs you forget, and left at Ecbatan; and in ſaying ſo, he threw upon the Table all the Letters of Aglatidas. I leave you to imgine what Operation the ſight of theſe had upon the Heart of Ameſtris; yet ſince ſhe knew her ſelf not ſo culpable as Ottanus thought her, ſhe recollected her Conſtancy, and without any great Dauntedneſs; Sir, ſaid ſhe unto him, ſince you know it was my Father's Command upon me, to look upon Aglatidas, as one who ſhould afterwards be my Husband, methinks you ſhould not think it ſtrange that I ſhould receive Letters from him. But the laſt of theſe Letters, replied he, admits not of that excuſe; ſo that though you were not faulty in receiving the firſt, yet it was an unanſwerable Crime to keep them any longer, or to receive the laſt. I do confeſs, ſaid ſhe, that I was not ſo prudent as I might have been, in not burning them, when I reſolved to marry you; but truly the Crime is not ſo great as you apprehend it: and as for this laſt Letter received, ſince, indeed it was impoſſible for me not to receive it, yet I can aſſure you that I did never return any Anſwer unto it, and that it was not in my power to ſend it back unto Aglatidas. However, replied he, it ſeems he is much in your Favour. Sir, ſaid ſhe unto him, give me leave to tell you only two things for the Satisfaction of your Mind: The one is, that I ſhall never ſee Aglatidas again: And the other, that I will never receive any more Letters from him, nor ſhall he from me. It ſeems to me (ſaid Artemon, who was preſent at this angry Conference) that Ameſtris does offer more than is Reaſon; for knowing her Vertue as you may do, although ſhe ſhould ſee a Man who was in love with her; yet there is no neceſſity you ſhould be troubled at it. But how can I be aſſured (ſaid Ottanus to Ameſtris, not hearkening unto Artemon) of this which you tell me? Sir, anſwered ſhe, you may leave me here, and not let me go to Ecbatan, where Aglatidas, perhaps, may hereafter be. Solitude (replied he, and ſhoke his Head) is very fit for ſecret Meetings. Then carry me to the Town (anſwered ſhe) that all the World may eie my Actions, and all the World may know (replied he all in Fury) your Crime, and my Misfortune. But who was it which brought you this laſt Letter? one who was unknown to me, anſwered ſhe, having no mind to bring the name of Menaſta in queſtion. Where is Aglatidas at this preſent, asked Ottanus? I know not, replied ſhe, for I hold no intelligence with him, nor enquire of his being. And why, ſaid he unto her, did you marry me, ſince you loved Aglatidas? I thought (anſwered Ameſtris) that my preferring you before all others, would have obliged you not to uſe me as you do. I thought, ſaid he, that though you did not love me, yet you would have loved your own Honour, and done nothing unworthy of your ſelf. Truly, ſaid Artemon, me-thinks all theſe Promiſes, which Ameſtris hath made, ſhould ſatisfy you: She ſaith ſhe will never ſee Aglatidas again; ſhe will never receive any Letters from him, nor ſhall he from her, and what would you more? I would have had her not to have received this laſt Letter, replied he, nor have kept any of the reſt, for they are certain Teſtimonies, ſhe is no Hater of Aglatidas, nor ever will be a Lover of me, and by conſequence I muſt be always in fear. Sir, replied Ameſtris, I beſeech you know this, that though I were an inveterate Hater of you, and did love Aglatidas as well as I do my ſelf, yet would I never ſpeak to him again, and the more tender I were of him, the more circumſpect would I be to avoid meeting with him; therefore if it be poſſible, let your Mind be at reſt concerning that matter, and leave me here. It is not an eaſy matter, replied he, for that Man whom you have made for ever miſerable, to leave you here. What then would you have her do? ſaid Artemon. I know not, replied he ſharply, but until I be better reſolved, I do intend that Menaſta, who is Couſin to Aglatidas, and doubtleſs his Confident, ſhall preſently return to Ecbatan, and that Ameſtris ſee her no more. Sir, ſaid ſhe, I beſeech you do not wrong a Lady of her Quality and Nature ſo much; augment, if it be poſſible your force againſt me, but be not uncivil towards her; yet if it be your Pleaſure that I muſt ſee her no more, let her return to Ecbatan, ſome few Days hence upon another pretence. I do underſtand you very well, ſaid he unto her, you have a Mind before you part with her, to conſult and agree which way you may receive ſome Intelligence from Aglatidas. Sir, replied ſhe, if Aglatidas and I were upon any Terms of Intelligence betwixt each other, why ſhould he be at ſuch a remote diſtance from hence? I can ſay nothing to you, replied he angerly, but that you will drive me out of my Reaſon, and my Life. Artemon ſeeing that all Ameſtris could ſay, did rather exaſperate than appeaſe him, did get him out of her Chamber almoſt by force; yet being prompt unto it by his jealous Thoughts, he would not leave the Letters of Aglatidas with her; neither would he burn them, thinking that whilſt he kept them in his Hands, he ſhould keep her better within compaſs of her Duty: he took them up then, and kept them as carefully as the deareſt thing in the World, and looking upon Ameſtris with inſufferable inſolency; I hope you will permit me, Madam, ſaid he unto her, to keep them now as well as you have done. I permit it with all patience, ſaid ſhe, for there is no Miſery which my Mind is not prepared for. After he was gone out from Ameſtris, he would by all means go unto Menaſta, who was not well that Day, and kept her Chamber: but Artemon diſſwaded him, and uſed ſuch Arguments, as moved him that Menaſta ſhould not return ſo ſuddainly, but could not perſwade him to let her ſtay long with Ameſtris; yet do what Artemon could, he would needs change all her Women, and every Servant which waited on her. It was as much as Artemon could do, to keep Ottanus from uſing Ameſtris ill, or from taking up ſome odd deſperate Reſolution. Yet was he much puzled in making the choice of a Place to dwell in; for though he thought the Country a more convenient place than the other to obſerve the Actions of Ameſtris; yet ſince his Occaſions would often call him from thence, he thought that Aglatidas might ſee her in his abſence more eaſily, and perhaps carry her away; for his foreſight was always very ingenious to torment himſelf. Moreover he was perſwaded, and that with good Reaſon, that Ameſtris ſeemed fair in the Eyes of all that looked upon her, ſo that he was not only in fear of Aglatidas, but his neareſt kindred, and his very beſt Friends were not priviledged from his Jealouſy; Artemon himſelf ſcaped not: and if he put any difference between him and others, it was in his Expreſſions of leſs Bitterneſs, and Artemons ſuffering with more Patience, and leſs Malice than others who delighted in perſecuting him. But the time came, that Mnaſta muſt return to Ecbatan, and that Artemon accompanied her; the parting of theſe two Friends, was the ſadder, becauſe they could not confer in private together not one ſhort quarter of an Hour, though Artemon did all he could to procure them that Conſolation: This generous Friend at his departure from Ottanus, made him promiſe not to ſpeak any more unto Ameſtris concerning Aglatidas, and that he would live better with her, otherwiſe himſelf in particular would complain of him. Moreover, ſince he conceived that Ameſtris would fare better at Ecbatan, though ſhe ſaw no Body, than in the Country, where ſhe ſhould ſee her angry Husband continually, he addreſſed his diſcourſe ſo handſomly unto him, that by his juſtifying Ameſtris ſo much, he gave him ſome ſubject of fear that Aglatidas would not ſo ſoon make any Attempts of ſeeing her in the Town, as in the Country; Not that I ſuſpect, ſaid he unto him, that Ameſtris would ever contribute any thing unto it, but yet you know that Aglatidas did moſt paſſionately love her, and does not yet hate her; ſo that ſeeing you more happy than himſelf, queſtionleſs he will ſeek out ways to make his Sufferings known unto Ameſtris, therefore if you will hearken unto me, carry her back to Ecbatan. Ottanas at the firſt, did think this Propoſition reaſonable, but immediately after he diſapproved of it, and Artemon departed with Menaſta, not knowing whether Ottanus would live in the Country always, or return to the Town, and indeed Ottanus himſelf was unreſolved what to do. Mean time, the unexpected ſudden return of Menaſta made a great noiſe, and the houſhold Servants divulging the cauſe of it, the Jealouſy of Ottanus made a freſh rumour in the World. Moreover, Anatiſa, having a Servant who was Siſter unto Denocrates, the Page and Confident of Ottanus, ſhe came to know by her means, that the Letters of Aglatidas were found in the Cloſet of Ameſtris; ſo that Anatiſa entring into a new fury againſt her, vented a hundred malicious Tales, which in concluſion turned againſt her ſelf; for ſhe ſpoke with ſuch Animoſity, that though ſhe ſpoke ſome Truths, yet whenſoever ſhe ſpoke againſt Ameſtris, ſhe was no more believed than if they had been all Lies. Mean while Ottanus was very buſy in guarding all the Advenues of his Houſe: If he chanced to ſpy a Peaſant in the Woods, he preſently imagined him to be Aglatidas diſguiſed: If he ſaw any of the Servants of Ameſtris talk with any that he knew not, he would know their Buſineſs, and what they ſaid, and ſuſpected they brought ſome Letters from Aglatidas to their Miſtreſs; to the end ſhe ſhould not corrupt any of her Women by any Gifts, he took an exact Catalogue of all her Jewels, and kept it himſelf, often viewing them to ſee whether they were all there. He ſearched every Cranny, where he could imagine ſhe could hide any Letters; and it might very well be ſaid, that notwithſtanding all her Perſecutions, yet he made himſelf more miſerable than her; he looked upon her with Eyes ſo full of tormenting Jealouſy, that ſhe might clearly ſee the Reſtleſſneſs of his Soul: In the mean time, he was forced to return to Ecbatan, upon ſome urgent Occaſions, and carried her with him, not daring to leave her alone in that Place. For though he did not know where Aglatidas was, yet he ſuſpected him to be lurking in ſome Place near hand, watching for an Opportunity to viſit her, when he did at any time go from her. At her return to the Town, he limited her unto ſuch Perſons, as he allowed her to ſee there: and principally charged her not to admit of any ſuch as made Gallantry their Profeſſion, who coached away their time from Street to Street, from Company to Company, only to talk the ſame things over and over again. Ameſtris with unequalled Patience did, without murmur, as he deſired, and did not ſee ſo much as Menaſta, but in private, by the means of Artemon. But ſince it was the delight and deſire of all reaſonable Men to ſee her, do what ſhe could, they ſought her out in the Temples; they followed her in the Streets, and found her ſometimes in the Houſes of three or four whom ſhe was permitted to viſit. Now as there was ever a ſort of Men who loved to delight themſelves, without any regard of prejudicing others; ſo there was one Man among the reſt called Tharpis, who to puniſh Ottanus for his Jealouſy, did augment it as much as he could: So that Ameſtris never went out, but he had Spies to watch whither ſhe went, that he might follow. As often as Ottanus went out or came in, he always obſerved ſome of Tharpis his Officers, keeping watch at the Corner of a Street next his Houſe, ſo that he became as jealous of Tharpis, as of Aglatidas, and to ſay truly, he was jealous of all the World as well as of him. When Ameſtris was not well, it was always ſaid at the Door of her Lodging, ſhe was ſo extreamly ill, that none could be admitted to ſee her: and when Ottanus was ill, he alſo was ſaid to be ſo ill, that Ameſtris could not leave him; ſo that when either of them was in the leaſt out of temper, it was carried ſo, as if they were at the laſt gaſp. If any one ſpoke unto Ameſtris in a low Voice, he would afterwards ask them both ſeverally what they ſaid, and that in ſuch an odd manner, as it was impoſſible to forbear laughing. This was the Life of Ameſtris, until the Death of Aſtiages, who as you know, died partly of Sorrow for the taking away of the Princeſs Mandana. Which in a few Days after Ciaxares was come to Ecbatan, to take Poſſeſſion of the Median Crown, and the Court would be very full: Ottanus imagining that Aglatidas might perhaps return to ſee the new King, he carried Ameſtris into the Countrey, though it had been more fit for him to return to the Town if he had been there: But as his Reſolutions were commonly contrary to all Reaſon or Handſomneſs, ſo he went out of Ecbatan when all the World came in; therefore when you, Sir, came thither with Ciaxares, ſhe was not there, but as ſoon as you were gone to the Armenian War, he then returned with her, though with no Intentions to uſe her any better, but lived after the ſame manner I have told you, until ſuch time as it was known that Aglatidas was in the Army, and gracious both with you and Ciaxares: This News begot two contrary Apprehenſions in him; for he was glad to hear Aglatidas was ſo far from Ecbatan, but very ill pleaſed with the Honours which the King and you were pleaſed to confer upon him; in ſo much as though every Letter which came from the Army, ſpoke in high Commendations of his Valour, yet Ameſtris durſt not ſo much as enquire of any News in general, nor of the War, becauſe he would be apt to imagine her end was to hear Aglatidas ſpoke of. But after the Governour of the Province of Areſantines was dead, he was very deſirous to imploy all his Friends, to obtain of Ciaxares the Government thereof for himſelf, becauſe all the Eſtate of Ameſtris, which was very great, did lie in that Province; yet ſince he knew nothing could be obtained from Ciaxares, but by your Mediation, he would not make any addreſs unto any who were loved, or Lovers of Aglatidas. Alſo, ſince he had neglected that Duty which a Man of his Quality ought unto Ciaxares, at his entrance to the Crown, and ſince his Jealouſy kept him from following the War, as his Birth obliged him, ſo he had not confidence enough to ask this Favour, and much leſs Hopes to obtain it, though he ſhould ask it: But a while after he received a Pacquet, which was no ſmall Amazement to him, for he found in it that you had ſent him the Government of that Province from Ciaxares. At the firſt he was extreamly joyed, and though he knew not from whence this good ſhould proceed, nor could gueſs at the Truth, yet he imagined it to come from the King's Diſpoſition only; ſo that he publiſhed it with Joy, declaring that this Honour was conferred upon him, though he employed none, nor made any Interceſſion for it. All the Town, upon this, did make their complemental Addreſſes to him; and he permitted Ameſtris to entertain all thoſe who would viſit her. But within three Days after this firſt News of Joy, he received others which were as vexatious as the other was pleaſing; for an old Officer in the houſhold of Ciaxares, who was of his acquaintance, ſent unto him and told him, he conceived it expedient he ſhould return ſome thanks unto Aglatidas for the Honour which he had received from him, ſince it was only by his Mediation he obtained it, intimating afterwards, your Zeal, Sir, in his behalf, at the requeſt of Aglatidas. When Ottanus received this Letter, he was in the Chamber of Ameſtris, in which was much Company; and becauſe it was known that it came from the Army, every one did draw near at the reading of it, to hear ſome News, and he was contented to ſatisfy them: But in his reading what I have told you, he changed colour about twenty times, and every one thought that either Ciaxares was dead, or elſe the Government newly conferred on him, was taken away again. Every one asked him what ill News? for they imagined by his Looks it could not be any good: but his Anſwer was, That he had received an account of ſome private Buſineſs which did not pleaſe him well; and indeed it was eaſily perceived, for ſo much diſcontent appeared in his Eyes, that Ameſtris, who knew him very well, did imagine ſomething beſides his Jealouſy, was a cauſe of his diſorder, yet ſhe could not gueſs what it was, but thought that perhaps ſome had ſent him intelligence Aglatidas would ere long return to Ecbatan: However, he made ſuch a viſible Teſtimony of his diſcontent to all the Company, that Ameſtris withdrew: ſome came unto him, who had not yet made their complemental Addreſſes unto him, as Governour; but he received them ſo ſillily, that they conceived themſelves injured; and had he not been known to be a jealous Man, and by conſequence phantaſtical, thoſe Men conſidering his extravagant Behaviour towards them, had quarrelled with him; but they made a ſhort Viſit, and left him to the liberty of his half-mad Humours: As good luck was, Artemon came in before he ſpoke with Ameſtris, after the Company was gone out: if he had not, perhaps he would have uſed extream Violence towards her.

As ſoon as Ottanus ſaw Artemon, here (ſaid he unto him, and gave him the Letter which he had received) ſee whether I had not Reaſon to believe that Aglatidas and Ameſtris have been always very kind one to another. Artemon took the Letter and read it, but finding not a Word in it conduced to what Ottanus talked of, nor any thing elſe but that Aglatidas had obtained for him the Government of the Ariſontine Province, which he ſo much deſired: How is it poſſible, ſaid he unto him, that your Reaſon and Mine ſhould be ſo oppoſite? Why, anſwered Ottanus, is it not as clear as day that Ameſtris hath written ſecretly unto Aglatidas, that I deſired this Government, and that it would be an excellent Expedient to reconcile me unto him, and would be a means to let me permit him the ſight of her if he obtained it? No ſuch thing, anſwered Artemon, but I am confident of the contrary, that a Crown were not able to induce Ameſtris to permit Aglatidas the ſight of her, or a viſit unto you, and conſequently I muſt conclude that Ameſtris had no Hand in it, and that Aglatidas did it out of pure Generoſity, becauſe he hates you not, as you do him. You are ſo much devoted to excuſe Ameſtris, ſaid he very angrilie, that I believe there are few Crimes which you would not abſolve her of if ſhe ſhould commit them. It is very true replied Artemon, that I am ſtrongly perſwaded of her Virtue; and moſt true alſo, that to puniſh one for thoughts which he had in the bottom of a Heart, were to entrench too much upon the Priviledg of the Gods, for they only can truly know them. However it be, ſaid Ottanus, I will never accept of any thing as a Gift from a Man whom I would Piſtol. How, ſaid Artemon, being much amazed, will you refuſe the Government which you accepted of, and after you have received the Complements and Congratulations of all the Town who came to rejoice with you? Yes, ſaid he, I will refuſe it, and render der thanks unto the Gods, that I need not write any Letters of thanks unto Clarans for his fine Honour conferred upon me. But what can you ſay unto thoſe who came to ſee you, replied Artemon? If any do meet me, ſaid he, and urge me for any Reaſons of my Actions, I will tell them I cannot endure Ameſtris ſhould love Aglatidas, and that I am more Generous than to receive a Beneſit from my Enemy, or that he ſhould triumph over the Heart of Ameſtris, which ſhould be only mine. Yet are you not afraid to offend Ciaxares and Cyrus by it (ſaid Artemon?) No, anſwered he, I fear nothing ſo much as to be obliged by Aglatidas. But why do I term it obliged? I may rather ſay wronged, for what greater injury could he do me than this? Had he written unto Ameſtris and ſent her any Jewels, or had ſhe anſwered him and returned her Picture, few then would have known it: But by this it is divulged throughout a whole Kingdom, that Aglatidas in lieu of asking a Government for himſelf, did ask it for a Man who hates him, and hath married her he loved and ſtill loves: he might as well tell all the World, that by this he doth recompence the Husband for the Favours which he hath received from the Wife; but I ſhall take ſuch Order as they ſhall not accuſe me of preferring any Ambitious thoughts before my Honour. Believe me, ſaid Artemon, you run a greater Hazard of your Honour by refuſing, than by accepting of this Government. However it be, ſaid he in extrem Fury, I had rather loſe my Honour, than receive any Benefit from Aglatidas. When the Benefits of an Enemy, anſwered Artemon, may prejudice us, it is prudence to refuſe them, and it is more generous to oblige an Enemy, than to be obliged; but ſince this Benefit which Aglatidas confers upon you is not of that Nature, and ſince you cannot refuſe it from the Hand of a King, without ruin to your ſelf, and moving all the World to mock you, I conceive you ought not to yield unto your Paſſion, but to overcome it. Pardon me, Ottanus, for uſing ſuch freedom of Speech, the Extravagancy of your Reaſon makes me think I am obliged unto it. Were it not that I ſee you are not Jealous of Aglatidas (replied Ottanus with a forced ſmile) I ſhould think you in love with Ameſtris. Tho you ſhould think ſo, replied Artemon, I ſhould not ſo much wonder at it, as I do at your Actions; And I do confeſs, that I cannot underſtand your Deſign in it. I would let all Media know, ſaid Ottanus, that I will not contribute any thing unto the folly of Ameſtris. Ah, Ottanus, ſaid Artemon, let it be leaſt of your Fears that any ſhould ſuſpect any ſuch thing; you have taken ſuch ſtrict order for that, as it can never be imputed to you. I will take a ſtricter order than yet I have done, replied he. Which you can hardly do, anſwered Artemon. You ſhall ſee that e're long, replied Ottanus; and ſhall confeſs, that my Honour is more dear unto me than any thing elſe. Artemon, fearing he had ſome ſecret ill Deſign againſt Ameſtris, urged him no further, but left him, becauſe it was very late.

He was no ſooner gone, but Ottanus went unto Ameſtris and vented as many expreſſions as Fury, Jealouſy, and Anger could invent, ſhe returning not one ſharp reply, or knowing the Cauſe of his Choller: for ſince he was fully perſwaded ſhe knew Aglatidas had obtained the Government for him, he expreſſed himſelf in ſuch obſcure Enigma's that ſhe could not underſtand either his Injuries or his Reproaches. After he had fretted and fumed away almoſt all the night in perſecuting Ameſtris, he went out of her Chamber unto his own, and would permit none to follow him but Dinocrates, whoſe unworthy flattery did beſt ſuit with his Inclination. He was no ſooner in his Chamber, but he ſent Orders to have his Horſes ready by break of Day; and after he had paſſed over the remainder of the Night in moſt unconceiveable turbulency of Mind, as ſoon as it was Day he took Horſe, without taking any leave of Ameſtris, and went into the Country, to avoid the concourſe of Company, not knowing what to ſay: But he was fully reſolved, rather to chooſe any Death, then to accept of any thing Aglatidas ſhould obtain for him.

However, the abſence of Ottanus gave a little more liberty unto Ameſtris; for her Spies were not ſo ſtrict in their Office, but ſhe had the comfort to ſee Menaſta, and ſhe ſaw Artemon alſo, who acquainted her with the Cauſe of her Husband's Fury. But when ſhe was alone with her deer Menaſta, ſhe did confeſs unto her, That though the jealouſy and chollerique Humour of Ottanus did trouble her very much; and though ſhe was vexed to the heart at the fantaſtical Reſolution of her Husband, in refuſing that Government, which all the World knows he ſo much deſired; Yet ſhe had ſome delight to think that Aglatidas ſhould ſtill love her ſo well, as in conſideration of her, to confer that good Office upon Ottanus, whom he always hated. For my part, ſaid Menaſta, I cannot chooſe but admire the various Events which are cauſed by one and the ſame Paſſion; for the Love of Aglatidas to you, moves Ottanus not to love you; and the Love of Ottanus to you, makes him not indure Aglatidas ſhould do any thing for him. Ah, Menaſta, ſaid Ameſtris, thoſe thoughts which Ottanus hath of me, cannot be phraſed Love: and I do conceive that they who ſay Love and Jealouſy are inſeparable, are much deceived; I do believe them to follow one another, but I cannot think them to reign both together at one time in one Heart. However, Menaſta, ſaid ſhe, do you not admire at my Misfortune? for doubtleſs Aglatidas thinks he hath much obliged me by it; and I believe he imagines that Ottanus, being well ſatisfied by it, will be leſs rigorous to me: but, quite contrary, he doubles his Perſecution upon me. Can any be more innocent then I am? You know, Menaſta, that ſince the Letter I received by you, and to which I returned no Anſwer, I have refuſed many others: And if at any time Aglatidas came into my Memory, it was againſt my Will, in my diſcourſe with you; and yet they ſay the Gods will puniſh me for ſome great Crime. You are not ſo innocent as you think your ſelf, replied Menaſta; for why did you ever marry Ottanus? was it juſt in you to imploy that great Wit which the Gods had indued you withall, in deviſing ſuch an odd way to puniſh Aglatidas, and juſtify your ſelf in his Opinion? O do not ſpeak of what is paſt, anſwered ſhe, and ſighed, let us think only upon the preſent and the future. I do foreſee ſo many diſaſters towards you, replied Menaſta, that you muſt pardon me, if I rather ſpeak of what is paſt, than of what is preſent, or what will be hereafter; for I do profeſs unto you, that I cannot at all conceive, either what Ottanus will do, or what you will do. For my particular, ſaid Ameſtris, I know no other Reſolution, but to refer my Self wholly unto the guidance of the Gods, to ſubmit, without the leaſt murmur, unto their Will, and to prepare my ſelf for a perpetual Perſecution: For, to attempt the driving of Jealouſy out of Ottanus his Heart, is meer folly ſo to think of it, ſince what I have done will not do it.

Theſe were the words and thoughts of Ameſtris, whilſt all the Town was troubled at the ſuddain departure of Ottanus, and ſought out for the Reaſon, but could not find it. But a few days after the thing was but too much divulged; for as the news of his being Governour of the Araſantines Province did fly into the Country as ſoon as it came to Town; many Deputies of great Towns came unto him; who, underſtanding that he was gone into the Country, went after him, but he would not receive them, telling them, he did not accept of that Office which was put upon him. Several perſons of Quality in the ſame Province writ alſo unto him, but he would return no Anſwer: So that theſe Deputies, wondring at it, went back to Ecbatan, and complained of their uſage, asking the Cauſe, but none could tell them; yet notwithſtanding, preſently after it was divulged: For Dinocrates acquainting Anatiſa with it, ſhe told it all over the Town, adding many things more than truth to make it thought Ameſtris was not ſo innocent as reported; yet ſay or do what ſhe could, ſhe was not believed. However, Ottanus, who hitherto paſſed only for a fantaſtical jealous Man, began now to be looked upon as a Man abſolutely out of his Wits, and deprived of Reaſon; and if they had been permitted to have ſeen Ameſtris, every one would have grieved for her, and adviſed her to forſake Ottanus: but thoſe unto whom he had committed the keeping of his Houſe, would not ſuffer any whoſoever to enter into it; not only becauſe he ſo commanded them, but alſo becauſe Ameſtris deſired it, contenting her ſelf with the Liberty of enjoying Menaſta, and ſeeing ſometimes Artemon, the firſt of which, entring in at a back Garden-door, was not diſcovered by any. As for Ottanus, he was in a moſt unimaginable perplexity; for notwithſtanding his Jealouſy and Fury, he did imagine that what he did, would ſeem very ſtrange in the Opinion of the World, and that he could no way juſtify himſelf, but by belching out lies againſt Ameſtris; he was not able to indure his Solitude, nor was he able to reſolve upon a return to Ecbatan; ſince he knew not what to ſay unto thoſe who came to rejoice with him, and whoſe Complements he had received: He was perplexed on all ſides; but amongſt his variety of different thoughts, the Image of Aglatidas went never out of his Mind; and when he imagined that Ameſtris thought her ſelf obliged unto him for what he had done, he was abſolutely mad, or at the leaſt ſeemed ſo unto Artemon who came to ſee him, in hopes to perſwade him unto Reaſon.

In the mean while Tharpis, who thought it a piece of Juſtice to torment that Man, who did unjuſtly torment the faireſt Woman upon Earth, did ſeem as if he had received a Letter from the Army, which did intimate that Ciaxares and you were ſo incenſed againſt Ottanus, for refuſing the Government which they had conferr'd upon him, that it would be a piece of great Difficulty for him, ever to reconcile himſelf. Then, as it is the quality of ill news always to ſpread ſooner abroad, all the Town in twenty four hours was filled with it, and reports went, That it was confirmed by four or five other Letters, though none at all came: So that Ottanus was preſently advertiſed of it by his Spies which he had in the Town. Theſe reports did ſo much augment his miſery, that he was not Maſter of himſelf. For ſince then your condition, Sir, was known unto all Ecbatan, the Favour which Aglatidas had with you, was moſt terrible unto him, and doubled all his Sorrows. At the ſame time it was certainly known, that the Affairs ſairs in Armenia were diſcompoſed, and that Ciaxares would draw the War into that Country: So that Ottanus, being moved unto it by apprehenſions of Rage, Diſpair, Revenge, and Jealouſy altogether, he reſolved to caſt himſelf into the King of Armenian's Party, though he apparently ſaw it would be the ruin of himſelf, and loſs of his Eſtate; Flattering himſelf with Hopes of ſome Occaſion to meet with Aglatidas, knowing he would be in that War, and he would ſeek him out, though in places fulleſt of Danger.

This Deſign being reſolved upon, without communicating it unto any, he ſent for Ameſtris, who, contrary to the advice of Menaſta, obeyed him. Artemon, who was returned to Ecbatan, hearing of it, would not let her go alone, but accompanied her whether ſhe would or no: When they drew near the place unto which they were to go, they eſpied Dinocrates on horſe-back under a Tree, who as ſoon as he ſaw them coming, galloped with all ſpeed towards the Caſtle where his Maſter was. This paſſage did much ſurprize Ameſtris and Artemon, who could not deviſe the meaning of it: But they were much more aſtoniſhed, when being come into the Caſtle, they underſtood, that as ſoon as Dinocrates advertiſed Ottanus of their coming, he took horſe with three or four of his Servants, and went out at a back-door, leaving a Letter with the Captain of the Caſtle to give unto Ameſtris: He had no ſooner declared it, but ſhe opened it, and found theſe words:

Ottanus to the unworthy Ameſtris.

I Go from hence to hide that Shame which you have brought upon me, and in order to that I go amongſt Men, who know neither you nor me: But the principal Reaſon of my Voyage, is to kill Aglatidas, if I can meet with him, as I hope I ſhall: If I hear you receive the News of his Death without any Tears, I ſhall return, and perhaps pardon you for loving that Man whilſt he lived, whoſe Death ſhould be indifferent unto you; in the mean time keep within this Caſtle; obey him who commands it in my abſence, unleſs you have a mind I ſhould return to puniſh you for all thoſe Evils you have brought upon me.

Ottanus.

Imagine, Sir, how this Letter grieved Ameſtris; who ſhewing it unto Artemon, conjured him to follow after him; and notwithſtanding all the diſſwaſion of the Captain, he did ſo. But whether Ottanus made too much haſte to be overtaken; or whether Artemon took a wrong Road, ſo it was he could not meet with him, but returned to Ameſtris, whom he found in a delulge of Tears: She was not well perſwaded whether or no Ottanus was gone; or if he were, whether he was gone to kill Aglatidas, as his Letter expreſſed; or elſe whether he was only hid, to ſee how ſhe would behave her ſelf during his pretended abſence: But however, ſhe collected by the beginning of his Letter, that he was not gone into the Army of Ciaxares, ſince there he would be known. After much debate upon the matter, they hit upon the Truth, and Artemon believed he was gone into Armenia, and was amongſt the King's Enemies. However, Ameſtris told him, that obedience unto her Husband was her Duty, and therefore ſhe deſired him to return back. Artemon uſed all his Arguments to perſwade her, that he might carry her back again to Ecbatan: But as ſhe had no Mind unto it, ſo indeed ſhe could not if ſhe would: for he whom Ottanus had left Commander in the Caſtle was an obſtinate and reſolute Man, and would not have permitted her: Yet the ſweet diſpoſition of Ameſtris did obtain this ſingular Favour from him, that Menaſta might come and ſee her. Thus was Ameſtris, after Artemon's departure, in a moſt terrible ſolitude, eſpecially becauſe ſhe knew no limits of time when it would end. Her Friends and Kindred did divers times offer to take her away in ſpight of him that kept the Caſtle, if ſhe would conſent to it: but ſhe never would; not ſo much, I think, out of her obedience unto Ottanus, which truly was without a parallel, as out of her own diſpoſition, to avoid company, which ſhe would not indure without conſtraint.

ſtraint. A while after ſhe had the comfort to hear that Ottanus was certainly in Armenia, and conſequently ſhe was in leſs fear of Aglatidas his Life, conceiving it a hard matter to meet with him amongſt an Army of a hundred thouſand Men.

Thus, Sir, did Ameſtris live during all the Armenian War, until the news was ſpread throughout all Media, that Ottanus was dead: It was told unto her with ſo many circumſtances, that none were afraid to rejoice openly with her, and all the World did make a publique thankſgiving for it, in behalf, and out of Affection to Ameſtris. But the wonder of all was, that ſhe who of all living had moſt reaſon to rejoice at the Death of Ottanus, did receive the News with the moſt moderation; for there was not the leaſt viſible ſign of any inward joy in the face of Ameſtris: as it was a thing impoſſible ſhe ſhould be ſad, ſo nothing of that Paſſion appeared likewiſe; but without either any Joy or Sorrow, ſhe made the Wiſdom of her Mind, and generoſity of her Soul moſt apparently appear in her diſcreet Moderation; and when Menaſta asked her why ſhe was not more ſenſible of that Freedom which ſhe was to enjoy? anſwered that there were ſome Scruples of Mind yet unſatisfied, and ſhe feared that the ill treatments of Ottanus would be a means by which the Gods would ſhorten her Life. Within a few days after, the Servants of Ottanus, returned all, except Dinocrates, who they ſaid was ſick and ſtaid in Armenia, which confirmed the reports of his Death. In the mean while the Captain of the Caſtle where Ameſtris was, in lieu of commanding her as before, he began to obey her as ſoon as he heard of Ottanus his death; and ſince he was never very ſevere in his Office, ſhe treated him with much Civility. Within a few days after the Kindred and Friends unto Ameſtris came to carry her back unto Ecbatan, where ſhe lived in all poſſible diſcretion, as if Ottanus had not at all been Jealous and Fantaſtical. Yet ſince it is not the Cuſtom of mourning in Media, to continue long; and ſince Ameſtris was never in her Life more fair than at that time, the paſſionate Affection of very many began to diſcloſe and diſcover themſelves by the tender of their Services: And amongſt the reſt Tharpis (who whilſt Ottanus was jealous, had no other deſign in ſeeing Ameſtris, and following her unto all places, but to add fewel to his fooliſh fires) was now really in love with her. Artemon for his part, he thought that meer compaſſion upon the Miſeries of Ameſtris was the only Cauſe prompted him ſo ſee and ſerve her, but now he perceived that he loved her with more tender Affection than he thought on: So that Ameſtris in loſing a Husband found many Lovers: And that which was moſt ſtrange, was, that Anatiſa only mourned for the Death of Ottanus, and ſo ſad ſhe was, that all the World perceived it. Ameſtris hearing as much, and diſcourſing on it with her dear Menaſta, after ſecond thoughts Menaſta imagined the true Cauſe, which was her Fears that the death of Ottanus would revive the Love betwixt Ameſtris and Aglatidas, if ever he returned to Ecbatan. Ameſtris bluſhed at this diſcourſe: Ambition and abſence, ſaid ſhe, will doubtleſs cure Aglatidas of his paſſionate Affection to me, ſo that the fears of Anatiſa are ill grounded: And though it ſhould not, yet I find Liberty ſo ſweet, that I ſhall hardly be induced to loſe it again. If you had ſpoke this unto any Friend of Anatiſa, replied Menaſta, and ſmiled, I ſhould have thought it much Prudence in you; but in ſpeaking unto me, and to tell me that Ambition and Abſence can cure Aglatidas, is very ſtrange: Aglatidas, who might have obtained the Government for himſelf, but preferred him whom you married, No, no, Ameſtris, it is impoſſible, and I cannot indure to hear of it: Speak Ameſtris, tell me truly, whether or no, you ſpeak as you think? tell me ingenuouſly if it would not vex you to ſee Aglatidas return hither, and court Anatiſa before your Face? As for Anatiſa, replied Ameſtris, I muſt confeſs it would much vex me, and I could not indure it. Who then could you allow him to court, ſaid Menaſta, and ſmiled? Wicked Woman, replied Ameſtris, why do you ſo cruelly perſecute me? and why do you force me to tell you with a bluſh, that I cannot indure Aglatidas ſhould love any thing but Honour above me? Yet, ſaid Menaſta, you ſpeak as coldly as if Aglatidas were Ottanus. I beſeech you, ſaid Ameſtris, ſpeak not of Ottanus, but let him enjoy that reſt in his Death which he could not have in his Life, and think (ſaid ſhe with a half-ſmile) that the Jealouſy of Ottanus had not been my only puniſhment, but the Jealouſy of Aglatidas hath alſo extreamly troubled me; and therefore I had need be wiſe in expoſing my Self the ſecond time to the ſame Miſery. You may eaſily prevent that (replied Menaſta wittily) by holding no diſcourſe with Megabiſus, if he return hither; and baniſh out of your Heart all Cauſes of Complaint againſt him: and let me tell you, that a ſecret Spleen in Love, how little ſoever it be in the beginning, may end in a great Quarrel: therefore hearken to my Counſel, and without any more apprehenſions of Aglatidas his Jealouſy, receive his Affection with Gratitude; for I am confident that his Fidelity deſerves it. This, Sir, was the ſtate of things: Tharpis and Artemon were in love with Ameſtris, and Anatiſa was jealous; for ſince the Death of Ottanus ſhe had many Spies about the Actions of Ameſtris, to the end ſhe might diſcover what intelligence paſſed between Aglatidas and her: But there being at that time ſome Commotions in Media, it was your goodneſs, Sir, to make choice of Aglatidas to be ſent thither, with Commiſſion from the King for it. I cannot well deſcribe unto you, Sir, the impatience of Aglatidas during this Voyage; yet give me leave to tell you, that though he was going to ſee Ameſtris, and Ameſtris at liberty, yet he did a hundred and a hundred times expreſs his Sorrows to be ſo far from you, Sir: The glorious Name of Cyrus, and the pleaſing Name of Ameſtris, were perpetually pronounced, and nothing elſe during all the Voyage. As good fortune was, things were a little calmed at Ecbatan before we came thither. Moreover, ſince he came with abſolute Authority, his Arrival was no ſooner known, but all addreſſed themſelves unto him with Reſolutions of Obedience; So that his entrance into Ecbatan was as if it were in Triumph. In the mean time Artemon, Tharpis, and Anatiſa were quite down in their conceits: But as for Ameſtris, ſhe was ſo quickned at his return, that ſhe hardly knew the motion of her own Heart.

As ſoon as Aglatidas arrived, he was ſo thronged and taken up with publique Buſineſſes that he could not diſingage himſelf from them, but deſired me to go unto Menaſta, and deſire her to know the Commands of Ameſtris, and to underſtand from her how ſhe was pleaſed he ſhould behave himſelf as ſoon as this throng of Affairs would permit him any leiſure to diſpoſe of. But Menaſta knowing the modeſt mind of Ameſtris, told me, Aglatidas ſhould make his firſt addreſs by way of viſit only, as was fitting unto one of her Quality, and that if he would be pleaſed to acquaint her with the day he intended to come unto Ameſtris, ſhe would contrive it ſo cunningly, that, provided he came in fitting time for it, there ſhould be little company when he came. Time did ſeem ſo tedious unto Aglatidas, that notwithſtanding his multitude of Affairs, he could not chooſe but write two Letters unto Menaſta that ſame day, and go unto her at night; for ſince ſhe was his Couſin, he was more free with her than another; and he took ſuch delight in diſcourſe of his deer Ameſtris, that he never thought of parting from her. But at laſt after he had ſpent two whole days in the King's ſervice, being in extreme impatience to ſee his fair Ameſtris, he went unto the Temple, where he underſtood, by Menaſta, ſhe uſed to be; yet Ameſtris not being there that day, not daring to truſt her ſelf before ſo much Company at the firſt meeting with Aglatidas, his hopes were diſappointed, and in lieu of ſeeing Ameſtris, he met with Anatiſa, who came thither purpoſely to ſee whether Aglatidas and Ameſtris were there. This encounter put him out of Countenance, being conſcious of his Crime to that Lady, and conſidering what a ſad conſequence the laſt ſight of her produced, it being the Cauſe why Ameſtris was jealous, and whereupon ſhe grounded her ſtrange Reſolution; he went out of the Temple as if he knew her not; and the time of his going unto Ameſtris being come, he went thither with a trembling Heart. As the mourning of Widows doth not laſt above four days at Ecbatan, ſo Ameſtris was out of it when we came thither; and though ſhe had no deſire to appear in her negligent dreſs, at the firſt ſight of Aglatidas, yet ſhe did not dreſs her ſelf in any glorious manner at that time, but was in a meen between both, ſo that not diminiſhing any of her Beauty, there appeared as much modeſty in her Dreſs as in her Mind. Menaſta, who was with her when Aglatidas and I came thither, and ſince Ameſtris knew that I was not ignorant of all paſſages, my Preſence did not interrupt the meeting; yet, Sir, it ſeemed unto me ſomething ſtrange, for in lieu of thoſe teſtimonies of Joy which uſually appear in the Faces of thoſe who love, and who after great Misfortunes and long Abſence delight to ſee one another, Ameſtris was reſerved, and concealing her Satisfaction from Aglatidas, ſhe ſeemed ſo ſerious at the firſt, that all joyes vaniſhed out of his Eyes, and his Heart was ſo damp'd that he had much ado to expreſs himſelf in terms of common Civility: That which did moſt of all non-plus him was, that at his coming in he found a Lady with her upon a viſit, as we were: ſo that Aglatidas knew not in all the World how to addreſs himſelf, nor did Ameſtris know how to anſwer him. For to tell her he was ſorry for her Loſs, had been ridiculous and Abſurd; to ſay he rejoiced at it, would offend her: and to ſay nothing, had not been handſom; ſo that Aglatidas was not a little puzled, and I know not how he came off with his Complement, for whilſt he was performing it, I addreſſed my ſelf to Menaſta, to tell her ſhe was not ſo good as her promiſe, ſince that Lady was there to interrupt us; and indeed as ſhe was preſent, diſcourſe was but conſtrained: yet Aglatidas hoped that when ſhe was gone, then Ameſtris would not appear ſo cold, but after her viſit was ended, and we were in freedom together, ſeeing ſhe kept ſtill in the ſame poſture and would not aſſume that obliging Air and free behaviour as he hoped for.

Madam (ſaid he unto her) Is it poſſible that you ſhould expreſs ſuch ſenſible Sorrow at my Departure, and that now you ſhould deny me ſo much Happineſs as to ſee ſome Symtoms of Joy at my Return? That Sorrow which I ſhewed againſt my Will (replied Ameſtris, and ſmiled) did ſeem ſo criminal unto me, when I could think upon it with Tranquillity, that I deſire to repent of that Fault now. Say rather (Madam) replied hee, that you have a premeditated Deſign to commit another againſt the Laws of Amity, which you owe me: For ſince you honoured me with your Commands, to love none but you, when I parted from you, I think it is lawful for me to ſay as much, ſince I have moſt exactly obeyed you. Yes, Madam, I have loved you, and loved none but you, and alſo in ſo high a meaſure that my Honour is not dearer than it, nor my Life; yet after I have ſuffered a Multitude of Miſeries; after a Senſibility of all your Sorrows, and my own; after I have preſerved a moſt violent Love, without any hope; and endured a Million of Misfortunes, and all only becauſe I loved you; then, after all theſe, to find ſuch an Indifference in your Looks, as perſwades me your Heart is indifferent alſo, is a very Hell unto my Soul. Do not believe my Looks, Aglatidas, ſaid ſhe unto him, if they tell you that my Heart is indifferent to you, ſince certainly I have ever eſteemed you as much as I ought to do. If you ſaid, loved me, in lieu of eſteeming me, replied Aglatidas, you had compleated my Happineſs. But cruel Lady, I believe you make no account of all my Services and Sufferings, but expect I ſhould make a new Purchaſe of your Heart: If it be ſo, I beſeech you tell me; for I muſt needs confeſs I am not prepared at this time to tell you that I love you, nor did I think you expected it; but Madam, if I was deceived, I beſeech you acquaint me with your Will, and you ſhall be moſt exactly obeyed. Whilſt Aglatidas was thus expreſſing himſelf, and Ameſtris moſt attentively hearing, that ſeeming Coldneſs which ſhe out of her Modeſty at the firſt affected, did vaniſh before ſhe was aware, ſo that the real Thoughts of Heart, ſtealing through her Eyes, did ſpeak her Joys ſo apparently, that Aglatidas had his deſired Satisfaction. Ameſtris alſo plainly perceiving that Aglatidas was no Changeling, was full of obliging Sweetneſs towards him. Then did they begin to relate all their Sorrows, and all their Misfortunes which intervened ſince they ſaw one another, and this Conference which began with a little kind of a Quarrel, did end in a renewing of a moſt ſincere Amity. Since Company began to come in, the Conference was interrupted, but the moſt obſervable Paſſage was, That Tharpis coming to Ameſtris whilſt we were there, within a quarter of an Hour, Aglatidas perceived he was in Love with her, and telling Mnaſta as much, ſhe told him again in Raillery, that he had beſt take heed of being jealous, as he was of Megabiſes. Wicked Couſin, anſwered he, why do you make a Jeſt of that which hath been the greateſt Torment of my Life? I do it, anſwered ſhe, to prevent your Relapſe into the like. By this time our Viſit had laſted but too long, and therefore I beckned unto Aglatidas to break off, which accordingly we did: But ſince he owed another Viſit unto one of his Aunts, he left me, and went to pay it: As ill luck was he found Anatiſa there, which vexed him ſo much, that he was in a Mind to go out of the Chamber: yet ſince he was diſcovered, and owed much reſpect unto the Lady he went to viſit, and who was already riſen up to ſalute him, he went forward and performed his Complements, which ſmelt a little of the Diſorder in his Soul: He ſaluted Anatiſa yet very civily, but with ſo much Confuſion in his Face, as he durſt hardly look upon her; for beſides his own nonplus, he ſaw a Lady who had good Reaſon to blame him, he was afraid that Ameſtris, if ſhe ſhould hap to know it, ſhould think he ſought the occaſion to ſee Anatiſa: So that reſolving to cut his Viſit very ſhort, he told the Lady whom he came unto, that this ſhould not be counted for one, but that ere long he would tender his Devoirs in a more ample manner. Juſt as he had ended his Complement, one came and deſired to ſpeak with his Aunt upon ſome very important Buſineſs. Nephew (ſaid ſhe unto him) I know you are in no ſuch haſte, but you may do me the Favour to keep this fair Lady Company, whil I go into my Cloſet and diſpatch a piece of Buſineſs which cannot be done another time. Anatiſa was ſo raviſhed with this fit Opportunity, that ſhe never offered to go away, but quite contrary, deſired the Lady not to make ſo much haſte, but to diſpatch her Buſineſs at leiſure. Aglatidas was ſo vexed with this angry Adventure, that though he would not openly offer any Incivility, yet he would have given ſome ill favour'd Reaſons to move Anatiſa to go away, or elſe that he muſt himſelf be gone: But the Lady of the Houſe left them together without any Anſwer, or any other Company except a Woman which waited upon Anatiſa, who ſtood at the other end of the Chamber: You may imagine, Sir, how Aglatidas was put to it, who was a long while dumb as well as Anatiſa, who ſtayed to ſee what he would ſay before ſhe began: Yet Aglatidas conceiving it beſt not to incenſe the Spirit of that Lady too much, by too great an Incivility, reſolved to make ſome Excuſes unto her, and to prepare her that ſhe ſhould not take it ill, he had caſt her off as he had done: but ſince he was ſomething long in conſulting with himſelf about it, Anatiſa broke ſilence firſt. Tell me truly, Aglatidas, ſaid ſhe unto him, did you know that I was here when you came in? Certainly, anſwered he, if I had known you had been here, I ſhould out of my Reſpect unto you, not have forced you to ſee a Man whom you have reaſon to hate; though, to ſay truly, I never had any Intentions to wrong you. That I may the better judg of your Crime, replied ſhe, you muſt ſincerely, without any Diſſimulation, tell me what it is, for truly my Mind is not yet reſolved what Thoughts to entertain of you. Speak then I conjure you, ſaid ſhe, and tell me ſincerely, whether when you applied your ſelf unto me more than unto any other, and by your aſſiduous Courtſhip perſwaded me that you loved me; whether I ſay, did you really love me, or only did diſſemble it, that you might better hide your Love of Ameſtris? for it may be you quitted her at that time for me, or it may be you now quit me for her: or elſe perhaps you were ever devoted unto Ameſtris, though I cannot underſtand what Reaſon you had to let her marry Ottanus: However, tell me the real Truth, that I may accordingly regulate my Thoughts of you. Aglatidas being much gravelled for an Anſwer, ſtood ſilent a while. No, no, ſaid ſhe unto him, pump not for any Excuſe, nor any Diſguiſement of the matter; let me only know whether you be only an unconſtant Man, or an Impoſtor, leſt I ſhould be unjuſt in hating you either too much or too little; for I put a great deal of Difference between theſe two Crimes, which one of them you have committed. Aglatidas being deeper gravelled than ever, thought it beſt to confeſs the very Truth of the matter: Madam, (ſaid he then unto her) ſince you command me to ſpeak the Truth in all Sincerity; I do confeſs that I was never inconſtant, but that I ever loved Ameſtris better than my ſelf: I beſeech you (ſaid he, ſeeing her bluſh for Anger) let not this Truth incenſe you more againſt me; for I am certain there is no cauſe of Offence; and am certain alſo, that you will confeſs as much, if you will be pleaſed to underſtand me. I do not think you can perſwade me to it, replied ſhe, ſince I have more reaſon to complain againſt you, than if you were inconſtant. You ſhall ſee, Madam, the greateſt Eſteem which I had of you; for ſince I loved Ameſtris with a moſt violent and unruly Paſſion, and eſteeming her above all the World, but finding great cauſe of Complaint againſt her Severity towards me, and deſiring to cure my ſelf, if it were poſſible, of ſuch an unaccepted Paſſion, I conceived you able to deface the Image of Ameſtris out of my Heart, and would perſwade my ſelf and all the World that I was in love with you: Judg, Madam, whether any Man that was in love, and who thought the Lady he loved the moſt incomparably accompliſhed of any upon Earth, could render a greater Teſtimony of Eſteem than I unto you upon this occaſion: I make a queſtion whether I had been able to have rendred it in ſo high a Degree, if I had been really in love with you, as in ſeeming to be ſo, and as I endeavoured to become ſo really. Now if by the help of all my Endeavours, I cannot paſs above the degree of Eſteem, nor reach ſo high as Love, the Fault is not in your Beauty or Wit, or any Virtue wanting in you; but the only Fault is, that I cannot root out of my Heart those firſt Thoughts which took ſuch deep hold of it. Therefore, Madam, to ſpeak reaſonably, it was a wrong rather unto Ameſtris than you, when I applied my ſelf unto your Service, ſince I endeavoured to diſpoſe of a Heart which was not in my Power, but only and abſolutely in hers. Confeſs the Truth, replied Anatiſa, Was not your only aim to make Ameſtris jealous, and never to intend any Love towards me? Ah Aglatidas, you are deceived if you ever thought I believed you: Inconſtancy is ſometimes pardonable: but an Impoſtor, a Cheat, a Man which cozens us, there is no imaginable Revenge which is not ſweet to puniſh him withall. Had I proteſted a thouſand times (ſaid Aglatidas) that I was infinitely in love with you, or if you had done me any conſiderable Favours, you had then ſome reaſon for what you ſay; but alas, Madam, I was no more than a frequent Viſitor, and diſcourſed with you more than with any other; and I do not doubt, but if I had been ſo bold as to profeſs any matters of Love to you, then you would have treated me more hardly than you did: but ſince it is no Shame for all Beauties to be loved, I cannot conceive I have done you any great Injury in moving you to believe, by ſome deep Sighs, that I loved you. No, replied Anatiſa, you have rather done me a Kindneſs, by giving me cauſe to think that you never loved me: However Aglatidas, I ſhall be revenged of you, and I will revenge my ſelf upon Ameſtris, that I may be the better revenged upon your ſelf: And ſince you ſay you have tried and indeavoured to love me, I thank you for it, and in Requital, I ſhall try and indeavour to hate you, and if I be not much miſtaken, I ſhall bring to paſs my Deſign better than you have yours; for I perceive I have a ſtronger Inclination unto it: Expect therefore a Puniſhment for your Crime, even by Ameſtris her ſelf, who perhaps ſhall not make you leſs jealous than Ottanus was; for indeed Aglatidas ſome have Eyes as well as you; others think her fair as well as your ſelf; and after the choice which ſhe made of Ottanus, I believe few Lovers are ſure of their own Hearts, be they as compleat Men as can be. Ye ſince you are ingenuous and ſpeak ſincerely unto me, I ſhall be the like and tell you with the ſame Sincerity, that I do already hate you more than you can love Ameſtris, and ſhall never be ſatisfied until you be both miſerable; I ſhall not make any great blunder in the World, but ſhall revenge my ſelf in a more fine and ſubtile way. You may uſe your Pleaſure (anſwered Aglatidas coldly) for ſince I reſpect all Ladies in general, and much eſteem you in particular, I ſhall be ſo effectually reſpective, that I ſhall not interpret your Hatred and choller to my Diſadvantage, and if I return any Anſwer unto the Injuries you ſpeak of, it ſhall be in Complements.

As Anatiſa was ready to reply, the Aunt of Aglatidas came in, and he took his leave of her, and left Anatiſa as much incenſed againſt him as poſſibly could be. But the angry part of this Viſit was, that Tharpis came into the Chamber as the Aunt of Aglatidas came out of her Cloſet, ſo that he ſaw the private Conference which had been between him and Anatiſa, and obſerved the Diſorder which appeared in the Face of that Lady: So that Aglatidas fearing this Encounter ſhould prejudice him in the opinion of Ameſtris, he ſent Menaſta unto her, to acquaint her with the Accident, and indeed his Policy was advantagious to him; for Tharpis found out ſome means or other to acquaint Ameſtris the next Morning, that Aglatidas and Anatiſa had a long private Conference together at the Houſe of Aglatidas his Aunt, which made it ſeem as if it were a thing appointed: but ſince Ameſtris knew it before, this Device took no Effect, nor made any jars between Ameſtris and Aglatidas.

In the mean time Artemon and Tharpis were not a little vexed to obſerve that they did concur ſo well: But ſince Artemon was not declared a Lover, though it was apparent enough he thought he had found out an excellent device to ruin Aglatidas; So that reſolving not to ſpeak yet as a Lover, he deſigned the Deſtruction of his moſt feared Rival, by acting in Appearance as the Friend of Ameſtris; and the Truth is, if ſhe had not perceived by a hundred Circumſtances that he was in love with her, his Plot had took Effect: for he did manage it moſt cunningly, as I ſhall tell you. Preſently after Aglatidas arrived, and had made many Viſits unto Ameſtris, where it was eaſily perceived he always loved her, and was never hated: Artemon, one Morning deſired to ſpeak with her, and it was granted him; for ſhe was much obliged unto him for taking her part againſt Ottanus when he was with her, and had Liberty to talk in private.

Madam (ſaid he unto her) I know not whether my Zeal will be well taken, but I am certain that if you could ſee my Heart, you would confeſs I am obliged to what I did. Artemon (anſwered ſhe) I have received ſo many Teſtimonies of Friendſhip from you, and you have done me ſo many good Offices, that I cannot imagine what you can tell me, which will not be well taken; therefore ſpeak on, I conjure you. Madam, replied he and bluſh'd (for he related the Conference unto me very fully, as I ſhall tell you at the end of my Diſcourſe) I know very well that the Jealouſy of Ottanus had ever a cauſleſs Foundation, and that your Virtue is ſo great that no Calumny can blemiſh it: But having always obſerved your paſſionate Love of Honour, and that you would not only be vertuous, but alſo would appear ſo in the Eyes of your very Enemies, I thought it requiſite for you to take into your ſerious Conſideration all thoſe things which Ottanus hath publiſhed to the World, concerning the Correſpondency betwixt Aglatidas and your ſelf. Not, Madam, but that I know his Injuſtice was well perceived, yet for all that, I conceive that Aglatidas conferring the Government upon Ottanus, and he making that the Pretence of his Fury againſt you, you would perhaps take away a great cauſe of Cenſure from all thoſe who envy your Beauty and Merit, if you ſhould a little leſs admit of Viſits from Aglatidas. Not that I have any Exceptions againſt him, for you your ſelf have often heard me ſpeak much good of him, upon ſeveral occaſions: Therefore I do moſt humbly entreat you to believe that what I ſpeak is merely out of Zeal to your Service. I am much obliged unto you (anſwered Ameſtris, knowing well enough what Motive induced him to this Advice) and I do aſſure you, Artemon, that I will take your Advice, as I ought to do: yet let me tell you, with the like Freedom that you take, I am unwilling to revive the Jealouſies of Ottanus after his Death: for he would have barred me from the Converſation of all the World; you your ſelf was not excepted. It is very true, replied Artemon, but all the Town talks more of Aglatidas than any other, not that I adviſe you to baniſh him from your Sight abſolutely, but only for a little time; and thereby ſtop the Tongues of Calumnies which Anatiſa perhaps will raiſe againſt you. This ſeems to be but ill Policy, ſaid Ameſtris, therefore I had rather not conceal my Thoughts, and it will be advantagious to me, that all the World did know them, ſince, Thanks be to the Gods, they are not criminal. However, Madam, ſaid he unto her, I beſeech you take it not ill, that I ſhould be ſo free with you. I do promiſe you, I will not, anſwered ſhe; but Artemon, (ſaid ſhe further, and ſmiled) you give me this Counſel ſo ſeriouſly that I am fearful you will take it ill from me, if I do not follow it. Truly Madam, replied he, I ſhould be very glad you did follow it for ſeveral Reaſons, but I ſee you have no Inclination to it. I do ingenuouſly confeſs it, ſaid ſhe, for I have lived ſo long in a conſtrained Condition, that I deſire to enjoy Freedom as far as Civility and Decency will permit me. But, Madam, ſaid Artemon to her, you may remember the time when you told me that expoſing your ſelf to the Converſation of the World, was conſtrained, and contrary to your Inclination: Did you then ſpeak as you thought, Madam? or, is your Mind changed ſince? But Artemon, ſaid ſhe unto him, you may remember the time when you told Ottanus that it was fit one of my Age and Quality ſhould expoſe themſelves unto the Converſation of the World; Did you then ſpeak as you thought, Artemon? or, do you not ſpeak as you think now? you, I ſay, who would have me baniſh from my Converſe the prime Perſon that I have in Ecbatan. Madam, (ſaid he, being tranſported by his Paſſion) to ſpeak ſincerely and really unto you, I would never have moved you to forbear the Company of Aglatidas, but only to diſcover your Thoughts of him, and likewiſe to diſcover what are mine of you. I do not ſee (ſaid Ameſtris, and aſſumed a more ſerious look) what ſhould be the Riddle of theſe things. You may eaſily perceive it, anſwered he, if you will be but pleaſed to conſider that none can converſe with you except they infinitely love you, and deſire unto themſelves a Happineſs which they fear you will beſtow upon another. I muſt confeſs, ſaid Ameſtris to him, that your Diſcourſe amazeth me, and I could never have believed you would have given me any cauſe to complain againſt you, or begun your Expreſſions of Affection with any Thoughts of Jealouſy: But Artemon, that you may ſee I forget not my Obligations to you, I will take the ſame Freedom as you have done, and give you ſome Counſel, and ſincerely tell you, that you will be the moſt miſerable Man upon Earth, if you ever think of loving me: Content your ſelf I pray you, that I do believe you are my Friend, and be confident that as long as you keep within the Limits of that, I ſhall very much eſteem you; but on the other ſide I do ingenuouſly profeſs, that if you love me any otherwiſe than ſo, you will loſe your Labour, you will exceedingly vex me, and I ſhall endeavour my utmoſt to perſecute you as much as ever I can. But, Madam, ſaid he unto her, I beſeech you then acknowledge that Aglatidas is the cauſe of the abſolute Impoſſibility to move your Heart. When you are no more than only my Friend (ſaid ſhe unto him, and ſmiled) I ſhall diſcover the Secrets of my Heart unto you.

Alas, Madam, ſaid he, that's an Honour I ſhall never arrive at; for it is abſolutely impoſſible for me to love you more or leſs than I do. But when Ottanus lived, ſaid ſhe unto him, you were neither unquiet nor jealous, and yet I was the ſame I am now, and you ſaw me alſo as you do now, therefore did you love me at that time? Doubtleſs I did, Madam, ſaid he unto her, yet I did not know it by that Name; but I called that Eſteem, Friendſhip and Compaſſion, which really was moſt violent Love. For my part, ſaid Ameſtris, I cannot ſee any reaſon why your Friendſhip ſhould not continue Friendſhip ſtill, or why your Eſteem ſhould be converted into Love. The Return of Aglatidas, replied he, is the cauſe of it. I do underſtand you very well Artemon, ſaid ſhe unto him, you had ſome ſparks of Jealouſy in your Mind before you knew you were in love; and believe me, nothing could render you more terrible to Ameſtris than that Humour. I know, Madam, replied he, that the reaſon why you ſay ſo is, becauſe I was allied to Ottanus, but I did intend by it to let you know my Sincerity and my Miſery. You would do much better, ſaid ſhe, to let me ſee your Wiſdom and Diſcretion, in continuing my Friend, as heretofore you have been: for by that way you will be ſure to have my Eſteem and Friendſhip; and the other way you will force me to hate you, and ſhun your Company.

Thus, Sir, you ſee poor Artemon, who came to ſee Ameſtris in hopes to get Aglatidas baniſhed, was almoſt baniſhed himſelf: therefore he began to expreſs himſelf in the moſt obliging Language he could poſſible, and ſolemnly proteſted he would never ſpeak any thing again that ſhould incenſe her; but deſired he might come ſee her, though never in private again.

All this while Anatiſa was plotting her Revenge upon Aglatidas, and in order to that, ſhe made a firm League of Friendſhip with Tharpis; the Confidence they had in each other was ſo high, that I think they imparted their moſt ſecret Thoughts: They held many Councels upon it, to adviſe upon the beſt courſe; and this cunning Lady made him promiſe her never to ſpeak openly of his Love to Ameſtris, for fear ſhe ſhould treat him ill, and baniſh him her Company: for ſince there was a Report that Ciaxares would, ere long, return to Ecbatan, and that Megabiſes would return with him, ſhe thought that all three Rivals would puzzle Aglatidas to ſome Purpoſe; and if they had all three the Freedom of courting Ameſtris at once, it was ten to one but ſome Jars or other would ariſe amongſt them, which would reflect upon Aglatidas. She adviſed Tharpis therefore only to get ſome faithful Spy which ſhould be continually about Ameſtris, and never to ſpeak any thing which might incenſe her, or move her to baniſh him her Company: And the better to delude Tharpis, ſhe told him that there was a Letter which came from the Army, intimating that as ſoon for Ciaxares came to Ecbatan, then you, Sir, would ſend for Aglatidas back; and therefore it was better to ſtay until he was abſent, before he declared himſelf: Telling him further, that his principal Buſineſs ſhould be, to hinder as much as ever he could, that Ameſtris and Aglatidas held no long private Conferences together whilſt he ſtayed at Ecbatan. So that Tharpis was ſo perpetually with Ameſtris, as it was impoſſible to be there and not find him. Aglatidas did divers times offer to quarrel with him, but Ameſtris did ſtrictly forbid him: for though he did earneſtly importune her, and was a perpetual Trouble, yet ſhe would not permit a Quarrel, upon no other Reaſon but Frequency of Viſits: She would not neither have it denied that ſhe was within, but let every one enter beſides; ſo that ſhe could never enjoy the Sight of Aglatidas, but ſhe muſt admit of the Sight of Tharpis alſo: for though his Company was pleaſant enough, yet Ameſtris, Menaſta, Aglatidas, and my ſelf were ſo confined in our Freedom of Diſcourſe, that when he was preſent we knew not what to diſcourſe upon: Every one was ſilent, purpoſely to vex him, but all was one, for ſpeak or ſpeak not, he was always there, and was the laſt Man commonly that went away: So that Aglalidas could never have any Opportunity of private Diſcourſe with Ameſtris, but ſometimes at the Lodging of Menaſta, and that too was very rare to find none but our ſelves there. Aglatidas yet was ſo fully aſſured that Ameſtris loved him, though ſhe gave him but common Teſtimonies of it, as that he thought himſelf unhappy in nothing but that ſhe would not name him, conceiving it too ſhort a time ſince Ottanus died to do it with any Hanſomneſs.

Thus, Sir, was the State of things when Ciaxares came to Ecbatan, and when Megabiſes followed him, whom one would have thought, that Time, and Abſence, and Reaſon would have made him forget his Affection to Ameſtris; but as ſoon as he heard of the Death of Ottanus, and that Aglatidas might perhaps become happy, it revived, and he was deeply in Love with Ameſtris: when he came to Ecbatan he was not deceived in his Conjectures, for he found that Aglatidas was in favour with Ameſtris, and his Soul was ſo extreamly perplexed, that he could not tell whether the Hatred he bore unto his Rival did revive his Affection unto Ameſtris, or his Affection to Ameſtris revive his Hatred unto his Rival: However, theſe two contrary Paſſions took up the whole dominion of his Heart, ſo that in one and the ſame day, he did both love and hate in the higheſt Exceſs, and was equally tormented by them both: for as he durſt not yet tell Ameſtris that he loved her, becauſe he had promiſed never to ſpeak any more of his Love unto her: ſo ſhe durſt not make his Hatred of Aglatidas appear more than ordinary, becauſe of Ciaxares and of you, Sir: ſo that he was extreamly tormented; but in the end, Love being the predominate Paſſion in his Heart, he conceived, upon ſerious Thoughts, that though he ſhould tell her he loved her ſtill, yet it was no unpardonable Sin: So that he went unto Ameſtris with a Reſolution to commit it. This Viſit did both ſurprize and perplex her; for ſhe imagined that ſince Megabiſes had broke his Promiſe of ſeeing her no more, he would break the other alſo before he had done; and though to ſpeak reaſonably, it may very well be ſaid, that he was only the innocent cauſe of Aglatidas's Jealouſy: yet for all that, Ameſtris had never married Ottanus, if Megabiſes had not ſpoke with her in the Garden when Aglatidas became jealous, and therefore ſhe could not chuſe but have a Spleen againſt him: For this Reaſon therefore, and many others, ſhe gave him but cold Entertainment, yet would ſhe not openly chide him for his Breach of Promiſe, becauſe Tharpis was preſent, who was an eternal Obſtacle unto Megabiſes as well as unto Aglatidas.

The moſt obſervable Paſſage was, that Ameſtris, being extreamly joyed that ſhe had continually one with her who hindred Megabiſes from any private Diſcourſe, did one Day deſire Aglatidas, ſmiling, not to be jealous, if ſhe treated the poor Tharpis a little kindly; to the end he ſhould continue his Aſſiduity about her, as long as Megabiſes ſhould be at Court. Anatiſa, who was very ſubtile and crafty, did deſire that Tharpis ſhould be with Ameſtris, only when Aglatidas was with her, and be no hindrance unto either Megabiſes or Artemon, for ſhe cared not who got the Heart of Ameſtris, ſo Aglatidas loſt it. But Sir, Aglatidas was ſo exceedingly obſequious and full of Reſpects unto her, that though the Viſits of Megabiſes were as ſo many bitter Pills to his Stomach, and perplexed him to the Heart, yet he reſolved never to tell her ſo much, or ſpeak unto her: But do what he could, his Eyes betrayed the Secrets of his Soul, and diſcovered his reſtleſs Thoughts; yet ſince ſhe was reſolved to be very ſincere and free with him, ſhe expreſſed her ſelf ſo obligingly unto him at Menaſta's Lodging, that ſhe ſweetned thoſe bitter Pills at the laſt, if ſhe did not abſolutely cure him of his Malady.

In the mean time Megabiſes watched all Opportunities to ſpeak in private with her, and at the laſt found out an odd Device, which was, to ſuborn the Porter by a conſiderable Sum of Money: Then when he intended to execute his Deſign, he made choice of ſuch a Day as he knew Menaſta would not be with Ameſtris; and acquainting the Porter with it, he obliged him to tell every one, except himſelf, that came to ask for his Lady, that ſhe was not at home. So that the Porter obeying him, and Megabiſes ſending away his Men when he came near the Houſe, fearing if any who came thither ſhould ſee them there, they would know by them he was there alſo, he went up into her Chamber, and found no Company with her but her Women: His firſt entrance did a little ſtartle her; yet imagining that Company would preſently come in, and at leaſt Tharpis would not fail to deliver her from the Perſecution of Megabiſes, ſhe reſolved to be ſpeaking continually unto him, and prevent him from any Expreſſions of Love: So that when they were ſet, and conceiving there was no Subject fitter for a long Diſcourſe than to ſpeak of you, Sir; Since we have a fit Opportunity, ſaid ſhe unto him, tell me, I beſeech you, whether Cyrus be really ſuch a one as Fame ſpeaks him to be: I do not expect you ſhould make a large Relation of all his Conqueſts, but I would have you tell me truly, whether it be true, that he is abſolute Owner of all the Virtues, and hath not ſo much as one Fault: for ſince I was not at Ecbatan when he was there, I miſſed the Sight of him, and would gladly know, whether all thoſe that ſpeak of him do not flatter.

That Prince, anſwered Megabiſes, is ſo exactly accompliſhed in all Reſpects, that none can flatter him more then they can your Beauty, Madam, though they commend him in the higheſt ſtrain. But, Madam, ſaid he, if Aglatidas hath not fully deſcribed him unto you, he is not grateful enough for thoſe Favours which Cyrus hath done him; and you have ſome Reaſon to fear he will be negligent alſo in his acknowledgments of thoſe Favours he hath received from you. Aglatidas, replied ſhe, has extolled him in ſuch a high ſtrain, as that is the Reaſon why I enquire of you concerning him, conceiving it not poſſible that one Prince ſhould have as many Virtues as all the Men in the World together can have; therefore if I were of a condition and humour to ſhew any Favours unto Aglatidas, I need not fear by this Reaſon that he will be ungrateful. But Megabiſes, added ſhe, there is ſuch a vaſt difference between the Fortunes of Cyrus and mine, that it is not fit they ſhould be brought in any Compariſon; ſo that without any more Speeches of me, I beſeech you let us ſpeak only of him. I ſhall ever ſpeak of him with delight (ſaid he unto her) but only this day, Madam, I beſeech you diſpenſe with it and me both, and give me leave to ſpend this Opportunity I have to be alone with you, in begging Pardon for not keeping within the limits you preſcribed me. I alſo believed, Madam, that ſince you are pleaſed to permit me the ſight of you, ſo alſo you will permit me to ſpeak unto you; and what coldneſs ſoever I obſerve in your Eyes, I cannot chooſe but aſſure you, that the flame which once they kindled in my Heart, is now hotter than ever it was.

Ameſtris, ſeeing ſhe could not avoid this diſcourſe which ſhe ſo much feared; and ſeeing alſo that it was in vain, ſhe turned her ſelf towards the door, to ſee if any came in to relieve her, ſhe reſolved to anſwer him directly and ſpeedily, leſt any ſhould enter before ſhe had ended; ſo that taking up Megabiſes very ſhort, I ſee ſaid ſhe unto him, that pr udence is moſt requiſite of all the Virtues, and it is fit ſometimes not to let all ones Goodneſs appear; for indeed Megabiſes my indulgence towards you in ſeeming to forget that I ever deſired you to ſee me any more, and that you promiſed me obedience, is the Cauſe that you ſpeak as you do: yet know the Reaſon why I did not forbid you to ſee me, or diſcourſe of a Paſſion which I cannot anſwer, was becauſe I thought that this Paſſion had been quite extinguiſhed, and conſequently you might perhaps become one of my Friends: But ſince you indeavour to perſwade me that it remains ſtill in your Soul; Let me once more conjure you to keep within the limits of your Promiſe. I do confeſs, Madam (replied he, and ſmiled) that I made this Promiſe unto the fair Ameſtris as daughter unto Artambares, who had diſpoſed of her Heart unto Aglatidas, but I never made any promiſe to the Wife or the Widow of Ottanus, who being abſolute Miſtreſs of her own will, ought now to make more equitable Laws than this, if ſhe deſire to be obeyed.

That Ameſtris of whom you ſpeak, ſaid ſhe unto him, in changing condition has not changed her thoughts of you. I wiſh to the Gods, replied he, that ſhe had changed her thoughts of Aglatidas, and that he ſhould not be the only happy one amongſt ſo many miſerable Men: Howſoever, replied ſhe, I do expect Obedience, and ſince you cannot ſee me but diſpleaſe me, you ſhall ſee me no more; or at the leaſt, if I cannot avoid it abſolutely, you ſhall never ſee me but in Melancholy and Anger. Yet, Madam, ſaid he unto her, is it poſſible you ſhould marry Ottanus, and caſt off Aglatidas, for whom you baniſhed me, and will you not now ſo much as hear the Complaints of a miſerable Man, on whom, out of your Goodneſs, it was your pleaſure to beſtow ſome ſweet Language when you baniſhed him? for then you told him he might pretend unto your Eſteem and Friendſhip, and that if you had not been engaged by the Command of a Father, and your own Inclination, to prefer Aglatidas before all the World, you would not have ſcorned him: Now, Madam, ſince Aglatidas hath broken your Chains, and aſſumed thoſe of Anatiſa, before all the World, in ſo much as you married Ottanus, tell me, I beſeech you, if after all this, I have not ſome pretence unto your Heart, which Ottanus unworthily poſſeſſed, and which Aglatidas hath rendred himſelf unworthy of by his inconſtancy? Moreover, Madam, grant that he never was really in love with Anatiſa, and that by Orders from you, he did diſſemble with her, yet I will maintain he never did love you rightly, that could do ſo much: At the leaſt, I am moſt certain, that if you had impoſed any ſuch Command upon me, I ſhould never have been able to obey it. Obey me only in this (replied ſhe) Never viſit me any more, nor ſpeak of your pretended Paſſion; and I ſhall impoſe no other difficulties upon you. Had I not ſeen you change your mind, replied he, doubtleſs I ſhould obey you, ſince heretofore I have done ſo; but ſince I have ſeen you make choice of Ottanus before all the moſt compleat Men in Media, it is not poſſible, Madam, I ſhould caſt off all Hope, how rigorous ſoever you are: for I think I may ſpeak it without any Vanity, that there is not ſo great a difference between me and Aglatidas, as there was between him and Ottanus.

Ameſtris hearing Megabiſes ſpeak thus, and his diſcourſe bringing into her Memory, all thoſe misfortunes which he had been the cauſe of; ſhe was extreamly troubled: ſhe wondred that none came in all that time; and turned her ſelf towards the door upon every leaſt noiſe that her Women made; however, Megabiſes, do or ſay what ſhe could, did paſs away the greateſt part of the afternoon with her: and in anſwer to the laſt thing which he had ſpoke unto her, ſhe told him in general terms, that her marriage with Ottanus, was cauſed by a Secret which none could dive into, and that ſhe was reſolved never to declare it; diſcovering no further unto him, but that he himſelf did much contribute towards it. I, Madam, (ſaid he in a great amazement!) Yes, you, replied ſhe; and therefore looking now upon you as the cauſe of all my miſery, judg your ſelf whether I can ever hearken unto what you tell me. I am ſo ignorant of the Crime whereof you accuſe me, ſaid he unto her, that I cannot tell how to juſtify my Self. However it be, anſwered Ameſtris, you ſhall never alter my Heart; therefore, if it be poſſible, alter yours, and aſſure your ſelf that this is the laſt time that you ſhall ſpeak with me in private as long as you live. Megabiſes would have replied, but that ſhe roſe up in a great chafe that none ſhould come in to relieve her, and commanded that her Coach ſhould be preſently made ready, ſaying ſhe would go and viſit Menaſta. You ſee (ſaid ſhe unto him, after ſhe had given that command) how dangerous it is to give an ill example; for if you had not failed in thoſe reſpects which you owed unto me, certainly I ſhould not have failed in that Civility which I owed unto you.

After this, without hearkning unto his anſwer, ſhe took up her Hood, and going unto her glaſs to put it on, ſhe conſtrained Megabiſes to go out; yet he did wait upon her unto her Coach: But when the Porter heard them coming down, he went and hid himſelf, that he might have ſome excuſe when ſhe returned, in caſe ſhe ſhould come to know that half of the Town came that day to ſee her; he intended to tell her at her return, if ſhe ſpoke unto him, that he thought ſhe was gone out on foot at the Garden back-door, and that moſt of thoſe who came to ask for her, came ſince ſhe went out to viſit Menaſta.

In the mean time Aglatidas paſſed away many a reſtleſs Minute; for be pleaſed to know, Sir, that we were that Afternoon very timely to Ameſtris, and the Porter told us ſhe was not within; and becauſe we ſaw not her Coach in the Court, we asked him whether any of her friends had borrowed it, or whether ſhe was gone out on Foot? and he anſwered us, that ſhe was gone out at the Garden back-door; Then did we ſeek out all the Neighbourhood for her, but could not hear a word where ſhe was: After we had made many a ſhort viſit, we came to the houſe again, and asked whether ſhe was come home? and the Porter anſwered, No. Then, ſince Aglatidas was to give her an account of a Buſineſs, which ſhe deſired him to do for one of her Friends, unto Ciaxares, he had an extream deſire to meet with her, to let her ſee how ready he was to obey her: So that we went out again, to ſeek for her in all likely places; we ſent alſo unto divers houſes, to enquire, in the name of Menaſta, for a plauſible Excuſe, whether ſhe was there? Whilſt we were going thus from Quarter to Quarter, from Street to Street, and from Door to Door, through all Ecbatan, we met Tharpis and Artemon ſeveral times, who were ſearching as well as we; and I think we met moſt of any Quality in all the Court; but amongſt them all we met with no Megabiſes; ſo that jeſting with Aglatidas, I told him, that Fortune in depriving us of the ſight of his Miſtris, was yet favourable in delivering us from his Rival. Aglatidas bluſhed at this, and laughing as well as I, told me, that it was no laughing matter, if Megabiſes ſhould be all this while with Ameſtris.

But, Sir, after we had the ſecond time viſited all the Quarters of Ecbatan, we reſolved to come unto her Houſe again, and if ſhe were not there, then go and lament with Menaſta: but preſently after we were anſwered, that ſhe was not yet returned; ſtaying ſome twenty or forty paces from the Houſe, we ſaw Ameſtris come out of her Houſe in her Coach, and Megabiſes on Foot, without any Servant following, who croſſing the Street, went into a Houſe oppoſite to the Houſe of Ameſtris. Judg, Sir, what operation this ſight had upon the Heart of Aglatidas: At the firſt he looked upon me, and afterwards turning haſtily to ſee which way Megabiſes went, and which way Ameſtris, he loſt the ſight of both; for the Coach turned into another Street cloſe by, and Megabiſes went into the Houſe I named before. And indeed it was happy that he was out of ſight, for I am perſwaded he had quarrelled with him without any more delay. Now, Artaban, ſaid he unto me, What do you think of this? It is very odd, Sir, ſaid I unto him; yet ſince the like hath happened unto you before, I would adviſe you not to judg upon Appearances. Why, ſaid he unto me, Can I make any doubt of my Misfortune, when I ſee they have denied Ameſtris to be within, both to me and every one elſe, whilſt all that while Megabiſes hath been alone with her? How, Artaban, can you interpret this any waies advantagiouſly for me? When you ſaw Megabiſes, replied I, with Ameſtris in the Garden by the Fountain, and with your own Eyes ſaw him kiſs the Hand of that fair and virtuous Lady, did you not then think that you had as much reaſon to be jealous as now? yet the Event did apparently manifeſt that you wronged her, and that ſhe was moſt innocent and faithful.

I do confeſs it, ſaid he, yet what I now ſee is very conſiderable, and more ſtrange; and I pray you, Artaban, what do you think of it? I cannot tell anſwered I, yet I adviſe you to ſpeak with Ameſtris, and ſee what ſatisfaction ſhe will give, before you precipitately reſolve upon any thing. At the firſt Aglatidas could not reſolve upon that courſe, but all his thoughts were of revenge upon Megabiſes; but I conceiving, by the way they went, that ſhe was gone unto Menaſta, did urge him very importunately to go thither, and ſo we did; but I never in all my life ſaw ſuch an alteration as was in the Face of Aglatidas; and coming into Menaſta's Chamber, where we found much Company, he never looked who he was firſt to ſalute, but obſerving the Eyes of Ameſtris, he ſaw her ſo troubled and reſerved, that he took it for an argument of her Crime. Madam, ſaid he aloud, It is not my Fault that I did not wait upon you before this time of the day; for I have been at your houſe three times ſince dinner: nor was there any negligence in me, ſaid Tharpis, for I have been there as oft as Aglatidas: nor was I much ſhort in my duty ſaid Artemon, for I was there twice. Truly, ſaid Menaſta, I do not know how Ameſtris hath this day diſpoſed of her ſelf; for all that came this day unto me, told me they were at her houſe, and ſought her all over the Town, and could find her no where: Many that were preſent alſo ſaid the ſame. Ameſtris all the while was ſo amazed ſhe knew not what to anſwer, ſince ſhe was all that while at home when they ſought for her: Menaſta, wondring at her ſilence, and never ſuſpecting any hidden myſtery in the matter, preſſed her to anſwer.

Tell us, I beſeech you, ſaid ſhe unto her, what you have been imployed in? Or, if you will not, I ſhall think the Ghoſt of Ottanus hath appeared unto you and commanded you to be retired. Truly (anſwered Ameſtris aloud) I am ſo much amazed at what I hear, that I know not what to ſay, for indeed I was never out of my own Chamber untill I came hither, and Megabiſes (ſaid ſhe and bluſhed) hath been with me all the afternoon. Aglatidas, thinking ſhe ſaid this only becauſe perhaps we might ſee them come out together, could not withhold the expreſſions of ſome unquietneſs in his Looks: But Ameſtris, deſiring to juſtify her ſelf before all the Company; asked all thoſe who ſaid they had been at her Houſe, whom they ſpoke withal; and as ſhe particularly asked Aglatidas, who told her he enquired of the Porter: I confeſs, ſaid ſhe aloud, ſince it is ſo as you tell me, I may be ſuſpected of great Familiarity with Megabiſes: But I can aſſure you, without any Falacy, that whether it was I was in an ill Humour, or he was ſo, I know not, but we found no pleaſant agreeableneſs together. Yet Madam, ſaid Aglatidas, his Viſit continued very long. I thought it ſo, replied ſhe; yet notwithſtanding, ſaid Artemon, the Converſation of thoſe who newly come from travel, uſeth to be very pleaſant: Yes doubtleſs, replied Tharpis, but perhaps Megabiſes did not think it fit to entertain her with diſcourſe of the ſtately Walls of Babylon, or the River of Euphrates; with the Grandure of Artaxates, or ſuch like: However, ſaid ſhe (and interrupted him) I muſt know at my return how this Deſign comes to paſs. After this Aglatidas ſpoke not a word, and as Ameſtris could not chuſe but ask the Eyes of Aglatidas what he thought of this Paſſage, ſo ſhe looked upon him very oft, and the more ſhe did him that Favour, the more did he ſuſpect her of Infidelity. Since it was now very late, the Company was forced to break off, and Tharpis alſo retired, becauſe Ameſtris made it known ſhe would ſup with Menaſta.

Aglatidas would have gone away before he had rendred an account of his Buſineſs, but ſhe making that her Pretence to ſtay him longer than the reſt, Aglatidas, ſaid ſhe unto him, I believe you have ſome Buſineſs with me which concerns my ſelf, and therefore I would ſpeak with you. Madam, ſaid he unto her, I did not think you had been very earneſt to know it, ſince you cauſed ſome to tell me you were not within the ſame day I was to render you an account of it. Do you think (ſaid ſhe unto him, ſeeing none but Menaſta and my ſelf in the Chamber) that it was by any order from me you did not enter? Madam, ſaid he, I had good cauſe to think you ought to be obeyed in your own Houſe. And doubtleſs you believe, ſaid ſhe, that Megabiſes was permitted to enter when every one elſe was denied? ſpeak Aglatidas (ſaid ſhe, ſeeing him ſilent) what do you think of it? I reſpect you ſo much (ſaid he, and ſighed) that I dare not tell you what I think. You tell me enough ſaid ſhe, in telling me no more: but ſince I confeſs that there are Circumſtances and Appearances againſt me, I will be ſo favourable as not to condemn you of any Lightneſs, but will juſtify my ſelf in the preſence of Menaſta and Artaban; but after this Aglatidas, I do expect to be obeyed in all things, without any Exception. And as ſoon as he promiſed an abſolute Obedience, Ameſtris related all the diſcourſe which had paſſed between her and Megabiſes, her Vexations and Anger, to ſee that none came in to relieve her, and her Suſpition that there was ſome trick or other put upon her; ſo that to clear the matter, ſhe ſent for the Porter; when he was come, ſhe asked him, why he told every one that day ſhe was not within, ſince he knew very well ſhe was? Pardon me, Madam, I beſeech you, ſaid he unto her, for the fault which I committed againſt my Will, thinking you to be gone out of the Garden back-Door. But if you had thought ſo, replied ſhe, you would not have let Megabiſes enter. Megabiſes! Madam, (replied he, and ſeemed to wonder) I did not let him enter; if he did come in, it muſt needs be very timely, whilſt I ſtept into the Town about a little Buſineſs, immediately after Dinner, not thinking any would come ſo ſoon; at my return I asked a Boy whether you went out ſince I went, and he told me you were gone out at the back-Door; and certainly he took one of your Women for you; and I do aſſure you, I ſaw none of Megabiſis's his Men at the Gate, for if I had, I ſhould have known he had been there; but ſince I ſaw none, I could not imagine he was entred, ſince he never comes alone. And how came it to paſs (ſaid Amestris to him) that you were from the Gates when I went out? Becauſe I went to the Garden-door, replied he, thinking ſome had knocked: and to tell you the truth, Madam, when I underſtood that you were not gone forth, but had given Orders to make ready your Coach, I was ſo much aſhamed of my Fault, that I durſt not look you in the Face; but I can tell you the Names of all thoſe who came to wait upon you: Then did he begin to number up all that came to ask for her that Day, beginning with Aglatidas and my ſelf, and went on with Tharpis and Artemon: But Ameſtris ſtopping him, was angry that the Anſwers of this Man did not handſomly juſtify her ſelf, and did let him know by her threatning Language, that he was to provide himſelf of another Miſtreſs. When he was gone out, Ameſtris looking upon Aglatidas, did know by his Eyes he was not ſatisfied: I perceive, ſaid ſhe unto him, that the Anſwers of my Porter have not juſtified me in your Opinion. Truly, Madam, replied he, it was not from him I expected the Satisfaction I have need of. Yet it was he who denied you the Gate, replied ſhe, and let Megabiſes enter. I confeſs it, replied Aglatidas; yet if Megabiſes was not preferred unto that Honour by your own Orders, it troubles me much leſs; and to know that, Madam, I muſt appeal unto your own Mouth.

If you will take my word, ſaid ſhe unto him, you ſhall be quickly ſatisfied; for I do proteſt unto you, Aglatidas, I gave no Order at all that Day, either to open the Gates or ſhut them, or denied my ſelf unto any whoſoever, and if I had excepted againſt any, certainly it ſhould not have been your ſelf. Madam, ſaid he unto her, you give me moſt obliging Satisfaction; but when I think of Megabiſes being a whole afternoon with you in private, and ſaw him come out alone preſently after you had taken Coach, I did conclude, Madam, whether I would or no, that you were either not ſincere (if I can ſpeak it without offence) or elſe that your Porter had betrayed you. Men of his Condition are ſuch Block-heads, ſaid Menaſta, that there is nothing to be concluded by their impertinent Words or Deeds: This fellow, replied I, ſeems not to have done this, without ſome Deſign in it: What, Artaban, ſaid Ameſtris to me, are you againſt me alſo? Pardon me Madam (ſaid I unto her) for I think the more I ſuſpect the Porter, the more I juſtify you; yet Aglatidas, ſaid ſhe, I beſeech you tell me what I ſhould do, not only to perſwade you that I never conſented unto the private Conference with Megabiſes, but alſo to make the Town believe it. I know one infallible way, replied Aglatidas, and ſighed; but, Madam, I am afraid you will not take it. It ſhall be a very difficult one then replied ſhe; for I aſſure you I am ſo extreamly vexed, that any ſhould think I conſented Megabiſes ſhould be four Hours together with me in private, as I would do any thing to undeceive them; therefore tell me Aglatidas, how I ſhould juſtify my ſelf, both in your opinion, and in the opinion of all the World. If you will appear perfectly innocent, Madam, ſaid he unto her, you muſt make me happy, and marry me; for I know no greater Teſtimony of your Innocency; therefore Madam, if you pleaſe, I beſeech you reſolve upon this way of Juſtification. But Aglatidas, ſaid ſhe, I very well ſee, that this way would juſtify me to your ſelf, but not to the World. I can aſſure you, Madam, replied he, that your Virtue is ſo generally known, as when they know you are fully reſolved to prefer me before all the reſt of your Lovers, they will never ſuſpect you of any Familiarity with Megabiſes; I muſt confeſs unto you, Madam, that the violent Paſſion of my Soul cannot endure the Torment, to ſee you, and not ſee you, (if it be permitted me to ſay ſo;) for I do not call that a ſeeing you, when I paſs away a whole Afternoon with you amongſt my Enemies; for ſo, Madam, all ſincere Lovers uſe to call their Rivals: Do not think, I beſeech you, I ſay this out of any fantaſtical Jealouſy; No, Madam, it proceeds from pure Affection: and though the Preſence of my Rivals do trouble me much more than any others; yet a Lover in his height of Sincerity cerity cannot enjoy the Converſation of the Party loved, when any ſhares with him: Love, Madam, loves Secrecy; and Thoughts that paſs from one Heart into another, love no Witneſſes: permit me therefore, Madam, I beſeech you, the Happineſs to tell you, that I love you above all Expreſſions, and love not to tell you ſo alone, even Menaſta her ſelf ſhall be preſent.

Since Ottanus did uſe me very ill, ſaid Ameſtris, It becomes me to do more than others: yet ſince there are more Eyes upon me than upon others, I cannot be too circumſpect: therefore Aglatidas, in Conſideration of your good Fortune and Happineſs as well as of my own, it is good to be well aſſured we ſhall be happy together, before we engage our ſelves too far. Ah, Madam, cryed he out, you need not doubt of my good Fortune or your own. However, ſaid ſhe, I cannot give you a direct Anſwer now. Will you then not juſtify your ſelf, replied he? Yes, ſaid ſhe, but I would have you take my Word.

All this while Menaſta and I were talking together, but ſtill overheard what they ſaid: and fearing that Aglatidas and Megabiſes would quarrel, ſhe left me and went to them: Truly Ameſtris, ſaid ſhe, I wonder at you; for do you not reſolve in your Heart to marry Aglatidas? If you do, why do you defer it? would you have him fight with two or three for you? Would you have him kill one, and fly for it, and return in a Diſguiſe? Would you have him find you in the Garden again talking with ſome of your Lovers whom you would baniſh? Would you have him jealous again, and counterfeit a freſh Love to Anatiſa? would you marry another Ottanus, to juſtify your ſelf, and puniſh him? Believe me Ameſtris, if you would avoid all theſe, you muſt marry Aglatidas preſently, and lead a happy Life. Menaſta ſpoke all this with ſuch a pleaſant Importunity, that Ameſtris could not chooſe but laugh: and as for Aglatidas, he thanked her in ſuch a manner, as made it appear he thought himſelf much obliged. For my part, I added my Prayers unto Menaſta's Reaſons, and preſſed Ameſtris ſo far, that ſhe could hardly chooſe but anſwer our Deſires: And when ſhe went about to oppoſe gainſt us, and demand time to conſider : Menaſta counſelled Aglatidas to think that ſhe conſented to the private diſcourſe with Megabiſes. But do what we could, ſhe would have two Days time to conſider, and then to give her poſitive Anſwer. After this Menaſta telling her in a low Voice, ſhe feared a Quarrel with Megabiſes ; Ameſtris did abſolutely command Aglatidas the contrary, and he was forced to promiſe her he would not, provided ſhe gave him a favourable Anſwer.

Thus, Sir, this private Conference which Megabiſes had ſo ſubtily contrived for his own Advantage, was a cauſe moving Ameſtris unto Reſolutions in favour of Aglatidas. After this we retired ; But notwithſtanding all that Ameſtris had ſaid, Aglatidas was very unquiet in his Soul, and what he had ſeen had ſuch an influence upon his Mind, that all the Night I could not move him to ſpeak of any thing elſe. In the mean while Menaſta made Ameſtris to declare openly unto all the World in favour of Aglatidas, knowing then that none durſt be ſo bold as to interrupt his Happineſs, conſidering what favour he was in with Ciaxares. But ſince ſhe had a great deſire to diſcover whether her Porter had told her true, or cozened her, when ſhe was returned home and in her Chamber, ſhe imployed one of her Women, who was very witty and ſubtile, to enquire very narrowly, whether the Porter held any Familiarity with any of Megabiſes Servants. Madam, anſwered ſhe, I know not whether he hold any intelligence with any of his Servants, but I am ſure, that as I returned from the Temple theſe two Mornings, I ſaw Megabiſes talking with him at a Corner of a blind Street; yet ſince I thought that Megabiſes only asked him whether you were at the Temple, or whether you would preſently go Abroad, or ſome ſuch Queſtions, I went on and took no further notice of them.

No ſooner had the Woman told this to Ameſtris, but ſhe immediately ſent for the Porter again, to ask him what Megabiſes ſaid unto him ſuch a Day, ſuch an Hour, and in ſuch a Place ? The Man was ſo ſtartled at this Queſtion, that he trembled, and gave but a very bad Anſwer : So that Ameſtris not giving him ſo much time as to invent a Lie, began to threaten him, and tell him that if he would confeſs the Truth, ſhe would pardon him: Then after many ill Anſwers, which would be too tedious to relate, he confeſſed that Megabiſes ſent one of his Men for him, that he gave him Mony; and indeed told the whole Truth. After this, Ameſtris, fearing ſome future Miſfortune might be occaſioned by Megabiſes, reſolved to marry Aglatidas.

In the mean time Tharpis and Artemon, had their ſhares in Vexations as well as others: The firſt of theſe two had not the Happineſs of complaining to Anatiſa, for ſhe was gone into the Country, yet ſince ſhe was not above fifty Furlongs from Ecbatan, he writ unto her; as for Artemon, as deep in Love with Ameſtris as he was, yet being more wiſe, and ſeeing how ſhe lived with Aglatidas, he deſiſted, and durſt attempt no further Manifeſtations of his Love; but yet, ſince Hope never leaves Lovers till the laſt Gaſp, before he quite excluded the Image of Ameſtris out of his Heart, he would know a little more certainly upon what Terms Aglatidas ſtood with her: So that ſince we two were a kind of Friends together, and knew that I was very much one unto Aglatidas, he came unto me and deſired me to tell him, in general, whether the Heart of Ameſtris was ſo deeply engaged that there was no Hopes at all left for thoſe that loved her? I know very well, ſaid he unto me, you ought not to reveal any ſecret wherewith you are truſted; but however, being your Friend, as I am, I know you will not refuſe to adviſe me, in a buſineſs upon which depends the Miſery or Happineſs of all my Life; give me leave therefore to tell you, that I am extreamly in love with Ameſtris; but for all that, if I were ſure her Heart were engaged unto another, I would endeavour to recal my own; therefore I beſeech you, tell me what is my beſt way to do. Artemon ſpoke this with ſo much Ingenuity, that I thought my ſelf obliged to counſel him ſincerely, and to do good Service unto three at once: To Ameſtris, in delivering her from Artemon's Importunity: To Aglatidas, in taking a Rival off his Hand: And to Artemon, in curing him of a Paſſion which would never be accepted:

cepted. Yet ſince there is no truſting the Sincerity of a Lover, I acquainted him with nothing of what I knew concerning Aglatidas and Ameſtris, but I adviſed him to try whether he could poſſibly quit his Affection, for I knew Ameſtris would never accept of it; I coloured my Counſel with other Reaſons; I told him, that ſince Megabiſes and Aglatidas, who were in great favour with Ciaxares, did pretend unto her, there was no Hopes for him againſt ſuch Rivals, for they had been both in Love with her before ſhe married Ottanus, and that in all likelihood, if ever ſhe married again, ſhe would chuſe one of them two: However, his beſt way would be to ſtay and ſee what time would produce. Artemon gave me thanks for my Advice, though it went againſt the Heart of a Lover. In the mean while Ameſtris, who had ſent for Menaſta, to diſcover unto her what ſhe knew concerning the trick which Megabiſes put upon her, reſolved now to defer it no longer, but to declare openly for Aglatidas, and to tell him as much; But Ameſtris conceived, that ſince Megabiſes had ever expreſſed much paſſionate Affection to her, it would not be amiſs if Menaſta ſpoke unto him, and endeavoured to prevent any quarrel; yet there was no ſuch need; for as ſoon as Aglatidas did ask the King's Permiſſion to marry Ameſtris, Ciaxares knowing the Pretentions of Megabiſes to her, did abſolutely command him, not to hinder the good Fortune of Aglatidas; ſo that he durſt not oppoſe it. Then ſince the buſineſs made a great noiſe, Artemon was glad he took my Counſel, and Tharpis ſeeing Megabiſes durſt not complain againſt the Happineſs of his Rival, out of Obedience to the King, he was forced to follow his Example, and hide his Sorrows.

Thus, Sir, you ſee Aglatidas as happy as he could deſire; for Ameſtris had made the Plot of Megabiſes ſo apparent unto him, that not the leaſt Suſpicion remained in his Mind. All the Kindred and Friends of Ameſtris approved of her choice, and all thoſe that loved Aglatidas were glad of it; not a Rival durſt appear: Megabiſes ſhunned his Rival and his Miſtreſs both: Artemon complained unto none but me, and ſweetned his Sorrows by relating unto me the Virtues of Ameſtris whilſt Ottanus lived: And Tharpis went into the Country to Anatiſa, who was vexed in ſo high a meaſure, that it may be termed Rage rather than Sorrow or Revenge. In the mean while nothing hindred Aglatidas from his Happineſs, and he had no other torment but Impatience, which never leaves Lovers until all be compleated: All the Court and Town rejoyced at this intended Marriage; for the Solemnity of which, a thouſand publick Diverſions were preparing. The Day was ſet down by the King himſelf, who would honour this Feaſt with his Preſence: The Invention of all the Ladies in Court and Town were upon the rack for new Dreſſes againſt that Day. Ameſtris and Aglatidas, diſcourſing together with more freedom than before, did ſo infuſe their Souls into each other, that their Loves increaſed, and by conſequence their Happineſs, it being certain that the Felicity of Lovers do not leſs conſiſt in the reciprocal Opinion of each others Merits, than that of their Paſſion.

This being the ſtate of Things, and there being but three Days until the Marriage, a Chance happened which did extreamly trouble the Joys of Aglatidas and Ameſtris. I think I already told you that Anatiſa was fifty Furlongs from Ecbatan, and that Tharpis went unto her. As they were one day walking together near the way which goes to Ecbatan, and conſulting which way they might trouble the felicity of Aglatidas and Ameſtris, they ſpied a Man on Horſeback, who left the high-way and came towards them. Anatiſa, who was not in any Humour to receive Viſits, would have avoided him; yet imagining that perhaps it was one who came to ſee her Aunt, with whom ſhe dwelt, ſhe continued her walk as if ſhe took no notice of him who was coming towards them: But a Woman which waited upon her, knowing him to be her Brother that waited upon Ottanus, ſhe cried out, and went with open Arms to embrace him, for he was lighted from his Horſe, and gave him unto a Man which waited on him. Anatiſa, at the Cry of her Woman, who thought her Brother was dead, looked upon him and knew him to be Dinocrates, who had done her much ſervice in augmenting the Jealouſy of Ottanus, and perſecuting Ameſtris: So that in Conſideration of theſe offices, ſhe talked with him, and asked how he loſt his Maſter, and why it was ſo long before he returned? Then he made a Relation, how Ottanus periſhed under the Mountains of Artaxates, unto which the King of Armenia retreated; how he ſaw his Body in the Torrent ſink to the bottom of the Water, and how he himſelf fell ſick in a little Town; how afterwards he had got him another Maſter, but not liking his Service, he quitted it and returned; and ſince he was to paſs ſo near a place where he thought ſhe might be, he came thither. But Dinocrates, ſaid ſhe to him, tell me, I pray you, whether Ottanus when he died did hate Aglatidas. He hated him ſo much, anſwered he, that I believe it was the cauſe of his Death; for he would not have engaged himſelf ſo far amongſt the Enemies, but in Hopes to meet with him, and to kill him: for my part, ſaid he, ſince the Fight was in the Night, I cannot tell how the Misfortune happened, but I ſaw him dead with theſe Eyes, and ſo did many others.

Whilſt he was ſpeaking thus unto her, ſhe looked upon the Hilt of his Sword, which was much too rich and magnificent for a Man of his Quality to wear, and conſidering upon it, ſhe knew it to be the Sword of Aglatidas. Thoſe who do not know the power of Love, would wonder Anatiſa ſhould take any notice of this Sword; but for my part I think it not ſtrange at all; for I am perſwaded that every thing which belongs unto the Party loved will never be out of Memory. Moreover, this Hilt was ſo very rich and extraordinary, that it was the more remarkable, and ſhe had ſeen it a thouſand times before. Anatiſa no ſooner knew it, but ſhe asked who gave it unto him: And he told her, that a few Days after the Death of his Maſter, as he was in Artaxates, he bought it of a Perſian Souldier, who told him he pulled it out of the Body of a dead Armenian at the bottom of the Mountains where they fought. Anatiſa, after this knew that Aglatidas had left his Sword (as ſometimes it may happen) in the Body of him he killed. And ſaying no more, ſhe left Dinocrates with his Siſter, and continued her walk with Tharpis; but ſo taken up with her own Thoughts, that he could not chooſe but ask her, why her Mind was more muſing than ordinary? I am ſtudying, ſaid ſhe unto him, how to make you happy if I can, or at the leaſt to diſturb the Felicity of your Rival. He ſtands upon too ſure Terms, replied Tharpis, for me ever to hope for it. Not ſo ſure, ſaid Anatiſa, but if Dinocrates will be as faithful unto me as heretofore he hath been, I ſhall bring it eaſily to paſs. Tharpis was ſo impatient to know her Deſign, that he aſſured her he would ſuborn him though with half his Eſtate rather than fail; ſo that ſhe told him her Plot, and he did ſo well approve of it, that he was ready to thank her upon his Knees, for finding out ſo rare an Invention: After this, without any delay, Anatiſa called Dinocrates, and told him ſhe would make him a Fortune if he would do as ſhe deſired; Tharpis alſo aſſured him of a very rich Preſent.

Dinocrates was naturally apt enough for ſuch Deſignes, and therefore promiſed to obey them, whatſoever it was they would command: Then did they tell him their Deſires, after they had well agreed upon the buſineſs, and given Dinocrates full Inſtructions what to do and ſay; they found it not expedient it ſhould be known he had ſeen them; ſo that after they had expreſly charged his Siſter to conceal his return from every one, they ſent him to lodge in the Town cloſe by, and the next Morning meeting in the ſame place, Tharpis was as good as his word, and charmed him with a very conſiderable Gift, after which ſhe gave him his laſt Inſtructions and ſent him away, charging him to be ſure that he did not go unto Ameſtris until there was much Company with her.

One afternoon then, juſt three Days before the intended Marriage, he went unto her whilſt Aglatidas was with the King, but he found Menaſta and four other Ladies with her, who were of kin to Ottanus, and becauſe they loved her, they came upon a Viſit; Dinocrates watching his Opportunity, went into the Chamber of Ameſtris: As ſoon as ſhe ſaw him enter, ſhe bluſhed, and the very ſight of him brought freſh into her Memory the Perſecutions of Ottanus, and all the ill Offices which he had done her; yet thinking it more generous and handſom to diſſemble her Reſentments againſt Dinocrates, and to look upon him as one whom her Husband loved, ſhe recollected her ſelf, and ſpeaking very mildly unto him; How comes it to paſs Dinocrates, ſaid ſhe, that it is ſo long after your Maſter's Death, before you return? Madam, replied he, and ſighed, I was ſo troubled at the Accident, that I fell ſick for Sorrow, but as ſoon as I recovered I returned, Madam, to give you an account of my Maſter's Miſfortune: I ſaw you, ſaid I unto him, when you ſought for his Corps, and found it in the midſt of the Torrent: It is very true, Sir, replied he, and you were a Witneſs of part of my Sorrows that I could not get it out of the Water: Were you in the fight when he was killed? ſaid Ameſtris: Yes, Madam, replied he, and I touched Aglatidas, whom I knew by his Voice when he ran his Sword through the Body of my Maſter and could not draw it out again: Your Maſter (replied I, extreamly aſtoniſhed, but leſs than Ameſtris) was he killed by Aglatidas? think well what you ſay Dinocrates, for how could you know him in the tumult of the Fight, when there was no light but Stars? I told you, Sir, before, anſwered Dinocrates undauntedly, that I knew him by his Voice; for when he fell upon my Maſter, who was then in the Head of a Party, he ſpoke ſomething unto the Men which followed him by way of Encouragement: So that my Maſter, knowing the Voice of Aglatidas better than I did, turned towards me and ſaid; Ha Dinocrates, yonder is Aglatidas whom I look for, do not forſake me: I cannot directly ſay that Aglatidas knew my Maſter's Voice; but I am ſure they charged one another very fiercely, and Aglatidas, more happy than Ottanus, ran his Sword to the Hilts through his Body, who immediately falling, Aglatidas could not draw out his Sword again; then I ſeeing my Maſter fall, knew not whether I ſhould fall upon his Murtherer, or endeavour to recover him from the Feet of thoſe who were fighting; but the Tumult of the Combat removing a little from that place, I took up the Body of my Maſter, to ſee if he had any Life; I pulled the Sword out of his Body by little and little, and finding no Breath nor Life, I began to defend my ſelf; Then Aglatidas having got another Sword, and I knowing him better than I did before, reſolved to revenge the Death of my Maſter; but our Party was grown ſo weak, that we were forced to fly, and I could not return to look for the Corps of my Maſter until ſuch time as a Truce was made, and then when I had the liberty to look for him, I could not find him in the place where I left him, but immediately after I ſaw him in the midſt of a violent Torrent, as Artaban ſaith, not knowing who it was that caſt him in. All the time of this diſcourſe Ameſtris was infinitely perplexed, and durſt not look up: The Ladies which were preſent, and underſtood the ſtate of things, were very ſorry to hear this Relation: for my part, my choller was ſo high, that I could hardly refrain interrupting Dinocrates, who ſeeming to be altogether ignorant of any intended Marriage between Ameſtris and Aglatidas, did peremptorily juſtify that it was he who killed Ottanes, and that the Sword which he drew out of his Body, was the Sword of Aglatidas, for it was a Sword which was very Remarkable, and he had ſeen him wear it ſeveral times: Then Dinocrates, ſeeming as if he were ingenious, I will not ſay (ſaid he) that for this Aglatidas is in any fault at all; for in War none whoſoever of the Enemies Party are to be ſpared. But where is this Sword? replied I; Sir (anſwered he with Tears almoſt in his Eyes) I dare not ſhew it in the preſence of my Lady, for I cannot endure to look upon it my ſelf, nor know I upon what Conſiderations I have kept it.

As he was ſaying ſo, Aglatidas, who yet knew not that Dinocrates was returned, came into the Chamber of Ameſtris with Eyes as full of Joy, as if nothing could hinder his Happineſs; but perceiving an extream Sadneſs ſit upon the Soul of Ameſtris, ſeeing Dinocrates there, and obſerving much Aſtoniſhment in me and all the Ladies preſent, he ſtood ſtill, and bethought himſelf what Misfortune could poſſibly happen. Aglatidas (ſaid I unto him) come and juſtify your ſelf; for Dinocrates here, ſays you killed Ottanus that ſame Night when we fought at the bottom of the Artaxaten Mountains. Who I? (replied Aglatidas in a ſtrange Amazement) how can that be, ſince the illuſtrious Cyrus told me he heard a cry that Ottanus was dead, in a place where I was not? And I my ſelf heard Ottanus named far off the place where we fought. Sir (replied Dinocrates moſt impudently) I am very ſorry that I have uttered a truth which I ſee doth much trouble you; yet, as I ſaid before, when any one is killed in Wars, the Perſon who killed him is never to be blamed. But, Sir (ſaid one that was Couſin to Ottanus, and thought to juſtify Aglatidas by the queſtion which ſhe asked) Did you loſe your Sword in that fight? Yes, Madam, anſwered he; for I could not pull it out of the Body of an Armenian, but was conſtrained to leave it in him, and ſnatched another by good Fortune, out of the Hands of another Armenian. Ah Aglatidas, ſaid Ameſtris, what do you tell me? Since he could not imagine why Ameſtris ſhould ſpeak ſo, or why the other Lady ſhould ſpeak of his Sword, nor how they ſhould come to know he had loſt it; he turned towards me, and I told him that Dinocrates affirmed he had the Sword, and that he drew it out of his Maſter's Body. The Sword, ſaid Aglatidas, is ſo knowable, that none can miſtake it for another, and I believe that every one of my Friends and Acquaintance knows it: but where is it, added he? Sir, replied Dinocrates, if it be your Pleaſure I ſhould ſend for it, I will let you ſee it in the outer Chamber. Then Aglatidas preſſing him unto it, Dinocrates went out: During which time he looked upon Ameſtris, who had no diſpoſition to look upon him: Madam, ſaid he unto her, I ſee very well, that if Dinocrates ſhew me my Sword, and affirm he pulled the ſame out of his Maſter's Body, I cannot make it clear that I did not kill Ottanus, ſince I muſt ingenuouſly confeſs, that I left it in the Body of a Man who was in the ſame Party Ottanus was; yet for all that, Madam, I muſt needs believe the Relation of Dinocrates to be falſe, ſince he hath ever been your Enemy in all things; he is Brother unto a Woman who waits upon Anatiſa, and therefore what ever proceeds from the Teſtimony of his Tongue ought to be ſuſpected. But Aglatidas, ſaid Ameſtris, I find by your own Confeſſion, that you left your Sword in a dead Man; Dinocrates ſays that Man was Ottanus; and if once he ſhew you your own Sword, you can then no way contradict him, but by ſaying, that you did not know it was Ottanus whom you killed: and that's too little, abundance too little againſt ſo ſtrong and circumſtantial a Depoſition as this; therefore I conjure you to ſee me no more, until you can better clear your ſelf. Oh, Madam, cried he out, what fatal Requeſt is this!

As Ameſtris was ready to reply, one came in and told us, that Dinocrates was in the outer Room, and had brought the Sword: Aglatidas therefore went out, and ſo did all the Ladies except Menaſta, who ſtayed with Ameſtris. As ſoon as this Sword was ſhewed, which we knew well enough, Aglatidas looked ſternly upon Dinocrates, and not knowing what to ſay in his own Juſtification, he ſearched in his Eyes to ſee if he could know by them whether he was innocent or culpable: But Dinocrates did ſo ſubtily diſſemble the matter, that it was not poſſible to diſcern his Malice. Aglatidas was ſo full of Fury in his Looks, that ſometimes I thought he would have killed Dinocrates; and had he not imagined that he ſhould have appeared more criminal by the Act, I do believe he would have fallen upon him: But at the laſt, not knowing what to ſay, nor being able to aſcertain himſelf that he had not killed Ottanus, he went towards the Chamber of Ameſtris, with Intentions to caſt himſelf at her Feet, though he knew not well what to ſay: But Menaſta met him with abſolute Commands from Ameſtris that he ſhould not enter, and that he ſhould be ſo reſpective of her as never to ſee her until he could make his Innocence better appear. Aglatidas could hardly yield Obedience, but Menaſta uſed ſuch Arguments as perſwaded him. Then we went out both he and I, after we had examined Dinocrates by a hundred croſs Queſtions, in hopes he would contradict himſelf; but he was ſo ſubtile in all his Anſwers, and in the leaſt Circumſtances, that the moſt exact Judges would have been fully ſatisfied with them, and condemned Aglatidas. After we were gone out, the Ladies ſtayed a while with Ameſtris, and afterwards went out all except Menaſta, who ſtayed with her, as I did with Aglatidas. Dinocrates went down alſo, and told all the Story unto the Servants of the Houſe, to the end the noiſe of it might be the lowder; but he might have ſaved that labour, for within four Hours after he had ſpoken with Ameſtris, nothing elſe but the oddneſs of this Accident was diſcourſed of in all Ecbatan.

In the mean time, I knew from Menaſta that ſhe had no ſooner been in private with Ameſtris, but that fair and wiſe Lady, looking upon her with Eyes ſo full of Melancholy, as plainly ſpoke the trouble of her Soul; Truly ſaid ſhe unto Menaſta, it muſt needs be acknowledged that my Fate is lamentable, and that I was too blame in ever hoping for any Quietneſs, after ſo long and ſo cruel a Torment; but I am at this day arrived unto ſuch a height, that Hope can never again elevate my Heart, and therefore can never augment my Torment ſince I ſhall endure no more Miſeries than I looked for. I muſt needs confeſs (ſaid Menaſta to her) that the Accident is very ſtrange; but yet ſince Aglatidas doth verily believe that he did not kill Ottanus, and ſince there is only the relation of Dinocrates againſt him; why ſhould you make your ſelf miſerable all the Days of your Life by any ſuch tormenting Thoughts? Becauſe replied ſhe, I can never have any Contentment of Mind without Horror, and I will never be accuſed for doing any thing againſt Decency and Virtue. As ſoon as ſhe had thus expreſſed her ſelf, Dinocrates came into her Chamber, who apprehending as he ſeemed that he ſhould incur the hatred of Ameſtris and Aglatidas; Madam, ſaid he unto her, I moſt humbly beg your Pardon for the Fault which I have ignorantly committed, for ſince I came directly to your Chamber, before I had ſpoken with any, I did not know of the Deſigns betwixt you and Aglatidas, for if I had, queſtionleſs I ſhould have concealed ſome part of that truth which I have uttered: But perhaps Aglatidas killed my Maſter, and knew it not; or if it be your Pleaſure, Madam, I ſhall contradict what I have already ſaid, and never ſhew the Sword unto any, to the end it may not be known. Dinocrates ſpoke this with ſo much counterfeit Ingenuity, that though Ameſtris had herefore ſeen a hundred Demonſtrations of his Malice, yet ſhe was deceived, and thought that now certainly he ſpoke ſincerely; yet ſhe would not accept of his offer, but told him that though none upon Earth knew of the buſineſs but her ſelf, yet ſhe would do what became her. After this ſhe diſmiſſed him, and aſſured him ſhe would deſire Aglatidas not to be revenged on him, for being the cauſe of his Miſfortune. Do you then intend never to ſee him again (ſaid Menaſta after Dinocrates was gone?) There is no queſtion to be made of it (anſwered ſhe;) for how can my reaſon permit me to ſee the Man that hath killed my Husband? But, Madam, ſaid Menaſta, he never intended it, nor can I believe he killed him. That is not ſufficient, anſwered Ameſtris; for though I were moſt certain, he did never intend it, yet all's one, I would do the ſame only becauſe the World believes it, and will ſuſpect I knew of it; Not that I can accuſe Aglatidas for killing him; but yet for all that, ſince it is known he died by his Hand, there needs no more to oblige me never to ſee him again, nor to render my ſelf the moſt miſerable Perſon in the World. Whilſt Menaſta was talking thus to Ameſtris, I was no leſs buſy in comforting Aglatidas, who could not chuſe but admire how the Fates did interrupt his Happineſs; for, ſaid he, how can I poſſibly juſtify my ſelf, ſince I am not certain whether Denocrates ſpeak true or falſe? I am moſt certain that I knew him not to be Ottanus, and that I heard him named far off me; but yet for all that, I know the Sword which they ſhew me is mine, and that I could not draw it out of the Body of an Enemy which fell dead at my Feet, and it might be Ottanus, ſince he was in the Fight. But, ſaid I unto him, why did you not diſclaim your Sword? for I am perſwaded that Love does admit of ſome handſome innocent Lies, which do no hurt unto any. I ſhould rather prejudice than juſtify my ſelf, ſaid Aglatidas, if I ſhould have diſowned the Sword, ſince all Men of any Quality in the Court do know it: And Megabiſes amongſt the reſt could have known it to be a lie, for he hath ſeen it a hundred times; ſo that Ameſtris might well have ſuſpected that I knew him to be Ottanus when I killed him: neither do I think it generous to become happy by lying. But I do ſo plainly ſee the Gods intend my ruin, that I verily believe I cannot better obſerve their Wills than by deſtroying my ſelf; yet firſt I am reſolved to ſee Ameſtris, and therefore I conjure you to go unto Menaſta, and procure her to obtain this favour for me; for truly I cannot conceive it juſt to condemn me before ſhe hear my Reaſons. Then did I go accordingly to do him this Service; but Menaſta told me ſhe thought it would be no eaſy matter to obtain, yet ſhe would do what ſhe could. In the mean time Anatiſa, to take the fuller Joy in her Plot, returned to Ecbatan, and divulged that Aglatidas knew well enough when he killed Ottanus, and that Ameſtris, as innocent as ſhe made her ſelf, knew it alſo. This laſt Report found credit but with very few; Yet ſince Ameſtris was very inquiſitive of what the Town talked, and hearing of all the Impoſtures, ſhe did ſo confirm her ſelf in her Reſolutions, never to marry Aglatidas, or ſee him again, that Menaſta could not obtain leave for him to come and plead his Reaſons; So that there was a Neceſſity in deceiving her, and to ſee her, whether ſhe did conſent unto it or no; not that ſhe did not all this while love him with abundance of Tenderneſs, but it was the Conſideration of her Honour that was predominate in her Soul. Whilſt Aglatidas and Ameſtris were thus miſerable, Anatiſa and Tharpis rejoyced, Artemon and Megabiſes were glad; and to drive the Nail unto the bottom of the Plot, Anatiſa did cauſe Reports to be blown in the Ears of Ameſtris, that the World did infinitely commend her Reſolution of never marrying Aglatidas, or ſeeing him again, ſo that ſhe gave ſuch reſolute Anſwers unto Menaſta, that there was no hopes of obtaining any thing for poor Aglatidas.

Three or four Days paſſed on in this manner; but at the laſt Mnaſta, feigning her ſelf to be ſick, purpoſely that Ameſtris might come to viſit her; her Plot took effect, and Aglatidas, with my ſelf, knowing it, went thither: Mnaſta gave Orders that none ſhould enter except us: as for Ameſtris, though her Coach ſtood at the Door, yet every one, knowing the great Familiarity between them, were not at all offended that ſhe ſhould enter and none elſe. When we came into the Chamber, Ameſtris was ſitting upon Mnaſta's Bed, ſo that Aglatidas was upon his Knees before her, ere ever ſhe knew he was entered. Madam, ſaid he unto her, and would not let her riſe, I beſeech you give me leave to preſent you with my Reaſons, before you ſhall procede to Judgment, leſt you ſhould be Guilty of ſome Injuſtice. Ameſtris, without anſwering Aglatidas, looked upon Mnaſta, as if ſhe accuſed her for deceiving her, and indeed had gone out, if Mnaſta had not held her by the Gown. Alas Mnaſta, ſaid ſhe, what will the World think of me, if it be known I permit Aglatidas to ſee me? Alas, Madam, replied I, what ſhall we ſay of you, if you will not ſo much as hear the Complaints of a Man you have made moſt miſerable? If he could ſay any thing which could juſtify himſelf, replied ſhe, I ſhould hear him with abundance of Delight, but ſince he cannot, why ſhould you deſire me to lay ſuch a ſtain upon my Reputation, as nothing can poſſibly efface? I know not, Madam, what Juſtice there is in crediting the Relation of a Man who heretofore has told a thouſand Lies againſt you. I do confeſs his Tale is told handſomly, and confirmed with ſtrong Conjectures; but for all that, Madam, I do aſſure you with all poſſible Sincerity, and do conjure you by all the Gods whom we adore to believe it, that I did never intend to kill Ottanus, nor did ſo much as know whether he was in the fight or no: And I do alſo moſt ſeriouſly proteſt, that though I did always hate him, yet if I had known him amongſt mine Enemies, I ſhould for the Love of you have ſhunned meeting with him; therefore, Madam, though it be true that I did kill Ottanus, as I cannot believe I did, yet was not the act to be imputed unto me as a Crime, ſince I knew him not; yet upon the bare Depoſition of one of your grand Perſecutors, who hath accuſed me for killing a moſt extream Tyrant in the Wars, you, Madam, will make me the moſt miſerable Man upon Earth, and you will be ſo highly ſevere againſt me as not to hear my Complaints. I conjure you, Madam, in the Name of the Gods not to condemn me ſo ſlightly, or at the leaſt not to condemn me ſo ſoon. I wiſh to the Gods whom you invoke, ſaid Ameſtris, that I could never condemn you, but that your Innocence might appear as clear as the Day; but Aglatidas it cannot, for truly to ſpeak ſincerely unto you, although I were moſt certain that all Diaſcrates ſays were falſe, yet were I not able to undeceive the World, and therefore I muſt never marry you. Your Amity, replied Aglatidas, were built upon a weak Baſis if it were not able to withſtand ſuch a Conſideration as this; for be pleaſed to know, Madam, that true Virtue is not built upon the Opinion of others; but when one hath that ſecret Teſtimony of a clear Conſcience on their ſide, it is Satisfaction ſufficient, and one never need to make ones ſelf miſerable for the Satisfaction of others. But, Madam, ſaid he and ſighed, I am afraid you are not ſenſible of my ruin.

Yes Aglatidas, replied Ameſtris, do not deceive your ſelf, for I have ſo high an eſteem of you, and if I durſt ſay it, ſo great an Affection, that I cannot think you Guilty of any Crime. I do believe all you ſay, and conſequently do think, that if you killed Ottanus, it was ignorantly; yet for all that, if I ſhould marry you, the cenſorious World would perhaps be apt to ſay, that you did it by my Appointment: So that this thought doth ſo deeply wound my Imagination and my Honour, that I muſt uſe all Expedients to make my very Enemies think me innocent; and in order to that, Aglatidas, I muſt not only refuſe to marry you, but alſo ever to ſee you again; and if you have any Power over your own Soul, you will find out ſome handſom Pretence to depart from Ecbatan; yet for your comfort I do aſſure you, becauſe I think I may do it without a Crime, that I think it an eaſier matter for me to die than part with you. I do moſt heartily beſeech you, Madam (ſaid Aglatidas with moſt ſorrowful Eyes) either be all Severity, or all Sweetneſs; either content your ſelf with the innocency of my Heart, and let me enjoy yours, or elſe expreſs ſo many ſigns of Scorn and Inhumanity, that I may die with Sorrow at your Feet: for what delight can you take, Madam, in prolonging my Life by giving me ſuch obliging Language, and to augment my Miſery? How do you think it poſſible I can ſhake Hands with Death, as long as I think the divine Ameſtris loves me? And how do you think I can endure my Life, when I certainly ſee ſhe ſhall never be mine? and when as I am in ſome Fears (if I durſt ſay it) ſome other hereafter ſhall enjoy her? Never fear this laſt, replied Ameſtris, but on the contrary, be certainly perſwaded, that the Heart which I had given you ſhall never be in the power of any other.

Your Expreſſions are moſt obliging, replied Aglatidas; but, Madam, the Miſeries which I ſuffer are ſo great, that I cannot handſomly reſent that Joy which thoſe advantagious Words might give me; for I ſee it is your Pleaſure I ſhould never hope for any thing either from tedious time, or your divine Affection, or my moſt loyal Fidelity: whoſoever ſhould have told me, when Ottanus lived, that I ſhould have been more miſerable after his Death, I could not have believed him; and yet there is no compariſon between then and now: Ottanus in his Grave doth more cruelly torment me than he did alive: Yes, Madam, I do moſt ingenuouſly confeſs, that without ever any contrivance of his Death when I went from you, I had ſome Hopes that it was not impoſſible I might overlive him: But the Reaſon by which you now ruin me and all my Hopes, is a perpetual Reaſon, and will laſt for ever, unleſs the Gods will work Miracles, and make my Innocency viſible to the World; ſo that I ſee no other end of my Miſeries but Death: Do not then hinder me of my only Remedy by giving me any ſmooth and unprofitable Language, which perhaps are the bare Effects of your Pitty, and proceed not from any ſuch Affection as you promiſed me. Whilſt Aglatidas was thus in diſcourſe with Ameſtris, I perceived in both their Faces ſuch an extraordinary ſadneſs, that I never in my Life ſaw the like: Ameſtris could hardly ſpeak, becauſe ſhe thought all her obliging language a Crime; yet was her ſilence ſo eloquent and ſignificative, that Aglatidas could not make any doubt but his dear Ameſtris did moſt tenderly love him; yet making ſome ſcruple at the length of this ſad Conference, ſhe would needs go away: But Aglatidas holding her, I moſt earneſtly beſeech you, Madam, ſaid he unto her, to tell me preciſely what I muſt do. I would have you live, replied ſhe, but that you live far off from me. O Madam, ſaid he, I beſeech you do not command me things impoſſible; or at the leaſt ſo difficult, that Death is much more ſweet and eaſy than obedience to them. But I require more from you, replied ſhe, for I would never have you ſend me any Letters, nor expect any from me. This is much, Madam, replied Aglatidas, and much too much; nor know I how to yield obedience, unleſs I were able to forget you, and leave loving you. On the contrary, ſaid ſhe, I am ſo perfectly perſwaded of your Innocency, that I make no ſcruple to deſire that you will love me as long as you live. In the mean time, Aglatidas, let me be gone; for when I think how all the Town believes you killed Ottanus, and ſhould know I permit you to be thus at my Feet, I bluſh for ſhame, that I ſhould thus long ſuffer it. But, Madam, ſaid Aglatidas, do you not conſider, that by baniſhing me from you, I leave Megabiſes, Artemon and Tharpis with you? It is very true, replied ſhe, you do ſo: but ſince I am not able to baniſh you out of my Heart, you need not envy them at all. But, Madam, ſaid Aglatidas, will you ever endeavour to baniſh me out of your Heart? I ought to do ſo at the leaſt, replied ſhe; and if I do not attempt it, it is becauſe I know I ſhould loſe my labour. After theſe obliging words, Ameſtris roſe up, as being aſhamed for pronouncing them; and Aglatidas ſeeing ſhe was fully reſolved to go away if he did not, he riſe up alſo, and looking upon her Eyes ſo full of exceſſive Sorrow; Madam, ſaid he, and breathed a profound Sigh, I had rather I ſhould leave you than you ſhould leave me, for perhaps Menaſta will plead for me when I am gone. I do promiſe you, I will, (ſaid that faithful Kinſwoman.) And I do abſolutely forbid you, ſaid Ameſtris, unleſs you have a mind to double my Sorrows. But, Madam (ſaid Aglatidas) is it poſſible my ruin ſhould ſo much trouble you? muſt I periſh for ever? and muſt this be the laſt time that ever I muſt ſee you? No, no, Madam, I cannot imagine it; queſtionleſs you will permit me to return again, and to ſee you: for though I would yield obedience unto ſuch Commands, yet I ſenſibly ſee I am not able: Indeed, Madam, I muſt needs return, whether I will or no, or whether you will or no; and though I ſee nothing but the top of that Palace where you dwell, I ſhall come and wander over the tops of thoſe Mountains beyond Orontes to receive that delight. Aglatidas expreſſed himſelf ſo cordially, and with ſo many Raptures of real Love, that Ameſtris was extreamly moved: ſo that not being able to retain her Tears, ſhe pulled down her Hood, and making a ſilent ſign with her Hand that he ſhould go away, he took her Hand, and intended to kiſs it, but ſhe haſtily pulled it back, as if the Hand of Aglatidas, who was (though wrongfully) accuſed of murther, ought not to touch hers: My Heart is ſo purely innocent, Madam, ſaid he, that I did not think my Hand could prophane yours; yet ſince you think it ſo, permit me at the leaſt I beſeech you to kiſs your Garment; and then he ſtooped with Intention to do ſo, but Ameſtris putting forth her Hand to forbid him, and Aglatidas ſeeing her Hand ſo near his Mouth could not chuſe but kiſs it, ſhe not being able to prevent him, though by her Face ſhe ſeemed very angry at it. After they were riſen up, Is it then your poſitive Pleaſure, Madam, ſaid he unto her, that I muſt depart? I wiſh you might never depart from Ecbatana, anſwered ſhe; but ſince the Fates will not handſomly permit it, I would ——— Ameſtris ſtopt at theſe Words; and not being able to ſpeak any more, ſhe made a ſecond ſign with her Hand, that he ſhould go away; and ſo he did, but with ſo much Sorrow in his Face, as a ſadder ſight could not be ſeen. Ameſtris was no leſs grieved than he; and, as I after underſtood from Menaſta, he was no ſooner gone, but ſhe threw her ſelf upon her Bed, and watered it with a flood of Tears, which ſhe reſtrained as long as we were preſent.

After much diſcourſe in Commendations of Aglatidas, Ameſtris deſired Menaſta to go with her into the Country, ſince ſhe was not able to hide her Sorrows for the loſs of Aglatidas; and without any more delay, it was reſolved upon to go the next Morning: Menaſta went to Aglatidas from Ameſtris, and charged him not to follow; and Ameſtris was no ſooner gone, but Menaſta writ a Letter, which did ſo fully charge him to obey Ameſtris, that if Aglatidas had leſs Love or Reaſon than he had, he would have punctually obeyed her. In the mean time ſeeing he was not able to alter the Reſolutions of her, who only was able to make him happy, and ſince he was not able to endure the World, he reſolved upon a departure; and preſently addreſſed himſelf unto Ciaxares, and importuned him to ſend him unto you, Sir, and he obtained his deſire. Before his departure he was full of many ſtrange Deſigns: for ſometimes he thought of killing himſelf; other times again of fighting with Megabiſes, Artemon, Tharpis, or any Pretender to Ameſtris: but I was ſo oppoſite unto all theſe fatal Reſolutions, that I perſwaded him to depart, and let all theſe violent Reſolutions alone: ſometimes I employed your Name, Sir, telling him it was more honourable to die in your Service, than any other way. But, Sir, though Aglatidas went out of Ecbatan at a quite contrary Gate to that which goes unto the place where Ameſtris was, and intending fully to obey her, yet for his Heart he could not; and he was no ſooner got about fifty Furlongs from Ecbatan, but ſending all his Men ſome two days Journey from Ecbatan, he went with one Servant only to the place where Ameſtris was: In the mean while his departure was very welcome news to Megabiſes, to Tharpis, and to Artemon: It was very pleaſant alſo unto Anatiſa, but not ſo much as to the reſt; for her Deſign was only to break off the Marriage, but not to exile Aglatidas; yet her Revenge upon a Rival was very ſweet, and ſhe was very well pleaſed with the fruits of her Project: Dinocrates alſo enjoyed the fruit of thoſe Preſents which Tharpis conferred upon him, and was wondrous well contented.

But, Sir, to return to Aglatidas, he went ſtraight unto Ameſtris to bid his laſt adieu: She was ſo amazed and infinitely angry at him, that Menaſta aſſured me, he was ready to take horſe again, before he had ſpoke four Words; yet by the Rhetorick of ſome pithy Perſwaſions, he obtained the liberty of an hours Conference, during all which time he could not alter one jot of her Reſolutions: This laſt parting went nearer the Heart than the other, and both of them were in a moſt lamentable Condition: When Aglatidas was gone, Ameſtris could talk of nothing but his Misfortune; and ſhe repeated all the paſſages of his Life, watering his Memory with abundance of Tears, which trickled down not only her Cheeks, but her very Neck and Breſts. Whilſt ſhe was thus ſitting and lamenting with Menaſta in her Couch, and whilſt Menaſta was perſwading her to moderate her exceſſive Sorrow, they heard a great noiſe below in the Court, and preſently after, hearing the ſame upon the Stairs, and then the Chamber Door open ſuddenly, Ameſtris ſaw Ottanus enter, with the ſame Fury he uſed heretofore, when he brought perſecuting Reſolutions with him.

Ottanus! ſaid Cyrus in a great Amazement, how could Ameſtris ſee Ottanus enter, when you ſay you ſaw him in the midſt of a Torrent, and ſink afterwards unto the bottom? Give me but a little patience, Sir, ſaid Artaban, and you ſhall know: But yet I beſeech you give me leave to go on with my diſcourſe.

Ottanus being entered then, as I told you, ſaid Artaban, the ſight of him made Menaſta cry out, ſuppoſing it had been an Apparition; and ſtruck Ameſtris into ſuch a wonder, that ſhe was not able either to ſpeak or riſe up; and it was a long time before they could certainly know whether it was really Ottanus, or his Shadow: at laſt, he looking upon Ameſtris, whoſe Eyes were ſwell'd with Tears, and yet ſparkled with Rage and Fury, and aſſuming a Tone that was able to ſtrike Terror into the Mind of the boldeſt and moſt innocent Woman in the World; You have reaſon, ſaid he unto her, to be troubled at the ſight of me, for I ſhould never have returned but to puniſh you for all your faults at once. Ameſtris then knowing him to be really Ottanus, and having a little recollected her ſelf, ſhe riſe up, and bowed unto him with much Reverence, Sir, ſaid ſhe unto him, you have heretofore ſo well accuſtomed me to endure unjuſt Reproaches, that I have not yet loſt the habit of it. Infamous Woman, ſaid he unto her, doſt thou call the charge of all thy preſent Actions, unjuſt Reproaches? Canſt thou believe me dead upon any light Report, and not ſo much as cry? and muſt I find thy Face all ſwell'd with Tears now for the abſence of thy Lover? Know, that I have been hid ſix days in Ecbatan, in a place where I have heard of thy intended Marriage, and all thy unworthy and wicked Actions; and I came hither to kill Aglatidas before thy Face, hearing he was come hither to thee, but ſince I underſtand I came a little too late, I find none but thy ſelf to be revenged on. Sir, replied Ameſtris, ſince you ſay you know all my Actions, then you know alſo, that as ſoon as Dinocrates told me that Aglatidas killed you in the Wars, I broke off with him, and reſolved never to marry him. Yes, replied furious Ottanus, you ſeem ſo before the World, but not in private, for if thou hadſt, thou wouldſt never have come hither. I can aſſure you, Sir, ſaid Menaſta, that Ameſtris did ſtrictly charge Aglatidas never to ſee her again. And I can aſſure you, anſwered Ottanus, that I came hither with Intentions, that ſhe never ſhall ſee him or you again.

To relate, Sir, all the crabbed paſſages which Ottanus uſed, would be to abuſe your Patience: Let me only tell you, that he ſpoke as much as Jealouſy, Rage and Deſpair could invent, both againſt Ameſtris, againſt Aglatidas, and againſt Menaſta: Then cauſing a Coach to be made ready, he forced Menaſta to return to Ecbatan, and ſhut Ameſtris up in a Chamber with one Woman only to wait on her; threatning her with all imaginable Severity. That which did moſt fright Ameſtris was, that ſhe ſaw one of her Window Ottanus treat Dinocrates as formerly. But, Sir, ſince I know you deſire to hear of the Reſurrection of Ottanus, you, I ſay, who in the fight did hear it cryed, Ottanus is dead, I ſhall relate what I have heard from ſeveral Reports: Be pleaſed to know then, that Ottanus was in the fight that Night, and fighting next unto an Armenian who was his intimate Crony, he let fall a Bag of Jewels which he had, and ſtooping to take them up again, this Armenian thought that his reaſon of ſtooping was ſome wound with a Sword, or Javelin, and therefore cryed out, Ottanus is dead, though he was not: It is very true, that he had much ado to riſe again, becauſe the fight was very hot in that place, and he was ſeveral times tumbled over and over: After this, as you know very well, Sir, the Armenians were all vanquiſhed, and could not poſſible recover their Mountains: Moreover, you know, Sir, that Phaartes retreated into a little Valley, whither you followed him ſo that Ottanus ſaved himſelf as the reſt did: But ſince he feared nothing more than to fall into the Hands of Ciaxares, becauſe he was a Traytor to his Country, and principally becauſe Aglatidas was in his Army, therefore in lieu of going with Phaartes, he ſtole away, and by the favour of Night did hide himſelf amongſt ſome high Rocks which are cloſe by the ſide of a River: but becauſe the Arms he wore were very remarkable, he thought it would not be eaſy for him either to hide himſelf, or to croſs the Field in the Day-time without being ſtopped: When he ſaw that none remained in the Valley, whither Phaartes retreated, he found one dead, and changed his rich Arms for thoſe of a common Souldier, and changed all his Clothes alſo, ſo that he paſſed through all our Army without a ſtop, taken to be one of our Party by reaſon of his Habit; and going on foot to the firſt Town, there he fell ſick.

But, Sir, to ſatisfy you concerning the miſtake of Dinocrates and my ſelf, when we ſaw the Arms of Ottanus on the back of a dead Man in the midſt of a River: Be pleaſed to know, that after Ottanus had changed Arms, a Cilician Souldier going to plunder Clothes amongſt the dead, happily light upon theſe by the help of the Moon, and being raviſhed at his happy Encounter, he put off his own, and put on theſe: Preſently after two other Ecbatan Souldiers met him, who ſeeing theſe rich Arms upon his Back, would needs be ſharers with him; but he denied them, ſaying, as it may be conjectured, they belonged to him becauſe he found them; yet becauſe they underſtood not the Language of one another, they fell to fight for them; and ſo near the River, that being wounded he fell into it, and ſtuck upon the Point of a Rock in the River, where Dinocrates and I ſaw him the next Morning: One of theſe two Souldiers who fought with him that wore the Arms of Ottanus, being the next Morning by the River ſide, and heard Dinocrates ſay it was the Body of his dead Maſter, durſt not confeſs what he knew; but being weary of War, and returning to Ecbatan, I entertained him into my Service: ſo that when the return of Ottanus was divulged, and this Man hearing me wonder that his Arms ſhould be ſeen upon a Man in the midſt of a River, he confeſſed unto me the whole truth as I have related it unto you.

But, Sir, to return unto Ottanus, whom I told you lay ſick in a little Town; be pleaſed to know, that he was ſo extreamly ſick, and continued ſo long, that he thought twenty times of Death; yet the Gods intending to make a further trial of the Conſtancy of Ameſtris, they ſpared him: and when he was well recovered, he bought a Horſe, (for he had Jewels of ſufficient value to ſupply himſelf with all Accommodations) and departed, not knowing all this while, that the News of his Death was carried unto Ecbatan, with ſo many probable Circumſtances: And thinking to find Ameſtris in the ſame Caſtle where he left her, he went thither, not daring to return to Ecbatan, unleſs in a diſguiſe, becauſe he had been in Arms againſt Ciaxares: But he was much amazed to hear that every one ſhould think him dead, and that Aglatidas was not only in Ecbatan, but ready to marry Ameſtris: To make you the better apprehend what were the Thoughts of Ottanus upon theſe Reports, I need only tell you, that though he was an high Delinquent againſt the King, and State, yet he reſolved to go diſguiſed unto Ecbatan, and hide himſelf in ſome ſecret place where he might know all the Actions of Ameſtris and Aglatidas, to the end he might diſturb their Felicity when he ſaw occaſion: he diſguiſed himſelf in the Habit of a Merchant, and coming in the Night, lodged with one who heretofore had been his Tutor; expreſly forbidding him to diſcover that he was alive; he enquired how the ſtate of all things ſtood, and underſtood that the happineſs of Aglatidas was prevented by the return of Dinocrates, who arrived two Days before him: This news was very agreeable to his Fancy, and ſurprized him, not being able to imagine why Dinocrates ſhould deviſe ſo many Lies. However, in this juncture of things he reſolved to keep cloſe, and hear how Ameſtris diſpoſed of her ſelf; and ſince he ever loved Dinocrates, he ſent for him to the Houſe where he lay concealed: Dinocrates came accordingly, and Ottanus received him with a thouſand Welcoms: And though he did not know only why he had vented theſe Lies, yet ſince they diſturbed the hopes of Aglatidas and Ameſtris, in preventing their Marriage, he thought himſelf much obliged unto him. In the mean time, Dinocrates ſeeing his Maſter alive, and being of a quick and ſubtile Wit; Sir, ſaid he unto him, I thank the Gods for ſo happily inſpiring me, otherwiſe you had found Ameſtris in the Arms of Aglatidas: Then Ottanus asked him, why he had diſſembled the truth as he had done? Sir, replied he confidently; hearing at my firſt coming unto Ecbatan, that Ameſtris was within three Days to marry a Man whom I know you hated; I did ſo much abhor to ſee ſhe ſhould be ſo little ſenſible of her own Honour, as to marry Aglatidas, of whom you had ſo many cauſes of Jealouſy, that having in my poſſeſſion a Sword which I knew to be his, I told Ameſtris, that Aglatidas had killed you with it, thinking that if ſhe had any ſpark of Honour in her, ſhe would never marry him after this: or if ſhe did, I ſhould at leaſt have ſo much Satisfaction, as to ſee that all your Jealouſies were not without good ground. You may well conceive, Sir, how Ottanus was pleaſed with Dinocrates, and what Rewards he promiſed him, for that which he had been ſo well recompenced before by Tharpis.

In the mean time he underſtood by him that Aglatidas after this had been with Ameſtris, at Menaſta's Houſe; and before he would ſhew himſelf unto any others, he would obſerve a while, whether Ameſtris was really broken off with Aglatidas, or whether it was only ſo in ſhew, expreſly forbidding Dinocrates to tell any he was alive. And he obeyed him, not ſpeaking of it ſo much as to Anatiſa, or Tharpis: But afterwards, Dinocrates telling his Maſter, that Ameſtris and Menaſta were to go into the Country, and that Aglatidas was to depart alſo, Ottanus thought this to be a buſineſs concluded upon between them, and that perhaps they would marry in ſecret; ſo that preparing for his departure as well as Aglatidas, he went unto a Wood, by which he imagined he would paſs, with Intentions not to fall upon him by the way, but to follow him at a diſtance, and not to ſhew himſelf until he was come unto the preſence of Ameſtris: But ſince Aglatidas went out of another Gate, and took another way, Ottanus miſſed of him; and waited ſo long as his Patience could laſt, ſo that he came an hour after Aglatidas was departed: Then coming unto the Court, he asked who was with Ameſtris? and they anſwered, no Body, but that about an hour before Aglatidas was with her, and now gone: ſo that coming furiouſly into her Chamber, as I told you before, he ſhut up Ameſtris, he ſent away Menaſta, and ordered Dinocrates to procure ſome Souldiers to defend him in caſe the King would arreſt him. I ſhall not lengthen my Story, by reaſon of the exceſſive Sorrows which Ameſtris and Menaſta expreſſed at parting; but give me leave to tell you, as ſince ſhe hath told us, that notwithſtanding all the hatred which Ameſtris had of Ottanus, and all thoſe cruel Perſecutions which ſhe was to expect, ſhe had a ſecret joy and comfort to ſee that Aglatidas was juſt; and that ſhe might without any ſcruple preſerve him in her Eſteem and Friendſhip.

In the mean time, Menaſta was no ſooner come to Ecbatan, but ſhe ſent for me, to tell me Ottanus was living, and returned, and Ameſtris was Priſoner, and perhaps in ſome danger of her Life. I could not believe all this at the firſt, but ſeeing ſo much real ſadneſs in her face, I ſuſpected for the truth of her Words: I grieved as well as ſhe; and for Ameſtris's ſake I wiſhed that Aglatidas had not been ſo well juſtified in her opinion. Then did we conſult which way poſſibly Ameſtris might be delivered from this tormenting Perſecution; and conſidering that Ottanus was an high Delinquent againſt the King and State, I reſolved to advertiſe Ciaxares that Ottanus was living, and of the place where he was. Menaſta approved of my Deſign, and haſted me to put it into Execution, becauſe ſhe feared Ottanus would either kill or poyſon Ameſtris, ſo that I went unto the King the very ſame Hour, and knowing his kindneſs towards Aglatidas, and acquainting him with the place where this Delinquent was, I told him he would perhaps ſave the Life of a Lady whom Aglatidas loved above all the World, if he would puniſh this Traitor to the State, and himſelf. Ciaxares no ſooner heard my Advice and Requeſt, but he preſently commanded the Lieutenant of his Guard to take ſome Forces with him, and ſecure the Perſon of Ottanus, and to releaſe Ameſtris, bringing them all to the Town.

In the mean time, Menaſta publiſhed about the Town that Ottanus was alive, and returned; and how he began to perſecute Ameſtris: every one wondred, and could hardly believe it: Tharpis was deſperate, Megabiſes and Artemon were quite down in their Fancies: As for Artemon, he no ſooner heard how courſly Ottanus uſed Ameſtris, but he reſolved to go and ſee her Perſecutor, in hopes to qualify his Severity, but he found he was miſtaken: for ſince Ottanus knew that not only Aglatidas intended to marry her, but that Megabiſes, Tharpis, and Artemon alſo were in love with her; he received him very ill, and was ready to quarrel with him; though he had hardly any leiſure for it, becauſe Artemon was no ſooner entred, but the Lieutenant of the Guard followed him with above an hundred Men; ſo that Ottanus found himſelf in a ſad Condition, knowing himſelf to be a Traitor to the State, and ſeeing he was not able to reſiſt them: Dinocrates, who went to procure ſome Souldiers, was not yet returned; ſo that having but a few Men with him, and they not very affectionate unto him, he knew not what to reſolve upon:

he had a deſire to fly for it, and firſt perhaps to have killed Ameſtris; but when he perceived that the Lieutenant of the Guard had ſeized upon all the Paſſages, he was in ſuch an extream Fury and Rage, that Artemon thought (as afterwards he told me) he would immediately have killed himſelf. In the mean time, the Captain of the Guard demanded entrance, and receiving no ſatisfactory Anſwer, cauſed the Doors to be broke open, and entred with all his Men: Ottanus hearing this noiſe, went towards the Captain of the Guard with his Sword drawn, and Artemon ſeeing he was not able to defend himſelf, interpoſed between them, but Ottanus ſtruck at Artemon, whilſt three of the Guard ſeized upon him, and his Sword: Ottanus finding himſelf diſarmed, and ſeized upon, vented a thouſand moſt horrible Imprecations: However they cauſed him to go into his Chamber again, until Orders was taken for the departure of Ameſtris. Artemon being a Friend unto the Captain of the Guard, went with him unto her Chamber where ſhe was locked up: Madam, ſaid he unto her, ſince you were pleaſed to permit me the continuance of Friendſhip, I beſeech you permit me that I help to releaſe you. Ameſtris was ſo amazed at the great noiſe, and at the language of Artemon, that ſhe knew not what to anſwer: But the Lieutenant of the Guard coming to her, and telling her he had Orders from the King to carry her unto Ecbatan: She asked him from whence proceeded her Liberty? and when ſhe underſtood that it was by the Impriſonment of her Husband, ſhe expreſſed no Joy at the news: However ſhe was put into a Coach with her Women, and was waited upon by Artemon, and a dozen Gallants which accompanied him: As for Ottanus he was carried on Horſeback, and conveyed into a Chamber at Ecbatan, where Traitors to the State uſed to be put. Never did any thing make a greater noiſe than this return of Ameſtris, and the Impriſonment of her Husband; I diſpatched one of my Men immediately towards the Army unto Aglatidas, and went in all haſte unto Menaſta, to carry her unto Ameſtris.

In the mean while Anatiſa, who ſuck'd Poyſon for Ameſtris out of every thing, did publiſh about the Town a very baſe Report, that Ameſtris had cauſed her Husband to be impriſoned; and that Aglatidas did lie lurking in ſome concealed Corner of the Town, whilſt he employed all his Friends to the King againſt Ottanus, and an hundred ſuch Falſities as theſe: But this impoſture took no deep root, though Ameſtris never heard of it; for out of a magnanimous Generoſity ſhe told Menaſta and my ſelf, as ſoon as we came into her Chamber, that ſhe would ſolicit for the liberty of her Husband. When ſhe told us this, we wondred, and endeavoured to hinder her from it, but all in vain; for ſince ſhe ſaw there was Glory and Nobleneſs in the Act, no Arguments could diſſwade her from it: Then did ſhe aſſemble together ſome of her Husband's Kindred, who rather in reſpect of their Family, than of any Amity to him, did wiſh him out of Priſon: Then ſhe and they together did caſt down themſelves at the Feet of Ciaxares, and begged Pardon for Ottanus. This Generoſity ſeemed ſo high, that the King was charmed with it: at the firſt, to try her Virtue, he refuſed, and ſaid, Ottanus was unworthy to be her Husband; yet ſhe ſeconded her Petition with ſo much Spirit, and ſuch preſſing Importunity, that Ciaxares promiſed her the Life of Ottanus; but as for his Liberty he would never conſent unto it, until Ottanus did ſolemnly promiſe never to carry Ameſtris out of Ecbatan again, or to uſe her any ways unkindly. Ameſtris thanked the King for the care he had of her, but ſtill humbly deſired him to releaſe Ottanus without any Conditions at all, yet he would not by any means; ſince Ottanus was extreamly hated, though the goodneſs of Ameſtris did ſolicit for him, yet there were many which did ſolicit againſt him, and amongſt the reſt, one ancient Enemy unto his Family, did negotiate againſt him ſo openly before all the World, that Ottanus himſelf was acquainted with it.

The King within a few Days after, ſent for Ottanus into his Preſence; and after he had told him of his perfidiouſneſs towards him, and his injuſtice towards Ameſtris, yet that virtuous Lady notwithſtanding all his Cruelty to her, did with much importunity beg his Life and Liberty: He told him alſo, that at her Requeſt he had conſented unto the firſt of theſe; but denied her the ſecond, unleſs he would ſolemnly promiſe never to carry Ameſtris any more into the Country, or any manner of ways uſe her unkindly. Ottanus hearing the King ſay ſo, in lieu of thanking him, or accepting of his offer, was ſo inſolent as to ask whether theſe Conditions were mentioned by the conſent of Ameſtris? The King wondering at this ſtrange effect of Jealouſy, anſwered him very ſweetly, that Ameſtris on the contrary deſired it without any Conditions at all: Yet ſay what the King could, Ottanus could not directly promiſe it, but asked three Days time to conſider; during which time doubtleſs he endured intolerable Torment: for he apprehended, that unleſs he would ruin himſelf, he muſt punctually keep promiſe with Ciaxares, and he perceived by himſelf he was ſo abſolutely unable to do it, that he knew not what Reſolution to pitch upon: yet ſince preſent Miſeries are apt to lay hold upon preſent Remedies, he ſent word to the King, that he would promiſe what he deſired, ſo he might be ſet at Liberty; he was cauſed to ſolemnize this Promiſe with all poſſible Ceremonies that might make it inviolable, and afterwards he was releaſed, maugre all the ſecret Solicitations of all the Lovers and Friends of Ameſtris; and maugre all the Malice of that declared Enemy unto Ottanus, who oppoſed it as much as poſſibly he could. But here, Sir, may be admired the Contrivances of the Gods: for as ſoon as Ottanus was out of Priſon, and had rendred thanks unto Ciaxares, he met with this declared Enemy whom he knew had ſolicited againſt him; he began to ſpeak fiercely unto him, and to affront him ſo far, that he drew his Sword, which moved Ottanus to draw his alſo, and fighting, Ottanus was left dead upon the place, before any could come in to part them: his old Enemy was in little better ſtate than he, for within three Days after he died of his Wounds: and Ameſtris out of her conſtant Generoſity cauſed him to be apprehended, and reſolved a revenge upon him for the Death of her Husband. Since Ottanus was once thought to be dead when he was not, every one, to ſatisfy their Curioſity, would ſee him whether he were really ſo or no; and to ſpeak the very Truth, every one rejoiced at it, except Anatiſa, Tharpis, Megabiſes, and Artemon; for though it be the natural

Diſpoſition of all Lovers not to grieve for the Death of him that enjoyed their Miſtreſs; yet ſince theſe three Rivals were ſure that Aglatidas would now enjoy her before any of them, they had rather ſhe ſhould have ſtill continued the Wiſe of Ottanus, then become the Wiſe of Aglatidas. All this while Ameſtris carried her ſelf according to her accuſtomed Modeſty and Wiſdom: But that Dinocrates might be puniſhed for all his knavery at once, it chanced that coming one Night to Ecbatan to fetch away all that he had there, intending to change his Habitation (for he had heard of his Maſter's Impriſonment, when he was bringing Souldiers ſecretly unto his Houſe) he met, the Night after Ottanus was killed, a Servant belonging to Aglatidas, who knowing him by the help of a Candle which accidentally paſſed by, did aſſault him ſo vigorouſly, that Dinocrates flying away, and not knowing what he did, came to ſave himſelf in my Lodging, where he fell, being wounded in three Places, juſt as I entred: But though I knew him, yet ſince he fled into my Houſe for Sanctuary, I my ſelf ſtopped the Servant of Aglatidas which followed him, who out of reſpect to me retreated; yet his Life could not be ſaved, for he died within ſix Days after: yet before he died, he confeſſed many things, which I was very deſirous to know, amongſt the reſt, the Plot of Anatiſa and Tharpis. In the mean while I was vexed to the Heart that I could hear no news of Aglatidas, of whom I durſt never ſpeak unto Ameſtris, but continually unto Menaſta: But at the laſt, he whom I ſent unto him returned, and told me it was long before he could find him, and at laſt found him ſick of extream Sorrow three days Journey from Ecbatan. Then, Sir, to treſpaſs no longer on your Patience, let me in ſhort tell you, that the news of Ottanus his Death was ſuch a preſent Cure of Aglatidas, that within eight Days he was able to take Horſe. Before he would come into Ecbatan, he ſent me unto the King, to obtain permiſſion to return, with as much earneſtneſs as he asked to depart; commanding me to acquaint Ciaxares with the true cauſe of his departure, and deſire of return. Then went I preſently unto the King, who was moſt willing to do any thing in advantage of Aglatidas, and aſſured me that he would perſwade Ameſtris not to be over-ceremonious in her mourning for Ottanus. But it was not poſſible to obtain it of her: for notwithſtanding all the requeſts and deſires of Ciaxares, of Menaſta, of Aglatidas, and my ſelf, ſhe would by all means continue out the time of mourning according to the cuſtom of Ecbatan. In the mean time, to prevent all new Misfortunes, Ciaxares gave expreſs Command unto all the Rivals of Aglatidas, never to think any more of Ameſtris, and that ſo abſolutely, that they were forced to yield obedience. After this, I ſhall not need to tell you, Sir, how great were the Joys of Aglatidas and Ameſtris, nor how blank all the Rivals were, nor how furious Anatiſa was; for if I ſhould, the day would be too ſhort to relate them all: But give me leave to tell you, that as ſoon as Ameſtris had left off her mourning, the day of Marriage was appointed; all the Gallants of the Town came to the Feaſt; all her rejected Lovers abſented themſelves as well as Anatiſa; our two happy Lovers ſwimmed in a Sea of Joys, and were married in the Preſence of the King and all the Court. After this, Sir, I have no more to tell you, but that though Aglatidas does love Ameſtris much more than ever he did, yet the love of Glory, and the honour to ſerve you, Sir, is ſo prevalent with his Soul, that he moſt willingly accepted of the Employment which Ciaxares conferred upon him, to bring ten thouſand Men unto you: though let me alſo tell you, Sir, that he did not leave Ameſtris without abundance of Sorrow; and I can aſſure you, that as we conducted this fair and admirable Lady a day's Journey from Ecbatan, (for ſhe reſolved to ſpend all her time of abſence from her Husband in the Province of the Ariſantines) I ſaw them both as ſad, as before they were full of joy. And ſo, Sir, you ſhall ſee Aglatidas again both a Husband and a Lover, as unquiet and reſerved as he uſed to be.

I thank the Gods (ſaid Cyrus, when Artaban had ended) that Aglatidas has no other Torments than ſuch as abſence cauſes; and I wiſh with all my Heart (ſaid he, and ſighed) that all thoſe who love him, may one day be in the ſame Condition that he is. After this Cyrus thanked Artaban for the pains he had taken in relating the Story of his illuſtrious Friend, the novelty and ſtrangeneſs of which he could not chuſe but admire : Then was he forced to break off further Converſation, becauſe he was told that the King of Phrygia and the King of Hircania had ſome Buſineſs of importance to communicate unto him : So that he embraced Artaban, and went out of that Room into another, where thoſe two Princes, accompanied with Tigranes, Phaartes, Artamas, Perſodes, and many others, expected him ; and that with ſo much Majeſty as it can hardly be imagined that a Prince of ſo high a Soul ſhould be ſo ſweet as to hearken unto a long amorous Diſcourſe, in which he had no other intereſt, than as relating unto a Man whom he loved, unleſs it were by comparing the Torments which other Lovers ſuffer, with thoſe which he endured for Mandana.

The End of the Second Book.

ARTA-

OR THE

GRAND CYRUS.

Part IV. Book III.

WHEN Cyrus came unto thoſe Princes which expected him, the King of Phrygia told him, that the Lacedemonians had contracted Alliance with Crœſus, and that he thought fit to acquaint him with it. The King of Hircania alſo informed him, that the Thracians and Egyptians did arm themſelves in the King of Lydia's quarrel. As for the Lacedemonians, replied Cyrus, I do not wonder they ſhould do ſo, ſince it had been moſt unjuſt in them to deny aid to a Prince who did ſo liberally furniſh them with as much Gold as they ſtood in need of, to make that prodigious Statue of Apollo, which in my Travels I ſaw neer the Mount Thornax in Laconia : But as for the King of Egypt, I do not ſee any reaſon he hath to contract Alliance with Cræſus, or why he ſhould decline Ciaxares. But however, ſaid he, the more Enemies we have to fight againſt, the more Glory we ſhall have in overcoming them : This huge Body of ſtrange Troops will do them no other ſervice but ſow Diviſions amongſt them, and put their Army in diſorder ; for it is impoſſible that Men who fight after different Orders, ſhould in ſo ſhort a time be conformable unto one and the ſame Diſcipline. After this Cyrus acquainted them with the freſh Supplies which Ciaxares had ſent him by Aglatidas: So that rouſing up their Hearts by the ſprightfulneſs of his own Courage, the ſame Spirit which he infuſed into theſe Kings, they alſo infuſed into the Captains, and the Captains into the Souldiers; ſo that the great noiſe which all the Preparations of Crœſus did make, and was ſpread amongſt them, did not at all aſtoniſh them, and they never diſpaired of Victory, as long as the illuſtrious Cyrus commanded them. Their impatience to fight, though the Spring was neer, yet it made them think it long in coming: The Perſians prayed unto the Sun, which they adore, to be ſwifter in his courſe for their Sakes; the Medians were no leſs importunate with their Gods; and ſuch was the zeal of every Nation in particular, to ſee their illuſtrious General at an end of all his Travels by the defeat of Crœſus, and liberty of Mandana, that they preſented their Prayers unto their Gods to bring them unto a ſpeedy Fight. As for Artamas, he was extremly impatient to ſee the Princeſs Palmis out of Captivity. As gallant as he was, he did not deſire it ſhould be obtained by Battel; for though Crœſus had treated him very hardly, yet could he not wiſh his overthrow. In the mean time the Prince of Phraartes went very often to viſit the Princeſs Araminta, who was much diſpleaſed that he ſhould continue loving her, ſince ſhe had ſaid as much as any ſprightly and vertuous Lady could do to make him deſiſt. A few Days after Aglatidas arrived with his freſh Auxiliaries: Cyrus received him with ſo many Expreſſions of Love, that Aglatidas did moſt obligingly deſire him not to lay any greater load upon him, leſt his Heart ſhould not be able to contain his exceſſive Joys. But Cyrus, thinking a Man that was ſo far from her he loved, as he was, could never die with over-much Joy, did ſtill preſs upon him with a hundred moſt obliging Expreſſions, and aſſured him that Ameſtris was not more ſad in parting with him, then he was glad to embrace him. Afterwards being deſirous to view thoſe Forces which he had brought up, and which Aglatidas had left in Battalia ſome twelve Furlongs longs from the Camp, Cyrus with many of great Quality went unto the place where they were, and ſtanding upon a little Hill he viewed them, and found them to be compleat and well armed Men: So that being very well pleaſed with them, he appointed them their Quarters, and returned unto his Tent to talk with Aglatidas, not only of Ciaxares, from whom he brought Letters, but alſo of all their Misfortunes both paſt and preſent. Within two Days after Aglatidas arrived, Artabaſes, whom Cyrus ſent into Perſia to the King his Father, and the Queen his Mother, returned back, Madates ſtill ſtaying with Ciaxares. He received him with as much joy as his Soul was capable of, conſidering the ſtate in which Mandana was, ſince he brought Letters from two ſuch as he did moſt highly reverence: He read theſe Letters with much delight; when he found they contain'd that Pardon which he deſired, expreſſed in ſuch tender and obliging Terms, as did let him plainly ſee that Fame had ſpoke unto them in his behalf. Artabaſes told him ſo many things from them, as did let him ſee they had great and heroick Souls: He was alſo loaded with moſt magnificent Preſents for Cyrus from them; and moreover aſſured him, that Cambiſes would preſently make new Levies to ſend unto him. So that when Cyrus did divulge this report unto his Army, the Souldiers rouſed up freſh Courage. Artabaſes alſo brought another Letter from the Queen of Perſia unto Chriſantes, which intimated, that in lieu of quarrelling with him for ſo long concealing her Son, ſhe gave him many thanks for bringing him ſo well up. A few Days after, Timocreon and Tegeus underſtood by thoſe whom they ſent unto Sardis, that the Princeſs Mandana and the Princeſs Palmis would certainly be brought thither: That a Chamber was making ready in the Cittadel for the Princeſs Palmis, and another in the King's Palace for the Princeſs Mandana; and that as neer as they could gueſs, they would be conducted thither within 15 or 20 Days; and that Cræſus intended they ſhould come by a way which ſhould almoſt always have the River Hermes between them and the Army of Cyrus. This Intelligence was confirmed the ſame day by the return turn of Feraulas, who reported how the Friends of Menecus aſſured him, that within fifteen or twenty days the King of Pontus would carry the two Princeſſes unto Sardis; though he cauſed it to be publiſhed in Epheſus, that they would not carry them, until all the Army of Crœſus was come together, the Rendezvous whereof was to be upon the Banks of Pactolus. Feraulas, having been happier in his Negotiations than heretofore, found out a way by the addreſſes of a Friend unto Meneceus, Siſter unto Agiſiſtrata, to ſend a Letter unto Marteſia, and to receive her Anſwer, which he ſhewed unto his deareſt Maſter: for ſince he had not writ unto her but for him, he therefore had as much ſhare in it as himſelf: So that after he had rendred him a full account of every thing, he ſhewed him this Letter which contained theſe Words.

Marteſia unto Feraulas.

THE Perſon of whom you ſpoke unto me being ſtill the ſame ſhe uſed to be, that is, the wiſeſt and juſteſt in the World, you may aſſure your illuſtrious Maſter that he need not fear any thing, but ſtill may hope for all that concerns her: O I wiſh unto the Gods, that Fortune would put no other Obſtacle unto his Happineſs! For as much as concerns you, ſince I am perſwaded that it depends upon him, it is ſufficient that I tell you I have contributed as much as is in my Power to make him happy, ſince I do every day pray unto the Gods that he may ſpeedily triumph over all his Enemies.

Marteſia.

This Letter cauſed more joy in Cyrus than he was able to expreſs, though he did ſecretly murmur a little, that the Princeſs did not ſo much as write one Word with her own Hand in this Letter; yet ſeriouſly conſidering all Circumſtances, he was not angry at all, and thought himſelf as happy to know her thoughts by Marteſia, as a common Lover would have been in the Enjoyment of his Miſtreſs: It is an infallible Teſtimony of a real and high Paſſion, to be moſt ſenſible of the leaſt Favours; and ſo, ſince that of Cyrus was the moſt violent and tender that ever any was, he apprehended the moſt inconſiderable Circumſtance which proceeded from Mandana, with an extaſy of Joy; for he imagined that Marteſia had not writ any thing in this Letter, without the Princeſs's knowledg and Approbation, and he was as tender and dear of it, as if ſhe had writ it her ſelf. However, to loſe no longer time in unprofitable imaginations, but the ſooner to procure the Liberty of his Princeſs, he aſſembled the King of Aſſyria, the King of Phrygia, the King of Hircania, the Prince Artamas, Tigranes, Phaartes, and ſeveral others of Quality together, intending to conſult with them upon the beſt Expedients for it.

Artamas, who till then had ever a great reſpect of Crœſus, conſidering now that he intended to continue the impriſonment of the Princeſs Palmis, ſince ſhe was to be lodged in a Cittadel, and not in the Palace of the King her Father, he was ſo violently deſirous to prevent her coming into that Priſon, out of which he himſelf came, that he deſired Pardon of Cyrus, if he delivered his Opinion the firſt; for being fully perſwaded that none could propoſe a way ſo expedient as himſelf, he thought himſelf excuſable for aſſuming that liberty. Cyrus, and the King of Aſſyria, hearing him ſpeak ſo zealouſly, did both of them aſſure him, that they would moſt willingly hearken unto him: So that Artamas told them, how ſince the King of Pontus was to conduct the Princeſſes on the other ſide of the River Hermes, he hoped that they ſhould be able to paſs over that River without any oppoſition, becauſe the Governour of that Caſtle which ſtands at the end of the Bridg over that River, and is of the ſame name, is ſo abſolutely for him, that he does not think he will deny him any thing: Moreover, he knew there was ſome Diſcontent between that Governour and the King of Lydia, who intended to put him out of his Government: So that, ſaid he to them, if that Bridg can be obtained, and ſince the Wood, which I already told you, of is not above thirty Furlongs from thence, it will be a ſhort cut for us to be there in convenient time, when we ſhall have intelligence that the Princeſſes are to paſs by.

Cyrus finding much Reaſon in the Advice of Artamas, it was reſolved, That without any further delay, to ſend and make ſure of this Governour; and after that, when they ſhould receive further intelligence from the Friends of Meneceus of the prefix'd Day when theſe Princeſſes and their Convoy ſhould ſet out, that then they would the ſame hour ſet out with equal, or rather a ſtronger Number than thoſe of the King of Pontus, to execute this glorious Enterpriſe; for they might the more eaſily effect it, becauſe they were nearer that place when they were to paſs over the River Hermes, by a days Journey than Epheſus was. The thing then being thus reſolved upon, it was thought the beſt Expedient, that Artamas ſhould ſend one of his own Servants to negotiate with this before-named Governour: But Love was ſo violent in the Soul of that Prince, that he would not truſt the tranſaction of a Buſineſs, upon which the Liberty of the Princeſs Palmis depended, unto any other than himſelf; So that not imparting his Deſign unto any but Soſicles, he diſguiſed himſelf the Night following, and went to act what himſelf had propos'd, leaving a Letter for the King his Father, by which he deſired Pardon for undertaking this Buſineſs, without firſt asking his leave; for fearing leſt he ſhould deny him, he would rather run the hazard of his Diſpleaſure, than ruin a Deſign upon which the Happineſs both of Cyrus and himſelf did ſo abſolutely depend. The King of Phrygia was at the firſt a little angry with the Prince his Son; but Cyrus did ſo highly commend the Act, that he durſt not openly ſhew his Anger. In the mean time, they which commanded in the Frontier Quarters towards Lydia, were making continual Incurſions upon the Enemy; and not a Day paſſed, but they had ſome Skirmiſhes, in which they got good Plunder, which did animate the Hearts of the Souldiers to fight: Cyrus never reſerved any thing of what they got, but the Glory, and the Priſoners, to the end he might releaſe them; yet did he ſo largely recompenſe thoſe which took them, that what Ranſom ſoever the Priſoners were to give, they had it all with Advantage. Chriſantes, who commanded in the utmoſt Quarter, underſtanding by his Scouts, that two hundred of the Enemies Horſe were guarding a Coach full of Ladies, going towards the Caſtle of Hermes, intending to paſs the River there, he commanded out four hundred Horſe to intercept them, conceiving that the inequality of Number would effect it; and indeed ſo it ſucceeded: Though he who commanded thoſe two hundred Horſe did moſt gallantly behave himſelf, but his timerous Followers forſaking him, he was forced to render himſelf, deſiring Chriſantes that he would let the Prince Artamas know that he was a Priſoner unto Cyrus, and that he might obtain ſo much favour from him, as that theſe Ladies which he conducted might be carried unto the Queen of Suſiana. Chriſantes was too gallant a Man to treat ſo brave an Enemy (as he found him) ill; and told him, that according to the Laws of War, he muſt carry him to Cyrus, but promiſed to obtain of him what he deſired. In the mean time Chriſantes did provide the moſt convenient Lodgings that he could for thoſe Ladies, amongſt which one of them was a moſt raviſhing Beauty; and the next Morning himſelf did conduct theſe Priſoners unto Cyrus: But in going thither, they were to paſs through a little Town where the Queen of Suſiana, and the Princeſs Ariminta was, and they went by the Temple there, juſt as thoſe Princeſſes were coming out of it: Chriſantes, out of his Reſpects unto them, made a Halt, and the Coach in which the Captive Ladies were, ſtaid, and one of them knowing Panthea, cried out ſo loud, as that Princeſs turning towards her, looked ſeriouſly upon, and knew her: And being well acquainted with Chriſantes, ſhe ſent unto him, deſiring the Favour that ſhe might ſpeak with thoſe Ladies which he conducted: And ſince he was not ignorant what Reſpects Cyrus would have rendered unto that Queen, he went himſelf unto her, and ſaid he would bring them unto her Houſe, as ſoon as ſhe ſhould be there; and he was giving Orders accordingly for it, when News was brought him that Cyrus was coming to ſee Panthea, and the Princeſs

Ariminta. So that Chriſantes ſeeing the diſpoſition was no more in him, ſince his Maſter was preſent, he left the Queen, who was going into her Coach, and went to acquaint Cyrus with her deſire. This Prince then, paſſing by the Captive Ladies, ſaluted them with as much civility as if they had not been Priſoners at all; and going ſtraight to the Queen of Suſiana, with whom the Princeſs Ariminta was, Madam, ſaid he unto her, and bowed down to the very ground, you will find more conveniency at your own Houſe than here, to entertain theſe Ladies which are of your Acquaintance. Panthea then commanding they ſhould obey Cyrus, went to her own Lodging, and the Coach in which the Captive Ladies were, followed hers: In the mean while Chriſantes preſenting his Priſoner unto his Prince; Sir, ſaid he unto him, this Enemy which you ſee here, is queſtionleſs worthy of your protection, ſince he aſſures me that the Prince Artamas is his Friend. If ſo, ſaid Cyrus, and embraced him, I am ſure to be his alſo, ſince I think my ſelf obliged to love all that he loves. That Honour, Sir, replied the Priſoner, would be too great for me; and it would be enough if you will be pleaſed, in conſideration of him, to treat thoſe Ladies whom I conducted, with all civility. The conſideration of the Queen of Suſiana, replied Cyrus, without any addition of the Prince Artamas, is ſufficient to oblige me unto it; and your own Merit, without that Prince, is alſo enough to make me your Honourer; for finding by your Face, that you are a Man of Quality and Spirit, and underſtanding by Chriſantes, that you have as much Soul and Heart as a Man can have, there needs no more to induce me to it; and to let you ſee I am ſerious, before I certainly know what you are, pray go with me to your Ladies, who are with the Queen of Suſiana. In ſaying ſo, they alighted from their Horſes, and went unto Panthea's Chamber, whom he found full of expreſſions of Friendſhip and Affection unto one of thoſe Priſoners. My dear Cleonice, ſaid ſhe unto her, am I ſo happy, as once to ſee you again? And can I grieve for your impriſonment, ſince it makes my own more ſweet? Madam, replied Cleonice, the loſs of my Liberty ſhall delight me, if it can any way add unto your Happineſs: however, it is not long of your illuſtrious Conqueror (ſaid ſhe, and looked upon Cyrus) that my Captivity is not ſweet unto me. Cyrus, anſwered Panthea, according to his ordinary Generoſity. After this, that Princeſs told him, how the Father of this fair Priſoner was born her Subject, ſince he was the Subject of Claſomenes, although he dwelt at Epheſus; and told him further, that ſhe had known Cleonice a long time, and loved her exceedingly, and that ſhe was of a moſt ſweet condition; conjuring him to let her be with her, and all the Ladies in her company alſo, though ſhe knew none of them. Cyrus conſented unto all her Deſires; telling her, they ſhould have their Liberty, if he did not think their preſence would be more pleaſing to her, and would divert her. Afterwards Cyrus asked that Lady, whoſe name was Cleonice, whether ſhe was any Friend unto the Prince Artamas? thinking it impoſſible but ſhe muſt needs know him by the famous Name of Cleander. Sir, anſwered ſhe, and bluſhed, I am a Debtor unto that Honour which I have, to be known unto the generous Ligdamis (and pointed with her Hand unto that Priſoner which Chriſantes took) and I make no queſtion, but when by his Mediation, Artamas ſhall know we are in your Fetters, he will obtain ſo much favour from you, that our Chains may be as light as the Laws of War will permit. The illuſtrious Cyrus (ſaid the Princeſs Ariminta, and interrupted her) does not uſe to impoſe heavy Ones upon his Priſoners; for he is much more obſervant unto the Laws of Generoſity, than the Laws of which you ſpeak. Whilſt Ariminta was ſpeaking thus, Panthea looked upon Ligdamis, and thought ſhe ſhould remember the Name; then addreſſing her ſelf to him, I pray, Sir, tell me, ſaid ſhe, and ſmiled, whether your Father be not Governour of the Caſtle of Hermes? and whether you are not that ſame Ligdamis, whom reports ſay, does make a publique profeſſion to be a declared Enemy of Love, and to all them that are in Love? Madam, replied, plied he, doubtleſs I am the Man you mean, though I am not the ſame I was. Leonice bluſhed at the anſwer of Ligdamis, but to turn it as handſomly as ſhe could, ſhe ſaid, when none asked her, that one of her Couſins being ſick in the Country, ſhe durſt not venture to go from Epheſus unto her, if Ligdamis had not offered to guard her and one of his Siſters, which ſhe ſhewed unto Panthea, who indeed was very fair. Cyrus knowing by this Diſcourſe, the Name and Quality of his Priſoner, did uſe him more civilly than before, conceiving it might advantage the Deſign of Artamas: So that after a long viſit unto theſe fair Priſoners, he left them with Panthea; and charged Araſpes to treat them with all poſſible kindneſs and courteſy: As for Ligdamis, he carried him with him, aſſuring the Ladies that he would be as careful of him, as Panthea could be of them: and indeed in their return unto the Camp, they talked together, and Cyrus, to teſtify how dear the Friends of Artamas were unto him, he let him have his Liberty upon his Parole, and told him he ſhould have no other Guards upon him but his own Generoſity. Ligdamis returned thanks, with all imaginable Submiſſion and Reverence, and made the greatneſs of his Soul ſo fully appear by his judicious Anſwers, that Cyrus to his Honour ſaid, That he never eſteemed any in all his Life ſo much in ſo little a time. When he was come into his Tent, he bad Feraulus make much of Ligdamis, as of one whoſe Friendſhip he deſired to gain. In the mean time, as he had obſerved ſome words which Ligdamis uttered, and that Cleonice bluſhed twice when he was ſpoken of; ſo he imagined, or indeed knew that they were in love with one another: yet to clear the matter, he appointed Chriſantes to bid Araſpes, as he returned to his Quarter, to enquire, as well as he could, whether Ligdamis was not in love with Cleonice, and inform him, for it would be of concernment to know it: and to tell him further, that if he could not find it out any other way, then to go unto the Queen of Suſiana from him, and entreat her to let him underſtand what ſhe knew concerning it; alſo to aſſure her, that it might chance ſo to fall out, that by the knowledg of it, the War of Lydia might be compoſed without fighting, ſo that by the ſame conſequence her dear Abradates would not be in any danger.

Chriſantes was punctual in his Obedience, and acquainted Araſpes with their Princes deſire: Araſpes, though he was full of obedient Deſires, yet he thought his task very hard, ſince he had none but Priſoners to enquire of: and it was to be imagined, that tho he did put the queſtion unto any of them, yet they would never tell him: ſo that he thought the beſt way would be to make addreſs unto the Queen of Suſiana firſt: and accordingly he went unto her Chamber, where he found Leonice with her; but which way ſoever he turned his Diſcourſe, he could not diſcover any thing of his Deſires; ſo that he was forced to acquaint Panthea in a low Voice, with the Orders he received from Cyrus, telling her, that it did exceedingly concern him to know the Relations betwen Ligdamis and Cleonice. The Queen of Suſiana hearing this, told him, that ſhe knew nothing concerning Ligdamis, more than this, that when ſhe came from Suſa, he was ſuch a profeſſed Enemy unto Love, that it was to be ſuppoſed he never would become a Lover; yet, ſaid ſhe, ſince I know that this curioſity in Cyrus is not without good ground, although I cannot underſtand it, yet I will promiſe him to enquire further; which that I may the better do, it is requiſite that Cleonice and I be in private together: and in Order to that, do you retire your Self, and take ſuch a courſe, as none may come in to interrupt us. In obedience thereunto, Araſpes went out, as if Panthea had ſent him unto ſome place. Then after much other common diſcourſe, Panthea asked Cleonice, Whether Ligdamis did ſtill continue in his heretical Opinion concerning Love? Truly, replied Cleonice, he is very good Company. That is not an anſwer unto my Queſtion, anſwered Panthea; for I would know whether he be ſtill an Enemy to Love and all Lovers? Cleonice bluſhed extreamly at this Queſtion, and half-laughing, replied, Since I was not the Confident of Ligdamis, when I had the honour to ſee you laſt, I know no reaſon you have, Madam, to ask me any ſuch Queſtion. I ask it, anſwered the Queen of Suſiana, becauſe if Ligdamis do ever love any, it muſt needs be you. You have an ill Opinion of his judgment then, replied Cleonice. No, replied Panthea, but on the contrary, a very good one, and that's the reaſon why I ask the Queſtion. But the truth is, Cleonice, I have a great deſire to know the Hiſtory of your Life, ſince it is a long time ſince I had the happineſs to ſee you. Truly, Madam, replied ſhe, you have moſt abſolute Power over me; though I muſt tell you, it will trouble me to obey you in this. If you have any of your Friends with you, replied Panthea, who is acquainted with it, let her take that pains, and I am contented to ſave you the labour. You would much oblige me, Madam, anſwered ſhe, if you would be pleaſed to ſave us all that trouble. But the Queen of Suſiana, ſeeing ſhe was unwilling, was more importunate than before: So that Cleonice conceiving that the credit which this wiſe Queen had with Cyrus might be advantagious unto Ligdamis, if ſhe were acquainted with the Intereſt ſhe had in him, reſolved to obey her. But ſince her Modeſty would not give her leave to tell the Story of her ſelf: Madam, ſaid ſhe unto Panthea, I could well enough relate my own Thoughts unto you, but I cannot ſo well tell you the Thoughts of Lagdamis; therefore I beſeech you permit one that is both a Friend unto him and unto me, to relate what you ſo much deſire to know. Panthea conſented unto the Motion; and Cleonice calling for this Friend of Ligdamis and hers, who was called Iſmenea, ſhe conjur'd her to ſatisfy the curioſity of Panthea; after which, ſhe went unto the reſt of her Company, which came with her, whilſt Iſmenea began her Story thus.

BODLEIANA BIBLIOTHECA

The Hiſtory of Ligdamis and Cleonice.

SInce I know that Cleonice has the honour to be known unto your Majeſty, I need not ſpeak any thing of her Quality: But, Madam, ſince I know that ſhe departed from Claſemone very young, to come and dwell at Epheſus; and ſince that time, ſhe never had the honour to ſee you, unleſs at ſome ſhort Voyages which ſhe made unto Sardis, whilſt you were there, I think it not impertinent to tell you, what Humour ſhe appeared to be of unto us, when ſhe came to dwell in our Town. Doubtleſs you remember, Madam, that at that time Epheſus was one of the moſt pleaſant Towns of all Aſia; for when you came thither to viſit the Temple of Diana, I remember you gave that Character of it, though you did not ſtay there above four or five days. And truly, he who is the Governour of it, is ſo gallant a Man; and Polixenida his Wife, is a Lady of ſuch an excellent Spirit, that they do much contribute unto the Delights of all the People: and this Court, though leſs tumultuous than that of Sardis, yet is it more delightſome. You know, Madam, that when the Father of Cleonice left Claſamone to come and inhabit at Epheſus, ſhe was not above fifteen Years old; and queſtionleſs you have not forgotten that Stenobea her Mother was a gallant and vertuous Lady, and one who hath been very fair, and yet was reaſonably ſtill: So that when ſhe came to Epheſus, ſhe courted the World, as much as the World courted Cleonice, who indeed did appear like a new and glorious Star, which eclipſed all the reſt. You may well imagine then, that ſhe being ſo admirably Fair, and beſides that, having the advantage of Novelty, ſhe did infinitely pleaſe: So that ſince Stenobea did forbid no Company coming to her, Reſort thither was greater than unto any Houſe in all Epheſus whatſoever: The luſtre of the Daughter's Beauty, did draw all the compleat Gallants of the Town thither. Every one was ambitious of the honour to be her firſt Servant, and pay her his firſt Services: That quality which did moſt take thoſe that ſaw her, was their obſervance that ſhe knew her Beauty, and was not proudly affected with it: and though ſhe was one of the moſt ſweet and civil Ladies upon Earth, yet ſhe was ſo out of a natural Inclination, and not out of any Deſign to pleaſe or take others who came unto her: She took her pleaſures as others did, but ſhe did not greedily ſeek after them; and though ſhe had one of the moſt charming Wits of the World, yet did ſhe rather endeavour to hide ſome part, than to ſhew all the Rules of it; nor did I ever in my Life meet with any, who knew better how to ſpeak well, or how to be ſilent with leſs pain, than ſhe did. Thus, Madam, you ſee a perfect deſcription of Cleonice, at her firſt coming unto Epheſus: The Mother ſought after all Pleaſures, and all Pleaſures ſought after the incomparable Daughter. Be pleaſed to know, Madam, that there was then at Epheſus a Beauty, who bore the name of Artelinda, and one who was of a good Quality; and to ſpeak the very truth as it is, there were ſo many charms in every part of her, and ſuch a ſweetneſs in all her Actions, as whoſoever looked upon her, could not chuſe but love her: for there was ſuch an obliging and captivating quality in her taking Eyes, as made all Hearts her own, before they knew where they were, or could conſult with their Reaſon; at the leaſt, a great number of her Lovers ſaid ſo, to juſtify their Paſſions.

And, Madam, to deſcribe Artelinda the better unto you, for ſhe has ſo great a ſhare in this Hiſtory, as I muſt needs let you perfectly know her. Be pleaſed to know further of her, that never was ſuch a proud inſulting Minx as ſhe was; for ſhe would not only gain the Hearts of her Lovers by her Beauty and her Wit; but alſo by all her endeavours, by her Complacency and Civility; and then when any of her private particular Friends did contend with her, ſhe would mock them; and jeeringly ſay, That as ambitious People think they can never get a Crown at too dear a rate; ſo one can never take too much pains to get a Heart: and as Conquerors do always talk of their Victories, but never ſpeak of the

pains they took, ſo would ſhe brag of the Hearts ſhe had got, but never remember the Cares and Troubles which they coſt her; and truly, I believe Artelinda was never melancholy, but when a day paſſed over her Head, in which ſhe had not made ſome new Conqueſt: yet be pleaſed to know, Madam, that this Lady had a Mother called Anaxippa as wiſe and diſcreet a Mother as ever was, one whoſe Vertue was a little too ſevere, and condemned all innocent Recreations, and who had educated her Daughter in ſo great a conſtraint, that no ſuch things as Diverſions were ever named or heard of: And indeed, if Stenobea had been the Mother of Artelinda, and Anaxippa the Mother of Cleonice, there had been far greater ſuitableneſs amongſt thoſe four Perſons: For the frollick and gallant Humour of Stenobea made Cleonice often think time to be very tedious: And Stenobea would often complain againſt the too ſerious diſpoſition of her Daughter, and chide her for it ſecretly: Anaxippa could not endure the gadding humour of Artelinda; and Artelinda could not abide the ſtrict ſeverity of Anaxippa: The one would be continually in the Temple, at her Prayers; the other would be always abroad to ſee and be ſeen: however, Cleonice and Artelinda were near Neighbours, and viſited one another very often; and the contrarity of diſpoſition which was between them, and which in probability would have prevented frequency of Viſits, was a cauſe of their ofter being together than any others: For ſince Artelinda found always more Company at Stenobea's Houſe than at her Mothers, ſhe went thither very often; and ſince Cleonice found leſs Company at Anaxippa's Houſe than her Mothers, ſhe was there as oft as ſhe could; ſo that theſe two Beauties of contrary Humours were almoſt continually together: Stenobea was glad that Cleonice was often with Artelinda, hoping ſhe would drive her out of her ſerious and melancholy Mood; and Anaxippa alſo was well pleaſed that her Daughter ſhould be ever in the Company of Cleonice, hoping her modeſt and ſevere Example would correct the giddy Inclination of the other. Thus did Cleonice ſeek her ſolitude at Anaxippa's Houſes, and Artelinda ſeek her Servants at Stenobea's.

Cleonice endeavoured to reclaim Artelinda from her gadding Humours, and from letting her chief Felicity conſiſt in conquering of Hearts without number or choice; or having no other deſign in it but the vain-glory to make all that look on her in love with her. Yet Ligdamis was to be excepted, for ſhe could never ſubject him with all her Arts, do what ſhe could; for the truth was, Ligdamis never loved any, and in all likelihood never would; and though he was a moſt accompliſhed Gallant, yet was he ſo reſolutely oppoſite unto that Paſſion, that he not only would never be in Love, but alſo would never love thoſe that were; and upon that ſcore he broke off with an old Friend called Phocylides, becauſe he was of the ſame diſpoſition as Artelinda; and he had profeſſed Service to as many ſeveral Ladies, as ſhe had captivated Servants. Thus, Madam, you ſee the Humours of theſe four Perſons, which were moſt ſpoke of in Epheſus. Ligdamis a moſt accompliſhed Gallant, was eſteemed by all, though he would be a Friend but unto very few, nor would he love any at all: Phocylides he fell in love with all the Ladies in the Town, at leaſt ſeemed ſo: Artelinda had many Lovers, and would have had all: And Cleonice without any Intentions to captivate any at all, did captivate many; and the truth is, if ſhe would have given entertainment unto all that addreſſed themſelves unto her, the Empire of Artelinda had been ruined; but ſhe carried her ſelf with ſo much Wiſdom and Diſcretion, and was neither ſevere nor laviſh of her Favours; ſo that ſhe rid her ſelf of that multitude of Lovers which were of Artelinda's Humour, and ſhe did ſo publiſh it, that her Heart ſhould be hard to conquer, as there was very few in all the Town, who durſt have ſo good an opinion of themſelves, as to attempt it. Many a Lover ſighed at it, but ſighed in ſecret; yet one, whoſe name was Hermodorus, was to be excepted, for he did abſolutely quit the ſervice of Artelinda, and devoted himſelf and all his Services wholly unto Cleonice: but ſhe had no fancy at all unto him: and the jocund Humour of her Mother was ſo averſe unto her Diſpoſition, that ſhe did not at all anſwer his Addreſſes, but lived in Epheſus with ſo great an indifferency, that ſhe could be compared unto none but Ligdamis, who did ſometimes ſee her. In the mean time, ſince it were ſtrange that Friendſhip between two of ſuch contrary Humours as hers and Artelinda's, ſhould laſt long, Cleonice, as I told you before, would attempt to alter Artelinda, and would perſwade her, that ſhe did injure her own Beauty, by ſuffering ſo many to hope for the enjoyment of her Heart: For truly (ſaid Cleonice unto her, one day when they were alone together) you can never make me believe, that this multitude of Lovers which wait upon you in the Temples, in the Streets, in the Walks, and in every Houſe unto which you go, would ever wait, and ſo obſequiouſly follow you, without ſome hopes: and I can never believe they can have any hopes, unleſs you your ſelf did give them Life: For to ſpeak ſincerely unto you, I ſee ſome of your Adorers ſuch ill-favoured Men, that they can never flatter themſelves ſo much as to hope for any thing from you, unleſs you did flatter them, and beget thoſe Hopes in their Hearts. I do ingenuouſly confeſs, anſwered Artelinda, that I do ſo; for it is one of my beſt Recreations to deceive Men by fooling ſo with them, that they ſhould believe I love them. But, replied Cleonice, do you call that fooling, when you are in ſuch earneſt, as you make them believe they are in poſſeſſion of your Heart, and muſt hereafter, perhaps be of your Perſon alſo? O Cleonice, ſaid Artelinda, you go a little too far! the moſt favourable Action that I afforded my moſt eſteemed Lover, can never move ſuch a wicked thought in him. I believe I am not deceived ſo much as you are, replied Cleonice; for ſince it is commonly ſeen, that Lovers will hope even in the midſt of the moſt ſevere Behaviour towards them, how can you imagine that Men who are loaded with Favours, will not hope for any thing? No, no, replied Artelinda, miſtake me not, I am not ſo laviſh of my Favours, as to load any with them; and if I were not afraid you would diſcloſe my Secrets, I would diſcover the bottom of my Heart unto you, to the end I may juſtify my ſelf in your Opinion: But my dear Cleonice, I am very much afraid, that if I ſhould diſcover my Thoughts unto you, I ſhould my ſelf loſe my Empiredom over ſo many Hearts: for if you ſhould but joyn a little cunning unto thoſe charming Features in your Face, I were abſolutely undone, ſince I am certain all my Servants would then be wholly yours. You are ſo uſed to flatter, replied Cleonice, that you flatter even your very Friends; but Artelinda, that is not my deſire: however, to put you out of all Fears, I do faithfully promiſe you never to make any uſe of your Secret, and therefore be not afraid to diſcloſe your Reaſons unto me, if you have any that can perſwade there is any delight to be taken in being courted by a hundred Servants whom you neither love nor eſteem; for it is not credible you can at one and the ſame time love fair Men, black Men, great Men, little Men, Men that are ſerious, others that are frolick, ſome that are pleaſant and ſprightly, others that are Clowns, Blockheads and Fools: I ſay it is altogether impoſſible, that all theſe can ever have any place in your Heart. It is moſt true, replied Artelinda, and I aſſure you I do not deſire they ſhould. But why then, replied Cleonice, do you oblige them ſo much, ſince you do not love them? Becauſe I would have the pleaſure of being beloved, anſwered ſhe; for truly, Cleonice, what is Beauty good for, unleſs to captivate Hearts, and to erect an Empire, without a Scepter, or Throne, or Crown, and yet one gets abundance both of Subjects and Slaves? But they are Slaves, replied Cleonice, which are not ſerviceable, but in hopes to reign, and who puts you to a great deal of trouble to gild over their Fetters: for my part, ſaid ſhe, if ever I take any delight in captivating any, my Fetters ſhould be ſo harſh and heavy, that I ſhould never doubt of their Fidelity who ſubmitted to them. If I had any deſign to recompence them after their Patience, ſaid Artelinda, I ſhould do ſo alſo: but ſince my Ends are only to divert my ſelf, it would not be juſt to load them with ſuch Severities. However, Artelinda, replied Cleonice, you do expoſe your ſelf to a world of Cenſures and dangerous Conſequences. But wherein am I in any fault? replied ſhe: You are to blame in receiving Letters, anſwered Cleonice, and in anſwering ſome of them; you are continually abroad to ſee and be ſeen; you appoint ſecret Meetings, and fail not to obſerve them; and though I know all this be but to talk two or three Words in private, and to make a great ſecret of a buſineſs of nothing; yet for all that, it is an Appointment, it is a Secret; it is made a Myſtery, and by conſequence a Crime; becauſe to ſpeak the truth, Innocency ſeeks no ſuch Corners, but is open and free in all her Actions. Moreover, you uſe to receive and ſend many Tokens; you ſuffer them to ſteal your Picture, and ſometimes give it: and as for Ribands and ſuch fantaſtical Fooleries, there is not ſo many Colours as you have given Favours. I am not ſo much in fault as you conceive me, replied ſhe; for there is not a Man amongſt them all, which can brag of any Favour that ever I gave him, which in any reaſon deſerved the name of a fault; for truly, I cannot call any of thoſe which you have reckoned up by that name; nor can I ſee there is more ſin in them, than there is in dreſſing my ſelf, or curling my Hair; for thereby we uſe to procure Love; and by all thoſe ways for which you chide me thus, I do no more but catch ſome few Hearts, which would not be captivated by bare Beauty only. [Is not that enough? replied Cleonice: what would you do more? I would interrupt the courtſhip of all others, anſwered ſhe; make Wives and Miſtreſſes full of jealouſy, be loved of every one that looks upon me, move Hopes and Fears when I liſt, have a hundred Divertiſments to chuſe of; make Men compoſe Elogies and Verſes in my Commendation, that they talk of nothing but me, and follow me into all Places; and after all this, I will not engage my Heart any further than I pleaſe my ſelf in hearing others ſigh; and the truth is, I do love the Gallantry, but not the Gallant. There is too much danger in that, replied Cleonice; for in the end your Heart will be captivated before you are aware: Your cold reſervedneſs (replied Artelinda, and laughed) does much more expoſe you unto that Danger, than I am: I, I ſay, who am ſo accuſtomed unto Tears and Sighs, that my Heart is not moved at them: but you who are ſo ſevere, you will never admit of any ſuch things; if once a confident bold Lover chance to court you cloſe, and force you to hearken unto him, alas, two or three Tears will molify your Heart; or to ſpeak more properly, will kindle ſuch fire in it, as will make you love him, as well as you are beloved, and perhaps better: but pray Cleonice, tell me, what will you do with thoſe fair Eyes which the Gods have given you? I will obſerve, and wonder with them, replied ſhe, how artificially you uſe yours, and take all that comes near you; yet for all that Artelinda, there is not one amongſt all ſuch kind of Lovers as theſe, amongſt ten thouſand, that will make a good Husband. Sooner than amongſt thoſe of your ſerious Diſpoſition, replied ſhe; for to tell you truly, I am ſo afraid to meet with one of my Mother's Humour, that I am almoſt reſolved never to have any at all: Do not think Artelinda (replied Cleonice) that Youth will laſt ever. The Antipathy between old Age and young Gallantry is ſo great, that nothing can be more oppoſite: and what will you do when all your Gallants forſake you? Never look ſo far before (anſwered ſhe) for as for my part, I promiſe you I never will; nor will I be too prudent, leſt I be too miſerable: I will look in my Glaſs, and when the Roſes and Violets of my time begin to fade, I will ſit down, and ſet my Heart at reſt. If Souldiers ſhould continually contemplate upon all the Dangers that the fate of War may bring upon them, there would be but few Conquerors, or Conquered. But the Conqueſts of your Eyes, replied Cleonice, have ſo bad a title, that I can hardly call them Conqueſts: However, they are Conqueſts, anſwered ſhe; and admit I do loſe part of thoſe Hearts which I have ſubjected, yet the Honour is no leſs. Seriouſly, replied Cleonice, I am afraid you will never alter your Mind. No, no, ſincerely, anſwered Artelinda, I never ſhall. Why, do not you think my Life is more pleaſant than yours? and do you not repent of your too ſerious Gravity? No, no, replied ſhe, I do not, nor deſire I to be of your Temper: nor I of yours, replied Artelinda; therefore I pray you, let us both enjoy our own Opinions, and I believe we ſhall love each other the better for it: for truly if you were of mine, perhaps I ſhould extreamly hate you; and if I were of yours, doubtleſs we ſhould but jar and diſagree, ſay what we could. Cleonice ſeeing ſhe was not able to alter the Mind of Artelinda, did change diſcourſe, and preſently after left her: but as ſhe was ready to go out, ſhe called her back, and prayed her in a laughing manner, to ſend back unto her that fugitive Slave which ſhe had robb'd her of, meaning Hermodorus. It ſhall not be long of me, replied Cleonice, if he do not come and aſſume his firſt Fetters, But that's not enough, added ſhe, for I would not have you captivate the Heart of the inſenſible Ligdamis, whom I confeſs, I could never endure. There is ſo little Wiſdom in your Language, ſaid Cleonice, that I will not anſwer it; and you are ſo over-wiſe, replied Artelinda, that I think my folly to be much better than your wiſdom. Thus did theſe two Beauties part; Cleonice went unto her Cloſet to ſtudy, and Artelinda unto hers, to write unto ſome of her Gallants; for indeed, ſhe had nothing elſe to do. Moreover, Madam, this Lady had yet a moſt charming Modeſty in her Looks, notwithſtanding all her frolick Humours; and ſhe uſed ſuch art in all her Actions, that whoſoever ſaw her, and did not know her, would believe, that ſhe thought her ſelf much troubled with that multitude of Servants, which her ſelf had ſubjected, and did carefully preſerve them.

As for Cleonice, her buſineſs was quite contrary; for ſhe did love her Study and her Books, better than all her Mother's Gallants, or Artelinda's Servants, or the Complaints of Hermodorus: And yet ſhe was a Lover of Company, but it was the Company of choice and rational Men; and ſince ſhe was not Miſtreſs of her ſelf, becauſe ſhe depended upon her Mother, whoſe Humours were ſo oppoſite unto hers, ſhe did exceedingly force her ſelf, and inſenſibly grew not only a horrible Hater of all Gallantry and Gallants; but alſo a Condemner of Love in general, as a Paſſion the moſt dangerous of all others: yet did ſhe ſee Artelinda every day, and continually ſaw her Mother's Chamber full of thoſe kind of Men, who make open profeſſion of never going unto any place often without ſome hid Deſign; who are always very earneſt, and yet have not any other buſineſs but to make it thought they are loved, and are in Love, and are ever more careful to perſwade the firſt of theſe, than the ſecond. Cleonice ſaw all this, but the Gods know, much againſt her Mind, and therefore with no delight at all. About this time, I my ſelf had the Happineſs to be in the Catalogue of her Friends, my Humour being not ſo contrary unto hers, as Artelinda's; and as Ligdamis was my Kinſman, ſo I was very well acquainted with him; and would often ſay, that ſince there was ſuch a ſympathy of Inclinations between him and Cleonice, I wondred they did not ſee one another ſometimes; when I met Ligdamis, I would ſay as much to him; ſo that acquainting both of them with each others Humours, they knew one another better by my Relation, than they did before; for their Converſation was wont to be ſo general and confuſed, by reaſon of much Company which viſited Stenobea, that they very ſeldom ſpoke one unto another; yet after my Deſcriptions of Cleonice unto Ligdamis, he uſed to ſee her ofter than uſual; and ſince I was there almoſt every day, we met very often, and diverted our ſelves more conveniently than we were uſually accuſtomed: for whilſt Stenobea was entertaining one part of the Company; and Artelinda buſy in captivating new Lovers, or keeping the old ones; and whilſt Phocylides was languiſhing for many Ladies at once and in the ſame place, Ligdamis, Cleonice and my ſelf, did in the mean time make our ſelves very merry at them. And indeed there is no better ſport than to ſtand by and obſerve this kind of univerſal Courtſhip and Folly; for commonly all their Actions and Words are ſo contrary to all Reaſon and Wiſdom, that queſtionleſs, better ſport cannot be to an unintereſted Looker-on, than to obſerve them. At the firſt, Cleonice was very ſhie, and had not any ſuch confidence in Ligdamis, as before him to mock at the Paſſages we ſaw: And being one day alone with her in her Chamber, I told her, ſhe did wrong her ſelf, in paſſing away her Life without any particular Converſation with any. I do confeſs it Iſmenea (ſaid ſhe unto me) for certainly in the humour I am in, if I had the diſpoſe of my own ſelf, I ſhould let the Sweetneſs of my Life conſiſt in the Friendſhip and Converſation of a ſelect Number of choice and rational Men, who know what true Honour is, and love it; ſuch as are not capable of being deluded by gilded Follies, but look upon things as really they are in themſelves, and do not make their Felicity to conſiſt in ridiculous Fooleries. But alas Iſmenea, where are ſuch Perſons to be found? For firſt, all Women which I know, are of three or four ſeveral kinds; ſome are Weather-Cocks, others are wiſe, but dull; ſome have Wit and Vertue, but ſo crabbed and harſh, that they are not pleaſant; others again are crafty and wicked: The fair ones, commonly are envious and jealous; the witty and ſprightly ones proud; the Fools are inſufferable; and too much Gallantry is horrid unto me: Who then would you have me keep Company with? It is very true, replied I, for moſt of the Epheſian Women at this Day, are ſuch as you have deſcribed: Yet believe me, there are ſome compleat Men which are worthy of Friendſhip. Ah, Iſmenea, ſaid ſhe unto me, it is as hard a matter to find them amongſt Men, as Women: But I do confeſs, that if it were poſſible to find out ſuch a rare Man as can be conſtant in all his Actions, not love a hundred at once, as Phocylides, but can, as I do, abſolutely condemn this fooliſh affected Paſſion of Love, his Company were worth keeping: For I muſt needs acknowledg, that a well accompliſhed and rational Man, knows more than the wiſeſt Woman; his Wit is of a higher Strain, his Diſcourſe is more agreeable; he can be more complacential unto a Lady, than Ladies can be to one another; and to tell you truly, there is ſuch a kind of Diſpoſition in me, which proceeds from ſome cauſe which I am ignorant of, that makes me think ſuch Friendſhip more tender and ſolid than any other: But yet my dear Iſmenea, this Man I ſpeak of, muſt be ſuch a one as I ſpeak of, and not at all amorouſly diſpoſed; for I do profeſs if he be, I ſhall never truſt my ſelf with him.

As we were in this Diſcourſe, Ligdamis comes into the Chamber, who ſeeing Stenobea was not within, deſired to ſee Cleonice. I no ſooner ſaw him enter, but I roſe up, and ſaid unto him; Come, Ligdamis, for if you be not ſuch a Man as Cleonice looks for, I ſhall never find him as long as I live. Really Iſmenea, ſaid ſhe unto me, I ſhall take it very ill, if you tell Ligdamis what I ſaid unto you. You may take it ill if you pleaſe, ſaid I unto her, and laughed, yet I muſt needs tell him of that wonderfully Sympathie which is between you: And then I told him ſome part of what we had ſpoken. Muſt it not needs be confeſſed, there is a ſtrange Conformity between you and Cleonice, ſince you have caſt off Phocylides, becauſe he was too full of Courtſhip; and he hath almoſt caſt off Artelinda, becauſe ſhe hath too many Servants? How, ſaid Cleonice, hath Ligdamis caſt off Phocylides, becauſe he was amorouſly diſpoſed? Yes, Madam, replied ſhe, for I will never truſt any Man of that paſſionate Profeſſion; and more then that, I do not intend to truſt any, for thoſe which are not in Love, may hereafter be, and therefore I will keep my Secrets lock'd up in my own Heart. But, Madam, Iſmenea has forced me to ſpeak that which perhaps will ruin me in your good Opinion; ſince being fair as you are, and making many love you, as you have done, it is no Diſcretion to tell you, I am a Hater of that Paſſion which you have ſo often cauſed. Oh! Ligdamis, ſaid Cleonice, I am infinitely joyed to ſee ſo compleat a Man as you are, of my Opinion: for truly I did think that nothing in the World could be more prejudicial unto us than an amorous Friend: For my part, I am an Enemy to the Paſſion, and I beſeech you do me the favour to acquaint me with all the ill Conſequences that Love hath cauſed in you, to the end I may be more confirmed in my Hatred againſt that Paſſion. Thanks be to the Gods, Madam, it has not done me much Hurt, replied he, although it have my Friends: But, Madam, not to tire you with any long Relations, let me only tell you, that as I was going into Greece, I met with Phocylides, and contracted a great League of Friendſhip with him: So that travelling three Months together, I opened my very Heart unto him: Yet we were no ſooner returned to Epheſus, but he had communicated all my Secrets amongſt his Miſtreſſes; and ſome of them being none of the moſt diſcreet, had ſquandred thoſe things up and down all the Town, which I had ſo ſecretly kept in the Cloſet of my Heart: And therefore I have experimentally found the Danger of truſting an amorous Friend. But Ligdamis, ſaid I unto him, all Men are not ſo fooliſh and indiſcreet as Phocylides. I do aſſure you, replied Cleonice, all Lovers are alike, and no Difference is to be made between them: For, ſaid ſhe, Love works ſuch an abſolute change in all thoſe in whom it is predominate, that there is no Truſt to be repoſed in them. I remember, a little before I came from Claſomenes, there was a Man whoſe Name was Cleanor, who profeſſed abundance of Friendſhip unto me; he was perpetually at my Lodging, he could not live out of my Sight, he told me the whole Cabinet of his Heart; I never ſaw him either reſerved or unquiet, he was infinitely indulgent to pleaſe me, and all this without any Profeſſions of Love. But I wondered to ſee him altered upon a ſudden: He fell into a conſtant mode of muſing; and I do confeſs I feared that he loved me a little too well; I found preſently after that, that I was deceived, for I knew his Mind: His longeſt Viſits laſted not above half an Hour; he would never tell me any News, or any more of his Secrets; all ſuch things as were wont to divert him before, did now diſpleaſe him; and he was ſo abſolutely altered from the Humour he was in before he was in Love, that one would not have thought him the ſame Man. One day as I taxed him with it, he to excuſe himſelf, confeſſed the whole Truth, that he was in love with a Lady; and after this, he would never talk of any other thing, but of her he loved; inſomuch as he became ſo inſufferable, as I could not endure him.

Then, Madam, ſince I was extreamly glad, that Cleonice and Ligdamis were ſo well acquainted, I put my Vie amongſt them, to give them further Subject of Diſcourſe, and to that end I made a third amongſt them: Truly Cleonice, ſaid I unto her, you go a little too far; for there is a vaſt Difference between Giddineſs and Love: you may condemn the one, but muſt make ſome Exceptions of the other. Not at all, ſaid Cleonice; for I aſſure you, a reſolute Lover is as unfit to make a Friend of, as any of thoſe common Lovers, who love in ſo many Places, that they love no where: And truly, I believe, theſe laſt ſort are more pleaſant Company than the other. Truly, ſaid Ligdamis, the fair Cleonice ſpeaks abundance of Reaſon: for they whoſe Minds are not too much taken up with Thoughts, are always beſt Society; they talk of Muſick, and Balls, and Walks, and Feaſts, and all Delights, wherein others have a ſhare; but a ſerious and real Lover, the more amorous and faithful he is, the more reſerved and more cloſe he is to himſelf, and rather troubles than communicates any Joys unto others. But Ligdamis, ſaid Cleonice, do you ſpeak really as you think, without any Diſſimulation? But, Madam, ſaid he, I beſeech you tell me truly, is it poſſible a Woman that is admirably fair, and infinitely loved, can have a Soul ſo great, as to contemn thoſe Trifles in which the Felicity of fair ones do moſt commonly conſiſt? Ah, Madam, if you be ſuch a one, certainly Men ought not to love you, but infinitely to adore you: for there is nothing upon Earth more rare, than to ſee a fair Woman not deſire that her Eyes ſhould burn all thoſe they ſhine upon; for, Madam, all fair Eyes are moſt commonly malevolent Stars, the Influence of which, brings Miſery upon Men: For fair ones, to ſpeak in general, are not contented that Men ſhould only render Homage, and offer Incenſe; but they require more ſad Sacrifices: a thouſand Hearts reduced to Aſhes, can hardly appeaſe them; a quick and ſpeedy Death cannot ſatisfy their Cruelty, but they muſt inflict long and violent Torments: Their higheſt Felicity is to make Men miſerable. And ſince ſo, Madam, how can I believe that you, whoſe Beauty tranſcends all others that ever I ſaw, can ſo abſolutely renounce all the Sweets of this imaginary Empire, which Beauties do pretend to have over all Hearts? you eſpecially, who can more ſollidly eſtabliſh that Empiredom than any other. I cannot conſent, ſaid Cleonice, that I have Beauty enough, either to conquer or raign: But had I as much as were requiſite for it, yet the Examples of others ſhould preſerve me from any ſuch Imbecility; for really, I think nothing ſo cruel, as to make all that comes near us out of their Wits, and to hazard the being out of them our ſelves; for let them talk what they will, Love is a moſt peſtilent contagious Diſeaſe. You your ſelf, replied I, were never yet infected by any, though I have often ſeen ſome in your Company, who had that Diſeaſe upon them: When by chance ſuch a Miſery is upon me, replied ſhe, I have ſuch admirable Antidotes againſt it, that I do not fear my Loſs of that Health which I enjoy. Madam, replied Ligdamis, though you cannot love any, nor will permit any to love you, yet I hope you will admit me upon terms of Friendſhip without Offence; and will not forbid me to hope for the Happineſs of obtaining that Honour from you; otherwiſe I ſhould blame you. The choice of Friends, replied ſhe, is a Buſineſs of ſo great a Difficulty, that there is a Neceſſity of more Prudence, than Civility or Generoſity; but I do think that Friends and Confidents to be a high Happineſs; yet (as I ſaid unto Iſmenea, before you came in) I will never have any amorous Friend, nor one that is wholly engaged, nor any that is courted with a thouſand Gallants, neither will I admit of proud ones, or Fools, or Dotards, nor of one that wholly is taken up with the Æconomy of his Houſe. In a Word, were I to chooſe a Friend, he ſhould have a pure Mind, a good Wit, and a high Soul; one that I might love, as I might love a Brother, without the leaſt Thoughts of Gallantry and idle Courtſhip; one to whom I might impart all my Thoughts, and conſequently one that is rational; but above all, one that is not in Love, and gives me good Aſſurance that he never will be. Ligdamis and I began to laugh at Cleonice's Diſcourſe: Madam, ſaid I unto her, why do you not make choice of Ligdamis, to be this intimate Friend you look for? I have not all thoſe good Qualities which ſhe deſires, replied he; and Cleonice is too fair to aſſure me of her Friendſhip, ſince it is not credible but ſome one of that thouſand of her Lovers, and the Diſeaſe which ſhe hath cauſed in them, will be too ſtrong for that Antidote which ſhe ſaith ſhe hath. I perceive, Ligdamis, ſaith Cleonice, that you are afraid to be too far engaged; but let it not trouble you, ſince in the Humour I am in, I ſhall not be over-haſty to diſpoſe of my Friendſhip. You have good Reaſon, ſaid he unto her, for Friendſhip is a thing too precious to be contracted in ſo ſhort a time: however, Madam, I beſeech you give me leave to eſteem you with all the Faculties of my Soul, and ſtay until you ſhall think me worthy of your Friendſhip. As they were thus in Diſcourſe, Artelinda came in, with two or three of her Servants at her Heels, and made her change the Subject of her Diſcourſe. Ligdamis ſtaid ſtill, and changed not his Place, but did ſit all that Afternoon between Cleonice and me. Preſently after her, five or ſix other Beauties entred, and after them Phocylides and Hermodorus, who ſince they could not get near Cleonice, were ſo melancholy and diſordered, as I could not chuſe but laugh. After general Diſcourſe had laſted a long time, wherein the Talk was of News, of Horſe-Races, and Faſhions, and ſuch like, Artelinda whiſpered one of her Servants in the Ear, and whilſt ſhe was holding him Talk a long while, it was good Sport unto us, that had nothing elſe to do but obſerve, to ſee how nettled the reſt were at it; and I never paſſed an Afternoon away with more Pleaſure: ſometimes Cleonice would purpoſely ask a Queſtion of one of them, and then he would anſwer two Words, and turn preſently away to obſerve Artelinda, in hopes to gueſs by her Countenance at what ſhe ſaid unto their Rival. When ſhe laughed, we might ſee three or four of them at a time, knit their Brows and frown, ſo that it was impoſſible but we muſt laugh for Company: Then Artelinda, to appeaſe one of them which ſhe had netled, would quit the other ſhe had whiſpered with, and talk unto him; then would ſhe look whether any of the reſt were jealous,, and to comfort them alſo, ſhe would talk with every one of them in their turn: on the other ſide, Phocylides was no leſs buſy than Artelinda; for being deſirous to make Cleonice and three or four others believe he loved them, his Looks, his Heart, his Mind, his Wit and Tongue were all ſo divided amongſt them, that he ſeemed to be a little diſtracted; for he had no ſooner done ſpeaking with one, but he immediately accoſted another; he looked upon one, and talked with another: he ſometimes talked, ed, and ſomẽtimes ſighed ſo much, and was ſo extreamly puzled, that we pittied him. All this while the poor Hermodorus ſpoke not a Word, and was ſo vexed, that he could not ſpeak in private with Cleonice, that it was good ſport alſo to obſerve him: when he was forced to ſpeak, he would contradict every thing in the World, unleſs when one commended the Beauty of Cleonice. But to augment the Averſion which Cleonice and Ligdamis had unto Love; by chance there was a very compleat Gallant of the Town, who had been long in love, came to ſee Cleonice, ſince his Affection was very well known, there was many Eyes upon him. When this Lover entered, it was good ſport to ſee with what care he endeavoured to ſeat himſelf next her he loved: and at his firſt Entrance, he was not ſo obſervant to ſalute Cleonice, as he was to ſee where his Miſtreſs was, that he might ſeat himſelf cloſe by her; yet he was diſappointed, for Cleonice craftily cauſed a Chair to be given him in another Place: but however, he made a ſhift, for ſeeming to have private Buſineſs with Phocylides, he roſe up and whiſperd him in the Ear, and afterwards went unto his Miſtreſs, and ſat by her. At the firſt, they ſpoke aloud, and the Lady made ſome Signs he ſhould not begin to talk privately ſo ſoon: but they began inſenſibly to ſpeak in a low Voice, and by little and little did ſo forget that they were in Company, that they ſpoke as high as if none had been in the Room with them, and did ſo publickly diſcover themſelves, that really I was aſhamed of them. Well Iſmenea, ſaid Cleonice in a low Voice unto me, is not all manner of Love a moſt ridiculous thing? and muſt not it and all kind of Gallantry be utterly condemned? Ligdamis being deſirous to intrude, and hear what they ſaid, Cleonice did civilly thruſt him back: No, no, ſaid ſhe unto him, we are not upon thoſe terms yet. Why, Madam, ſaid he unto her, you uſe me as if I were a devoted Servant, though I have diſclaimed that Quality for ever: you are ſo fit to be one when you will, replied ſhe, that I cannot yet truſt your Words.

By this time the Night came on, and the Company broke up; when all was gone, Cleonice was ſo pleaſant, and ſo full of Satyrical Expreſſions againſt all kind of Gallants and Gallantry, that in all my Life I never ſaw her in a more jocund Humour. Ligdamis came unto me the next Morning to talk of Cleonice, who had ſo charmed him, that he could not enough admire her, deſiring me to imploy my beſt Endeavours that he might become her Friend; and I without any Reſiſtance did make him a Promiſe that I would, yet not aſſuring him I could obtain it: There did he ſeek for all handſom Opportunities to ſee her, ofter than uſual; but ſince there was always much Company at the Houſe of Stenobea, he went ſometimes unto Anaxippa's, where ſhe often uſed to be, eſpecially when Artelinda was not there, preferring the Company of the Mother before the Daughter's, though her Vertue was of over ſevere a ſtrain; yet whereſoever he met her, he ſtill expreſſed how great an Enemy he was unto Love, and being a Man of an excellent Wit, he expreſſed himſelf in ſuch ſignificant terms, as he highly advanced himſelf in Cleonice's Eſteem. Ligdamis being with her one Day at her own Houſe, when Stenobea was gone into the Walks with half the Town following her, he began a freſh to court her for her Friendſhip, and the ſooner to obtain it, he proteſted unto her that he was not in Love. I do believe it Ligdamis, ſaid ſhe unto him; but what Aſſurance can you give me, that you will not hereafter be ſo? I can give you that Aſſurance my ſelf, Madam, anſwered he; for moſt infallibly, ſince I am not in Love with you, I ſhall never be with any: you are abſolutely the faireſt that ever I ſaw, your Wit tranſcends the higheſt Meaſure of any I know, either Man or Woman; your Vertue raviſhes me, your Converſation charms me; and notwithſtanding all theſe, my Heart apprehends only reſpective and reverent Thoughts of you: I muſt needs ingenuouſly acknowledg, that I extreamly love you in the Degree and Quality of Friendſhip, but it is without any exorbitant or unquiet Deſires: Therefore, Madam, ſince ſo much Beauty, Wit, Vertue; ſo much Eſteem, and ſo great a Diſpoſition to love you, has not had that Influence upon my Heart, you are ſafe, and need not refuſe my Friendſhip, nor deny me yours. Love me, Madam, as you love Iſmenea, and if you pleaſe a little more; for ſince I reſolve to love none upon Earth but you, methinks in reaſon you ſhould not refuſe to love me a little more than any other. You expreſs your Friendſhip in ſuch obliging terms, replied Cleonice, and bluſhed, that methinks I ought to ſuſpect you: But Ligdamis, do not deceive your ſelf, I deſire Sincerity; and though I am confident you are not in love with me, yet perhaps you think I am one of thoſe who only change the Name of the thing, but can well enough endure a Lover under the Notion of a Friend: Take heed therefore what you deſire of me, and know, that the Friendſhip which I ever can either give or take, is, and ſhall be a moſt conſtant real Friendſhip, without any Folly or fond Thoughts: I would only have you love me, as one brave Man may love another; and I ſhall love you, as I ſhould love a vertuous Woman, if I knew any worthy of my entire Affection. I ask no more, anſwered Ligdamis. But firſt, ſaid ſhe, I would have you bind your ſelf by an Oath, that if ever you ſhould be ſo unfortunate as to fall in love with any Beauty, to tell it unto me the ſame Hour; to the end I may aſſiſt you with my Counſels, and fortify your Reaſon; and in caſe you cannot become free, I may be abſolved from your Friendſhip; for I ſeriouſly declare, that if ever you be in Love, I ſhall be no longer your Friend. But, Madam, ſaid he unto her, and ſmiled, ſuppoſe I ſhould fall in love with your ſelf, what muſt I do then? muſt I acquaint you with it as ſoon as ever I perceive it? No, ſaid ſhe, I like not that: What then muſt I do? replied he: you muſt wreſtle with your Paſſion, anſwered ſhe, and overcome it, without ever telling me; and though you cannot overcome it, yet be ſure to hide it ſo from me, that I ſhall never know it. But, anſwered he, all the World ſays Love cannot be hid. Then you muſt hide your ſelf, replied ſhe, and never ſee me again; yet added ſhe and ſmiled, I hope that will never come to paſs; for the Spring can never bring forth more Roſes in my Cheeks than it hath: I have as much Beauty as ever I ſhall have; and ſince it has had no Operation to move you hitherto, you may be confident it never will, and by conſequence our Friendſhip will be eternal. I chanced to come in to them as they were upon theſe Terms, and they acquainted me with the Conditions of their Friendſhip: But, ſaid Ligdamis, ſince I promiſe you faithfully never to love any, and if, to my Misfortune I ſhould, to acquaint you with it; May not I ask ſome Aſſurance againſt Hermodorus, and all the reſt of your Lovers and Adorers? For my part, ſaid I, and interrupted them, I conceive it reaſonable, Cleonice ſhould make a reciprocal Promiſe. I refuſe it not, replied ſhe, for I am ſo certain never to love any, that I do engage my ſelf unto it.

Thus, Madam, after much ſuch Diſcourſe as this, the Friendſhip between Ligdamis and Cleonice was contracted; and for the more abſolute confirmation of it, they both of them vented a thouſand Invectives againſt all Love and Lovers. Since that day, Ligdamis eſteemed himſelf ſo happy, that he ſaid, he never began to live, till ſince he was acquainted with Cleonice; and ſhe alſo was ſo well pleaſed with him, that ſhe hath given me a million of Thanks for contributing unto their Friendſhip. Then did there ariſe a great Confidence between them: Ligdamis was never upon any Deſign, but he did communicate it unto Cleonice. Whenſoever he went unto the Court, it was with her Approbation and Order; and ſhe had ſuch an abſolute Power over his Life, that ſhe did regulate him in Matters of his Acquaintance: She made him caſt off ſome Friends, and take in others; yet all this without any imperious Tyranny. Ligdamis alſo was acquainted with ſome of her ſecret Thoughts; ſhe imparted to him a thouſand Domeſtick Grievances, which the Humour of Stenobea cauſed; ſhe ſincerely told him her Thoughts of all, and diſcovered the very bottom of her Soul unto him. And ſince ſhe had not only a great and piercing Wit of her own, but alſo did, with abundance of pains, daily add knowledg unto it, to ſhew the vaſt Treaſure of her Knowledg, ſhe would often inſtruct Ligdamis in many things which her Modeſty made Secrets of unto any elſe. When he was at the Army with the Prince Artamas, he would write unto her, and ſhe to him again, and that in ſuch a ſtrain, as her Letters made him almoſt as happy as her Preſence did. Afterwards Stenobea went unto Sardis, and carried her Daughter with her. And ſince Ligdamis thought he might be ſerviceable unto her, he went thither alſo. And indeed he rendred her a moſt conſiderable good Office during that Voyage: for being very eminent in the War, the Prince Artamas, who as you know was then called Cleander, loved him very dearly; ſo that he made uſe of him in her Buſineſs. Moreover, if Ligdamis met with any pleaſing News, he never was at reſt until he had communicated it unto Cleonice, who was as complacential unto him again; ſo that a very great Confidence was between them. One Paſſage fell out, which was like to have begun a little kind of Quarrel between them; for Hermodorus was ſo importunate with Cleonice, whether ſhe would or no, that ſhe was forced to anſwer him in ſuch, both plain and ſincere Language, as he was compelled to reſt quiet; and indeed ſhe was ſo bitter againſt him, that I wonder he did not retort: For as he was preſſing her to give him ſome Reaſons, why he ſhould for ever give over all hopes: Since you will needs know, ſaid ſhe unto him, it is for two Reaſons; the one, becauſe I am fully reſolved never to love any, nor ſuffer any ſhould love me; the other, becauſe though I did reſolve to love one, yet of all Men living it ſhould not be Hermodorus: Therefore if you be wiſe, regulate your ſelf according to this Anſwer, which without any diſſimulation proceeds from the full Reſolves of my Heart.

After Cleonice had pronounced this diſmal Sentence upon this unfortunate Lover, ſhe told it unto Ligdamis and my ſelf; and both of us returned her many Thanks, becauſe Hermodorus did often interrupt our Converſation. But afterwards we underſtood that Artelinda, whoſe Humour was to ſubject all Hearts that were Rebels to Love, had uſed a thouſand Stratagems unto him which he never acquainted us withal; which did ſo much incenſe Cleonice againſt him, that I had much ado to appeaſe her: yet acquainting him with her Reſentments, he went immediately unto her, and told her, That the Reaſon why he never acquainted her with it, was out of his Modeſty, to hide the groſs Follies of Artelinda. So that this Reconciliation did tie the Knot of Friendſhip faſter than ever; and I think it might be ſaid, that their Affections had all the tenderneſs of Love, without any Irregulation or Diſtemper; for they had as much delight in ſeeing and talking with one another, as if they had been the deepeſt Lovers, without all the impatient Conſequences of it; and they came to that height, that they were jealous without Love: for Cleonice was in continual fears that Ligdamis ſhould fall in love; and he again was infinitely afraid that ſome Lover or other would ſteal the Heart of Cleonice from him; for both of them were perſwaded (and perhaps not without reaſon) that a great Love and a great Friendſhip were impoſſible to be together in one and the ſame Heart. This kind of Jealouſy yet had no bitterneſs in it, nor produced any ſad Conſequences; but on the contrary, made their Converſation more obliging and delightful. Theſe two eſteemed themſelves exceedingly happy; and Cleonice, for her part, was ſo well-pleaſed, that ſhe trimmed up her ſelf; yet did ſhe ſhun Artelinda as much as ever ſhe could, whoſe falſe vain-glorious Humour was every day more and more horrid unto her. And truly, ſince we know all her Actions by means of Phocylides, who the more to oblige Cleonice, told her all, we were very ſorry that one who was brought up under ſo vertuous a Mother, ſhould be guilty of ſo much folly; for her Heart was ſtill thirſting after Conqueſt upon Conqueſt, without any diſtinction or choice at all. Then, as the Temple of Diana did draw abundance of Strangers unto Epheſus; there came not a Man of any Quality unto that place, whom ſhe did not endeavour to captivate; and certainly ſhe did effect her Endeavours, for every one became her Servants. As Cleonice, Ligdamis, and I were one day ſeeking out for a Reaſon why one and the ſame Beauty ſhould pleaſe and take ſo many different Humours, and Strangers ſo far diſtant; we concluded that Hope was the cauſe of it. For (to ſpeak in general) it is hard for a Man to ſee a fair and young Lady, (whoſe Affability makes Men think the Conqueſt of her is no Impoſſibility) and not to tie himſelf a-while unto her Service, though it be only out of Curioſity. Alſo it might almoſt be ſaid, a Man had been diſhonoured, if he had not ſome Favour or other from Artelinda, and much more if he continued long in her Service. But though we were much aſtoniſhed that Artelinda ſhould captivate ſo many, yet we did much more wonder how Phocylides could delude ſo many; for we know of ſix or ſeven Ladies in Epheſus, who thought themſelves paſſionately loved; and we concluded that we were much obliged unto Heaven for inſpiring us with more reaſonable Thoughts.

In the mean while, the frequent Viſits that Ligdamis made unto Cleonice, began to make a great noiſe, and wound the Mind of Artelinda, who could not believe there could be any Society between a Man and a Woman without Courtſhip; and ſince ſhe was vexed to the Soul, that all her Stratagems could never have any Effect upon the Heart of Ligdamis, ſhe began to hate both of them extreamly. Phocylides alſo even deſperate that he could never move the Mind of Cleonice, and ſuſpecting the Favour of Ligdamis was the Cauſe, did alſo hate them: And both of them plotting how to be revenged of them, took different ways to bring it to paſs; for Artelinda attempted to make Cleonice jealous, and Phocylides Ligdamis.

Artelinda, though ſhe did viſit Cleonice ſeldomer than ordinary, yet ſometimes ſhe did ſee her: And one day being both together, Artelinda took occaſion to ſpeak of all the Reprehenſions which Cleonice twitted her withal concerning the freeneſs of her Behaviour; and being one of the cunningeſt Women upon Earth, and the moſt flattering, after an hundred obliging Complements, Was not the Reaſon (ſaid ſhe unto her) why you did ſo inſenſibly decline my Friendſhip, becauſe you believed all I ſaid unto you one day when we were alone together, was my real Thoughts? It is very true, I did ſo; and I found your Actions and Words to agree ſo well, that I cannot think I did you any wrong in that behalf. If that belief, anſwered ſhe, did not loſe me your Affection, I ſhould not much care: As for the World in general, I have long ſince ſet up my reſt ſo much above all it can either ſay or think, that I value it not : But I ſet a much higher rate upon you, my dear Cleonice, (ſaid ſhe, with extream diſſimulation) for it would grieve me to the Soul to be excluded your Heart; therefore I beſeech you be ſo ſincere as to tell me, whether you can afford me your Affection, as long as I continue this courſe? Cleonice thinking Artelinda had ſpoke ſincerely, conſidering her Expreſſions, did ingenuouſly confeſs that ſhe could not ſeparate her Friendſhip and her Eſteem from one another; and that ſhe could not poſſibly eſteem one who was ſo weak as to ſacrifice her real Honour for an imaginary Chimera of Vain-glory, as ſhe did, by having continually at leaſt a thouſand Adorers about her. But deceive not your ſelf, for all theſe Flatterers do not love you ſo well as you believe; and for proof of it, do but take their Hopes from them one Month, and you ſhall ſee how they will fall off: Not that there is any Imperfection in your Beauty, or that you want any excellent Qualities that would render you moſt accompliſhed, if you did not ſpoil them by your Behaviour: But the Truth is, I do know thoſe whom you deceive, and who deceive you, better than you do, and ſee with more unintereſted Eyes, and freer Judgment, the Precipice from which you are like to fall. Moreover, how do you imagine I ſhould truſt one who deceives all that come near her by diſſembling her Thoughts, and divides her Heart amongſt a thouſand Men whom I do not eſteem? And therefore blame me not if I do not love you. Were you only poſſeſſed with a violent Paſſion, though I ſhould not confide in your Friendſhip, yet I ſhould pity you, and hope ſo to cure you, that hereafter I might love you: But the Diſeaſe wherewith you are infected, I ſee is incurable, and I thought fit to decline you as much as Civility will permit. Ah my dear Cleonice! ſaid ſhe, how much do you miſtake me? But the ſooner to obtain your Pity, if not your Friendſhip, (ſaid this crafty Woman) I will confeſs, with a bluſh, what I have a long time concealed; and I will no longer conceal that Perſon whom, of all the Earth, I love the beſt next after——. Artelinda ſtopt at theſe words; and covering her Face with her

Fan to hide her Shame, ſhe ſtood a while ſilent. Then ſeeming to be a little better recollected, Pardon me, dear Cleonice, ſaid ſhe unto her, that my Diſcourſe and Mind ſhould be in ſuch diſorder; for being ready to confeſs that which I never did unto any, I found ſome contradiction in my ſelf; and though my Will prompted me to diſcover the bottom of my Heart unto you, yet my Mouth would not permit me to pronounce his Name, who is the cauſe why I live as I do. Cleonice not knowing what Artelinda meant, but being very deſirous of it; I do ſo little underſtand you, ſaid ſhe unto her, that I cannot return any Anſwer. But you ſhall underſtand me preſently, replied Artelinda, and ſighed: Know therefore, my dear Cleonice, that I am ſo far from affecting an univerſal Courtſhip, that I think my ſelf the moſt unhappy Woman upon Earth, for I am engaged in the moſt firm and conſtant Affection that ever was. How? replied Cleonice, Can Artelinda love firmly and conſtantly? If I could believe that, though I condemn Love in all others, yet I think I ſhould pardon it in her. Pardon me then, ſaid ſhe, for the truth is, what you do condemn me for, proceeds from one whom I love a thouſand times above my ſelf, and one who orders the whole Courſe of my Life. And will this happy Lover, ſaid Cleonice, permit you to favour a thouſand others? Certainly he does, replied ſhe, and purpoſely to hide that real Paſſion which is in both our Souls: for ſo it is, that if once our Affection ſhould come to be known, our Happineſs would be for ever ruined; and the carriage of it hitherto hath been ſo cloſe, that none in all Epheſus can ſuſpect any thing of that innocent Intelligence that is between us. Yet I think it ſomething ſtrange, ſaid Cleonice, that he ſhould let you paſs, in the Opinion of the World, for what you are not. When there is no other way to be happy, replied ſhe, that courſe muſt be taken. Will he not be jealous of thoſe he permits you to favour? ſaid Cleonice. Very oft, replied ſhe, and that's the reaſon why ſometimes I caſt off thoſe whom he thinks I love beſt. Thus, dear Cleonice, when you thought me ſo pleaſant and gay, having a thouſand Adorers about me, then, then; even then, was I moſt to be pitied; for I always ſaw thoſe I loved not, but ſeldom him whom I did love: Judg therefore, dear Cleonice, whether you did not uſe me cruelly in denying me your Friendſhip, and in taxing me with ſo many Follies. I deſire to be pardoned for not naming him who hath my Heart; but I had rather you ſhould gueſs who it is, if it be poſſible. I am not to be too preſſing into the Secrets of another, replied Cleonice, and therefore I will try if I can hit upon him. But however, Artelinda, though I pity you more than I did, yet I blame you no leſs; for whoſoever your Lover is, I cannot allow of ſacrificing your Honour to his capricious Fancy. If I ſhould name him, replied ſhe, perhaps you would forbear your Cenſure, for there is not in the World a wiſer Man than he.

Thus, Madam, did this Conference paſs, which did exceedingly puzzle Cleonice, for ſhe ſuſpected ſome Trick in it: But yet not knowing very well what to think of it, ſhe kept it to her ſelf, and did not impart it either unto Ligdamis or me. Some few days paſſed on in theſe Thoughts, and then ſhe went to viſit Artelinda, who expected her with much impatience, and prepared to receive her in private, whenſoever ſhe came. She no ſooner heard ſhe was coming, but ſhe ſet a little Box open upon the Table, in which were divers things, and among others there was a Letter laid upon the top of them, which had this Superſcription:

Ligdamis to the ſair Artelinda.

Preſently this cunning Woman retired into her Cloſet, imagining in all likelihood that Cleonice would find this Letter, and know the Hand, and perhaps take it with her. And indeed ſhe was not deceived; for Cleonice was no ſooner come into the Room, but ſeeing this Box upon the Table, ſhe went towards it, thinking to find ſome pretty Knacks which might pleaſe her: as ſoon as ſhe caſt her Eyes upon it, ſhe knew it to be the hand-writing of Ligdamis; and no ſooner knew it, but took it up; and no ſooner took it up, but hearing Artelinda coming, hid it, and ſeemed to rumble up and down all that was in the Box; and ſhe ſaid ſhe looked not for Letters, but for ſome Verſes only. Artelinda even raviſhed at the diſſimulation of Cleonice, took the Box out of her Hands very haſtily: Truly, inſenſible Cleonice, ſaid ſhe unto her, you received my Confidence ſo ill the other day, that I am reſolved to tell you no more than I did, and will not diſcover the Party whom I love unto you. Cleonice being infinitely deſirous to know whether Ligdamis loved Artelinda, did much importune her to tell her who he was, but ſtill ſhe would not: So that ſeeing all her Entreaties would not prevail, and being very impatient to read this Letter which ſhe had taken, ſhe made her Viſit very ſhort, and went home; and was no ſooner in her Chamber, but ſhe opened the Letter, and read theſe words:

Ligdamis to the Fair Artelinda.

I Know you are the moſt amiable upon Earth: Continue, I beſeech you, thoſe amorous Fallacies, which make ſo many happy, and ſo many miſerable; and never fear it ſhall ever prejudice you in my Opinion, for you are there ſo thought upon, that nothing can alter it. The more Hearts you captivate, the more you pleaſe me, and the more ſhall I admire you. I ſhall not need to tell you how much of my Soul is yours, let it ſuffice that you call to memory my Expreſſions, the laſt time I had the happy Honour to talk in private with you; for I dare not commit them to a thin piece of Paper: It was happy I was ſo bold as to tell them once, and it is enough that I now proteſt my Thoughts ſhall never change, but that I ſhall be for ever the ſame I was within theſe three days.

Ligdamis.

After Cleonice had read this Letter, ſhe ſtood in a maze, and knew not what to think: For as ſhe knew of ſome other Paſſages between Artelinda and Ligdamis, ſo now ſhe made no queſtion but there was a great correſpondency between them; and ſhe was ſo exceedingly incenſed that Ligdamis ſhould be ſo weak, that ſhe thought ſhe could not look upon him but with angry Eyes: For, ſaid ſhe, if he be in love with Artelinda, I am extreamly miſtaken in him; and if he be not, yet however I muſt break off with him, ſince I can no more endure he ſhould be a Cheat, than I can he ſhould be a Lover. In the mean time he knows all the Secrets of my Heart: I have ſpoken a hundred times againſt Artelinda, I have told him what I thought of her; and in all likelihood he courts this very Lady. Yet notwithſtanding, ſaid ſhe, had he acquainted her with that Friendſhip which we have contracted, ſhe would never have ſpoke to me as ſhe did. But what can I juſtly infer from all this, ſince thoſe who are ſincere, cannot eaſily gueſs what thoſe who are not ſo do think? However. I muſt break off with Ligdamis, and expoſe my ſelf no more to be deceived: I will truſt none, nor love any whoſoever; but live with as much caution amongſt thoſe who profeſs Friendſhip, as with thoſe that declare themſelves my Enemies. Yet ſhe reſolved not to acquaint Ligdamis with what ſhe knew of him, nor knew ſhe well whether ſhe ſhould accuſe him of this Crime, and chide him. As ſhe was amidſt theſe Contemplations, Ligdamis came into her Chamber, and came from Stenobea, to bring her unto hers: As ſoon as ſhe ſpied him, ſhe haſtily took up the Letter, and hid it with much diligence, ſeeming to be as much troubled at it, as if Ligdamis were her Husband, and that Letter had been to one of his Miſtreſſes. Yet could not Cleonice ſo ſoon put up this Letter but it was ſeen; nor could ſhe ſo well diſſemble, but he knew there was ſomething in her Mind which angred her, and that his Preſence was but troubleſom. So that coming a little nearer her, Madam, ſaid he, I undertook this Commiſſion from Stenobea, to come for you, with much joy, becauſe I thought you would have willingly obeyed her: but I ſee that I am diſappointed, for I ſee you conceal a Letter which queſtionleſs you do not deſire I ſhould ſee; and your very Eyes do tell me that I am troubleſom unto you. You know, Ligdamis, ſaid ſhe, that the Secrets of others are not our own; and ſince I have no intereſt in the Contents of this Letter, I will not ſhew it unto you: In the mean time, I will obey thoſe Commands which you have brought. And in ſaying ſo, ſhe prepared her ſelf to go out of her Chamber into her Mother's. Ligdamis would have ſtaid her, and conjured her firſt to tell him what it was which troubled her Mind: Yet ſhe would not anſwer him a word, but went away into Company, where both of them were very reſerved, and looked upon one another ſo ſternly, that they obſerved and made others alſo take notice of their Diſtempers. As for Ligdamis, his Heart durſt not reſolve upon any thing againſt Cleonice: but ſhe had other Thoughts of him; for the more Diſcontent ſhe found in the Eyes of him, the more ſhe accuſed him, imagining that his Guilt made him aſhamed, and was the true cauſe of all the Diſorder which appeared in his Mind. In the interim, Phocylides, who much deſired to know certainly whether Ligdamis was in Love, ſeemed according to his cuſtom, to be ſo with one that was Siſter unto Ligdamis, who then was with us: And ſince he had Wit at will, he thought it would not be a piece of any Difficulty to ſcrue it out of her. But he was at a great non-plus, when he underſtood from her, that Ligdamis was never unquiet or troubled; that he made no Secrets of Cleonice's Letters, but on the contrary, did frequently ſhew them; and that there appeared no Arguments of his being in Love, only his frequent Viſits, and continual Commendations of Cleonice when any Occaſions were offered. And he found that theſe were not abſolute Arguments whereby to conclude he was in Love; ſo that he knew not either what to ſay or think: ſince he was not one of an humour to love violently, he himſelf was never much unquiet; and the Jealouſy of ſuch Men may rather be termed Curioſity than Jealouſy. As for Artelinda, ſhe did ſecretly triumph in being a Cauſe of Cleonice's trouble: yet was her Joy not over-full of Tranquillity, becauſe ſhe was ſtill in ſome doubt there was ſome ſecret Affection between Ligdamis and Cleonice: for if that were not, ſaid ſhe, ſhe would never have taken that Letter and concealed it; and if ſhe had not conceived her ſelf intereſted in Ligdamis when ſhe ſaw his Hand, ſhe would not have come off with ſo ſhort a Viſit, nor been ſo impatient to be gone. Thus did Artelinda argue; all whoſe Thoughts, ſince then, we came to know, for ſhe was not of any humour of keeping Secrets very well. In the mean while Ligdamis could not imagine what this Letter ſhould be, which Cleonice ſo carefully concealed; nor could he conceive what it was which ſo troubled her Mind: He could not think upon any thing but it; and when he returned home, he would not admit of any Company whoſoever. Yet did he wonder to find himſelf ſo unquiet, and was angry that he ſhould be no more a Maſter of his own Mind: conceiving, that Friendſhip only ought not to cauſe ſo many angry hours; nor knowing any Reaſon why the ſight of this Letter, which ſhe ſo cloſely concealed, ſhould cauſe any ſuch ſenſible Sorrow in himſelf, ſince he was not in love with her. Yet ſince Friendſhip may be as tender as Love, it may be alſo a Cauſe of as much unquietneſs; and one may fear the loſs of a Friend, as well as the loſs of a Miſtreſs. Finding therefore that he had ſome Reaſon to be troubled, he waited, with much impatience, till the next morning, before he could clear himſelf of his Doubts: yet he could not ſo ſoon; for though he went betimes to the Houſe of Cleonice, yet ſhe was gone forth before he came. But, Madam, that which cauſed her haſte, was her fancy to tell Artelinda all that had paſſed between Ligdamis and her, to the end ſhe might better be convinced of his being in love, though ſhe was abſolutely perſwaded that he was: for beſides this Letter, ſhe knew that the Father of Ligdamis would not ſuffer his Son to marry any but one Woman whom he had propoſed unto him. So that ſhe expounded all that Artelinda had told her, even as that cunning Woman wiſhed. But to clear all, Cleonice went to Artelinda's Chamber, and conjured her to diſcover the Name of this fantaſtical Lover who permitted her a hundred Servants. Cleonice, ſaid Artelinda to her, I confeſs I ought to be fuller of pity than you your ſelf have been: but you ſhall never know it, not only becauſe you are too cruel, but alſo becauſe he whom you would have me name, hearing of our private Conferences, is ſo afraid I ſhould diſcover our Correſpondency unto you, that ſince yeſterday he had written no leſs than thrice unto me,. that he will abſolutely break off with me, if ever he hear I acquaint you with the League that is between us: Therefore, Cleonice, I beſeech you pardon me, and importune me no further to tell his Name: I confeſs his Proceeding does much aſtoniſh me, becauſe I cannot comprehend his Reaſon why he ſhould ſo much fear I ſhould diſcloſe our Secret unto you, eſpecially knowing that he eſteems you very highly. And truly, I muſt alſo confeſs (ſaid this ſubtile Woman) that if you were leſs ſevere than you are, I ſhould think this Man hath told you as well as me, that he loves you, and ſo deceives us both. Therefore, Cleonice, (ſaid ſhe ſtill moſt craftily) if there be any Man, who notwithſtanding your ſeverity, does tell you any delighting Lies, which do not diſpleaſe thoſe who do not believe them; I conjure you to confeſs it unto me, and name the Man who told them; promiſing you that if you name him whom I mean, I will immediately acknowledg him, for I have as great a deſire to tell his Name, as you have to know it: Speak therefore, Cleonice, and tell me the Man, to the end that joining our Intereſts and Reſentments together, we may both of us hate the Man that thus divides his Heart between us. For my part, ſaid Cleonice, (who found enough to confirm her in the Opinion ſhe had of Ligdamis) ſince none ever talks to me concerning matters of Love, I can neither ſatisfy your Curioſity, nor my own. Ha, Cleonice, ſaid Artelinda, you ſpeak in too general terms to be credited; for how is it poſſible Men ſhould ſee you, and not tell you at the leaſt that they think you fair, ſince I my ſelf, who am not in a capacity to love you, cannot chuſe but ſay as much? However, ſaid ſhe, you may very well ſpeak more ſincerely unto me, ſince I would truſt you with things of greateſt importance. I do not deſire, Cleonice, you ſhould tell me who it is that you love, but who it is that loves you: I perceive very plainly you will not ſatisfy me, becauſe you will not ſo much as name Hermodorus. I ſhall not name him indeed, replied Cleonice, as well becauſe he hath ceaſed his Courtſhip, as becauſe I know it is not he with whom you hold this ſecret Correſpondence. As they were thus in diſcourſe, Ligdamis hearing Cleonice was there, came into the Chamber. As ſoon as he appeared, Cleonice bluſh'd; and Artelinda counterfeiting ſadneſs, ſhe drew her Chair further from Cleonice, as if ſhe were afraid Ligdamis ſhould obſerve ſhe whiſpered with her.

This converſation was not pleaſing unto any but Artelinda, who had a ſecret malignant Joy, to obſerve the reſtleſs Mind of Cleonice, who not being able any longer to endure the company, either of Artelinda, or of ſuch a perfidious Friend as ſhe conceived Ligdamis to be, did riſe up, and would have gone away. He preſented his Hand unto her, to lead her out; though this Viſit was ſo ſhort, that it was a kind of incivility offered unto Artelinda to go ſo ſoon; but Cleonice imagining that his going with her was only to diſſemble the better, would not ſuffer him to go with her; and to hinder him, ſhe ſaid ſhe was not going to her own Houſe: adding further, with a forced Smile, that ſhe would not incur the hatred of two ſuch Friends at once, by ſeparating them ſo ſoon. Artelinda replied unto this, according to her uſual ſubtilty, and Ligdamis could not imagine why ſhe ſhould ſay ſo; for her looks were ſo ſerious, as he could not believe it to be a bare Complement, without any deſign, ſo that he would however conduct her to her Coach; and as ſhort as his Viſit had been, yet would he not go in again, but would ſee whether Cleonice ſaid true, in ſaying ſhe went not unto her own Houſe: So that he followed after her; and Cleonice looking back to ſee whether he ſtaid with Artelinda, ſaw him follow, and thought that it was only the better to cozen her: and though ſhe told him ſhe was not going Home, yet ſhe did, ſince the anguiſh of her Mind would not permit her to make any more Viſits. Ligdamis, as ſoon as he ſaw her go into her own Houſe, knew certainly ſhe was not Friends with him; and thought the reaſon of it to be, becauſe there was ſome other whom ſhe loved, of which the Letter he had ſeen, and Language Cleonice gave him, were convincing proofs. She dares not, ſaid he, acknowledg her weakneſs unto me; however, ſhe might have broke off with me a little more civilly. Thus Madam, did Ligdamis argue with himſelf, who being very deſirous to ſatisfy all doubts, went the ſame hour unto Cleonice: And coming into her Chamber, he did exceedingly ſurprize her. Madam, ſaid he unto her, I did not think that any little Lies (if I may ſo phraſe them) were allowable amongſt ſuch as profeſs ſincere Friendſhip; however, if I durſt, I would chide you for telling me you would not go preſently to your own Houſe. I did not intend it, replied ſhe, when I told you ſo, but I altered my Mind afterwards. O, Madam, replied Ligdamis, do not add Crime to Crime: if you do not think me worthy of your Friendſhip, or that you cannot keep any longer within our Conditions, I beſeech you let us break off. I do not ask who that happy Man is, from whom that Letter came, which you preſerve ſo ſecretly. That happy One, replied ſhe ſharply, is more of your Acquaintance than mine. I do not know a Man, replied he, that merits thoſe Favours which you do him. I do agree with you, replied ſhe, he does not deſerve them. Why then, replied he, do you make him your Friend or Lover, for I know not which of thoſe two attributes he muſt have? As for the laſt of theſe two, replied ſhe, let us refer it unto Artelinda; and as for the other, I hope he ſhall not long wear that Title. Artelinda has ſo many Lovers, replied Ligdamis, much perplexed, that I cannot imagine which you mean. It is very true, ſaid Cleonice very fiercely; but Cleonice has ſo few Friends, that you may quickly gueſs if you pleaſe; but Ligdamis, Shame ſhuts up your Mouth. Mine, Madam, replied he, much amazed; rather ſay, a real Reſpect impoſeth Silence, and keeps me from accuſing you. You carry it very confidently, replied ſhe, to be ſo culpable, and yet complain. I muſt do ſo, replied he, but with much reſpect: therefore without further Aggravations, I beſeech you, Madam, be ſo generous as to tell me ſincerely, whether it be fit I ſhould be any longer your Friend? for ſince Friendſhip as well as Love ſhould proceed from a free and voluntary Conſent, I ſhall trouble you no further, but free you from the trouble which my preſence cauſes; nor will I any longer diſturb the Joys of that happy Stranger, whoſe Letters are ſo dear unto you. I do aſſure you, ſaid ſhe unto him, that he who writ the Letter which ſticks ſo in your Stomach, is one whom I will never ſee again, as ſoon as I have loſt the ſight of you: Ligdamis amazed at this anſwer, importun'd her to ſpeak more plainly: Then, ſince ſhe was fully reſolved to break off with him that very day, ſhe pull'd out of her Pocket that Letter which ſhe took from Artelinda; and ſhewing it unto him, Look, perfidious and diſſembling Man, whether he that writ this Letter, be my Lover or my Friend; or whether he be not rather an Impoſtor? O Madam, (cried he out) how fallacious are all Appearances, if you think this Letter any Argument of Love to Artelinda? O Ligdamis, ſaid ſhe, how can you be ſo impudent as to deny your Crime, and juſtify your ſelf? No, no, I am not ſo eaſily gulled, nor ever will; for I will truſt no more, and then the moſt ſubtil ſhall never deceive me. However Ligdamis was leſs grieved that ſhe ſhould complain againſt him, than to have cauſe to complain againſt her, becauſe he knew he was not culpable. But when he proffered to deliver his Reaſons, ſhe prevented him, ſaying, ſhe would tell hers firſt. But, Madam, ſaid he unto her, I believe you have no good Ones. Why, ſaid ſhe, do you not think I have juſt cauſe to think you the verieſt Impoſtor amongſt Men, to counterfeit as you have done; to condemn Love, to vent continual Satyrs againſt it, and in the ſhew of all the World to abhor it, whilſt, in the mean time, you loved Artelinda, and to hide your Courtſhip, wiſhed her to entertain a hundred Gallants about her? Believe me, Ligdamis, ſhe carries it very well; but let me tell you, that Heart which you think is ſo totally yours, is not ſo: However, let me tell you, I will have no more of your Friendſhip: and ſince the Conditions between us were not to be in Love, I have kept my Promiſe. How, Madam, replied Ligdamis, is it poſſible you ſhould think I am in love with Artelinda? Why, Ligdamis, ſaid ſhe, I need not doubt it, ſince I read this Letter, and know what Artelinda told me. Artelinda, replied he, is a crafty Woman, whoſe Words ought always to be held in ſuſpicion: and as for the Letter, Madam, if you do but underſtand the true ſenſe of it, you will find it to be far from any ſigns of Love. I do ingenuouſly confeſs my ſelf to blame in not acquainting you with the Extravagancies of Artelinda, yet I hope it is not a Fault unpardonable: on the contrary, I conceive you are obliged unto me for it; for the Reaſon why I conceal'd her Follies from you, was out of reſpect and love to you, and therefore you would be moſt unjuſt and cruel if you ſhould puniſh me for it. I do moſt ſeriouſly proteſt (ſaid he unto her) that I am not in love with Artelinda, that I never was, nor ever will be. If this be not fully Satisfaction, but that you will needs have me tell you the Adventure between this Lady and me, I muſt firſt, for my ſatisfaction, entreat you to ſeem as if you were ignorant of what I ſhall diſcover unto you; for truly Artelinda is ſo indiſcreet, that ſhe moves my pity: not that ſhe is guilty of any ſuch Crimes as will put one to the bluſh; for certainly never any of her moſt favoured Servants ever obtained any thing of her, which did directly wound her Vertue; and becauſe ſhe knows that thoſe which ſerve her, cannot accuſe her of any Crime, ſhe is therefore the more bold to ſpeak, to write, and do a hundred things which are not very handſom. A very handſom preamble (ſaid Cleonice, and interrupted him) to excuſe one whom one does not love. Ligdamis then ſeeing, by the manner of her Speech, that there was an abſolute neceſſity of a handſom interpretation of ſuch Contradictions, was forced to confeſs, that being one day with Artelinda, ſhe did with ſo much art and boldneſs together, engage him in a converſation of Gallantry, that he never in his Life was more perplexed. What could ſhe ſay unto you? (ſaid Cleonice to him, being extreamly deſirous to know the paſſage) for I cannot imagine it poſſible, that ſuch a one as Artelinda could begin firſt any ſuch Diſcourſe. Ligdamis ſeeing there was no way to juſtify himſelf, but by his obedience unto Cleonice, began to relate what ſhe ſo much deſired to know. As I was ſitting very ſeriouſly by Artelinda, ſaid he unto her, ſhe asked me the Reaſon of my reſervedneſs? unto which I did not anſwer, becauſe the only cauſe of my reſervedneſs was nothing elſe, but that I was engaged in Company of one whoſe Diſpoſition was ſo contrary unto mine: but I anſwered in an ambiguous ſenſe, ſo that ſhe much rejoiced at it, and told me, with a Smile, that ſhe had ſeen in her Life-time more Lovers than one, who carried it as I did, when they loved and durſt not tell. I do proteſt unto you, ſaid I unto her, and laughed alſo, that this is not the cauſe of my reſervedneſs; for truly if I were ſo unfortunate or fond as to be in love with you, I ſhould not make a Secret of it. You would ſay (anſwered ſhe) that I ſhould be more glad to hear of ſuch a thing, than you are fearful to diſcover it unto me, ſince all the World twits me with it. But for all that, if you chance to love me hereafter, you would not find it ſo eaſy a matter as you think to diſcover it unto me: for you are ſuch a declared Enemy unto that Paſſion, as you will be aſhamed to contradict your ſelf: however, ſaid ſhe, and laughed, perhaps you love me already a little; and that which makes me believe it, is, becauſe I obſerve you ſhun me, and becauſe I am terrible unto you. This is a very extraordinary ſign of Love (ſaid I unto her). As extraordinary as it is (ſaid ſhe, ſtill in Raillery) it is a ſign; for my Glaſs tells me, that my Face cannot fright you: my Company is not ſo dull as to make you ſhun it; and therefore I muſt needs conclude, that you fly me, becauſe you fear I ſhould overcome you, and captivate you. Captivity indeed is ſo great a miſery, ſaid I unto her, that though I avoid it for that reaſon, yet am I excuſable: But, Madam, ſaid I, ſince I am ſincerely plain, I muſt tell you, that's not the Reaſon why I decline your Converſation: but the real Reaſon is, becauſe I know not how to talk with you: to admire your Beauty, I cannot, becauſe I am not ſenſible of it; to diſcourſe of Wars, is not a fit ſubject for Ladies; to talk of Gallantry, that would ſeem as if I did diſpute with you; to ſpeak of Liberty unto one who every day captivates ſo many Slaves, were indiſcreet; to profeſs againſt Love, will be thought ruſtick and barbariſm: ſo that not knowing what to ſay, I fly your Company as much as I can handſomely.

Since you are in an humour to ſpeak ſo freely unto me, ſaid ſhe to me, I pray tell me really what are your Thoughts of me? Are you indifferent? or have you any averſion againſt me? Do you hate me? or ſcorn me? or eſteem me? or love me? I do proteſt unto you (ſaid I unto her, and laughed) except it be the laſt of theſe, I have a little of all the reſt: For I am very indifferent of you, by reaſon of the Conqueſts you uſe to make; I am very averſe to your humour of favouring ſo many Men as you do; I hate you and ſcorn you for ſome of your Servants ſakes; and I eſteem you for the greatneſs and vivacity of your Spirit. But to ſpeak in general, ſaid ſhe unto me, what is the reſult of all theſe thoughts together, and what do you think of me? I think you are one of the faireſt Women in the World, ſaid I unto her; but the leſs amiable, becauſe too much loved. It is well, ſaid ſhe unto me, that I can draw ſo much Commendations from one that is a profeſſed Enemy unto all Gallantry; and, Ligdamis, you muſt know, that Commendations is the firſt ſtep to Love. However (ſaid ſhe ſtill in raillery) if it chance ever to be my hap to wound you, I promiſe you to releaſe at leaſt ſix of my Captives for the love of you. They think themſelves ſo happy in it, ſaid I unto her, that it is much better to let them alone in their Chains, than to load me with them. I ſhall never ſee you in private, ſaid ſhe unto me, but I ſhall ask you what progreſs I have made in your Heart. This, Madam, ſaid Ligdamis, was the Diſcourſe between Artelinda and my ſelf.

About three days after, meeting me in a Place where ſhe ſhewed me ſome Verſes compoſed by the famous Sapho, which were ſent her from Mitilene, I deſired her to lend them unto me: but ſhe refuſed, ſaying, ſhe would ſend them to me; and ſo ſhe did indeed that very ſame Night with a Letter, the anſwer unto which you have already. That I may the better believe what you ſay, ſaid Cleonice unto him, I wiſh I could ſee this Letter. That will be no difficult matter, replied he; for, as I remember, I writ ſomething upon the back-ſide of it concerning the Fortification of Epheſus, which the illuſtrious Cleander entruſted me with. You will not tell me then, replied Cleonice, that you have kept it out of affection to the Sender. I will not indeed, anſwered he; for I ſhould think my ſelf a very Fool, if I had the leaſt tenderneſs of Artelinda in me, and therefore far from Love. However, Ligdamis, to loſe no time, ſent one of his Servants to look in his Cloſet for this Letter, and accordingly he brought it: but though it was torn in ſome places, yet Cleonice read theſe words, after ſhe had very circumſpectly looked upon the back-ſide, to ſee whether Ligdamis had ſpoken truth or no.

Artelinda unto Ligdamis.

TO teſtify how much I profited by your laſt Converſation, know, that my Deſires were ſo much to pleaſe you, as I have not captivated any theſe three days. Send me word, I pray you, what Conſequences this will effect upon your Heart, to the end that if I cannot make any further happy progreſs therein, therein, I may ſtop, and engage my ſelf no further: but I pray you conſider ſeriouſly before your anſwer:

Artelinda.

After Cleonice had read this Letter, and ſeriouſly looked upon it, ſhe told Ligdamis, that it was not written by Artelinda. You muſt know, Madam, ſaid he unto her, that ſhe writes ſeveral Hands: ſhe does not write unto her Friends in the ſame Character that ſhe uſeth to write unto her Lovers; and if you will be pleaſed to ask Phocylides, he will ſhew you that I ſpeak Truth.

But, Madam, Ligdamis ſpoke ſo well in his own Cauſe, that he moved Cleonice to believe him; and cauſing her to compare his Anſwer with her Letter, ſhe found not the leaſt cauſe of ſuſpicion. Moreover, Cleonice remembring that Artelinda told her, it was her pretended Lover's deſire ſhe ſhould carry her ſelf as ſhe did; and that did either plainly appear to be a Lie, or elſe that it was not Ligdamis; becauſe ſhe writ, that to pleaſe him ſhe had not captivated any in three dayes. As Cleonice was thus very buſy in examination of the Matter, I came into her Chamber; and the Quarrel between them being related unto me, I juſtified Ligdamis, and compoſed all Difference between them; for I had not come to ſee Cleonice that day, but only to ſhew a Letter which Artelinda had writ unto one of her Adorers who was Kinſman unto me; and ſince ſhe found it to be the very ſame Character with that which Ligdamis ſhewed her, ſhe deſired pardon for accuſing him.

After this, they began new Proteſtations of Friendſhip, and lived as they did before, in much ſweetneſs and confidence in each other, all the Stratagems and Plots of Artelinda and Phocylides not being able to moleſt them. As for Hermodorus, as he loved none but Cleonice, ſo it was his only Buſineſs to obſerve her. And though the frequent Viſits of Ligdamis cauſed him many an hungry Hour, yet he ſmothered his Sorrows as well as he could: For as Cleonice had forbid him all Expreſſions of Love, ſo he durſt not ſhew his Jealouſy, but ſilently ſuffered all his Sorrows in ſecret. For our parts, it may be ſaid we lived in a Paradiſe of Pleaſure: Cleonice was ſenſible of no Diſtaſts, but what the Humour of Stenobea procured her; which ſhe imparting unto Ligdamis, he leſſened the Burden, and doubled all her Joys. For my part, the eſteem of theſe two firm Friends was fulneſs of happineſs to me: I was the Mercury who brought the News of the Town always unto them, and principally concerning Artelinda. I remember one day, hearing one of her Lovers being gone a Journey into the Country, and leaving a Brother with her as his Agent in his abſence, he himſelf fell in love with her; and ſhe would not by any means ſuffer him to talk of his Love unto her. I related the whole Story unto them, which had an hundred odd Paſſages in it: and after I had finiſhed my Tale; For my part, ſaid Cleonice, I cannot comprehend how one ſhould fall in love with another after they have lived a long time together, without the leaſt ſenſibility of that Paſſion: For truly, as I imagine the manner of it, it is its quality to ſurprize one upon a ſudden, and take up the Mind all at once, and not ſteal on by little and little, as Friendſhip does. Truly, ſaid I on the contrary, I think it much leſs ſtrange that one ſhould begin to love another after they are perfectly acquainted, and know the Qualities of each other, than to ſee Men in the higheſt Extreams, and love exceſſively the firſt minute they ſee the Party. Since it is certain, ſaid Ligdamis, that Love is an effect of a predominate ſympathy, rather than of any perfect knowledg, there is leſs cauſe of wonder to ſee one love at the firſt minute, than after long acquaintance. However, I am fully perſwaded, ſaid Cleonice, that one never paſſes from terms of Friendſhip, unto terms of Love; and that one is more apt to fall in love with another, of whom he had but an indifferent Opinion, than with one with whom he was upon terms of moſt tender Friendſhip. For my part, ſaid I unto her, I am not of your Opinion; for certainly it is a greater invitation unto Love, to be eſteemed, to be loved, to be courted, and pleaſed with the Converſation of one, than not to be at all acquainted; or if acquainted, to have but thoughts of Indifferency: Nor do I believe I am much miſtaken when I affirm, that there is much more Heat in the Hearts of thoſe who are upon terms of violent Friendſhip, than in thoſe that are upon terms only of common and indifferent Love. O Iſmenea, cried out Cleonice, you put me into an extream Fright by ſaying ſo: For if you can perſwade me of that, you will make me hate Ligdamis. You would be very injuſt then, ſaid he, though Iſmenea had reaſon for one thing which ſhe affirmed; for I do verily believe with her, that a violent Friendſhip hath more heat than a mean and indifferent Love. But, Madam, there is as vaſt a difference between theſe two, as there is between the heat of the Sun, and that of the Fire: The firſt of theſe warms and comforts without burning, and the other burns as ſoon as touched: This is the reaſon that Love is never without Sorrows and Diſtempers; whereas on the contrary, violent Friendſhip may be without any impatience or trouble. This Simile, ſaid Cleonice, does ſomething perſwade me againſt the Opinion of Iſmenea. He ſpeaks only what will pleaſe you, Madam, (ſaid I unto her, purpoſely to cauſe diſpute) but for all that, he cannot make me believe that a little Star can yellow Corn, or parch the Ground ſo much as the Rays of the Sun. For my part, ſaid Cleonice unto me, and laughed, you make me ſuſpect there is ſome naughty Affection (unto which you do not give the Name) which belongs unto it. And you will perſwade me, ſaid I unto her, that you only eſteem Ligdamis, and have not thoughts of Friendſhip at all. I had rather he ſhould think ſo, ſaid ſhe, than that he ſhould think I had any thoughts of him which might become Love. I never had ſo good an Opinion of my ſelf, replied he, nor ſo bad of you, as to imagine any ſuch thing; though (added he and laughed) if ever the fair Cleonice ſhould be capable of a kind of Affection, I wiſh it may be unto my Advantage. Ah, Ligdamis, cried ſhe out, this Wiſh does extreamly offend me. If I had wiſhed that you ſhould love me after another manner than you do, replied he, then doubtleſs I had been to blame, in violating the Promiſes which I made unto you: But I cannot think it will offend you to ſay, that if of neceſſity you muſt love any, I wiſh rather it were me than another. But if you do not love me, replied ſhe, (as I do not deſire you ſhould) why do you wiſh ſo as you do? For is there any thing in the World more ridiculous and extravagant, than to ſee one of my Sex to love, and not to be loved again? Indeed, Ligdamis, I do not like you ſhould fancy ſuch fond Suppoſitions as theſe.

But, Madam, (ſaid I unto her, and was much delighted with her Anger) I pray tell us, ſuppoſe the Caſe your own, and that Ligdamis ſhould fall in Love; had you not rather it ſhould be with you than any other? Really, Iſmenea, ſaid ſhe unto me, I think you have both loſt your Wits; Ligdamis in wiſhing me in ſuch an injurious Caſe, and you in asking me ſuch odd Queſtions. However, anſwer me, ſaid I unto her. Can you think, replied ſhe, and bluſh'd, that there is none in the World he can be in love withal but me? There is none in all the World, Madam, replied he, who can render my weakneſs more excuſable than you. But I pray you tell me, Cleonice, ſaid I unto her, Why do you ask that Queſtion? I ask it, anſwered ſhe, both in relation to his Intereſt and my own; for, certainly, with whomſoever I can be in Love, there is more poſſibility that he ſhall be loved again by any ſooner than by me, who am fully determined never to love any: Moreover, Ligdamis, in loving another, does only give me a Teſtimony of his Weakneſs; but in loving me, he does me an Injury, ſince we have concluded none can love without Hope, and he can never hope unleſs he wrong me. But you, ſaid ſhe to Ligdamis, who take upon you ſo much freedom as to ſay, you had rather be the Object of my Weakneſs than of anothers, What good Reaſon can you give me for your rather? Though I had none more ſtrong, anſwered he, than that, I ſhould never publiſh it, but could better conceal your Affection to me than any other, yet that were ſufficient. However it be, (ſaid ſhe, half angry) pray let us ſpeak no more of it; for I perceive we are more apt to diſcourſe of this Paſſion, than if we were not declared Enemies unto it.

The Chaſe in which Leonice was, made me laugh as well as Ligdamis: For, to perſecute her a little, we asked her an hundred odd Queſtions; unto which ſhe would anſwer, ſometimes in Raillery, and ſometimes in Anger: But at the end of our Converſation we were all in one Opinion, and parted good Friends. In the interim, Artelinda was almoſt out of her Wits, to ſee her Plots did thrive no better: But being of an Humour not to grieve long for any thing, ſhe cheared up her ſelf in the multitude of her Lovers. Phocylides alſo not knowing which way to trouble the Tranquillity of Ligdamis and Cleonice, did deſiſt from ever thinking of it, and lived according to his accuſtomed Rate as well as Hermodorus.

A little while after, the illuſtrious Cleander conferred the Government of the Caſtle of Hermes upon the Father of Ligdamis; ſo that there was a neceſſity of his going unto the Court to render his Thanks; and therefore he took his leave of Cleonice, who rejoiced much at the Honour which was conferred upon his Family. But in parting from her, though it was but for a few days, yet he ſeemed more ſad than he uſed to be when he parted from her upon leſs pleaſing Occaſions than this: For when he went to the Wars, his Journies were long, and the Caſe dangerous. However, he made no great Reflection upon it then, but came to Sardis, ſuppoſing himſelf only a Friend unto Cleonice, and not ſo much as ſuſpecting he ſhould ever become a Lover. Since he had the Honour to be deep in Cleander's Love, he retained him longer than he thought: But though the Court at that time was the moſt glorious Court in the World, as you know (Madam) much better than I do, yet was he extreamly diſcontented; and ſo impatient was he to return to Ephesus, that he left the Court much ſooner than Cleander deſired: But he returned with ſo many ſymptoms of Joy in his Face, that Cleonice, when he came to viſit her, imagined that ſome great good Fortune had happened to him which ſhe was ignorant of; though the only cauſe of all his Joy was only to ſee her. However, Ligdamis was much amazed to perceive, that by little and little the Tranquillity of his Mind was troubled without any apparent Cauſe; for his Fortunes were in better ſtate than ever; his Health was not impaired; he could not poſſibly be upon better terms with Cleonice than he was; there wanted nothing which conduced to his Happineſs, but to be ſenſible of it as formerly he had been; his Reaſon ſometimes told him he could not be better. When he was out of Cleonice's ſight, he could not endure her Abſence; and when he was with her, yet was he not contented: He looked upon her more, and ſpoke leſs: He was ſo extreamly unquiet, that he began to ſuſpect his Mind was changed, and that he was in Love. The very firſt thought of it did raiſe ſuch a turbulent ſtorm in his Soul, that all his Reaſon could not lay it: But in the end, examining the bottom of his Heart, and comparing his former Eſtate unto that wherein he was at preſent, he found he was not maſter of himſelf, but that Love was a triumphant Conqueror. To be better ſatisfied, he asked himſelf what it was he would have? what he deſired? As for matter of Fortune, ſaid he, I am fully contented, for my Ambition goes no higher. As relating to Cleonice, I have good reaſon alſo to be ſatisfied with her. But he had no ſooner ſaid ſo, than he perceived preſently that he was not; but was ſo full of ſuch unquiet Deſires as have no limited Objects, that he ſenſibly found he was in Love, and loved violently. Then did he remember, that for fifteen days together he had uſed no invective Expreſſions againſt Love; but always when he had ſome deſire unto it, they were mixed with ſome repugnance contrary to his cuſtom. So that after a ſtrict ſurvey of himſelf, he knew moſt certainly that he was abſolutely in Love. Yet could he not think that his Diſeaſe was incurable; but on the contrary thought, that to deſire againſt it, had been an Antidote ſufficient: yet when he conſulted with his Will, he found that he had no deſire at all to be cured. However, he reſolved to wreſtle with his Paſſion; and in order to a Conqueſt, he brought as many Reaſons as poſſibly he could invent, but all too weak and fruitleſs.

Seeing then he could not vanquiſh himſelf, he reſolved at the leaſt to hide his Paſſion, as well becauſe he was aſhamed of his weakneſs, as becauſe he knew that if Cleonice perceived it, ſhe would withdraw her Friendſhip, and treat him ill. Sometimes he would ask himſelf, whether it was true that he was in love? What, (would he ſay to himſelf) is this the inſenſible Ligdamis, who with ſo much zeal condemned Love, and yet ſuffers himſelf to be vanquiſhed? Fie, fie, I cannot think it: However, I find my Heart is not my own, my Soul is in diſorder; the friendſhip of Cleonice doth not ſatisfy me; that which was wont to pleaſe me, troubles me; I ſtudy and muſe without a cauſe: I can find no reſt either in the abſence or the preſence of Cleonice: when I am out of her ſight, I am infinitely impatient to ſee her, and think that then my Happineſs would be full; yet when I am come into her preſence, my Joys to ſee her are not pure, but mixt with deſire of ſomething elſe, though I know not what: Fain would I tell her my Mind; but how can I tell her that I love her, ſince I have been ſo invective againſt Love? and contracted Friendſhip with her, becauſe both ſhe and I were Enemies to that Paſſion? No, no, I can never be able to do it. But alas! ſaid he, and reprehended himſelf, is it poſſible I can live ſo reſtleſs without any complaint? Yet Cleonice engaged me, that if ever I ſhould be ſo unfortunate and fond as to be in love with her, I ſhould endeavour to vanquiſh my Paſſion, at the leaſt to hide it; and if I could not, to baniſh my ſelf, and forbear her company. I have already found that the firſt of theſe Injunctions is abſolutely impoſſible, and I do very much doubt the ſecond. My caſe is very hard, ſaid he; for all other Lovers, when they begin to love, may hope that their Complaints will be heard; they are not forbid to ſpeak of their Paſſions, till after they have expreſſed themſelves, ſo that they are ſure their Loves are known: But my deſtiny is very malignant, for they forbid me to ſpeak of Love, before ever I was in Love. Others, I ſay, in diſcovering their Affection, are not in any danger to loſe any thing, but may hope as well as fear: Yet I am almoſt certain, that Cleonice will withdraw her Friendſhip from me, as ſoon as I diſcover mine. However, ſaid he, ſince my Heart hath changed, why may not hers alſo? Hope then, ſaid he, hope Ligdamis! Then preſently his Soul was ſo full of Fears, that he loſt all Hope, and almoſt his Reaſon: yet ſince he could do nothing elſe, he reſolved to diſguiſe his Thoughts, having not a Heart to tell her that he loved her, or to deprive himſelf of her ſight. He viſited her therefore as he was wont, but almoſt without any delight, by reaſon of his conſtrained way. He deſired to look upon her without Diſtraction, as formerly he did, but alas it was impoſſible; his Eyes, whether he would or no, betrayed the Secrets of his Heart; he wiſhed ſhe could gueſs at the Motions of his Soul: but with much care did he hide that, which rather than his Life he would have her know, and which yet he durſt not tell her. Since Cleonice did not ſuſpect any thing of all this, ſhe took no notice of this alteration in Ligdamis: yet within a while after he was ſo diſtempered, and ſo reſerved, that ſhe perceived it, and asked him the cauſe with ſo much Sincerity, as let him know ſhe was ignorant of it: And he, being fearful to acquaint her with ſuch an unwelcom Truth, anſwered, that his reſervedneſs proceeded from a fooliſh indiſpoſition of Melancholy, without any cauſe; and Cleonice believing him, did ſtrive as much as ſhe could to divert him by a hundred obliging endeavours.

I well remember, how at that time Artelinda afforded us an ample Subject to ſpeak againſt Love: For, Madam, one of her Lovers being gone a Journey, and leaving a Brother with her as his Agent, to preſent his Letters unto Artelinda, and to receive her Anſwers, ſhe made a Captive of him, who was only a Solicitor for another, and ſhewed more Favours unto him, than to the Party for whom he did negotiate. Phocylides alſo gave us another Subject of talk, in perſwading two mortal Enemies which ſhe loved, and making them both believe ſeverally, that he did but mock the other whom he hated. Having met with theſe two freſh Adventures in one day, Cleonice, Ligdamis and I being together, Cleonice, according to her wonted manner, began to ſpeak againſt the fantaſtical effects of Love. Ligdamis, after he had been a long while and ſpoke not a word, told her that ſhe did miſtake things, ſince theſe kind of Extravagancies are rather cauſed by the folly of them that do them, than by Love, which really had never any room in their Hearts: For indeed Artelinda and Phocylides are not in Love. Yet if there were no ſuch thing as Love in the World, replied Cleonice, they would not do any ſuch things: But Ligdamis, ſaid ſhe, and laughed, how comes it to paſs that you make a difference between Love, and the Follies of Artelinda and Phocylides? Becauſe (anſwered he coldly) I have ſo many things beſides to accuſe them of, that I will not charge them unjuſtly. For my part, ſaid ſhe, I am not ſo indulgent unto them as you are; for I do accuſe Love of all the Evils in the World. Suppoſe it ſhould deprive me of my Reaſon, ſaid he, would you be glad of it? No, believe me, ſaid ſhe; for I love you more than I hate Love; and therefore I aſſure you I ſhould be extreamly ſorry: But I am ſo well perſwaded of your Wiſdom, that I never need fear any ſuch thing. Yet they ſay, replied he, Men muſt be in Love once in their Lives. I do not think that ſo general a Rule, but it will admit of ſome Exceptions, replied ſhe, and laughed; for Ligdamis has ſeen all the ſpringing Beauties in Epheſus and Sardis, and none of them could ever draw him into any danger; therefore I hope he will never be in Love, and by conſequence will for ever enjoy my Friendſhip. I promiſe you all the Beauties of Epheſus (ſaid he unto her) cannot keep me from loving you. But you ſay nothing of our Sardinian Stars (ſaid ſhe, and laughed ſtill.) Since you fear them not, replied he, and bluſh'd, I need not ſpeak of them. Cleonice obſerving an Alteration in the Face of Ligdamis, began to repeat all the Conditions of their Friendſhip. Do you not remember, ſaid ſhe unto him, that I promiſed you my Affection, as long as you were not in Love, and no longer; and how you for your part promiſed, if ever you were in Love, you would acquaint me with it that very ſame Hour? I do not know, Madam, (replied he with a far a far-fetched Sigh) what your Commands were, in caſe I ſhould be in Love with you. Though there be no neceſſity of a Repetition, replied ſhe, yet I will remember you, how I ſaid I would not have you acquaint me with it; that you ſhould endeavour to vanquiſh the Paſſion; that if you could not, yet to conceal it; and if you could not do that, then to hide your ſelf, and never ſee me again. But, Madam, replied he, did you never alter your Mind ſince that time? No, replied ſhe, not at all: But Ligdamis, I hope you will find no great Difficulty in obeying me; and ſince no other can captivate you, you will be ſtill free, and I ever your Friend: Though truly your reſervedneſs and melancholy of Love hath put me into many Fears; for I always imagined when you came unto me, that you came with Intentions to diſcover your Weakneſs, and to tell me you were either in Love with Artelinda or ſome other. Ligdamis did bluſh at this diſcourſe. I asked him the cauſe; and he told me it was uſual for them to bluſh who were ſuſpected of any Injuſtice.

Thus, Madam, was their diſcourſe, which did double all the Miſeries of Ligdamis, and grew ſo inſupportable, that he was not able to endure them: He offered a hundred and a hundred times to tell her that he loved her, and his reverent Reſpects of her ſtopped his Mouth. Then did he determine to diſcover his Love unto her by his Obedience; that was, in ceaſing to ſee her; conceiving no way better to let her know it, and not incenſe her. This way of declaring Love, was a hard chapter; but ſince he could not ſpeak, ſilence it ſeems muſt ſpeak for him; and he eſteemed it one degree of Happineſs in his Miſery, that he hoped ſhe would thereby underſtand his meaning: Then, after a long Viſit without a minute of private diſcourſe, becauſe much Company was there that Day, as he was going out with the reſt of the Company, which went out almoſt together; Shall I ſee you to morrow? ſaid ſhe unto him: No, Madam, replied he: And why will you deprive me of that Honour, replied ſhe: Becauſe I am reſolved to obey you, anſwered he, and went out, not daring to look at her. Cleonice calling to memory all that ſhe had ſaid unto him that Day, could not remember ſhe had enjoined any thing upon him to be done to morrow; and therefore ſhe thought his Memory had deceived him, but did not at all reſpect the truth.

The day following, ſhe asked me whether I ſaw Ligdamis? and alſo asked ſeveral others; who all anſwered, No; and indeed he never came out of his own Chamber, but waited with as much Fear as Impatience, till Clonice expreſſed ſome Signs ſhe underſtood him. He told me ſince, that never Man ſuffered more melancholy Miſery than he did upon that occaſion; for ſaid he, ſhe underſtands me not, and I deprive my ſelf of the Happineſs of ſeeing her to no purpoſe; and if ſhe do underſtand me, perhaps it is with anger in her Heart: I ſhall my ſelf deſtroy that eſteem which ſhe has of me, and perhaps ſhe will not do me ſo much favour, as to ſhew her Indignation unto me, but let me alone in my lamentable Exile: but Cleonice did not at all ſuſpect his Paſſion. The firſt day was thus ſpent, the ſecond aſtoniſhed her a little more, and the third day I coming unto her: What have you done with Ligdamis? ſaid ſhe to me, and what's become of him, that neither we nor any elſe can ſee him? I ſhould have ſaid he had been ſick, ſaid I unto her, if I had not met with his Siſter in the Temple, who told me he was not ſick, but very melancholy. I cannot imagine the cauſe of it, replied Cleonice, but muſt ſtay till he be in the humour to come and tell me. The next day being a day conſecrated unto Diana, Cleonice and I went unto the Temple, and as we came in, I ſaw Ligdamis, and ſhewed him unto Cleonice; yet he no ſooner ſaw us look upon him, but after he had bowed unto us, he went out of the Temple, which did exceedingly ſurprize us; for his cuſtom was, when he met with Cleonice, to regulate his Devotion according to hers, and wait upon her out. The next day following, we did accidentally meet with him, but ſince Artelinda and three or four more were in the Company, Cleo- ſhe could hardly ſpeak unto him, yet as he paſſed on her ſide, ſhe leaned towards him; and moſt obligingly ſaid, I pray Ligdamis, tell me what you are doing? I am obeying you, Madam (replied he in a low Voice, and bluſh'd) and without any longer ſtay, he went away; and left Cleonice ſo aſtoniſhed, that ſhe knew not what to think: As ſoon as ſhe was returned home, ſhe reſolved to clear her doubts; and writ unto Ligdamis in theſe Terms:

Cleonice unto Ligdamis.

Since I cannot remember I ever deſired any thing of you, which might deprive me of the Happineſs in ſeeing you, do me the favour to write your Mind; to the end I may chide my ſelf, and my bad Memory, and that I may know your willingneſs to obey me.

Cleonice.

After ſhe had writ this Letter, ſhe ſent it unto Ligdamis, by a Page which ſhe loved very well, who did deliver it the very ſame hour. You may imagine how Ligdamis was perplexed; he began twenty times to anſwer this Letter, and as many times blotted out what he had writ: Sometimes he thought he ſaid too much, and preſently after he thought it too little: But in concluſion, there being a neceſſity of writing ſomething, he returned this Anſwer, if my memory fail me not.

Ligdamis unto Cleonice.

I Would it were the Will of the Gods, Madam, that my putting you in memory of that Command which you impoſed upon me, to ſee you no more, could make me hope my Obedience would procure a Pardon of that Crime which did precede it: I have not ſo much confident boldneſs as to tell you what it is, unleſs your Goodneſs will permit, or rather appoint me.

Ligdamis.

After he had writ this Letter, and read it over and over, he gave it unto the Page which brought the other, commanding him to deliver it with his own Hands into his Miſtreſs's, and let none ſee but ſhe. As chance was, I came unto Cleonice, preſently after ſhe had ſent unto Ligdamis, and was with her when ſhe received his Anſwer: As ſoon as the Page appeared, ſhe went towards him to take that Letter which he writ; and turning towards me, We ſhall ſee whether I have loſt my Memory, ſaid ſhe; or whether I ever commanded Ligdamis not to ſee me, and have forgotten it. After this ſhe began to read the Letter aloud: but I ſaw her bluſh at reading of the two firſt Lines; her Voice changed; and ſhe read the laſt ſo indiſtinctly, that I underſtood her not: Then I took the Letter and read it. Is your Curioſity ſatisfied? (ſaid I, after I had read it.) Not at all, replied ſhe, for I do not well underſtand whether that Command which he ſays I impoſed upon him, be grounded upon that Queſtion which he asked me the other day in your Preſence, which was, What he ſhould do in caſe he fell in love with me? I perceive indeed, he would make me believe he is ſo. You muſt needs confeſs, ſaid I unto her, that this Declaration of his Love is the moſt reſpective that poſſibly can be, and alſo the moſt private. Heavens preſerve me from thinking that Ligdamis is in Love with me! ſaid ſhe: No, no, Iſmenea, I do not at all believe it, and I do repent of that ſuſpicion which I had of him: Certainly he is in a humour to make himſelf ſome ſport, and would be revenged of me for the perplexity I put him into by accuſing him of being in Love with Artelinda. However, ſaid I unto her, it muſt needs be acknowledged, that if he be in Love, he could not carry it with more Reſpect, or with more Gallantry. If he were in Love, replied ſhe, doubtleſs he could not carry it ſo: for Lovers loſe their Reaſon, as ſoon as they begin to enter into that predicament. Yet I have heard ſay, replied I, that there are ſome Men which Love makes more witty. I do think indeed, ſaid ſhe, that perhaps it may infuſe ſome Wit into thoſe who had none before; but I believe on the other ſide, it takes away the Wits of them that had any: And therefore I am confirmed in my Opinion, that Ligdamis makes himſelf merry by this Deſign; it not being imaginable he ſhould preſerve his Judgment, and be in Love. Yet for all that, ſaid I unto her, he has found out an Invention to make you read the Declaration of his Love without any Anger. I do confeſs it, ſaid ſhe, but 'tis becauſe I do not think that he deſires I ſhould: I am ſo afraid (ſaid ſhe and laughed) he ſhould imagine I take this ſeriouſly, and that I ſhould give him a ſubject of laughing at me all his Life-long, that I will ſend for him hither immediately; that I may let him ſee by my Entertainment of him, that I am not eaſily deceived. But (ſaid I unto her) ſay you ſhould be deceived, what would you ſay then? I would ſay (replied ſhe) that I am the unhappieſt Woman upon Earth: But why do I ſay ſo? Tell me, Iſmenea, have I not the very ſame Eye I had when Ligdamis was only my Friend? Am I more charming than I was? have I any more wit? What's the matter that makes me more terrible to him than before? No, no, the mind of Ligdamis is ſtill the ſame, and ſo free, that I ſee he hath invented a more witty Declaration of his Love, than all the Lovers of Artelinda ever could.

But how came it to paſs, ſaid I unto her, that you bluſhed ſo at the reading of his Letter; and that your Voice was ſo feeble and weak, that I had much ado to underſtand you? The Reaſon was, replied ſhe, becauſe all that ſmels of Gallantry and Courtſhip, doth affright me at the firſt, but preſently after I recollected my ſelf. However, you make me loſe time, which is ſo precious to me: for methinks I ſee Ligdamis delighting himſelf with his own Imaginations that he has made me angry. Then without more ado ſhe called one of her Women, whom ſhe commanded to bring the Page unto her who carried her Letter to Ligdamis: when he was come, ſhe commanded him to go again unto him, and to tell him ſhe deſired he would immediately come unto her: If by chance he ask who is with me, (ſaid ſhe) tell him Iſmenea;

nea; and if he enquire whether I be merry or melancholy, tell him the Truth, that I am not ſad. Cleonice gave him theſe Inſtructions, becauſe ſhe knew Ligdamis was wont to ask this Page a hundred ſuch Queſtions; and her Reaſon why ſhe bad him ſo, was, becauſe ſhe would not have Ligdamis think ſhe received his Letter (as he did write it) ſeriouſly: ſo afraid was ſhe, that Ligdamis ſhould believe one minute that ſhe thought him to be in love with her. The Page being gone to Ligdamis, he no ſooner ſaw him, but he thought he brought the Sentence of his Death, ſigned with the Hand of Cleonice: And he was preparing himſelf to read it with a ſad Heart, when the Page came near him with a pleaſant Air, and preſented a very civil Complement from Cleonice, telling him ſhe deſired he would come unto her. Ligdamis amazed at this, asked the Page whether ſhe had read this Letter? and he anſwered, that he believed ſhe had more than once, for (ſaid he) ſhe had Leiſure enough, ſince there was none with her but Iſmenea. Afterwards Ligdamis, ſeeming to enquire of his Miſtreſſes Heath, asked him whether ſhe was pleaſant or melancholy? And the Page anſwering according to his Inſtructions. Ligdamis was ſo ſurpriſed that he knew not what to think: He told the Page, he would wait upon her preſently; but he was not ſo quick as his Word, for it was above an Hour that he was deſcanting upon the Meſſage which he had received, and another Hour upon the Pleaſantneſs of Cleonice. Before he could get out of his Chamber, What ſhould I think of this? ſays he: does Cleonice underſtand me, or does ſhe not? is it poſſible that Love in wounding my Heart has troubled hers? or does ſhe not underſtand my Meaning? Certainly Cleonice has Wit enough, and therefore muſt needs know my Deſires; and certainly alſo ſhe knows them without Choler, ſince ſhe ſends for me. Go then I will, and go in Hopes; yet I believe I have more Reaſon to go in Fear; for how can it be imagined that ſtrong Averſion ſhe had to Love ſhould ſo ſuddenly alter? Yet on the other ſide, ſince I am changed; why may not ſhe alſo as well as I? The ſame Reaſon is equal unto both: and ſince the Beauty, Wit, and Merit of Cleonice hath changed my Reſolution, why may it not as well change her Tenderneſs of Friendſhip into a paſſionate Affection? Moreover, ſince Love is a grand cauſe of Love, why may not mine move hers? for certainly I love her above all Expreſſions. Hope then, hope Ligdamis! Go and receive a Sentence of Favour from her who is only able to grant it.

After this, Ligdamis went unto Cleonice; who no ſooner ſaw him, but ſhe broke out into an extream Laughter, purpoſely to let him ſee he had not deceived her, and that his Projects did not hit. But, Madam, Cleonice's Joy did not infect Ligdamis: for on the contrary, ſeeing by her jocund Air and pleaſant Looks, that ſhe underſtood not what he intended and deſired, he was ſo ſerious and extreamly troubled, as never Man was more: Yet notwithſtanding Cleonice proſecuted her intended Deſign, to let him ſee he had not deceived her. But Ligdamis was ready to anſwer, and I to take Cleonice's part, I was ſent for home, upon a Buſineſs of great Conſequence, ſo that I left them both together, and left them both extreamly non-pluſt. Yet did I afterwards know all the Paſſages, for they both of them ſeverally related them unto me that ſame Night. I was no ſooner gone, but Cleonice continuing her Jeers, Very well, Ligdamis, ſaid ſhe unto him, are you not aſhamed of your trim Declaration of Love, which you invented to make your ſelf Sport withal? Truly I take it very ill, you ſhould ever think I could believe it ſerious: but I believe you have ſome curious Diſpoſition to anger me. Yet Ligdamis, I am a little more ſubtile than you are, ſince I know very well it is only a Piece of your Raillery. I wiſh unto the Gods, Madam, ſaid he unto her, that what you ſay were true. Seriouſly, Ligdamis, I cannot endure to hear you ſpeak thus. Seriouſly, Madam, ſaid he unto her, I can ſpeak no otherwiſe, unleſs I ſhould lie. Cleonice then looking upon Ligdamis, and ſeeing ſuch a real Trouble in his Face as perſwaded her he was in earneſt, was ſo amazed and incenſed, that ſhe ſtood a while and could not ſpeak: ſo that Ligdamis began the Diſcourſe; Madam, ſaid he unto her, I beſeech you do not condemn before you underſtand me. You know very well, ſaid ſhe unto him, that this is not according to our Conditions, and that I ought not to hearken to any thing which you ſhall ſay, ſince you have rendred your ſelf unworthy of my Friendſhip by your poor Imbecility: which though I will not yet accuſe you of, however ſince I think you have loſt your Reaſon by ſome other Accident, go, Ligdamis, and ſtay at home until you recover it, and ſee me no more till then. In the Name of our Friendſhip, Madam, ſaid he unto her, do not thus cruelly baniſh me. That Conjuration, replied Cleonice, had Power to obtain any thing of me as long as our Friendſhip laſted; but ſince it is at an End, I muſt deny you all things. I do proteſt unto you, Madam, ſaid he unto her, that I have not one Thought in my Heart which can offend you: and if there be any Alteration in my Soul, it is diſadvantageous only unto my ſelf: I muſt needs confeſs I am more unquiet and troubled than I was, I do acknowledg it; but as in Relation unto you, Madam, the only Difference is, that I reſpect you much more than I did before: I fear you more, and love you with a greater Zeal, this is all, indeed, divine Cleonice; all the Alteration is, I loved you then, and I adore you now.

Whilſt Ligdamis was thus expreſſing himſelf, Cleonice looked upon him with Coldneſs able to drive a Man into abſolute Deſpair: And upon a ſudden ſhe beginning to ſpeak, Fie, fie, Ligdamis! ſaid ſhe unto him, give over, and do not add Crime to Crime; content your ſelf with Friendſhip, and do not force me to hate you. Would it be juſt, Madam, ſaid he unto her, to hate me for loving you too much? Moreover, do you not conſider that I did never reſiſt you, but always moſt punctually obey you? I have ſtriven with my Paſſion as much as I was able, and afterwards found I could not overcome it: I endeavoured to hide it; then ſeeing I was not able to do that neither, I would have baniſhed my ſelf. Why did you not ſeek a handſom pretence for it then, ſaid ſhe unto him, and never acquaint me with your Follies? Why, Madam, ſaid he unto her, would you wiſh me to loſe my Reaſon and my Liberty both? To drown my Soul in an ocean of turbulent Thoughts, altered all my Inclination, quitted the quiet of all my Life; and would you, I ſay, have been ignorant of the cauſe of all theſe Miſeries, and denied me ſo much Conſolation as to let you know how willing I was to obey you? Obey me then, ſaid ſhe unto him, in never ſeeing you again. Ligdamis would have ſaid ſomething to her, but ſhe would by no means hear him; and ſeeing he had no Will to go out of her Chamber, ſhe went out the firſt, and conſtrained him to go out alſo.

I leave you to imagine, Madam, how great his Sorrow was; and truly hers was no leſs, though it was in different Thoughts; for Ligdamis was grieved, becauſe he feared his Perſeverance would never alter the Heart of Cleonice; and ſhe was troubled to break off Friendſhip with Ligdamis, and deprive her ſelf of his Society who was ſo dear to her. She not being able then to contain her Sorrows in her own Soul, ſhe ſent for me, and I went to her the ſame Night; as ſoon as I came to her, My dear Iſmenea (ſaid ſhe unto me) am I not very unfortunate? and muſt it not needs be confeſſed, that I have Reaſon to be ſorry you ever made me acquainted with Ligdamis? Why, ſaid I unto her, did you quarrel when I left you together? Yes, anſwered Cleonice; and ſo much, that you can never agree us again. Then ſhe told me the whole Paſſage, but with ſuch diſturbed Thoughts, that it was eaſy to ſee, ſhe was extreamly perplexed: for I clearly ſaw ſhe had a moſt high Eſteem of the Friendſhip of Ligdamis; and I perceived alſo, that ſhe reſolved never to ſee him again. Methinks (ſaid I unto her, when I heard her ſay ſo) that you are a little too haſty in your Courſes, do you not conſider that if you break off ſo abruptly with him, all the World will be inquiſitive of the Cauſe? And do not you your ſelf conſider (ſaid ſhe to me) if I do not break off with Ligdamis, he may well imagine his pretended Paſſion does not diſpleaſe me? This laſt Inconveniency, ſaid I unto her, has not ſo many dangerous Conſequences as the other. Truly, ſaid ſhe, I think them much more dangerous.

Indeed, Madam, I could not with any Arguments alter her, but left her in a peremptory Reſolution never to ſee

Ligdamis again. As I returned to my Chamber, there I found this unfortunate Lover waiting for me, who came to ask my Advice and Aſſiſtance: I told him ingenuouſly that Cleonice was much incenſed againſt him, but would not tell him all I thought, becauſe I would not too much deject him. But Ligdamis, ſaid I unto him, do you intend to be ſtill in Love with Cleonice yet? With whom elſe, replied he ſharply? do you think I can love any but her, who is the moſt accompliſhed of her Sex? Knowing her Humour, as I do, replied I, and as you do alſo, methinks you ſhould never think more of her. Ah Iſmenea! ſaid he unto me, I am grown very knowing in Love of late, and you remain ignorant: within theſe few Days, doubtleſs I would have ſaid the ſame; but now I know by Experience, that Love is infinitely more ſtrong than all Reaſons, and nothing can overcome it; Therefore ſince it is not a voluntary Buſineſs, or a taken-up Humour, it is great Injuſtice to condemn thoſe that are captivated by it. You your ſelf then, replied I, and laughed, have been often very unjuſt. I do confeſs it, replied he, and am ſeverely puniſhed for it: However, it is but Equity to pity at the leaſt all unfortunate Lovers, who can hope for no other Conſolation: And this Iſmenea is all the Favour that I ask of Cleonice: She has heretofore done me the Honour to ſay, that if ever I fell in love, provided it was not with her ſelf, ſhe would take it well if I diſcovered it unto her; ſhe told me that ſhe would aſſiſt me with her Counſel, and do her beſt to cure that Diſeaſe which ſo tormented me: I beſeech you obtain only this Favour from her Goodneſs, that ſhe would be pleaſed to make no Exceptions; but that I once more tell her into what a Condition ſhe has brought my Soul, as if it were not her ſelf with whom I am in love; and I do moſt faithfully promiſe her, to follow her Advice whatever it be, and to try all Remedies which ſhe ſhall preſcribe in Order to my Cure: If I were in love with any other, ſhe were not ſo much obliged to help me: Negotiate therefore for me, dear Iſmenea, and perſwade this moſt admirable Lady to be the Confident of that Paſſion which ſhe her ſelf has cauſed.

I ſhould never end, Madam, if I ſhould relate all that Ligdamis ſaid unto me, for I think Love did never inſpire any Man with more delicate and pure Raptures than it did him: He moved me infinitely to pity him; inſomuch as I promiſed to uſe my beſt Endeavours that Cleonice ſhould not hate him. I found it a knotty piece of Difficulty to obtain of her that he might ſee her; for ſhe was many Days together peremptorily reſolved never to ſee him again; but maugre all her Choler, I perceived ſhe could not forget the Friendſhip which was between Ligdamis and her ſelf; and therefore I thought it expedient to preſs her no further than unto Terms of Friendſhip, to ſee how her Soul would reliſh that only. In the Interim, Ligdamis looked at no body, and feigning himſelf to be ſick for a Pretence of his not going out, he lived the moſt miſerable Life upon Earth; for when he remembred how happy once he was, when he was only the Friend of Cleonice, and conſidered how unfortunate he was now, only becauſe he loved her, he thought himſelf a moſt deſpicable Man. Four or five Days paſſed on in this manner, during all which time, I ſaw Cleonice was very melancholy, and I did not ſo much as name Ligdamis unto her. Sometimes I ſaw by her Eyes, ſhe expected I ſhould talk of him, and ſometimes again I ſaw ſhe did not deſire it; yet I kept conſtant unto my Reſolution, and ſpoke not one Syllable of him. Divers in my Preſence aſked her, whether ſhe knew the Cauſe of Ligdamis's Retirement? Artelinda, was one that aſked her the ſame Queſtion, Phocylides another, and every one, even ſo much as Hermodorus, endeavoured to know of her, how it came to paſs he did not viſit her? Some ſaid he was ſick, others ſaid he was grieved; all concluded he would die preſently, if the Malady of his Body or Mind did not diminiſh.

After all the Company was gone who had ſpoken to her concerning Ligdamis, ſhe turned towards me: The Deſtiny of Ligdamis, ſaid ſhe, is very ſtrange; for all that love him not, do not ſpeak unto me of him, and you who do love him, ſays not a Word. It is true, ſaid I unto her; but the Reaſon is, becauſe I love you more than I do him, and my Fears to anger you, impoſes ſilence. I give you thanks for that Thought of me, replied ſhe, but I ſhould have thought my ſelf very much obliged to you, if you had infuſed any Reaſon into the Soul of Ligdamis, whom I eſteem ſo much, as I wiſh I could ſee him Reaſonable again. It is you, Madam, ſaid I unto her, that muſt work that Miracle: and then I acquainted her how Ligdamis did moſt humbly ſupplicate, that ſhe would be pleaſed to be unto him as ſhe had promiſed to be, if he had been in Love with another. At the firſt, ſhe rejected his deſire, and would by no means hearken unto it; but afterwards, after a long reſiſtance, thinking that perhaps ſhe might diſſwade him by Reaſon from being in Love with her, ſhe promiſed to ſee him once again, and to adviſe with him upon ſome courſe to cure him of his Diſeaſe. As ſoon as I was parted from Cleonice, I ſent for Ligdamis, who received this News with incredible joy: But, ſaid I unto him, all this is not to adviſe you to be ſtill in Love with her. It is no matter, ſaid he unto me, I care not upon what Conditions it be, ſo I may but ſee her; the very ſight of her will be an unexpreſſible comfort unto me: And indeed he ſtaid not long for that comfort, for the next Morning Stenobea went abroad to make many Viſits, leaving Cleonice behind her, and I advertiſed Ligdamis of it; yet I could not poſſibly be at this Meeting, but he gave me an account of it the next day.

As ſoon as he came to her, ſhe looked upon him with ſuch an auſtere Aſpect, as was enough to quaſh all hopes in a Lover's Heart: Ligdamis, ſaid ſhe unto him, do not think to draw any matter of advantage unto your ſelf out of this my indulgence towards you, nor flatter your ſelf ſo much as to think I am not ſo much incenſed againſt you as I ſeem to be: I reſolved upon this preſent courſe, becauſe I thought our paſt Friendſhip obliged me to uſe all my endeavours for your Cure; and to try once more, whether I could infuſe any Reaſon into your Soul. Which way ſoever I have the honour of ſeeing you, Madam, anſwered he, I am infinitely obliged unto you, and more obliged than for all the Favour you conferred upon me, during the time of our Friendſhip; ſince really I never wiſhed for this honour with ſo much Ardency and Zeal, as ſince I have been deprived of your ſight. Yet I am the very ſame I was, replied Cleonice coldly. It is true, Madam, replied he, but I am not the ſame I was. I am very ſorry for it, replied ſhe, and I would do any thing to reduce you unto that pleaſing and faithful Friendſhip which was once in you, that you were ſuch a ſolid Friend, I ſay, as could clearly ſee things as really they are; and whoſe Converſation and Friendſhip, was the very delight of my Life: but, alas, Ligdamis, you are not now ſuch a one as I ſpeak of. Yet why are you not? why will you force me to hate you? or at the leaſt to ſee you no more. Madam, ſaid he, I am far from being ſo unreaſonable: and if I durſt I would tell you, that I limit all my Deſires only unto the ſeeing of you, and to the being your Friend. Did you pretend only unto theſe two things, replied ſhe, you never would have changed Thoughts; for there could not be a more tender Friendſhip than there was betwixt you and me, nor could you ſee me ofter than you did. It is true, Madam, ſaid he to her, but that Affection which you had to me, and thoſe frequent Viſits which I made, wanted ſomething which indeed I cannot expreſs, which yet is abſolutely neceſſary to ſatisfy an amorous Man. Fie, fie, Ligdamis, ſaid ſhe, did I ever think to hear ſuch a terrible word from your Mouth? You, I ſay, who has made me a hundred pleaſing Satyrs againſt ridiculous Love! who has deſcribed it as the moſt dangerous Paſſion! who has told me it never laid hold on any but Fools and idle People! who has promiſed me a thouſand times, it ſhould never captivate you! who has related unto me a thouſand ſad Conſequences it has cauſed, and ten times as many Extravagancies! who has told me, that it makes all thoſe who are poſſeſſed with it to loſe their Reaſon, to forget Vertue, and at the leaſt makes them all miſerable! You added unto all this, that this dangerous Paſſion makes the moſt faithful Friends become Impoſtors and Cheats; that a Lover ought always to be looked upon as one that is not fit to anſwer for himſelf, and as one that is ready to commit all Crimes for the advancement of his fooliſh Love. After all this, Ligdamis, would you have me look upon you as a Man in Love; and as one who according to your own Maxims I ought to ſcorn and hate? Speak, Ligdamis, ſpeak, I conjure you; but ſpeak as I would have you. What would you have me ſay, Madam? replied he. I would have you ſay (replied ſhe) and aſſure me that you will be always my Friend, and that you will never be a Lover. Indeed I cannot, Madam, anſwered he; for tho I ſhould force my Tongue to tell a Lie, yet my Eyes would contradict my Words, and my Face would diſcover the Secrets of my Heart. Fie Ligdamis! ſaid ſhe, are you reſolved to loſe my Friendſhip? Why, Madam, anſwered he, I could eaſier conſent to love you leſs, than to ſay it.

But Ligdamis, ſaid ſhe unto him, you do not anſwer unto what I ſay: I pray tell me whether all you have ſpoken againſt Love, be out of your Memory? No, replied he, but it is out of my Heart, ſince certainly I ſee things after another manner than I did before. For my part, ſaid ſhe, I know not why you ſhould. Yes, Madam, replied he, I do not ſee you as I did when I was only your Friend: I find you a hundred times more fair than I did; me-thinks you have incomparably a finer Spirit than you had before; you are infinitely more charming; your Humours are more agreeable and pleaſing unto me; the leaſt of your words now, has more eloquence than your fineſt Rhetorick had before; your very Look makes my Heart to beat; and you ſeem to be ſo infinitely above what you were before in every thing, that I am aſhamed I ſhould not diſcover thoſe admirable Perfections in you until I was in Love: Yes, Madam, the fire does not only warm, but enlighten me, and lets me ſee a hundred things which I could not ſee before. And can you ſee, ſaid ſhe unto him, that Love is not the ſame you ſaid it was before? I do moſt plainly ſee it, replied he, and in ſuch a moſt evident manner, that I wonder how I could poſſibly reaſon ſo againſt it. I do confeſs, Madam, there is a terreſtrial, groſs, and brutal kind of Paſſion that uſurps the name of Love, yet is not, which merits the averſion of all reaſonable People: Alſo I do confeſs there is a kind of univerſal Gallantry, unworthy of a lofty Soul: But a conſtant and pure Love, ſuch a Love as my Soul is ſenſible of, is the moſt glorious and commendable thing in the World. It is by this Paſſion that Souls are elevated above themſelves, and prompted unto all Heroick Actions. Be pleaſed, Madam, to command me any thing that is full of the greateſt Difficulties, and the moſt dangerous to be executed, and I ſhall immediately attempt it. If you had impoſed any thing of this nature upon that Ligdamis who was only your Friend, perhaps he would have conſidered the greatneſs of the Danger, and the difficulty of his Obedience, and in all likelihood would not undertake it: But this Ligdamis, who loves you now, will never deliberate a Minute upon any of your Commands, but is ready with his Obedience at a Minutes warning.

Then I command you not to love me as you do, replied ſhe, if it be ſo that your Obedience has no Limits. Impoſſibilities, Madam, replied he, are ever to be excepted; and therefore in this I cannot obey you, becauſe it is not in my power to love more or leſs than I do. Then I muſt never ſee you again, replied ſhe, unleſs you will endeavour to find out ways of curing your Folly. Tho my Diſeaſe is ſuch, replied he, that I had rather die than wiſh the cure; yet I will ask you, Madam, what you conceive moſt proper and expedient for it? I would have you think upon all you have formerly ſaid unto me againſt it, replied ſhe. I remember them very well, replied he; but I find them ſo unjuſt and remedileſs, that they will not do it. Conſult then with your own Reaſon, replied ſhe, and I am confident it will change your Opinion. Alas, Madam, replied he, my Reaſon is ſo troubled, and ſo far from affording me any Counſel, that it abſolutely ſubmits unto my Paſſion. Then ſee me no more, ſaid ſhe, and try whether Abſence will help you. Since theſe five or ſix daies in which I have not ſeen you, replied he, my Love is increaſed much more. Conſider then, replied ſhe, that if you love me, I ſhall hate you; and by not loving me, you will ſtill have my Eſteem and Friendſhip. O, Madam, cri'd he, how moſt unjuſt is this, to love me if I do not love you, and to hate me if I do! Whatever it be, Ligdamis, replied ſhe, ſince my Thoughts are not changed as yours are, but ſtill look upon Love with the ſame Eyes I did before, and find you ſo unreaſonable that I cannot endure you, I muſt tell you what I conceive: Your face is changed, and your Actions alſo; I find a continual reſtleſneſs in your Eyes; you ſpeak more haſtily than you did before; all you ſay is unjuſt; you are ſilent when you ſhould ſpeak, and anſwer alwaies impertinently, and indeed do every thing without Reaſon: For you thought your ſelf happy heretofore in my Converſation, my Eſteem, my Friendſhip, and my Confidence; I do yet offer the ſame unto you, and you are not contented. For my part, Ligdamis, you may ſay or think what you pleaſe; but I never found Love ſo fantaſtical in any as in you. The Reaſon is, replied he, becauſe the Paſſion was never ſo violent in any as in me: but alas, Madam, I muſt needs think my ſelf moſt unhappy, that my Love is unknown to you. Deceive not your ſelf, replied ſhe; for the more diſorder I ſee in your Soul, the leſs diſpoſition I ſhall have to love you. That muſt needs be impoſſible, Madam, replied he; for as the Fire burns thoſe that touch it, and the Sun enlightens thoſe that ſee it; ſo a pure and conſtant Paſſion muſt needs move the Heart of her one loves.

You hope then that I ſhall love you, (replied Cleonice with ſuch a coldneſs as made Ligdamis almoſt deſpair.) I do wiſh it, Madam, at the leaſt, replied he, but I dare not ſay I hope it. 'Tis very well, ſaid ſhe; indeed you could not do me a more manifeſt Injury, than perſwade me to love you, and to do that which I have ſo often condemned in others. Can you imagine, Ligdamis, that I ſhould laugh at all thoſe Follies in you, which we both together have condemned in others? Do you think I can take any pleaſure to ſee you miſerable for the Love of me? to hear you ſigh, and make all the crabbed Faces which Love uſes to force them unto that are ſubject unto it? Fie, fie, Ligdamis, I cannot endure it: And though I cannot regulate your Affection, yet let me limit your Hopes; for aſſure your ſelf, that a hundred Years Languiſhment, Sighs, Tears, Raptures, Expreſſions, and Services, ſhall never obtain any thing from me. Though, Madam, replied he, you cannot be ſenſible, yet I beſeech you be not unjuſt; but conſider that it is your Self who is the cauſe of my Miſery, and therefore you are obliged to have ſome compaſſion upon me. Then be only unto me, ſaid ſhe unto him, as I am unto Iſmenea, my Confident in point of Friendſhip: Love me as you were wont to do, and let me love you only as I do, and be not ſo unjuſt as to make me abſolutely miſerable without a Cauſe.

I know very well, Madam, ſaid he, that by our Conditions you are not to be a Friend to one that is in Love; but thoſe that make Laws, can alter them. I do remember that you ſaid one day, the reaſon why you would never have a Lover for your Friend, was becauſe you once had a Friend who fell in love, and was weary of you, and made but ſhort Viſits; that he talked unto you of nothing but the Party whom he loved; and that you durſt not truſt him with any Secret, becauſe he was ſure to reveal it unto his Miſtreſs. But, Madam, you need not fear any of theſe Inconveniences in me: For, firſt, Madam, I do proteſt I have no Joy but in your company; my Viſits ſhall laſt longer than ever; and if you pleaſe, I will never ſpeak unto any but your ſelf. Moreover, Madam, you need not fear my revealing of Secrets unto her I moſt adore, ſince if I do reveal them, it is only to your ſelf who truſted me with them; therefore why will you deny me the honour and happineſs of ſeeing you? And give me leave to love you, I beſeech you: perhaps your Inſenſibility will cure me ſooner than that Abſence which you condemn me unto: for, Madam, when I am from you, I ſhall ſtill imagine that if I were with you, I ſhould move your Heart; ſo that hoping ſtill to ſee you again, I ſhall hope alſo to be loved, and by conſequence to be continually in love: but if you permit me to continue with you, perhaps your Cruelty and Inhumanity will deſtroy my Hopes, and afterwards my Love. This Remedy, replied Cleonice, is as odd and fantaſtical as your Paſſion. It is the only one, replied he, which in reaſon you can appoint me. Yet let us try Abſence, ſaid ſhe, for I think leſs danger to be in it. I remember, Madam, replied he, I have heard you ſay, that the Malady which torments me was contagious: but I remember alſo that Iſmenea anſwered you, that it could never infect you: And certainly, Madam, it cannot; for as long as I have been with you, I could never perceive you the leaſt moved by it. Heavens preſerve me from ſuch a Misfortune, replied ſhe. However, Ligdamis, ſince I perceive it a thing impoſſible at preſent to bring your Soul unto Reaſon, all I can do for you is, to aſſure you that I am extreamly ſorry for the loſs of your Friendſhip; that you ſhall ever find it ready for you, as ſoon as you are out of Love; and in order to that I enjoin you to travel, and ſee whether that be more prevalent than my Reaſons.

If there were any Crime in my Paſſion, anſwered Ligdamis, or if my Pretenſions were unjuſt, then I could not blame you for baniſhing me: but, alas, I ask no more but that you would ſuffer me to love you: What harm does that which is in my Heart do you? has it put you unto any trouble this laſt Month I have been with you? No, replied Cleonice, nothing troubled me, but that I did not know the meaning of your Soul. You ſee then, replied he, that you have no ſolid Foundation for what you ſay; and that my Paſſion is not ſo troubleſom to you in it ſelf, but only by ſuch imaginations as you apprehend of it: For truly, Madam, the Paſſion which did not trouble you a Month ſince, was the very ſame it is now at this time: I profeſs that I am much more ſenſible of your Miſeries than I was, and if it were poſſible, I am more ſecret and faithful than ever. Though all this were true, replied Cleonice, yet I have one Exception againſt you, which you cannot anſwer ; which is, that ſince your Heart is capable of this Paſſion, you may love another as well as me; and if you ſhould, in what a caſe were my Confidence and truſt ? When I was in love with none, Madam, ſaid he, you had more cauſe to fear this inconveniency than now, for then it had not been impoſſible but I might have loved another, and not you: But now I do love you, it is abſolutely impoſſible I ſhould ever love any other, for out of all doubt, you are both my firſt and my laſt Love: One may perhaps forſake a mean Beauty, and fall upon another of more accompliſhed Parts; but to forſake the faireſt and moſt abſolute Perfection upon Earth for another, was never heard of ſince Love had dominion in the Hearts of Men. For my part, ſaid Cleonice, I am ſo affrighted to hear you talk thus, that I hardly know what I ſhould anſwer, unleſs that it is my beſt courſe to truſt none, but miſtruſt my own Reaſon: Therefore Ligdamis, I muſt needs deny your requeſt, and entreat you to ſee me no more, at leaſt of a long time. Would you have me die then? replied he. No, ſaid ſhe, but I would have you become wiſe. Then I conjure you, Madam, ſaid he, by that Friendſhip which you have promiſed, that I may have eight days allowed to ſee you. I grant it, ſaid ſhe, though you do not deſerve the Favour; yet it ſhall be with this condition, that you ſpeak not a word to me of your pretended Love.

Ligdamis then was as thankful unto Cleonice for it, as if ſhe had granted him her Heart; and at his parting from her, he came to me with ſo much Joy in his Countenance, that I knew very well his Heart was really in Love. He requeſted me to mediate for him, in ſuch obliging Language, as indeed he perſwaded me to do him that Office: Yet I aſſure you it was no eaſy Task, for I found Cleonice in ſuch a melancholy Mood, and ſo much perplexed, that ſhe would not hearken unto any but extreamly againſt her Will. The Friendſhip of Ligdamis was none of the leaſt Cauſes of her Grief, and her averſion to Love, was a great addition to her Torment. However, Ligdamis did ſee her during the eight days ſhe had granted him: But maugre all his violent Reſtraints, he could not hold from uttering ſome ſymptoms of his Paſſion, either by his Looks or Sighs, or his Studies, or elſe by ſome Words which ſtole from him unawares. Moreover, as Cleonice was diſpoſed to interpret all his Actions that way, ſo ſhe avoided the encounter of his Eyes as much as ſhe could: She bluſh'd as ſoon as ſhe ſaw him come near her; ſhe took all care not to ſit next him; ſhe did not addreſs any Speech unto him, and kept ſuch a ſtrange diſtance, that I wondred to ſee ſuch an alteration between them. When I asked Cleonice why ſhe would not behave her ſelf as if ſhe were ignorant of his Paſſion; She anſwered me, that ſhe could not for her Life do it, and that he muſt needs be gone from her: For (ſaid ſhe unto me the laſt day of his allowance) if he continue his Love ſtill, and do not go away, I ſhall hate him extreamly. But ſuppoſe he do obey you, and go away, ſaid I to her, and that abſence cannot cure him, what would you have him do then? do you think it juſt he ſhould be eternally baniſhed from his Country, only becauſe he loves you too well? Were he a Man you did not eſteem, or that he did not deſerve it, or that you had an averſion to his Perſon, what could you do more? I ſhould then do much leſs, ſaid ſhe unto me. I cannot underſtand your Reaſon for that, replied I, yet I muſt needs believe, becauſe I ſee you let Hermodorus live quietly at Epheſus, though he has loved you long. Hermodorus, replied ſhe, is not a Man whom I would honour ſo much, as to command him any thing. This Honour which you do Ligdamis, replied I, may well be called Injuſtice. Yet it is a Favour, replied ſhe, ſince I do all I can to preſerve his Friendſhip.

As ſhe was ſaying this, Ligdamis came in, with an intention to get his Term prolonged. I no ſooner ſaw him, but taking the word from Cleonice, Come, Ligdamis, ſaid

I unto him, come and hear the favourable Cauſe of your Baniſhment. Muſt I then be baniſhed? replied he. Yes, anſwered Cleonice, if I have any Power with you. You have it, Madam, moſt abſolutely, anſwered he, and ſighed; but it is the Office of thoſe that have the moſt ſoveraign Power, not to do all they can, but all they ought to do. And I ought to do all I can, replied ſhe, to infuſe Reaſon into your Soul, to the end I may keep you my Friend. Then you do not hate me, Madam? ſaid Ligdamis. I do acknowledg it,ſaid ſhe,but I ſhall moſt infallibly hate you,if you do not obey me. When you have made trial of Abſence, which I have heard is the only Remedy againſt Love; and that I ſee you uſe your beſt Endeavours to become wiſe, then perhaps I ſhall be ſo favourable as not to deny you my Friendſhip,but permit you to keep that Paſſion in your Soul which you cannot exclude. I proteſt, Cleonice,(ſaid I unto her,and laughed) this is an admirable good one, to make that which you endure, becauſe you cannot help it, to paſs for a great Favour, and to oblige Men unto Impoſſibilities. Though I ſee you would perſwade me I am to blame, replied ſhe, yet I do not repent it; for if it be impoſſible for Ligdamis to leave loving me, then let him give me ſome Teſtimony of his Love: Therefore I conjure you, ſaid ſhe unto him, to make trial of two Remedies; The one is Abſence, the other is Ambition: You know Cleander loves you dearly, go then unto the Court for ſix Months, and endeavour to drive out one Paſſion with another: but I beſeech you do not reſiſt me any longer, unleſs you will have me hate you. I know very well, Madam, replied he, that though I do obey you, yet all will do no good, ſince whereſoever I am, I am moſt certain you will be there preſent in my mind, and I am abſolutely incapable of any other Ambition,but of being in your Favour. After this, Cleonice began to ſpeak ſo earneſtly unto Ligdamis, that I knew ſhe would be obeyed; ſo that I adviſed him to be contented: For, ſaid I unto him, if Abſence do cure you, then you have good cauſe to think your ſelf happy; if it do not, yet you give Cleonice the greateſt teſtimony of your Obedience and Love that poſſibly can be. However, Madam, ſaid he unto her, I beſeech you promiſe me, if I punctually obey you, that you will never any more command me to pull that Paſſion out of my Heart, which doubtleſs will ever be there as long as I live. I promiſe you I will not, ſaid ſhe unto him: But becauſe this is not enough to keep a languiſhing exiled Lover alive, replied he; therefore, Madam, I beg this Favour of your Goodneſs, that in caſe I do not die of Sorrow, but live to return unto you, then that you would be pleaſed to be the Confident of my Paſſion. No, Ligdamis, ſaid ſhe unto him, I do not promiſe you that; but I aſſure you, that I will not hate you, if you obey me. In concluſion, Madam, not to trouble you with any impertinent Relations, Ligdamis obeyed her. It was eaſy to find a handſom Pretence for his Voyage, ſince it was wondred why he went no ofter to Sardis. I did my endeavours that he might take his leave before he went, but it could not poſſibly be obtained. I ſaw that the cauſe of this denial was advantagious for Ligdamis; for ſhe had not refuſed that Favour, but only becauſe ſhe knew it was impoſſible for her to bid him adieu, without expreſſing too many viſible ſigns of Friendſhip to him.

He departed then, with intentions to go unto Sardis, but in the way thither, he heard how Cræſus had impriſoned Cleander; ſo that reſolving not to go thither, by reaſon of this Accident, which put all Lydia into an univerſal aſtoniſhment, he went unto the Government of his Father, there to ſpend the time of his Exile, and in ſolitude to lament the Misfortune of Cleander, and his own, and almoſt as much Oleander's as his own; ſince after ſo many Victories, and ſo many good Services done unto all Lydia, he was a Priſoner without a Crime.

This News being reported at Epheſus, every one was extream ſad; for indeed it was one of the greateſt Misfortunes that could come to the whole Kingdom: But beſides the Publick Intereſt, which grieved Cleonice as it did the reſt, the particular Relations of Ligdamis was a great addition unto her Sorrows. She went to viſit the Siſter of Ligdamis upon this Occaſion; but ſhe would not write unto him, though I uſed all my Arguments to perſwade her; as for him, he writ often unto me unknown to Cleonice; for I had forgot to tell you how this cruel Lady made him promiſe her to ſend her no Letters, and that if he did write unto me, I ſhould conceal them from her; ſo that I durſt not acquaint her how Abſence had wrought no Effects upon the Cure of Ligdamis. In the mean time, Cleonice was exceedingly ſad and ſolitary, ſo that Artelinda and Phocylides left off their Viſits. Stenobea, after a hundred Chidings that ſhe was not jocund enough, was forced to let her alone in quiet. So that Cleonice keeping her Chamber very much, I was very often alone with her. At the firſt, when I began to ſpeak of Ligdamis, ſhe would be angry; yet by degrees ſhe did not only ſuffer me to talk of him, but alſo would her ſelf begin the firſt. One day then when we were alone, after diſcourſe of ſeveral other things; I am certain, ſaid ſhe, in what place ſoever Ligdamis is, he can find none unto whom he can ſpeak concerning me, and therefore I hope he will quickly forget his Folly. But, ſaid I unto her, and looked earneſtly upon her; Is it poſſible you ſhould wiſh as you ſay, that Ligdamis ſhould be indifferent towards you? Not, as I ſay, anſwered ſhe. What do you ſay? (replied I half angry). I ſay, (anſwered ſhe) I wiſh that Ligdamis would not love me; as for his Friendſhip, I ſhould be very glad of it, I do confeſs. But how do you think that is poſſible? ſaid I unto her: Do you not conſider, that if Abſence do cure a violent Paſſion, it muſt be by forgetting you, and unaccuſtoming himſelf from ſeeing you? Moreover, you do not conſider, that he is now no Friend unto you; that Affection has changed his Nature; and in all reaſon, if the Remedy which you have impoſed upon him do work that Effect which you expect, he will neither be your Lover nor your Friend.

Iſmenea, ſaid ſhe unto her, you are a moſt cruel Woman to examine me ſo ſtrictly upon a thing which does not pleaſe me: However, why is it not poſſible that the Friendſhip of Ligdamis which became Love, ſhould return to Friendſhip again? I know not well the reaſon, ſaid I unto her, but I am ſure the Example of it is very rare. I ſhould be very ſorry, replied ſhe, to loſe Ligdamis altogether. Yet you expoſe your ſelf unto it, ſaid I to her. But ſince I ſaw her in a leſs ſevere humour, I pray, Cleonice, ſaid I, whether had you rather that Ligdamis ſhould be abſolutely cured of his Paſſion, and be altogether indifferent towards you, or that he ſhould be in love with another? Since I was ever a Friend unto Ligdamis, (ſaid ſhe unto me, and bluſh'd) I cannot deſire he ſhould be cured of one Diſeaſe, by falling into another; and I had rather loſe his Affection, and love none, than to ſee him over-loaded with Fetters. But, ſaid I, ſuppoſe, there were an abſolute neceſſity that he muſt either love you or another, which would you chuſe? I long ſince told you what I thought upon that, replied ſhe. It is true, ſaid I unto her, but I ask you what you think now? I will not take ſo much pains, ſaid ſhe, as to think upon it: Yet if ever Ligdamis do cure himſelf of his Follies, I ſhall take a great delight in letting him ſee the little ſolidity there is in the Hearts of thoſe that are in love; for I proteſt, Iſmenea, I do think upon Ligdamis, as much as if he were here at Epheſus. Why then would you have him forget you? ſaid I to her, and laughed: Do you well know what you would have? Think upon it, Cleonice, and think upon it ſeriouſly: it would be very fine, if Ligdamis ſhould forget you, and you could not forget him. You ſpeak ſo fondly, replied ſhe, that I will not anſwer. You may do better to confeſs you cannot anſwer, replied I, unleſs you contradict your ſelf; for you no ſooner wiſh that Ligdamis ſhould think no more of you, but there is a ſecret deſire in your Heart which you cannot reſiſt, that forces you to wiſh he ſhould think upon you eternally.

You preſs me ſo far, ſaid ſhe unto me, that I have no mind to ſpeak any more of it. You have no mind to be ſincere, anſwered I, nor can you anſwer directly. I think, replied ſhe, and ſmiled, you have a mind to make me loſe a ſhe-friend as well as a he, and ſeek to quarrel with me. I know not, anſwered I, and laughed, whether you will quarrel with me or no; but I am ſure you either cannot, or will not anſwer me. Really, Iſmenea, ſaid ſhe unto me, I have told you all I thought; and more than that, I aſſure you I will anſwer unto any thing you will ask, and anſwer truly. Confeſs then, ſaid I unto her, that you would not have Ligdamis forget you. I do confeſs it, ſaid ſhe, and bluſh'd. And would it not anger you, if he ſhould love another? I do confeſs it alſo, replied ſhe, and looked down; though it be only in relation to himſelf, and not out of any Jealouſy. Whether had you rather he ſhould always love you, ſaid I unto her, or that he ſhould hate you? Ah Iſmenea! replied ſhe, you ask me ſuch odd Queſtions, that I know not how to anſwer: Yet I think that I ſhould be equally angry at the love and the hatred of Ligdamis. I do not think ſo, ſaid I unto her: But ſince you will not clearly explain your-ſelf, I will ask you no more Queſtions; only wiſh in revenge, that Ligdamis may forget you, that at his return he may love another, and that you cannot forget him. You are very revengeful, I ſee, ſaid ſhe unto me; but my comfort is, that what you wiſh will never come to paſs; for if Ligdamis do forget me, I ſhall forget him; ſo that it ſhall not diſquiet me at all. You have impoſed a Command upon him, ſaid I unto her, in which you do not deſire he ſhould obey you, ſince if he do, you will puniſh him. Cleonice after this would have told me, that ſhe appointed him only to baniſh Love from his Heart: but I would not ſtay to hear her, and left her without an Anſwer; conceiving the reſult of all ſhe had ſaid unto me was, that her friendly Diſpoſition unto Ligdamis was grown a little more tender towards him ſince he departed: Yet I durſt not tell her that I ſometimes received Letters from him.

But yet one day when ſhe and I were together, I let one of his Letters fall by chance; which ſhe preſently took up, not imagining it to be from Ligdamis; ſhe no ſooner had it in her Hands, but ſhe knew the writing; and ſhe no ſooner knew it, but ſhe bluſht extreamly. I perceived her firſt Thought was to read it; but her ſecond Conſideration check'd her, and ſhe offered it unto me without looking into it. You are not very inquiſitive, I ſee, Madam, (ſaid I unto her, and would not take it.) Indeed I am not, ſaid ſhe, eſpecially when I am afraid to hear any thing which will not pleaſe me. If you pleaſe, you may read it, ſaid I unto her. If I could make him ſuch a one as would pleaſe me, ſaid ſhe, I wiſh he were here; but ſince all my Deſires cannot change him, I had rather return it unto you unſeen. Then I taking it out of her Hands, and deſiring to anger her a little, to the end I might the better diſcover her real Thoughts; I told her that I would read it aloud unto her, if ſhe would not read it herſelf. Then, ſaid ſhe, I will not hear you: And after ſhe had ſaid ſo, ſhe was ſilent. Then, the better to hide the diſorder of her Thoughts, ſhe fell to work in a piece of Tiſſue of Gold, which lay upon the Table. After this I riſe up alſo, and ſeated my ſelf over againſt her, leſt ſhe ſhould ſee what was really in the Letter, which I read, and feigned theſe Words.

S*olitude,* Iſmenea! has done that which Reaſon could not; for the fair Cleonice ſhall be no more troubled with my Love. It was not Abſence only which cured my Diſeaſe; I ſtood in need of a more powerful Remedy: And I met with a Lady leſs fair, I confeſs, but much more ſenſible, who makes me very well able to obey thoſe Commands which Cleonice impoſed upon me.

Ha, Iſmenea! (ſaid Cleonice, in throwing her work upon the Table, and deſiring to read it her ſelf) ſure this is not the Letter of Ligdamis. Surely it is, ſaid I unto her, and hid it from her, though what is in it does not pleaſe you: But pray tell me what you deſire I ſhould read. I would not have you read any thing, ſaid ſhe; but I would read it my ſelf, whatſoever is in it. Seeing then the inquiſitive diſpoſition of Cleonice, after I had a while reſiſted her, at laſt I let her ſee it; and ſpoke ſo, as if what before I feigned to read were really in it. So that immediately opening it, ſhe read theſe Words.

Ligdamis unto Iſmenea.

If my adored Cleonice did but know that the leſs I ſee her, the more I love her; doubtleſs ſhe would recal me, though it were only to hinder the Augmentation of my Paſſion. Therefore I beſeech you (if you think it fit) let her know, that I ſhall be at the end of my Baniſhment without all compariſon more in love with her, than the firſt day I began it: The remembrance of her Beauty, her Wit, her Mind, and my deſire of ſeeing her, is the only buſineſs of my ſolitude. This, Iſmenea, is my Life: which would be happy in the midſt of my Miſery, if I could hope to be neither hated nor forgotten.

Ligdamis.

Whilſt Cleonice was reading, I did attentively obſerve her, and methought I ſaw more confuſion than anger in her Looks. I ſaw alſo, that in reading the end of the Letter, where Ligdamis ſaid he ſhould be happy to be neither hated nor forgotten, ſhe ſmiled a little: Afterwards returning the Letter unto me, and hardly daring to look upon me; You have taken ſuch good order, ſaid ſhe to me, that this laſt Misfortune ſhall not befal Ligdamis, that he needs not fear it: But cruel Woman that you are (ſaid ſhe, and aſſumed a more ſerious Countenance) what pleaſure can you take in tormenting me? I know Ligdamis is your Couſin; and therefore I had been to blame, if I had wiſhed him not to write unto you: But why muſt I be the ſubject of his Letters and yours? For my part, ſaid I unto her, ſince I did only anſwer Ligdamis, you muſt accuſe him only for ſpeaking of you. As for my particular, when he ſpoke to me concerning Cleonice, I did not think it civil to anſwer him concerning Artelinda, or any other, or to anſwer his Letters any otherwiſe than to the Queſtions he asked me. But what will you anſwer him? replied ſhe. I will anſwer what you pleaſe, ſaid I unto her, for I ſhall not write until to morrow. Whatſoever you write (ſaid ſhe) unto him, do not ſend him word I have ſeen his Letter. I do not ask you what I ſhall not write, ſaid I unto her, but what I ſhall: You may when I ſhall tell you, anſwered ſhe: In the mean time, if you will indeed oblige me, perſwade him very earneſtly to ſtifle that Paſſion which procures him nothing but trouble.

Thus you ſee, Madam, what were the Thoughts of Cleonice, during the Exile of Ligdamis, who returned to Epheſus as ſoon as the time of his Baniſhment was expired, without asking Cleonice any leave. As ſoon as ever he arrived, he came to ſee me, to aſſure me he was no Changling, and to ask counſel what he ſhould do. Since I knew the mind of Cleonice very well, I was of opinion that his beſt courſe was to ſend no Meſſages, before he went himſelf, and that he ſhould viſit Stenobea as he was uſed to do at his return from his Travels: So that hearkning unto my advice, he went thither the ſame day, and I went alſo, having a great deſire to ſee how this firſt Viſit paſſed; but as ill luck would have it, there was that day ſo much Company with Stenobea, that he had not one minutes Opportunity to ſpeak unto Cleonice in private. Artelinda and Phocylides came alſo thither; and becauſe it was a long time ſince they had ſeen Ligdamis, he was the only ſubject of the Converſation. Some accoſted him with Complements of Sorrow for the Impriſonment of Cleander; others aſſured him they thought his Travels long; and Artelinda, according to her Humour, told him, ſhe wondred how he could live in ſuch a ſolitude as he had done, applying her ſelf after this, to make a very pleaſant Satyr of the Country; Maintaining, that to be in it eight Days together, were enough to make one ſtupid, melancholy, and inſenſible for ever; and concluded, ſince Ligdamis had been there ſix Months, though his Spirit was never ſo great, yet he muſt needs be very melancholy, or for ever inſenſible. Whilſt Artelinda was thus talking, Ligdamis was ſo perplexed, that he knew not what to anſwer; and Cleonice was ſo troubled, that ſhe had little delight in that day's Converſation, though the next day ſhe had more: For Ligdamis came to my Houſe, whither ſhe alſo came with Intentions to deſire me, that I would deliver her from this obſtinate Lover, whom ſhe had no deſire to loſe. When ſhe ſaw him, ſhe thought I had ſent for him, though I did not; but yet, after ſhe had chid me a little for it, ſhe ſtaid with me: So that we three only being alone, Ligdamis addreſſing himſelf towards her, and looking upon her in ſuch a manner as might let her ſee his Soul was the ſame: You ſee me here, Madam, ſaid he unto her, at the end of my Baniſhment; but it is you only who can tell me whether I be at the end of my Miſery, and whether you will permit that Man, who cannot be your Friend, or leave off loving you, to relate the Sorrows which abſence hath procured him. I had rather you would tell me what courſes you have taken, ſaid ſhe unto him, to overcome your unjuſt Paſſion. Alas, Madam, replied he, how could I ever hope to overcome it, ſince I was never able to maſter my Will ſo far, as to fight againſt it? I had not baniſhed you, replied ſhe, but to the end you ſhould. I know it, Madam, anſwered he, but as ſoon as ever my Will went about it, my Heart, my Mind, my Reaſon, and all my Faculties rebelled againſt me, and I could not chuſe but continually repent my oppoſing ſo well-grounded a Paſſion; a Paſſion, I ſay, ſo noble, ſo pure and divine, that the moſt ſevere Vertue could not condemn it: So that, Madam, I muſt love you, and love you as long as I live; and ſo that if my Love be inſufferable to you, there is no other way to free your ſelf from it, but by commanding me to die: If it be your Pleaſure, Madam, ſo to doom it, I am reſolved upon Obedience; for as ſoon as I ſee the divine Cleonice can better endure my Death than my Love, deſpair will preſently do it: Speak then, Madam, is it your Pleaſure I ſhould live or die? you are abſolute Miſtreſs of my Deſtiny, and may make me what you pleaſe. If I could, anſwered Cleonice, I ſhould make you my Friend, and Ligdamis ſhould be no longer a Lover. Yet, Madam, ſaid he unto to her, is it not poſſible to accuſtom your ſelf to endur I ſhould love you a little more than I did before, and to acquaint you with my Sufferings? You promiſed as much, when I parted from you, and told me you would receive my Services, as Teſtimonies of my Feiendſhip. I have every day for ſix Months together ſuffered a thouſand Torments; and in lieu of accepting my Obedience according to your promiſe, will you prepare new Puniſhments for me? That would not be juſt (ſaid I, and interrupted them) and if Cleonice will follow my advice, ſhe ſhall not be ſo rigorous. Why do you ſay ſo Iſmenea, ſaid ſhe unto me: Can you be ſo much byaſſed by your affection to Ligdamis, as to counſel me unto any Gallantry with him? That word, ſaid I unto her, is a little too much; but I do confeſs, I know no reaſon why you ſhould treat Ligdamis, as if he were not ſo much as your Friend; for we are obliged to love our Friends in Miſeries, as well as in Happineſs. I do confeſs, ſaid ſhe, that they who do not ſo, are only the falſe Friends of Proſperity, and deſerve not that glorious Title of Friend. Then if Ligdamis ſaid I unto her, hath loſt his Reaſon by any manner of Misfortune, and ſeeks all Remedies to cure himſelf of all his Miſeries and Follies, but can find none, would you not endeavour to eaſe him, and much pitty his Misfortune? Doubtleſs I ſhould, replied ſhe. Then why do you not, ſaid I unto her and laughed? for do you not ſee that he is not Maſter of his Reaſon? though you do not grant him ſo much Affection as perhaps his folly deſires, yet receive his Affection with ſome kind of ſweetneſs; for it is not the part of true Friendſhip, to forſake him in ſo great a Misfortune as his is, to love one that is inſenſible: And for my part, if you uſe him ſo, you muſt give me leave to think you make no other uſe of your Friends, but to ſerve your own Ends, and to divert you, ſince you cannot endure they ſhould trouble you once in their Lives. Cleonice hearing me ſay ſo, began to ſmile, and Ligdamis to thank me: And he afterwards joined his moſt perſwaſive Rethorick unto mine, and we ſo overcame her, that after two hours converſe, we obtained that Ligdamis ſhould ſtay in Epheſus, and that he ſhould ſee her, but ſtill upon Condition, never to ſpeak unto her of any Love-Matters.

Thus then were ſome days ſpent; but ſince it was not poſſible for Ligdamis to lock up his Love ſo cloſe in his Heart, but that it would break out in ſome of his Actions or Words, there was not a day but Cleonice and he had two or three Quarrels. But Cleonice did inſenſibly accuſtom her ſelf to anſwer him; and though it was always with a Spirit of Contradiction, yet it was a great comfort unto him to talk of that which took up his whole Soul: And indeed it came to that paſs at laſt, that Cleonice became the Confident of his Paſſion, and could not endure he ſhould ſpeak of any thing elſe. And though ſhe always adviſed him never to hope for any thing, and often commanded him to quench his Flames, yet in the end ſhe had no deſire to be obeyed: She would often be ſo melancholly, that every one would chide her. At the firſt this ſurpriſed me, becauſe I never ſaw her in ſuch an humour before; but after I had diſcovered the phantaſtical cauſe of her melancholly, which took her often, and left her often; and I found the Fit would always take her when contrary to her Intention ſhe had ſpoken a little more ſweetly concerning Ligdamis than ſhe intended; and when her Memory did chide herſelf for being not ſharp enough with him, ſhe would be ſure to be dogged all that day, both towards her ſelf and all that came near her; and on the contrary, when ſhe had the power to treat him ill, ſhe appeared more pleaſant, and nothing but Joy could be ſeen in her Eyes: Alſo, one could never ſee them both in a good Humour at one time; for when Ligdamis was raviſhed with Joy at ſome favourable word which Cleonice had ſpoke, then ſhe was always melancholly; and when he was ſad at any harſh paſſage from her, then would ſhe be exceedingly pleaſant, ſo great was her care to hinder him from ſeeing ſhe was not inſenſible: Yet it is moſt certain, ſhe did not hate him; and though ſhe would not call her Affection by the name of Love, yet her change was ſo much, that it deſerved no other name: For a hundred trivial Paſſages, which ſlipt from her unawares, did ſufficiently manifeſt as much. I remember that whilſt he paſſed under the notion of her Friend only, ſhe cared not in what dreſs he ſaw her; and I have ſeen him in her Chamber ſome days, when her Dreſs was ſo careleſs, that any other Beauty but hers would have loſt its luſtre; and I am confident ſhe did never once in all her Life conſult with her Glaſs how to pleaſe him: But ſince his return it is otherwiſe; for Ligdamis never could ſee her till ſhe was dreſt: She made a ſhew as if her deſign in it, was only to wean him by degrees, from that familiarity he had with her; but the true deſign was, that Ligdamis might think her more fair. I humbly ask your pardon, Madam, for making ſuch an exact Relation of every trivial paſſage; for ſince you commanded it, I hope my Obedience will plead for my excuſe.

Be pleaſed to know further, that as Love cannot ly long hid, ſo Hermodorus, Artelinda and Phocylides preſently came to know that Ligdamis was in Love, and in Love with Cleonice: So that the Paſſion of Hermodorus augmented, the Love of Phocylides revived, and the Hatred of Artelinda renewed and became more violent; for ſhe was ſo vexed to ſee the Heart of Ligdamis reſiſt her Charms, and be captivated by Cleonice's, that ſhe uttered a hundred Symptoms of Envy. Moreover, as it is the cuſtom of many Ladies that are a little too gallantly inclined, to juſtify themſelves by accuſing others, ſhe divulged it in two or three days throughout the Town, that Ligdamis was in Love with Cleonice; adding further, that Cleonice was not ſo hard-hearted as ſhe was wont to be, ſaying in her Raillery, that Love had wounded two Hearts with one blow. The noiſe of it was ſo great in ſo little time, that it did not only come preſently unto my Ears, but it reached Cleonice's alſo, who heard it with more Sorrow than I can expreſs: for I ſaw many ſigns of Anger break out at her Eyes; but I could not tell whether it was againſt Ligdamis, or againſt Artelinda, or againſt herſelf; and ſhe would not explain herſelf, but ſpoke many things which much puzled led me: Yet I certainly knew that Ligdamis was upon better terms in her Heart than he believed himſelf. For whatſoever ſhe ſaid againſt Ligdamis, or Artelinda, or herſelf, ſhe never ſaid ſhe would quit Ligdamis; but on the contrary, whatſoever ſhe ſaid, ſhe added this unto it, That if ſhe ſhould change her manner of living with Ligdamis, it would be an occaſion to make the World believe all that Artelinda ſaid was true: Afterwards ſhe would ſay, that ſince this was only her own Thought, ſhe would uſe the matter ſo as none ſhould ever think Ligdamis in love with her. But in concluſion, when ſhe had uttered many Contrarieties, and ſaw that all her paſt Severity could not hinder the World from ſaying that Ligdamis loved her: Am I not very unhappy, ſaid ſhe, that after I have paſſed all my Life in Quietneſs and Honour, I ſhould now be expoſed to the Raillery of Artelinda?

But, Madam, ſaid I unto her, this is not ſo great a Crime as if you had loved him; for except Artelinda, none ſays that you love Ligdamis. If I had lived after the manner of others, anſwered ſhe, you had ſpoken well: But to hear ſuch Reports upon my ſelf after I have profeſſed ſuch a ſtrict Severity, believe me (Iſmenea) it is a moſt ſenſible Grief to me. Cleonice ſpoke this with ſo many Signs of real Diſpleaſure in her Face, that indeed I was ſorry for her; and deſiring to be a little more complacential towards her, Madam, (ſaid I) ſince it does ſo much trouble and torment you, though Ligdamis be my Friend, yet I adviſe you to forſake him, and baniſh him the ſecond time. Ah Iſmenea, ſaid ſhe unto me and bluſh'd, if I could do ſo, I had done it ere this; but to my Misfortune, Ligdamis has more of my Heart than I have my ſelf: Not that I can call my Apprehenſions of him Love, (ſaid ſhe in reprehending herſelf, and not deſiring to tell the Truth) but that my Friendſhip to him is ſo tender and violent, that I cannot deprive my ſelf of his Sight and Converſation. We will call this Affection what you pleaſe, (ſaid I unto her) yet ſince it is ſo, the matter is eaſily decided; for of two Evils the leſſer being to be choſen, ſen, it is better to make choice of that which will afford you ſome hours of Conſolation, than of that which will afford you none at all. But (ſaid I) my Advice is not to ſatisfy yourſelf by doing any act which is contrary to Civility; nor do I counſel you to regulate your Actions by the different Opinions of all the Men in a great Town: it will be ſufficient if you do nothing contrary to the univerſal received Cuſtoms of all good Perſons, nor any thing which may wound Vertue. This done, you may reſt your Mind in quiet, and never let the capricious Cenſures of others diſturb the pleaſure of your Life. But ſaid Cleonice unto me, I know not well whether this manner of living with Ligdamis, though it be moſt innocent, yet whether it be not contrary to that exact Civility which you ſpeak of; for the truth is, I know he is in Love, and I perceive I am ſo much his Friend that I cannot hate him. For my part, ſaid I unto her, it does not ſeem to me to be criminal; eſpecially if it be conſidered that your Quality and the Quality of Ligdamis is equal, and by conſequence you may marry; and ſince ſo, I do not ſee that Vertue would have any that are to marry to hate one another. All Paſſions (ſaid I) certainly are not Crimes, though heretofore you have thought ſo; there are ſome Loves which are innocent and allowable: Therefore do not uncalm your Mind, upon every light blaſt of common report.

You know, ſaid ſhe unto me, that the Father of Ligdamis is reſolved to marry him unto none but one. It is true, replied I: but you may well conceive, that ſince Ligdamis would not obey him when he loved none, he will not obey him now when he is in love with you: Therefore without taking notice of any Reports, I adviſe you to live with Ligdamis as you was accuſtomed: The noiſe which is vogued abroad, will quickly die; for ſince you know Artelinda will find ſo many ſeveral ſubjects of freſh diſcourſe, within three days the Love of Ligdamis will be no more talked on. However I conjure you, ſaid ſhe unto me, not to tell him that I confeſs I cannot baniſh him. But ſaid I unto her, and laughed, ſince the Affection you bear him is only Friendſhip, why will you hide the greatneſs of it? Believe me, Cleonice, it is not uſual to make any ſecret of Friendſhip; but on the contrary, it is ſo violent in ſome, that they cannot hide it. Well, well, Iſmenea, replied ſhe, I underſtand you very well; but though what you think were true,yet muſt I tell you every Thought of my Soul? Yes, ſaid I unto her, if you love Sincerity: But ſince you do not, I will be ſo complacential as to name every thing as you pleaſe; and call that Love which Ligdamis bears you, Hatred.

After this, Madam, the Mind of Cleonice was much more quiet, and Ligdamis more happy. All Reports (as I ſaid) died; for Artelinda gave ſo many new Cauſes of Talk concerning herſelf, that nothing elſe was ſpoke of; and ſhe did not only continue the Entertainment of that Multitude of Servants about her, but another notable Adventure fell out, which was this. As ſhe was one Morning writing ſeveral Letters unto three or four of her Lovers, unto which ſhe gave ſeveral Directions, and writing at the ſame time unto Cleonice to juſtify herſelf concerning what ſhe had ſaid againſt her; after ſhe had writ all the Letters, ſhe would write no Superſcriptions upon the top; and he to whom ſhe gave the Letters, though he was a witty Knave, and accuſtomed unto ſuch Offices, yet did he deceive her that day, in diſtributing them not according to her Directions. So that one of theſe Lovers, whom ſhe appointed to meet at the Temple of Diana, by one of her Letters, received another Letter which was not intended to him, and which appointed him that ſame Day to viſit a Lady which he never ſaw, who was his moſt mortal Enemy. That Letter which appointed the meeting at the Temple of Diana, was carried unto a Man of Quality who was a Stranger, and had not been long in Epheſus: He was one, who according to the Religion of his own Country, would not adore the Gods in any Temples which were built with the Hands of Men; ſo that this Letter did extremly ſurpriſe him. Artelinda had writ another unto one of her Lovers (who was to go out of Town that day) that he would meet her in the way as ſhe went to the Temple, to the end ſhe might there bid him adieu. But in lieu of that Letter, he received another which was not intended to him, but unto another, by which ſhe deſired him to meet her at Evening in the Walks by the Sea-ſide: And that which was intended for the other, was brought unto Cleonice; and that which was intended for Cleonice, was carrid unto another. So that this variety of Miſtakes made the beſt ſport in the World.

When the miſtaken Letter was brought unto Cleonice, we were altogether; and ſhe wondered that Artelinda, with whom ſhe was not Friends, ſhould write to her. She opened then this Letter very haſtily; but when ſhe looked upon the Character, ſhe preſently knew it to be the ſame in which ſhe uſed to write unto her Gallants, and not that in which ſhe uſed to write unto her Friends. Then Cleonice and I began to read theſe words, which did not at all concern her.

If you will be in the Street which leads unto the Temple of Diana, about that hour I uſe to go thither, I ſhall underſtand from your own Mouth, what Thoughts you have of me at parting; and you may underſtand from mine, how much your Abſence will trouble me.

After we had read this Letter, we knew that he who brought it was miſtaken; but I adviſed Cleonice to ſay nothing unto the Man, but that ſhe would do as his Miſtreſs deſired: And indeed we did not go with leſs deſire to be at the appointed Place, than perhaps that Lover would have done for whom it was intended. Cleonice gave orders, that they ſhould acquaint her when Artelinda went out of her Houſe, that we might follow after her; which was eaſily done, becauſe both were Neighbours. Therefore we no ſooner knew of her going out, but we alſo went out at a Back-door which was neareſt that Street where the Appointment was; knowing well we ſhould find her on Foot, becauſe it was not the Cuſtom of Epheſus to go unto the Temple of Diana in Coach. As ſoon as we ſpied her, we began to walk ſoftly, that we might obſerve what ſhe did; and we ſaw her look towards the place where ſhe expected her Lover, very ſeriouſly and often; then ſhe walk'd very ſoftly, in Hopes ſtill of his coming, having none with her but one Woman who was acquainted with all her Secrets. But at the laſt turning towards us, we came nearer her and met. She no ſooner ſaw Cleonice, (who ſhe thought had received her Letter, in which ſhe deſired her to ſtay within at her own Houſe after Dinner) but addreſſing her ſelf, Come, Cleonice, ſaid ſhe, it is not in this place where I muſt juſtify my ſelf; therefore I beſeech you let me have the honour, after dinner, to talk with you. And then ſhe would have left her. But Cleonice craftily ſtaying her, (and counterfeiting very handſomly) Then have you changed your Mind, ſaid ſhe unto her, for your Letter appointed this Place, and I thought you were going ſome Journey by the Expreſſions of your Letter. Artelinda bluſh'd at this Diſcourſe; and apprehending that he who carried the Letters was miſtaken, and had given one Letter for another, ſhe was in a great Fume; yet being both crafty and bold, ſhe turned it to Laughter, and asked to ſee the Letter, to the end ſhe might get it out of Cleonice's hands: She ſaid, by way of excuſe, that ſhe had writ it unto one of her Couſins, who was not upon good terms with her Mother, and was going into the Country; but Cleonice having no diſpoſition to reſtore it, ſaid, ſhe had left it at Home. Yet ſince Artelinda knew ſhe had writ many others, and that the ſame miſtake might chance have hapned to them alſo, her Mind was very much diſordered: She durſt not return back, or would ſhe go unto the Temple, hoping ſtill that perhaps he who was appointed to meet, had received the right Letter, and would come: But yet not ſeeing him, ſhe did more and more doubt the univerſal diſorder of all her Letters; ſo that being in a reſtleſs Impatience, ſhe left us and returned Home, where ſhe found all the Anſwers of her Lovers, which did ſufficiently confirm her in the Miſtake: He who was to go out of Town in the Morning, and had received an appointment to meet in Evening at the Sea-ſide, complained againſt her for her cruel kind of Raillery, and went out of Epheſus with a Mind much incenſed againſt her. He who never came into Temples, and had received an appointment to meet in the Temple of Diana, ſaid it was enough to make him change his Religion, and adore only her Eyes. He who had received that Letter which was intended for Cleonice, wherein ſhe deſired him to ſtay at Home, that ſhe might come and juſtify her ſelf, writ back to her, that he was not worthy of ſo much honour, as that ſhe ſhould come to his Houſe; nor knew he why ſhe ſhould juſtify her ſelf of any thing; yet adding notwithſtanding, that he would obey her. For be pleaſed to know, Madam, that the Letter was written ſo, that it would ſerve either to a Man or Woman. Moreover, he who had received that Letter which appointed him to go unto a Lady whom he never ſaw, and who was his mortal Enemy, thinking that Artelinda mocked him, did anſwer her in anger: Inſomuch, as Artelinda deſigning to favour four Lovers in a Morning, diſobliged them all, and gave a full ſubject of Revenge unto Cleonice. Yet would ſhe not publiſh this adventure at the firſt; but I, who was not ſo indulgent as ſhe, told it unto one of my Friends, who divulged it all over the Town: So that all theſe Lovers having heard what happened unto Cleonice, every one of them believed her, and themſelves, both injured by Artelinda.

Moreover, Artelinda was ſo very angry with him that had ſo groſly miſtaken her Letters, and uſed him ſo ill, that he told it unto very many: and in a few daies the thing was ſo generally known, that all theſe Lovers, except him who was abſent, ſhewed their Letters one unto another, and had ſo many Jeers for Artelinda, that Cleonice found her full Revenge: She found from thence another Benefit, which was, that they never after this ſpoke a word more concerning the Love of Ligdamis. So that both Ligdamis and ſhe did for ſome days enjoy all the happineſs that an innocent Love could afford: Yet did Cleonice cauſe ſome angry Hours unto Ligdamis, becauſe ſhe could not be perſwaded that Love could laſt long: So that though ſhe agreed ſo far with him as to believe his Love was very great, yet ſhe told him time would wear it out: So that it may be ſaid, ſhe diſquieted her ſelf when Fortune did not. She did divers times hinder Ligdamis from perſwading his Father to alter his Mind concerning his Marriage, and to permit him to addreſs himſelf unto Stenobea, to obtain her conſent of Cleonice, telling him,he muſt never be too haſty in buſineſs; and that perhaps his Love would leſſen, and that ſhe would have a long trial of his Paſſion. And though Ligdamis thought this Trial ſhe already had was enough, yet his reſpect of her was ſo great, that he durſt not importune her againſt any thing ſhe much deſired, eſpecially ſince he had no other Diſtempers of Love, but only Impatience. For though Hermodorus was ſtill in love with Cleonice, alſo Phocylides had a great Mind that way, and likewiſe many others, yet was he not jealous, but was as happy as any Lover could be, who had not the full enjoyment of his Miſtreſs.

Then, Madam, queſtionleſs you know that the Princeſs of Lydia was brought unto Epheſus, preſently after the impriſonment of Cleander. At that time Ligdamis being there,he ſought all occaſions to do Cleander the beſt Offices he could; and it was indeed by his means, that Eſop, who was then at Sardis, conveyed many Letters from this illuſtrious Priſoner unto that Princeſs, and by whom ſhe returned Anſwers. Though the Buſineſs was then very ſecretly carried, and none knew it, except Eſop; yet ſince it was known, Cleander loved Ligdamis very well. Hermodorus having ſome confuſed knowledg long ſince, that he received ſome Letters from the Princeſs, yet not knowing to whom they were directed, did ſecretly acquaint Cræſus, that Ligdamis did plot ſomething with the Princeſs his Daughter: Yet Cræſus not daring to arreſt him, becauſe he knew his Father was at his Government; he would therefore endeavour to remove him firſt; and in order to that, he ſent for the Father under ſome Pretence or other, to come unto him, and gave Orders to arreſt the Son at Epheſus, the ſame day the Father came to Sardis: But ſince he had many Friends at Court, he was acquainted with the Deſign of Cræſus; So that ſeeming to be ſick, he ſent his excuſe to the King, and ſent at the ſame time to Ligdamis, to acquaint him alſo, that he ſhould come away in all haſte.

I leave you to judg, Madam, how ſad this Story was unto two, who thought themſelves unhappy if they did not ſee one another every day: However, there was a neceſſity that Ligdamis muſt depart, and he did ſo, the ſaddeſt Man alive. He offered above twenty times to diſobey his Father; but when Cleonice conſidered that perhaps ſhe might be a cauſe of his Impriſonment, ſhe her ſelf did haſte his departure. Then did ſhe begin again to complain againſt Love, yet not being able to wiſh that Ligdamis ſhould leave loving her; ſhe ſaid this Paſſion made none any thing elſe but unfortunate. But as if it were not enough to be grieved for the Abſence and Misfortune of Ligdamis, ſhe muſt alſo ſuffer the Perſecution of Hermodorus; whoſe only end of proſecuting againſt his Rival, was to profit by his Diſgrace. He asked Cleonice of Stenobea in Marriage, who made him a promiſe of it, if he could obtain the Conſent of her Daughter. Phocylides alſo was more importunate than before; and ſince it was impoſſible for him to hide all his Melancholly, Artelinda did explain the Cauſe of it for him, unto all thoſe that could not gueſs it without her: So that Cleonice was beleagured by all ſorts of Sorrows at once. The Siſter of Ligdamis being married to a Man of good Quality, whoſe Eſtate was on this ſide the River Hermes, went thither with her Husband; and there ſtaid not in Epheſus, any with whom ſhe might talk of Ligdamis, except me. In the mean time Cræſus ſeeing his Deſign took no effect, and not conceiving it expedient to begin a Civil War in his own Dominions, when he expected a Foreign War upon himſelf, did diſſemble his Reſentments, ſeeming to be ſatisfied with the Excuſe which the Father of Ligdamis ſent him, and expreſſing no diſcontent at all; yet for all that, his Deſign was, as ſoon as Ligdamis, or his Father, came out of that Place, to ſecure their Perſons; and they having intelligence of theſe Intentions, by Friends which certainly knew it, it might be ſaid they were Priſoners,out of fear of being ſo; for they never came out of the Caſtle of Hermes: yet Ligdamis obtained once of his Father, to come diſguiſed unto Epheſus (under colour of diſcovering ſome important Buſineſs) to ſee Cleonice.

You may imagine, Madam, how I wondered to ſee him come one Night into my Chamber in a Phrygian Habit, which made me at firſt not know him; yet he no ſooner ſpoke unto me (and deſired me to conceal that I knew him, unleſs I durſt truſt my Women) but I knew him: So that I not conſidering his Voyage was cauſed by Cleonice, Ah me, Ligdamis, ſaid I unto him, good Gods, what brought you hither? Alas, Iſmenea, ſaid he, I am much more miſerable than I thought I was; for ſince you do not know me, it is an evident ſign that Cleonice does not think my Paſſion as violent as hers. She thinks hers more violent than yours, replied I, but I believe ſhe does not think you diſcreet enough, in hazarding that Life which is ſo dear unto her as yours is: For if you ſhould be taken in Epheſus, in a diſguiſed Habit, you give your Enemies a ſufficient ground to ruin you. It is no matter, ſaid he to me, ſo I may but have the happineſs to ſee Cleonice: Therefore to loſe no time, dear Iſmenea, procure me that Favour. When I heard Ligdamis ſpeak with ſo much zeal, and perceiving that he had rather ſee Cleonice, than return into ſafety; I ſent to deſire Stenobea, ſhe would be pleaſed to permit Cleonice to come unto me, to aſſiſt me in a Buſineſs wherein ſhe might do me a great Favour: I would not name any manner of Divertiſment, leſt Stenobea her ſelf, loving all Pleaſures, ſhould be there alſo: But my Device did not hit as I hoped; for ſhe thinking it to be ſome Muſick Matter, or ſuch Diverſion, ſent me word that ſhe would her ſelf bring her, as indeed within an hour after ſhe did.

You may well imagine how Ligdamis lamented this Accident, ſince he muſt not ſee his dear Cleonice all that Night; yet ſince there was no Remedy, I put him in my Cloſet, and ſat down upon my Bed, in expectation of Stenobea, who came preſently after, in hopes to find ſome very conſiderable Divertiſement. The merrieſt part of all the Adventure was, that ſhe acquainted all the Company that was with her with my Meſſage, who all alſo came unto my Lodging with her; ſo that in leſs than three quarters of an hour, half the Town was in my Chamber, which did exceedingly amaze me; and the more, becauſe I ſaw all that were there, expected ſomething more than they found. However, though I knew none in the Company would offer to go into my Cloſet, yet I was in a great perplexity, that I could not get them out of my Chamber: As for Stenobea, ſince ſhe was a lover of much Company, and found it there, ſhe never complained, nor would ſhe ſuffer others to complain that they were deceived in their expectation. But at the laſt I was ſo out of all patience at this paſſage, and complained ſo much, as I plainly told them all, I had no other deſign to ſee any that Night, but only Cleonice: who ſeeing ſo much Company, did trouble me in earneſt, entreated her Mother to depart, and to begin the Example unto others. So that Stenobea riſing up firſt, did lead the way out, and all the reſt followed, leaving only Cleonice with me.

After all this Multitude was gone, which ſo troubled me, and grieved Ligdamis, I roſe up and laughed at the Accident. Then Cleonice looking upon me, and ſeeing by my Countenance that I had no very ſerious Buſineſs with her; Is it true, Iſmenea, ſaid ſhe unto me, that you had ſome real Buſineſs with me; or did you ſend for me only to divert you? My principal Deſign, ſaid I unto her, has not been to pleaſe you; for you ſhall preſently ſee, that I regarded the Intereſt of another more than yours. Upon that, I opened my Cloſet-door; and putting her in firſt, I followed after her and ſhut the Door. When ſhe ſaw one there in a Phrygian Habit, ſhe ſtood in a maze; and much more, when he threw himſelf at her Feet, and took her by the Hand; Madam, (ſaying unto her) it was impoſſible for me to live, and not to ſee you. Cleonice knowing at firſt the Voice of him that was ſo dear in her Thoughts, could not chuſe but rejoice at it, and pardoned me for ſo deceiving her, and anſwered his Complaint in a moſt civil and obliging manner. But preſently after, conſidering, that if it were known Ligdamis was in Epheſus diſguiſed, they would arreſt him, and perhaps make that a Crime againſt the State, which was only an effect of Love, her Joy did leſſen; and her further fear was, that this Meeting, if it were known, would reflect upon her Reputation. So that repenting of her obliging Language, and her Expreſſions of Joy; Truly, Ligdamis, (ſaid ſhe, after we were ſet down) thoſe who ſay the firſt Thoughts of a Woman are always the beſt, do not always ſay true; ſince at the firſt I had an extream delight in ſeeing you, yet my ſecond Thoughts tell me that my firſt were unjuſt, and that I ought to chide you: For to ſpeak rationally, why do you put your Liberty and Life into hazard? and why do you expoſe me to be ſuſpected as a Confederate with you? My reaſon is, Madam, replied he, becauſe there is a fatal muſt upon me; that is, I muſt either ſee you, or die: And as for your Confederacy, or Honour, Madam, I cannot believe it to be in any danger, for your Vertue is above the reach of Calumny; Therefore, Madam, I beſeech you permit me to enjoy the Happineſs and Satiſfaction of Diſcourſe with you; and be ſo good as to tell me, whether my Diſgrace and Baniſhment hath not cauſed a change in your Soul? and whether Ligdamis muſt be hated, both by Crœſus and by you, becauſe he has the Honour to be in the illuſtrious Cleander's Favour? You wrong me extreamly, replied ſhe, to ſuſpect me of any ſuch unworthineſs; and I ſhould reſent it ſo, if you would not perhaps think that I took an occaſion to quarrel with you: To prevent which, I will forget the Injury, and aſſure you, that your Misfortunes make my Friendſhip to you more tender than before. Ligdamis was tranſported with Joy at this obliging Anſwer; and replied in ſuch acknowledging Terms, as ſpoke his Soul to be full of violent Love.

Thus did we paſs away this Evening together, Cleonice forcing him to promiſe he would be gone the next Morning before break of Day; for ſhe extreamly feared that his ſtay any longer would hazard a Diſcovery. His Deſires were to ſee her once more, but he could not poſſibly obtain it from her; ſo that he contented himſelf with ſtaying as late with us as handſomly he could. Cleonice endeavoured to hide the exceſs of her Sorrow at this parting, with as much care as Ligdamis took to expreſs his: But do what ſhe could, it appeared in her Eyes; and both of them were ſo exceſſively ſad, that I profeſs I was exceeding ſorry for them. After Cleonice was gone, Ligdamis ſtaid ſtill a long while with me diſcourſing of her, and entreating me to continue his Friendly Solicitor. But, in concluſion, it being very late, he left me alſo, and went to the Houſe of a Friend, where he ſtaid till break of Day. This Friend, whom he thought to be the moſt faithful Servant in the World unto him, he truſted him with all the Buſineſs of his Voyage. But, Madam, be pleaſed to know that this Friend, how faithful ſoever in appearance, proved to be the Spy of Hermodorus, who under-hand did uſe all poſſible endeavours to ruin Ligdamis, and marry Cleonice. So that being advertiſed by this Agent, that Ligdamis was in Epheſus diſguiſed, that he was in his Houſe, and that he had been at my Houſe with Cleonice; after Hermodorus had well conſidered what courſe to take, he ſent ſix Men, whom he had hired with Money, to ſeize upon the Perſon of Ligdamis, to take away his Sword, and to guard him in the Chamber where they found him; appointing them to tell Ligdamis, that they arreſted him by Command from the Governour of Epheſus. This courſe being reſolved upon, it was preſently executed; for he in whoſe Houſe Ligdamis lodged, did himſelf open the Door unto thoſe who would arreſt a Delinquent unto the State. So that Ligdamis lying down to ſleep, found himſelf a Priſoner when he waked, and diſabled to reſiſt their Violence.

In the mean while Hermodorus, being very glad he had his Rival in his Power, did moſt impatiently wait for an opportunity to ſee Cleonice. But ſince Mornings were not fit Hours to viſit Ladies, he ſtaid till the Afternoon; and then he came ſo ſoon after Dinner, that he found her alone in her Chamber. After he had rendred an officious Complement, which ſhe returned very coldly; Madam, ſaid he unto her, I am very ſorry that I muſt augment that melancholy which is in your Eyes; yet I thought it my Duty to acquaint you, that Ligdamis is a Priſoner. Ligdamis a Priſoner! (replied Cleonice, infinitely aſtoniſhed) then they have ſurprized the Caſtle of Hermes. No, Madam, replied he; it is in this Town that he is taken in a diſguiſe by a Man of my acquaintance; who hoping to have a great Recompence from Cræſus for ſeiſing upon a Delinquent againſt the State, he deſired me to lend him a Houſe of mine in the way to Sardis, to keep him in more ſafety. But, Madam, I knowing how dear the Life of Ligdamis is unto you, I have contrived a way to releaſe him, if you pleaſe. I perceive, Madam, by the trouble of your Countenance, that you ſuſpect the truth of my words: but the better to perſwade you, I need only tell you that he came diſguiſed unto Epheſus, in a Phrygian Habit, and that he has ſeen you at the Lodging of Iſmenea. Cleonice after this not doubting the Truth, changed Countenance and Diſcourſe; and looking upon Hermodorus as a Man who might releaſe Ligdamis; Hermodorus, ſaid ſhe unto him, I cannot deny but that the Misfortune of him you name does exceedingly trouble me: for beſides his being a Kinſman unto Iſmenea, whom I love very well, he is alſo ſuch a Friend, that I would do any thing to releaſe him; therefore I conjure you, for my ſake, if it be in your Power, to do it. Doubtleſs I can, replied he: but, Madam, I know not whether you will do one thing which is abſolutely neceſſary for the obtaining of his Liberty. It muſt be either a Crime, or an Impoſſibility, replied ſhe, if I will not: As for things only difficult, I will attempt them all to ſave the Life of any unfortunate Man that is a very ſtranger unto me, much ſooner for a Friend whom I infinitely eſteem. Be pleaſed then to reſolve, Madam, ſaid he unto her, not only to ſave the Life of Ligdamis, but of Hermodorus alſo: Yes, Madam, you may ſave them both with one word; and you ſhall no ſooner conſent that Hermodorus ſhall be happy, but Ligdamis ſhall be releaſed. Cleonice was ſo ſurpriſed at this Diſcourſe of Hermodorus, that ſhe looked upon him and could not anſwer, and began to ſuſpect the Truth: Hermodorus, ſaid ſhe unto him, are not you the Man that hath arreſted Ligdamis? I beſeech you, Madam, (ſaid he unto her) before I tell you the place where he is, or who arreſted him, anſwer to what I ſaid unto you: Ligdamis is a diſgraced Man, and will never be in a condition to expreſs his Love again at Epheſus. Ligdamis, replied ſhe in a great fury, is a Man moſt Illuſtrious; and diſgraced as he is, I prefer him before you or any other. But, Hermodorus, you have told me enough; for ſince I ſee it is in your Power to releaſe Ligdamis, you muſt either do it, or elſe reſolve upon my Hatred, and that unto ſuch a degree, as I ſhall never be at reſt until I take revenge: But on the contrary, if you can be ſo generous as to releaſe him without any Conditions, I ſhould be ſo much obliged to you, that certainly I ſhould treat you much better than heretofore; but to think you ſhould tyrannically engage me to marry you, that is a thing which you can never bring me to, though it were to ſave my own Life, as well as the Life of Ligdamis. But, Madam, I beſeech you, would you have me releaſe my Rival, to the end he may ſupplant me, and take away my Life, as I have preſerved his? Conſider this, Madam, I beſeech you, and do not ſo raſhly pronounce a Sentence of Death againſt Ligdamis. O thou moſt cruel Man! cried ſhe out, being tranſported by exceſs of Sorrow; Can you commit ſo horrid a Sin? Madam, replied he, you know if he fall into the hands of Crœſus, he is in danger; yet doubtleſs I ſhall not help him, unleſs you help me. Is there no Spark of Generoſity in you? ſaid ſhe unto him. Generoſity, replied he, bids me not make my ſelf miſerable by releaſing my Rival; it is ſufficient in thoſe that are moſt generous, not to hurt another though it be in their Power. But, ſaid ſhe, you no ſooner releaſe this Rival, but he flies away preſently, and will be gone far off from Epheſus. It may be ſo, replied he: but as far as he is off you, he will be ſtill in your Heart; and therefore, Madam, I muſt ask it, before I releaſe him who keeps me from it. My Heart, replied ſhe, is not ſo eaſily obtained as you ſuppoſe. You will then not releaſe Ligdamis, replied he. You will then not merit my Eſteem, anſwered ſhe, ſince at my Requeſt you will not do a thing, which your own Intereſt ſhould prompt you unto, if you loved your Honour.

Honour (replied Hermodorus very ſharply) is doubtleſs a glorious Attribute, but a Lover thinking it to conſiſt in the Enjoyment of her he loves, it is not ſtrange I ſhould ſet another price upon the Liberty of Ligdamis than Cleonice does. Yet, Madam, conſider upon it, and I will come to receive your ultimate Anſwer to Morrow Morning. Cleonice ſeeing Hermodorus ready to leave her, ſhe ſtayed him, and forcing her ſelf with much ado, ſhe began to ſpeak him fair; and entreated him to tell her where Ligdamis was, but he would not tell her: So that changing from fair Words to Threatnings again, ſhe ſpoke as much as Anger and Sorrow could invent, in behalf of him ſhe loved: But fearing leſt this courſe ſhould haſten the Deſtruction of Ligdamis, ſhe fell to her Supplications again: But ſince ſhe could not poſſibly tell Hermodorus ſhe would marry him, he left her, ſaying he would expect her Anſwer in the Morning; and that he gave her this time to conſider, leſt ſhe ſhould repent of any haſty Reſolutions: And ſo he went out, leaving Cleonice in a moſt miſerable Condition.

She ſent immediately unto me, and longed to impart the pittiful Story; and I went the very ſame Hour unto her Houſe, where I heard her relate all the Paſſages in ſuch Terms as would have moved Compaſſion out of the moſt hard and inſenſible Soul. After then I had participated of her Sorrows, and a long time deſcanted upon this ſad Adventure, we ſent unto that Friend's Houſe, with whom Ligdamis ſaid he would lodg, and where yet he was, to try if we could diſcover how he was taken. But the Wife of this perfidious Man being inſtructed by her Husband, ſaid that he was gone out by Break of Day, as ſoon as the Gates of the Town were open, and that ſhe knew no more of him. You may then very well imagine, Madam, how Cleonice grieved at the Misfortune of Ligdamis: In the mean time, we could not contrive how to prevent the ſad Conſequences of this fatal Accident; for to acquaint the Governor of Epheſus how theſe Men who arreſted Ligdamis, had no Authority to keep him, and that in all Likelihood it was Hermodorus who had done this wrong, were only to deliver Ligdamis from Hermodorus, into the Hands of Craſus, for every one knew how the Governor had Orders to arreſt him if ever he came to Epheſus: ſo that there was no more Safety for him in ſending him to the King of Lydia, than there was in the Tyranny of his Rival: Yet ſince Cleonice apprehended him to be in much Danger under his Rival, ſhe determined, that if Hermodorus when he came to her, would not be perſwaded to Reaſon, then to acquaint the Governor with the Buſineſs: For by this Courſe, ſaid ſhe, though I do not releaſe Ligdamis, yet I ſhall puniſh Hermodorus, and he ſhall not die by his Hand. 'Tis very true, ſaid I unto her, but will his Death be welcomer unto you one way than the other? and do you not conſider that this way will let all the World know, Ligdamis was with you at my Houſe, and perhaps make them believe you were the cauſe of his coming? But which way, replied ſhe, can I colour it? Shall I marry Hermodorus, to releaſe Ligdamis? Ah Iſmenea, he would think his Liberty then bought at too dear a rate, and yet I ſee no other way to get him out of the Hands of his Enemy, but by expoſing my ſelf. Then there is no more to be ſaid, but that I muſt reſolve to die; for though I had ſo much Power with my ſelf as to overcome my ſtrong Averſion to Hermodorus, and ſhould give him Satisfaction, yet perhaps he would not releaſe Ligdamis.

Afterwards conſidering what Reports would be of her, when it ſhould be known that Ligdamis had ſeen her in ſecret, ſhe knew not what to reſolve upon; and ſometimes fearing the Life of Ligdamis, ſometimes her own Reputation, ſhe was moſt extreamly troubled: But in Concluſion, after a hundred ſeveral Imaginations, I adviſed her to acquaint a Kinſman of Ligdamis who was at Epheſus with this Paſſage, to the end, that when Hermodorus came unto her in the Morning, he might by ſtrong Hand ſeize upon his Perſon, and tell him that he knew Ligdamis was in his Power; and ſo he might releaſe the one with the other. At the firſt, we found no Obſtacle in the Buſineſs, like thoſe who think the Execution of any thing which they earneſtly deſire, to be eaſy: But upon ſecond Conſideration, we found Stenobea to be a conſiderable Hindrance, becauſe ſhe was a Favourer of Hermodorus, and conſequently would not ſuffer any Violence to him in her Houſe; yet preſently after, Cleonice remembred that the next Day her Mother was to go into the Country fifty Furlongs off, and would not return till the Day after: This Obſtacle therefore being removed, we thought our Deſign to be the beſt and only Expedient we could take.

Then I left Cleonice, and went to my own Houſe, where I was no ſooner come, but I ſent for this Couſin of Ligdamis, who was a very ſtout couragious Man, and fit for ſuch an Attempt: As ſoon as he came, I told him his Buſineſs, and he undertook it according to my Wiſh; ſo that to loſe no time, he procured a convenient Number of Aſſiſtants, requiſite for the Execution. Cleonice and I expected the Morning with much Impatience. Ligdamis for his part, he knew not what to think upon the Adventure; for though he was arreſted in the Name of the Governor, yet he knew that they who arreſted him were not his Souldiers: Moreover, he ſaw they let him be in the Houſe of one whom he took to be his Friend, though the Traitor had not ſo much Boldneſs as to ſhew himſelf ſince he was arreſted. He could not gueſs at the Truth of the Buſineſs; but he told us afterwards, that the Sorrows which he thought Cleonice would apprehend in his Misfortunes, did trouble him more than his own Danger. As for Hermodorus, I believe his Thoughts were more turbulent than either Ligdamis or Cleonice's, ſince I cannot think it poſſible to commit any vile Act with a quiet Conſcience.

Yet, Madam, this longed-for Morning being come, Stenobea being gone, and I with Cleonice, the Kinſman of Ligdamis alſo being in my Houſe, with his Aſſiſtants, waiting till I ſent him Word that Hermodorus was come. Cleonice and my ſelf thought our ſelves in a worſe Condition than before: and though we did moſt eaneſtly deſire the Liberty of Ligdamis, yet when we came to the very point of executing our Deſign, we diſliked it; and we were ſo little accuſtomed to Tumults and Noiſe, that out of our Weakneſs we diſapproved of that, which our Reaſon and Affection wiſhed were done. In the mean time, Minutes ſeemed Hours unto us, and Hours Days, and it was Noon, and not a word of Hermodorus; who whether he had ſeen me with the Kinſman of Ligdamis, or out of his Subtilty foreſaw the Accident, I know not, but he reſolved not to come, and only ſend a Letter. When we had loſt almoſt all our Patience in a long Expectation, we ſaw a Man who was not his own, come unto, and gave a Letter unto Cleonice, the Senſe whereof was this:

Hermodorus unto Cleonice.

SInce my Reſolution depends upon yours, Madam, I ſent to know what yours is; but I beſeech you conſider, that if it be not favourable unto him who loves you moſt of all the World, it ſhall be fatal unto him whom you love beſt: Conſider ſeriouſly, and anſwer favourably, leſt you repent when it is too late.

Hermodorus.

After that Cleonice had read this Letter, ſhe ſeemed ſo deſperate, that I thought ſhe would have died with Grief. I asked him who brought it, where Hermodorus was? And he anſwered, that he thought he was at his own Houſe; and ſaid that it was one of his Men who brought this Letter to him, commanding him from his Maſter to deliver it, and bring an Anſwer. In the mean time Cleonice knew not what to reſolve upon: but upon ſecond and ſerious Thoughts ſhe writ back theſe Words.

Cleonice unto Hermodorus.

THE Reſolution which I have pitched upon, is not of ſo ſmall Importance, as to be truſted unto that Stranger which brought me your Letter: Therefore if you would know it, come hither your ſelf, for I will not write it.

Cleonice.

I forgot to tell you, that whilſt Cleonice was writing, I ſent unto the Couſin of Ligdamis, adviſing him to follow the Man who carried Cleonice's Anſwer, hoping that way to know where Hermodorus was: The Man whom he did imploy in the Buſineſs, was not ſo diligent as he might have been, but loſt the Sight of him in a preſs of People at the Gate of Epheſus; ſo that then we thought our ſelves more miſerable than before, becauſe we were out of all hopes, ſince we believed Hermodorus would not come upon the Letter which Cleonice writ.

The Kinſman of Ligdamis enquired very diligently where Hermodorus was, but could hear no Certainty: It was therefore reſolved, to ſet Spies about his Houſe the next Night to watch his coming out; and if it were poſſible to arreſt him. In the mean time Cleonice's Letter did much puzzle her obſtinate Lover; who to compaſs his Ends, did not care to commit all manner of Violences. He could not interpret her Letter, as any way favourable unto himſelf, neither did he think ſhe would ever conſent unto the Ruin of Ligdamis; yet not daring to come at her in the Abſence of Stenobea, becauſe perhaps, as I ſaid before, he knew the Couſin of Ligdamis was at my Houſe, he reſolved to ſtay until her Return, and then to go and receive from Cleonice her ultimate Reſolution; and reſolving, that if her Anſwer was not according to his Deſire, then to put Ligdamis into the Hands of Crœſus: But in Expectation of this, he kept home, and cauſed himſelf to be denied, if any enquired for him: Yet notwithſtanding withſtanding, ſince the Gods are more juſt than to permit Innocents to periſh, and the culpable to go free, it happened, that Hermodorus thinking himſelf not ſure enough of thoſe whom he had ſet to guard Ligdamis, would go himſelf that Night unto the Houſe where he was kept; ſo that coming out of his Houſe with two Men only, when all the World almoſt was in Bed, the Couſin of Ligdamis, and thoſe who watched, eſpied him. But not deſiring to aſſault him ſo near his own Houſe, leſt he ſhould be reſcued by his own Servants, they followed him at a Diſtance, till he was a good way off, before they would attempt it, and yet kept not ſo far from him, but they could fall on when they pleaſed. They were much amazed, when they ſaw him ſtay at the Door of him where Ligdamis lay; ſo that to loſe no longer time, they couragiouſly aſſaulted him, but ſtriving rather to take him than to kill him, they pulled him by the Arm further from that Door; yet he ruffled from amongſt them, and drew his Sword: The Couſin of Ligdamis and his Party being the ſtronger; they could eaſily have killed him, if their Deſires to ſave him alive had not reſtrained them; and alſo had eaſily taken him, if Hermodorus had not called out aloud to the perfidious Friend of Ligdamis for help; who hearing his Name, came out with four of the Guard belonging to Ligdamis, and the Combate then proved more bloody and diſputable. In the mean while, two of the Guard ſtayed ſtill with Ligdamis, who knowing their Action to be unjuſt, and thinking by this Noiſe, that they were in Danger to be queſtioned, they thought beſt to ſecure themſelves, by obliging Ligdamis, and releaſing him: After they had held a little Council between themſelves, they made the Offer of it unto Ligdamis, and confeſſed that it was Hermodorus who had unjuſtly obliged them to the Action: And not to loſe the Merit of their Kindneſs, they never told him that their Companions were gone to help Hermodorus; but on the contrary, they were gone out to part ſome Strangers which were quarrelling, and that they two for their parts would take hold of this Opportunity and releaſe him, and accordingly they carried him out of a back-Door: But ſince they could not poſſibly get out of Epheſus at that time of the Night, they thought my Houſe the ſafeſt Retreat: So that knocking at my Door, and deſiring ſome to tell me, that there was a Phrygian which deſired to ſpeak with me, my Servants did accordingly; you may eaſily imagine how I was amazed, when after the Door was open, I ſaw Ligdamis enter with two of his Guard: Since it was late before I returned from Cleonice, and alſo had many Letters to write, ſo it happened that I was not gone to Bed: which as it proved, was very happy; for if I had, perhaps Ligdamis had not been ſaved, becauſe then my Servants would not have opened the Doors. As ſoon as ever I ſaw him, I asked him a hundred Queſtions at once; for I could not for my Heart deviſe which way he ſhould be releaſed. Gladly would I have eaſed Cleonice of an ill Nights Reſt: but fearing it might chance diſcover what I ſo much deſired to conceal, I thought it better to ſtay until the next Morning before I acquainted her with this pleaſing News.

In the mean time, ſince it is never good truſting unto any ſuch Friends as had any Hands in an ill Act, I appointed a Chamber for the two Souldiers, and commanded my Men not to go to Bed, but to watch them: Yet firſt we made them tell us all that they knew concerning Hermodorus. For my part, I would not tell Ligdamis that his Couſin had followed Hermodorus all that Night, or that I believed it was he who aſſaulted him; leſt knowing his Courage, he ſhould offer to go out unto his Relief. I was the more induced to conceal it from him, becauſe I ſuppoſed the Combat was ended: But when I acquainted him with the Propoſition which Hermodorus had made unto Cleonice, with the Deſpair in which ſhe was, and the Anſwers which ſhe returned; he expreſſed as much Hatred to his Rival, and as much Love to his Miſtreſs, as was poſſible for two contrary violent Paſſions to invent. I had a good Mind he ſhould have gone away that ſame Night, but yet he would not: however let me tell you, it was abſolutely impoſſible to perſwade him unto any Sleep, or to ſhut his Eyes, though I forced him to go unto his Chamber which was made ready for him, whilſt I went into my own.

As ſoon as Day appeared, I went unto Cleonice, whom I found ready to hearken unto me: For beſides, as ſhe had not ſlept all that Night, ſo the Couſin of Ligdamis had been with her to give an Account of all Paſſages between Hermodorus and himſelf: yet ſince he was ignorant what was become of Ligdamis, he ſuppoſed that his Guards had only changed his Priſon, but never thought they had releaſed him. So that her Sorrows were ſtill the ſame, till I removed them, and told her that Ligdamis was ſafe. Her Joys were then ſo exceſſive, that her Thoughts were wholly upon him, and ſhe never told me what was become of Hermodorus: But after I had asked her ſeveral times, ſhe told me that the perfidious Friend of Ligdamis, with three of his Guards, were killed; that Hermodorus was much wounded; that the Kinſman of Ligdamis had loſt two of his Men; and that in Concluſion he being alone with his Men in the Streets, he went into this Houſe to know what was become of Ligdamis, and that he found none in it but one Woman, who told him that Ligdamis was gone from thence with two of his Guards. Cleonice further told me, that the Kinſman of Ligdamis was gone unto the Houſe of one who was an Enemy unto Hermodorus, there to hide himſelf until ſuch time as he knew what would become of his Wounds. In the mean time we began to apprehend that Ligdamis was not ſafe in my Houſe; ſo that we thought it expedient to advertiſe his Couſin, that he ſhould take Orders to go out of Epheſus that very Night; which accordingly he was reſolved upon, and executed. Cleonice would not afford her unhappy Lover ſo much Comfort as to ſee her once before he went, leſt it ſhould be diſcovered; and thought her Viſit would make it ſuſpected that he was in my Houſe: For be pleaſed to know, Madam, that as Rage and Deſpair made Hermodorus almoſt mad, ſo he ſpread it about all the Town, that Ligdamis was in Epheſus, that he had ſeen Cleonice at my Houſe, and that Hermodorus and he had fought; and a hundred more ſuch Reports. All which at the firſt did not much diſquiet Cleonice, becauſe all her Cares were to hear that Ligdamis was ſafe: But when ſhe underſtood that he and his Couſin were got out of the Town, with Men to guard them, then theſe Reports began to trouble her; which indeed did make ſo great a Noiſe, that the Governour of Epheſus cauſed a moſt ſtrict Search to be made. Since he was a very worthy Man, and Prolixenide his Wife did me the Honour to eſteem me very much, ſhe did me the Favour to ſend for me, and asked me very inquiſitively what I knew? When I had received this Summons, I went unto Cleonice, to conſult together upon what I ſhould ſay, before I went: For as on the one ſide, by not confeſſing that Love was the Loadſtone which drew Ligdamis hither, it would give cauſe of Suſpicion that he was a Delinquent to the State, and that he had ſome Enterprize upon Epheſus; ſo on the other ſide, if it ſhould be confeſſed that a violent Love to Cleonice was the cauſe of his coming in a Diſguiſe, yet it was to be feared that it would not at all be credited: So that whether ſhe ſhould juſtify Ligdamis, or her ſelf, was the difficult Knot of the Queſtion, which ſhe could hardly untie. As for the firſt of theſe two, ſhe muſt needs ſpeak the Truth; and for the other, ſhe was forced to the Refuge of a Lie, ſince certainly all Appearances were againſt us, and that it was not probable Ligdamis ſhould come to Epheſus in a Diſguiſe, without the Conſent of Cleonice.

After a ſerious Examination of the Buſineſs, Love was moſt prevalent, and ſhe conſented rather to be ſuſpected, than to give any Grounds of Accuſation againſt Ligdamis. She then appointed me to ſpeak the Truth; and indeed, I told my Tale ſo well, that Polixenide believed me, and undeceived her Husband in the Opinion which he had, that Ligdamis contrived ſomething againſt the King's Service; inſomuch, as he promiſed Polixenide to write unto Crœſus in Favour of Ligdamis. However, all this could not prevent Artelinda, Phocylides, and all the Town, from a hundred various Cenſures upon the Accident: But as for Hermodorus, he had not any long Vie amongſt them, for he died of his Wounds the ſeventh Day: So that all his Accuſations died with him; and all his Kindred being Perſons of Honour, finding his Actions ſo unworthy, would not proſecute the Couſin of Ligdamis as an Aſſaſſinate, nor revenge his Death, becauſe he deſerved it.

However, the Reports of theſe things were ſo loud, that Cleonice could not endure to hear them: So that her Aunt having a very pleaſant Seat near the River Hermes, and being ready to depart the Town, ſhe deſired Stenobea, that ſhe might go with her; and made me promiſe to paſs away the Autumn with her, ſince I could abſolutely diſpoſe of my own Actions.

Cleonice, who would not have left Epheſus, but becauſe of various Reports, would not give any cauſe to augment them; and therefore ſhe beſeeched her Aunt, not to paſs over the River, at the Caſtle of Hermes, where Ligdamis and his Couſin were happily arrived; but to find out a Paſſage further of, leſt Reports ſhould riſe, that ſhe went to ſee Ligdamis: Yet ſhe was in a place where he ſaw her ſometimes; for though he never went out of the Caſtle, yet ſince Cleonice was in the Country, and ſo near his Siſter, he pretended ſometimes to ſee her, ſometimes in Diſguiſe, and ſometimes with a more conſiderable Guard.

In the mean time, to keep my Word with Cleonice, I went into the Country to her; but I did not as ſhe did, for I paſſed the River at the Caſtle of Hermes, and called upon Ligdamis, whom I found ſtill extreamly amorous, but yet extreamly melancholy, and he would not tell me the cauſe; entreating me only to ſolicite for him, and be his Friend. When I came to Cleonice, I gave her an Account of all the Alterations in Epheſus, ſince her Departure; how that Phocylides finding none in the Town to deceive, was gone to dwell at Sardis; and how Anaxippa not being able to endure the Courſes of her Daughter, forced her to marry a Man, who the next Day after the Wedding, carried her into the Country where ſhe ſees none, and is doing ſevere Penance for her paſt Gallantries. This News, which heretofore would have much recovered Cleonice, did now only move a Smile, and that in ſuch a conſtrained manner, that I knew her Mind was not quiet. So that after I had addreſſed my ſelf in all fitting Civilities to her Aunt, I began to talk in private upon the firſt Opportunity which offered it ſelf; and carrying her into a Walk near the Houſe, What's the matter Cleonice? ſaid I unto her; from whence proceeds this extraordinary Melancholy? At the firſt, ſhe told me, it was only an Effect of Solitude, and her being in the Country. But I knew her too well to be put off by ſuch an Excuſe, and did preſs her a little further: What can it be, ſaid I, that thus torments you? All thoſe falſe Reports which once troubled you, are quite dead; Ligdamis is a Lover as he was, and loves you as much as ever he did. Ah Iſmenea, ſaid ſhe, I am afraid that what you ſay laſt is not true. What Reaſons have you, ſaid I unto her, to think it is not? A hundred, replied ſhe; ſo that I am certain you were deceived, when you told me one Day, that Love could never become Friendſhip, ſince certainly the Thoughts of Ligdamis towards me are more. Really Cleonice, ſaid I unto her, you are a moſt ſtrange Woman to ſpeak thus; for is it poſſible, that you who heretofore apprehended the Friendſhip of Ligdamis could never become Love, ſhould now fear that his Love ſhould become Friendſhip? I do not fear it, replied ſhe, and I believe it. And what ground have you for your Belief? ſaid I unto her: A thouſand ſlight Paſſages which I have obſerved, ſaid ſhe; and alſo upon a ſtrange melancholy Coldneſs, which Ligdamis of late hath uſed: But yet (ſaid ſhe, and diſſembled) I do not murmur, or ſay any thing to him; but he muſt know, that though his Father would change his Reſolution, and permit him to marry me, yet I ſhould never conſent: Not but that (ſaid ſhe, and bluſh'd) I ſhould be glad that Ligdamis ſhould love me; but to be engaged to live with a Man all my Life, who changes ſo often, is a thing which I can never do: For I have cauſe to fear, that ſince he has paſſed from Indifferency unto Friendſhip, and from Friendſhip unto Love, and from Love unto Friendſhip again, he will repaſs at laſt from Friendſhip unto Indifferency, where firſt I found him, and laſt of all, from Indifferency to Hatred and Scorn. Cleonice ſpoke all this ſo haſtily, as made me laugh; and ſo much the more, becauſe I knew ſhe wronged him. But, ſaid I unto her (and looked earneſtly upon her) will you be pleaſed to acquaint me with ſome of Ligdamis's Crimes? His Luke-warmneſs, replied ſhe, is a Crime, which though none but my ſelf can be ſenſible of it, yet it is ſuch a one, and ſo great, that I cannot pardon it. I cannot think, ſaid I, that Ligdamis can be ſo to you. As we were thus in talk of him, news was brought us that he was coming, which ſhe no ſooner heard of, but ſhe began to entreat me, that I would not tell him what ſhe ſaid, or chide him: Yet ſince I thought ſhe ſpoke againſt her Mind, I told him all what ſhe had ſaid; at which he much wondred. He perceived that ſhe was a little more ſerious than ordinary; but ſince ſhe told him that it was cauſed by ſome news which ſhe received from Epheſus, that did not pleaſe her, he took no great notice of it, knowing he never had given her any cauſe to complain againſt him. I do not know (ſaid he unto me, after I had made a Relation of what ſhe had ſaid concerning his change) whether ſhe call my Melancholy Luke-warmneſs; but I am moſt certain, I never in my Life did love her with more Zeal and Violence than now.

As we were thus talking in that Walk where Cleonice and I uſed to walk, we ſaw her walking alone in another; and going towards her, when he came near, Unjuſt Lady, ſaid he unto her, can you accuſe me for loving you only in the degree of Friendſhip? On the contrary, ſaid ſhe, I do commend you for it, and therefore I ſpoke unto Iſmenea of it. But yet, Madam, I beſeech you what have I ſaid, what have I done or thought, which could poſſibly move you to think ſo? You are grown ſo ſtrangely melancholy, replied ſhe, that I cannot chuſe but imagine, that though once you loved me, yet now you do not. I perceive then, ſaid he, that my Melancholy is my Crime: But, Madam, ſince I muſt diſcover the cauſe of it, which hitherto I have concealed, becauſe I would not make you Sharer in my Sorrows; Be pleaſed to know, that perhaps we ſhall be ſeparated for a long time, for the ſtate of things conſidered, there is great appearance that all Lydia will be turned into Deſolation, and our Monarch ruined. I know very well, Madam, that your Soul is heroick, and ſo intereſted in the publick Good, that the love of your Country imprints it ſelf deep in your Heart; therefore I am not afraid to tell you, that we are in expectation to ſee all Lydia in Arms, and conquered by a ſtrange Prince: For, Madam, my Father and I both, have received certain intelligence from the Court, that Crœſus will declare War againſt that invincible Conqueror, unto whom half of Aſia is already ſubject, and againſt whom there is no Reſiſtance: And all this in a time when the illuſtrious Cleander, who only is able to manage ſuch a War, is a Priſoner: For my part, I know not what Policy there is in it; but I know well, that the way to vanquiſh, is to have a General that knows both how to fight and command; and yet Crœſus will not hear talk of the liberty of Cleander, but ſtill keeps under Hatches the only Man that can oppoſe ſo Puiſſant a Prince: And I pray unto the Gods, that the Injuſtice of Crœſus do not draw the Wrath of Heaven againſt all the Monarchy: I know he hath ſent to conſult with ſeveral Oracles concerning it, and he waits only for their Anſwer before they fight. There runs an odd rumour alſo, that he will give retreat unto the King of Pontus, who carried away the Princeſs of Media: So that Cyrus being animated both by his intereſt of Love, and by his deſires of new Glory, he will in all likelihood pull down the Grandure of Crœſus, eſpecially if he do not releaſe the illuſtrious Cleander.

Now, Madam, you know the true cauſe of my Melancholy, which you are pleaſed to call Lukewarmneſs, and want of Love: But to make trial of my Paſſion, and not to truſt unto my Words, I beſeech you command me the moſt difficult things, and if you do not find a moſt exact Obedience, then tax me with want of Love to you, and hatred to my ſelf. Ligdamis expreſſed himſelf in theſe Words in a manner ſo far from that lukewarmneſs wherewith Cleonice charged him, that I forced her to ask him pardon, before ſhe had time to ſpeak; and indeed, after a while of reſiſtance, he made ſo many Excuſes, and ſeemed ſo aſhamed of her injurious charge, that ſhe would let him ſpeak no more by way of excuſing himſelf.

After this, we ſhared in the Melancholy of Ligdamis, and found that he had great cauſe of Fears: And ſince this, Madam, theſe two Lovers never quarrelled, though they were not without their Sorrows; for Ligdamis fell ſick within a few days after, and ſo dangerouſly, that it was thought he could not eſcape Death. Yet at the laſt he recovered a little, though the Phyſicians did all conclude it would be long before he was perfectly recovered: And indeed he found it true, for he continued very ill until Cleander was releaſed. Cleonice alſo had ſuch a violent Feaver, that ſhe could not return to Epheſus when the Forces of Cyrus were entring into Lydia. For my part, I was reſolved not to leave her, until we found out ſome conveniency for us both to return to Epheſus together: But ſince the Houſe of Ligdamis his Siſter was the ſtrongeſt in all that part of the Country, we ſtayed there till the War was begun. Then the liberty of Cleander being known, and alſo that he was the Prince Artamas, Son unto the King of Phrygia; this news wrought ſuch a perfect cure upon Ligdamis, and his upon Cleonice, that it was reſolved amongſt us to get into Epheſus before the War grew hotter: And Ligdamis being to guard us with two hundred Horſe, we began our Journey, intending to paſs over the River at the Caſtle of Hermes. But it was the Pleaſure of the Fates, that we ſhould meet with the Troops of Cyrus, and become his Priſoners; yet happy in ſuch a powerful Protection as yours, Madam, and ſuch a generous Conqueror as CYRUS.

Iſmenea, after ſhe had ended her Relation, left Panthea in much Satisfaction of Mind: and that Queen moſt obligingly telling her, that ſhe was as worthy to be Cleonice's Friend, as Ligdamis her Lover. After this, Panthea calling for Araſpes, whilſt Iſmenea went to ſeek Cleonice, ſhe gave him Orders to tell Cyrus, that Ligdamis was no leſs in love with Cleonice, than he was with Mandana: So that if it would conduce to end the War without fighting, Cyrus may make Peace through all Aſia: In the mean while, intreat him from me to look upon Ligdamis and Cleonice as two whoſe Intereſts are very dear unto me. Araſpes, after his uſual Reverence, told her he would not fail in his Obedience. Afterwards he took Horſe immediately, and went to give Cyrus an account count of that buſineſs which Chriſantes had impoſed upon him: And coming to the Camp, he went ſtraight to the Tent of Cyrus; who no ſooner ſaw him, but imagining he had executed his Commands, he talked with him in private: Come, inſenſible Araſpes, (ſaid he to him, and ſmiled) what news do you bring me concerning Ligdamis? Sir, (ſaid he and bluſh'd) he whom you ſpeak of is moſt certainly in love with Cleonice, as the Queen of Suſiana aſſures me. Cyrus was very glad to hear it, hoping thereby the better to advance the Deſign of the Prince Artamas: So that ſending Araſpes back with Orders to thank Panthea moſt civilly, he ſent for Ligdamis, who was with Feraulas in Timocreon's Tent. Ligdamis was no ſooner come, but Cyrus taking him aſide, conjured him to let him know one thing from his own Mouth, though he knew it perhaps another way. Sir, anſwered he, if it be within the compaſs of my knowledge, you ſhall moſt infallibly know it alſo. I do conjure you then (ſaid the moſt invincible Prince of Perſia) to tell me whether you be not more a Captive to the fair Cleonice, than you are unto Cyrus? Sir, replied Ligdamis, (a little ſurprized at this Queſtion) ſince my Captivity is moſt glorious unto me, I will never deny it unto you, but that the Fetters of the fair Cleonice do load me more than yours: But, Sir, I beſeech you (if I may be permitted to ask) why do you deſire to know it? Becauſe I would know, replied Cyrus, whether your Paſſion has not taught you to pitty others in the ſame caſe. Sir, anſwered Ligdamis, (ſtill more puzled to gueſs at the Intention of Cyrus) thoſe who are in my caſe may perhaps pitty, but their Compaſſion will be but very unſerviceable unto any in the like Condition. Not ſo, ſaid Cyrus, for you may do the Prince Artamas the moſt eminent ſervice that ever was done. How, Sir! replied he; I beſeech you tell me preſently what it is. You know, ſaid Cyrus unto him, that he is in Love with the Princeſs of Lydia: you are not ignorant of her Impriſonment; and doubtleſs you know alſo, that ſhe is to be brought from the Temple of Diana unto the Citadel in Sardis. I do know all theſe, replied Ligdamis;

but I confeſs I do not know which way I can be ſerviceable unto that Prince, who hath many ways obliged me to do all I can. And you may do it, anſwered Cyrus, by helping him to releaſe that Princeſs whom he loves. If I can do it, ſaid Ligdamis, without betraying the King my Maſter, or committing any unworthy Acts, certainly I will do it with abundance of Joy. Since I have told you that you can, replied Cyrus, you may aſſure your ſelf I will never move you to any unworthy Acts. After this, Cyrus told him that the Prince Artamas was gone to the Caſtle of Hermus, to perſwade his Father that they may paſs the River, to deliver the Princeſs of Lydia, as they conduct her unto Sardis.

Ligdamis at firſt ſeemed much ſurprized at this Diſcourſe: But Cyrus ſpeaking again, Do not think (ſaid he) generous Ligdamis, that we deſire a Paſs for all our Army, or with any Intentions to ſurprize Crœſus, or to vanquiſh him, or to ſubvert his Empire: No, Ligdamis, we would only releaſe our Priſoner-Princeſſes, and obtain permiſſion to paſs only with ſo many Men as will be able to deal with the Convoy which guards them: Thus you ſhall not contribute any thing to the ruin of your Country, but rather prevent it; ſince I do engage my Word, (if by your means we can recover the Princeſs Mandana and the Princeſs of Lydia out of their Power who perſecute them) to move Ciaxares to offer ſuch Conditions of Peace ſo advantagious to Crœſus, that he ſhall not refuſe them: But on the contrary, if you do not permit us this deſire, all Lydia ſhall be deſtroyed. Moreover, it is not to ſpare our Blood in forcing a paſſage over the River, that we have recourſe to your aſſiſtance; but becauſe if we be put to force, it will be with our whole Army, and then Crœſus cannot bring them unto Sardis, but they will remain at Epheſus where the Sea is open to carry them away, and ſo we ſhall not perhaps recover them but by many Battels and Sieges. Therefore generous Ligdamis, if it be true that the fair Cleonice hath ſenſibly moved your Heart, and made you capable to conſider the Caſes of other Lovers, be a Friend unto Prince Artamas who ſuffers all the Miſeries of a Lover. I will not ſay the fair Cleonice is in my Power; for though you deny my requeſt, yet I here declare, for the Prince of Phrygia's Sake, that ſhe ſhall not be any thing leſs favourably uſed.

O Sir, replied Ligdamis, it is enough, and my ſilence is a Crime. Yes, Sir, I am to blame to let you ſpeak ſo long; and queſtionleſs I ought to believe all your Propoſitions juſt, without any further Examination. I reſolve, Sir, to contribute all my Power unto the releaſement of the Princeſs Mandana, and the Princeſs Palmis: And therefore give me leave to tell you, that I believe the Prince Artamas will not do any good upon my Father: So that if you dare truſt me upon my word, it were expedient I went preſently to acquaint him, that my Siſter which is here with Cleonice is your Priſoner as well as my ſelf; and I doubt not but this Conſideration will much further your Deſires. But, Sir, I beſeech you, I beſeech you remember your Promiſe to procure the Peace of my Country, if I render you the Princeſs Mandana. I do ſo ſolemnly promiſe it, replied Cyrus, that you need not apprehend the leaſt fear; ſince it is my cuſtom to keep my Word unto my moſt mortal Enemies, though it would coſt me a hundred Crowns. I think, Sir, ſaid Ligdamis unto him, that ſince I leave a Miſtreſs and a Siſter with you, you need not fear my return. If I durſt not truſt you, anſwered Cyrus, I ſhould not ſpeak unto you as I have done. After this, Ligdamis deſired that ſome Men might go with him, leſt he ſhould be ſurprized in his Quarters as he paſſed, and alſo to the end there might be ſome Witneſſes of his Tranſaction with his Father, in caſe the Prince Artamas had been denied, and ſhould be gone from the Caſtle of Hermes before he came. Cyrus having already a very high eſteem of Ligdamis, would not have let any to have gone this Journey with him, but only Men to wait upon him, had it not been for this laſt reaſon: but the firſt being more ſtrong, he appointed Feraulas to go with him. So that without any more delay they prepared themſelves for the Caſtle of Hermes: Ligdamis firſt writing a Letter to his dear Cleonite, leſt ſhe ſhould be troubled at his departure. Cyrus having a deſire (according to his Promiſe) to let the King of Aſſyria know what Ligdamis went about; and ſince he could not but approve of any thing that might conduce to the Princeſs Mandana's releaſe, Ligdamis received a hundred kind Expreſſions from him as well as from Cyrus; and engaged his Word to free his Country, if Ligdamis freed Mandana.

However, though there was ſome Probability that this way might prevent a long War, yet Cyrus was as circumſpect and diligent as if it were to laſt a long time. He enquired of the Priſoners concerning the Paſſes over the River, the fit Places to encamp in, the moſt advantagious Forts, concerning the Fortification of all their Works, and a hundered other things: And as knowing as he was in the Art of War and Conquering, yet he never thought he knew enough; ſo that without any manner of Pride he would diſcourſe with the old Captains of his Army, and would not deſpiſe the advice of the meaneſt Souldier; though to ſpeak truth, he rather inſtructed them of whom he asked any Advice, than was inſtructed by them. His military Cares robb'd him not of one thought of thoſe Civilities which he intended to the Captive Princeſſes, and to ſo many Kings and Princes as were in his Army. Yet maugre all thoſe ſeveral Cares and Variety of Buſineſs, Mandana was the abſolute Miſtreſs of his Heart, and the object of all his Deſires: He did every hour flatter himſelf with hope of ſeeing her e're long at liberty, and alſo as oft fear the contrary: So that paſſing continually from Hopes to Fears, and Fears to Hopes, his Soul was in continual Agitation. The Picture of Mandana, and the Scarf which dying Mazares left, was all his Conſolation; he preſerved them with ſuch extraordinary care, as it might eaſily be ſeen, how dear ſhe was to him unto whom they related.

The ſight of the King of Aſſyria, procured him ſome vexatious Hours, and he had much ado to hide his real Reſentments, and to live in handſom civility with him, until Mandana's Releaſment, when then he ſhould either vanquiſh, or be vanquiſhed by him: Yet had he the conſolation to think he had thrown him out of his Throne, and to know that Mandana loved him not, and that he himſelf was more happy in her Affection than he: but on the contrary, that the King of Aſſyria could not in reaſon have one ſingle Thought which could afford him any comfort, unleſs out of the Oracle which he received at Babylon; for he ſaw his Rival arrived to the higheſt top of Glory, and that he was as high in the eſteem of his Princeſs, and no way unfortunate, but in being ſeparated from her, and her being a Captive: But as for himſelf, he ſaw he was without a Crown, or any hopes either to reign in Aſſyria, or in the Heart of Mandana, at the leaſt in all probability. Yet he flattered himſelf ſtill in hopes of this Oracle; and ſweetned all his Sorrows, and diſſipated all his Fears, by believing that he ſhould one day by ſome way which he underſtood not, be as happy, as he was at preſent unfortunate. Alſo, he was never without this Oracle about him, and had it writ in a little Table-book of Cedar, though he had it alſo perfectly in his Memory.

Thus did theſe two great Princes and illuſtrious Lovers, reaſon with themſelves during the Voyage of Artamas, who found much more difficulty in perſwading the Governor of Hermes than he imagined, for he did not think Ligdamis would not be there; yet was he received very civilly, as he by whoſe favour the Governor had his Government: But ſince the Negotiation was for a paſſage of foreign Forces, the Governor could not hearken unto it; though the Prince Artamas told him, it was only to releaſe the Princeſs Mandana, who was the principal cauſe of the War, and to deliver the Daughter of his King, who was moſt unjuſtly perſecuted. It is very true, his Mind was much troubled to hear no news of his Son, who he ſaid was gone to convoy his Siſter and ſome other Ladies, and that he could not give him any direct Anſwer, until he knew what was become of him: But when he heard by the return of ſome Souldiers an Hour after, that Ligdamis was a Priſoner, and his Siſter a Captive, he exceedingly grieved at it. The Prince Ar- tamas alſo knowing it, did give him ſome comfort; for he aſſured him that Cyrus would treat him very well, which did ſomething leſſen his Sorrow: He offered to ſend Soſicles for better intelligence; and did ſo, conceiving the Governor would conclude nothing with him, till he heard more certainly concerning his Son: But as good luck was, Soſicles meeting with Ligdamis and Feraulas in the way, that Journey was ſhortned, and they all returned to the Caſtle of Hermes, where they were received with much Joy; and it was hard to ſay, which had more ſatisfaction to ſee Ligdamis, his Father, or the Prince Artamas.

After this, the Tranſaction met with no great Difficulties; for aſſoon as Ligdamis related unto his Father how Cyrus treated him, and how his Siſter and all the Ladies were uſed, his Heart did change, eſpecially when Ligdamis told him that Cyrus deſired a Paſs for no more Men than were requiſite to releaſe the captive Princeſſes, and that he ſolemnly promiſed upon his Word to procure the Peace of Lydia, if by his means they were releaſed. After this, the Governor having no Power to oppoſe Prince Artamas, Ligdamis, and the welfare of his Country, he conſented unto their Deſires; ſo that the Phrygian Prince returned back fully ſatisfied: He moved Ligdamis to ſtay with his Father, purpoſely to keep him in the ſame Mind; but Ligdamis would not upon any Terms, ſaying that he were unworthy of thoſe Civilities which he had received, if he did not return. Artamas was ſtill urgent with him; but the Generoſity of Ligdamis being fortified with a prevalent conſideration of Love, was fully reſolved to return: And therefore they all returned to Cyrus, who welcomed them with abundance of Joy, eſpecially after he underſtood the happy Succeſs of their Negotiation. Artamas gave Cyrus many thanks for his favours unto Ligdamis, and Ligdamis beginning afreſh to applaud him, he forced the modeſty of Cyrus to impoſe ſilence; and to do it with a better Grace, he hindred them from ſpeaking of himſelf, by profeſſing his own Obligations unto them, for contriving things ſo as that he had hopes to releaſe Mandana.

Artamas, who had no leſs Intereſt in the Buſineſs than he had, could not endure he ſhould thank him for any thing he had done. And Ligdamis, who was exceedingly obliged unto both thoſe Princes, was much aſhamed of thoſe Thanks they gave him.

During this Conteſtation of Civility, the King of Aſſyria hearing of their return, came unto Cyrus, who was ſending for him, to acquaint him with the Reſult of their Negotiation: So that being a partaker of his Rival's Joy, and hoping to ſee Mandana releaſed, he rendred a thouſand Expreſſions of Gratitude unto the Tranſactors of the Enterprize; all of them being infinitely impatient to receive ſome Intelligence from the Friends of Meneceus, concerning the departure of the Princeſſes, and the Convoys which were to guard them. Artamas, who was not leſs amorous than any, was not leſs joyed in his Hopes to releaſe the Princeſs Mandana, without fighting againſt the King her Father. Ligdamis, for his part, hoping more in the enjoyment of his dear Cleonice, if the Wars were compoſed, than if they continued, was a moſt ſenſible partaker in the Joys of all theſe Princes.

In the mean time, the Prince Artamas deſiring permiſſion to go and acquaint the King his Father with his Tranſactions; and the King of Aſſyria deſiring to contemplate upon his Joys in private, both of them went away; and ſince Ligdamis and Soſicles did follow the Prince of Phrygia, Feraulas only remained with Cyrus. Indeed he was the moſt agreeable Companion he could have, ſince it was to him only that Cyrus had communicated the Secret of his Paſſion: For though Chriſantes in all other Matters was highly in his favour, yet it was to Feraulas he opened the Cloſet of his Soul, as one that was of a more ſuitable Age and Humour to excuſe all his Imperfections. Aglatidas alſo coming in, did not diſturb or alter the Converſation; for he had all the Qualities which Cyrus could wiſh for in a Confident of his Love: His Mind was clear, his Soul was tender, and he was acquainted with this Paſſion, out of his own experience. So that Cyrus imployed two Hours with him and Feraulas very pleaſingly in talking concerning the ſtate of things. This Converſation had laſted longer, if the King of Phrygia had not interrupted it, by a Viſit which he paid unto Cyrus to teſtify his joy that his Son's Negotiation had took ſo good Effect.

The reſt of this Day was thus ſpent; and the next Morning Cyrus reſolved with the King of Aſſyria, and the Prince Artamas, upon thoſe Troops which they would make choice of for this ſecret Expedition, when time required. After which Cyrus, who was the moſt obliging Prince upon Earth, calling for Ligdamis, who had contented himſelf with writing unto Cleonice, and durſt not ſo ſoon ask leave to ſee her, he told him, in a low Voice, and ſmiled, that he was his Priſoner no longer; So that, ſaid he unto him, if you be the Captive of Cleonice's, go and viſit her. Ligdamis anſwered, that ſince both his Captivities were glorious, he deſired to go out of his Fetters, no more than out of the fair Cleonices; yet ſince he gave him leave, he would go and viſit her, and did ſo.

The day following, Cyrus accompanied with the Prince Phaartes (who never failed upon ſuch an Occaſion) went to viſit the Queen of Suſiana, and the Princeſs Ariminta: He found the firſt of theſe two ſomething leſs ſad, by reaſon of the hopes which Araſpes had infuſed into her, but he had found the Princeſs Ariminta full of Melancholy, and could not gueſs the cauſe, unleſs the continuation of her Misfortunes, which ſhe endured with abundance of conſtancy. Cyrus did all he could to comfort her; but ſince ſhe heard no news of Spitridates, ſhe was not capable of any Joy. The ſight of Cyrus, as pleaſing as it might have been unto her, by reaſon of that prodigious reſemblance which was between him and Spitridates, did rather augment than leſſen her languiſhing Humour: For when ſhe imagined that this Prince who was ſo admirably handſom, ſo compleat, and ſo gennerous, was either Dead or a Priſoner, or Perfidious, ſhe had much ado to exclude ſuch angry Thoughts, for fear ſhe ſhould diſcover her Weakneſs: However, ſhe had rather the preſence of Cyrus ſhould revive thoſe ſad Thoughts, than ſee the Prince Phaartes with her, whoſe very ſight raiſed a thouſand Diſtempers on her Fancy, to think that her Eyes ſhould allure him, and chaſe Spitridates from her; ſo that the Love of this Prince was intolerable to her.

After Cyrus had continued his Viſit a long while with Ariminta, he took his leave of her; and to oblige Ligdamis, he went unto the Chamber of his Epheſian Priſoners, unto whom he ſhewed a hundred Civilities, eſpecially to the Siſter and Miſtreſs of Ligdamis. In his going from thence, he called for Araſpes, whom he had obſerved to be very ſad: And ſince he conceived the cauſe might proceed from a diſlike unto that Imployment; and ſince he loved him very well, he asked, whether he did not think himſelf a Priſoner, in keeping of Priſoners? if he were weary of it, he would put ſome other in his place. Araſpes was ſo ſurpriſed at this Queſtion, that in lieu of returning Thanks, he earneſtly asked him, whether the Queen of Suſiana, or the Princeſs Ariminta, had made any Complaints of him? or whether he had any way diſpleaſed them or him? And Cyrus anſwering, No; but rather on the contrary they commended him; he prayed he might continue in his Office, and thanked him for his Goodneſs towards him. Yet it was after ſuch a manner, as made Cyrus believe Araſpes was troubled at ſomething he had no diſpoſition to tell: So that without any further Reflection upon it, he took Horſe and returned to the Camp.

In going thither, he eſpied two Men on Horſe-back in the way coming towards him; and ſince they rode faſter than he did, they quickly met. But one of theſe Strangers no ſooner caſt his Eyes upon Cyrus, and obſerving the Honour which was done him, but he asked one of the Followers who it was? And being anſwered, it was Cyrus, he ſtop'd and alighted from his Horſe, and preſented himſelf unto Cyrus, making no queſtion but to be known unto him. Then addreſſing his Speech unto him, Sir, (ſaid he) I beſeech you give me leave to ask pardon for not rendring you that Honour which I ought, upon that occaſion wherein I did you all the Service I could. Cyrus looking upon this Stranger, whom he ſaw to be a handſom proper Man, did ſeriouſly examine his Memory whether ever he had ſeen his Face: but the Phyſiognomy of this young Cavalier was ſo new in his Eyes, that he concluded him to be certainly miſtaken; So that anſwering very civilly, he told him that he could not remember he ever ſaw him, and by conſequence he thought him to be miſtaken, ſince he did not uſe to forget ſuch Men as have any Characters of Nobleneſs in their Faces, as he had. Afterwards cauſing him to take Horſe again, and deſiring him to tell him when and where he ſaw him? This handſom Stranger told him in the ſame Language which he had newly learn'd, and which was in a kind of corrupted Greek, that he had the honour to meet him in a Wood in Paphlagonia, when he had but one Page with him, and when he was aſſaulted by ſix Men, from the violence of whom he endeavoured to defend him.

I do not know, ſaid Cyrus unto him, whether I ſhould let you go on in your Error, leſt I ſhould be ſuſpected not to acknowledg a Benefit: Yet notwithſtanding, to undeceive you, and to prevent my being accuſed of Ingratitude, know (Generous Stranger) that I engage my ſelf to recompence the Service which you did unto that Man for whom you take me: But know withall, that there is a Prince in the World who does ſo much reſemble me, that at divers times and places we have been taken one for another: Therefore ſince I do not doubt but that it was he whom you relieved, and ſince I am much intereſted in his Life and Fortune, I pray tell me what you know concerning him, and in what Place and Condition you left him.

Whilſt Cyrus was ſpeaking thus, the Stranger looking ſeriouſly upon him, did indeed find ſome little difference in the Air of his Countenance between him and the other, whoſe Life he had ſaved. So that not queſtioning the truth of what Cyrus ſaid, whoſe Honour was too well known to be ſuſpected of a Lie; Sir, ſaid he unto him, I beg your pardon for crediting my Eyes before my Reaſon, which ſecretly tells me, that he who hath conquered the greater part of all Aſia, cannot poſſibly fall into ſuch a Condition as to owe his Life to ſuch an unfortunate Stranger as I am. The Man whoſe Life you have preſerved, replied he, is ſo noble, that I conceive you more honoured by it, then if I owed you mine: For to ſpeak ſincerely to you, whatſoever I have above him, is rather the Gift of Fortune, than any effect of my Valour. However, I pray you, ſatisfy my curioſity, and tell me very punctually what you know concerning him. But, firſt, to make your Relation more pleaſing, I pray let me know the Name and Quality of his Preſerver, to the end I may render him his due reſpect. Sir, ſaid this Stranger, my Name is Anaxaris; but as for my Quality, I beſeech you move me not to tell it; it were eaſy, if I would diſſemble, by telling an advantagious Lie, to conceal it that way: But ſince I deſire no eſteem from you but what my Actions and Services ſhall ſpeak me worthy of, I will not either under or overvalue my ſelf, by ſaying my Quality is either too low or too high. Therefore without any more diſcourſe concerning it, give me leave to tell you, that the Reports of your illuſtrious Name drawing me out of my own Country to come and be my ſelf a Witneſs of ſo many Miracles which Fame does report of you: And paſſing one Evening through a Wood in Paphlagonia, I ſaw a Man ſitting under a Tree, who was ſpeaking unto another that was not above two paces from him, and who ſeemed to looking unto two Horſes which were tied unto the Trunk of a Pine-tree, leſt they ſhould break looſe. As the Air and Garb of him who ſeemed to be the Maſter of the other, ſeemed to have much Grandure in them; ſo I thought my ſelf obliged to help him, as afterwards I did. I looked upon him very ſeriouſly, and methought he was very ſad; giving me ſuch a civil ſalute as I paſſed by, that I looked back at him three or four times: And at laſt I perceived ſix Men come out of ſeveral quarters of the Wood, who falling upon him all at once, hardly gave him time to riſe, or put his Hand unto his Sword; which yet he did ſo readily and couragiouſly, that you need not wonder (Sir) if when they told told me that you were Cyrus, I thought that you were he whom I had the happineſs to ſerve; for I never in all my Life ſaw ſo much Courage in any Man, as in that illuſtrious Stranger. I no ſooner ſaw him aſſaulted upon ſuch diſadvantages, but I went to him, and cryed, I would die in his Defence; and did ſuch things as I believe I ſhould never have done, if his Example had not ſhewed me the way. So it was, Sir, that after a long combat we diſengaged our ſelves from theſe Aſſaſſinates; for four of them lay dead upon the place, and two ran away.

This valiant Stranger whom I did aſſiſt, was wounded in two places, whilſt he was getting upon his Horſe; So that ſeeing him to ſtand in need of help, I asked him into what place he would be conducted? He was as civil as valiant; and thanked me for my aſſiſtance, in ſuch Terms, as eaſily made me underſtand the excellency of his Soul. He would have diſpenſed with me from the Offer which I rendred, telling me, that the Life which I had ſo much care of, was not ſo happy, as to take ſo much pains in preſerving it. Yet for all that I would not leave him, but conducted him to the next Houſe, which was not above four or five Furlongs off: As good luck was, there was a Town not far from thence, where a Chyrurgion dwelt; and he knowing of him, ſent his Page for him. I ſtaid with him till his Wounds were dreſſed, and would have ſtaid longer, if he would have ſuffered me: ſo that ſeeing the People of the Houſe very careful of him, I the ſooner reſolved to obey him. He deſired to know my Name; and I told him, as I have done you, that it was Anaxaris. But ſince it was then very late, I was forced to ſtay there in that Place all that Night, and lodged in a Chamber next his. The Chyrurgion told me, his Wounds were not mortal; but he found ſo deep a Melancholy in his Face, that he feared a Feaver; which added to his Wounds, would make them more hard to heal. As I did lie in a Chamber which joined unto his, and the Partition was only of unjoined Planks, I heard him paſs away that Night without any ſleep: He ſpoke ſometimes very loud, and though I could not diſtinctly hear what he ſaid, yet I could often hear him pronounce the name of Araminta: I underſtood that he made many pitiful Complaints againſt ſome Beauty of that Name; for he would often cry ont, Araminta, perfidious Araminta! why cannot I forget thee? Theſe Complaints begetting in me a freſh curioſity to know whom I had ſerved, I asked his Page, before I parted: But he told me that he had ſuch ſtrict charge from his Maſter to conceal it, as I would preſs him no further. And ſo I left him, without any further knowledg what he was, than what I have told you: Yet I brought away with me ſo great eſteem of this valiant Man, that thinking I had found him when I met you, Sir, I was in an extaſy of Joy: But, Sir, I am well ſatisfied with my miſtake; for I had rather have the Honour to be known unto you, than have enjoyed my ſatisfaction in meeting with him I took you for.

The Prince Spitridates, replied Cyrus, is one of ſo high a Merit, that I am not diſpleaſed if you prefer him before me, ſince in ſo doing you do but what is reaſon. In the mean time, generous Anaxaris, I do profeſs my ſelf obliged unto you for preſerving the Life of Spitridates, as much as if you had preſerved mine; And therefore I do acknowledg, in the preſence of all that hear me, you may juſtly accuſe me of Ingratitude, if I do not render you all the good Offices which can be expected from a Prince who is obliged unto it. Anaxaris anſwered theſe civil Expreſſions in extream humility, yet far from any baſeneſs: But on the contrary, as humble as he was, yet it appeared, by his Anſwers, that he was more accuſtomed to confer Favours, than receive any. So that Cyrus conceiving a great Opinion of him, reſolved to have an eſpecial care of him; and in order to that, gave Orders to place him in one of his own Tents, and that he ſhould be treated as a Man of high Quality, as he ſeemed to be. But as Cyrus was well pleaſed with Anaxaris, ſo Phraartes was not: For ſince he was perſwaded, that if Spitridates had been dead, he ſhould have been more in favour with Araminta, ſo he had a ſecret malignancy lignancy againſt Anaxaris, as ſoon as he knew he had ſaved the Life of his Rival.

Cyrus, as ſoon as he came to the Camp, deſired to acquaint the Princeſs Araminta with ſome part of what he heard concerning Spitritades, and to diſſemble the other part, making him leſs wounded than he was; but ſince the Relation was before ſo many, he thought it hard to be done.

Yet thinking it would be more Conſolation unto her to hear he was wounded, than to believe he was unfaithful or dead, as ſometimes ſhe did, he ſent Feraulas to acquaint her, that a Stranger came to the Camp, who about a month ſince met with Spitridates; for Anaxaris ſaid it was about that time he relieved that Prince: Feraulas, according to his Maſter's Commands, went preſently unto Araminta, who at the firſt was extreamly joyed to hear Spitritades was alive: But not contenting her ſelf with what Feraulas told her, and deſiring to ſee the Man who had ſeen him, becauſe ſhe perceived he did not poſitively conſent ſhe ſhould, therefore ſhe imagined much more concerning Spitritades than it was: ſo that Feraulas promiſed to entreat Cyrus from her, to let her ſee him who brought the News.

Then returning to the Camp, he performed his Promiſe, and Cyrus deſired Anaxares the next Morning, to viſit the Princes Araminta, of whom the Prince Spitridates did ſo unjuſtly complain; withal conjuring him to ſay his Wounds are not ſo dangerous as they were: But this Warning was in vain, for Phraartes had let her know, by an Armenian Woman, (whom he had got to wait upon her when ſhe was at Artaxates, and was all for him) that Spitridates was left for dead, and never like to recover; ſo that Araminta would not believe Anaxaris, when he told her the real Truth. Cyrus hearing of her Deſpair, went himſelf to comfort her, and aſſured her, that Anaxaris told him no more concerning Spitridates, than he had told her. But to teſtify how much he valued the ſatisfaction of her Mind; after good notice taken of the Place where Anaxaris left Spitridates, he ſent for the Prince of Paphlagonia, and deſired him that he would ſend one of his Men, to know exactly what was become of that Illuſtrious Prince. Araminta rendred Thanks unto Cyrus, with as much Civility as her Sorrows would give her leave. The Queen of Suſiana had alſo an extraordinary care of her. Cleonice, and all her Friends, never left her; and except Phraartes, all the World did participate of her Sorrows. Until this Accident unto Spitridates, ſhe was as civil unto him, as afterwards ſhe was unto Anaxaris, when ſhe knew he was his Preſerver: But ſhe began to treat him much worſe than uſual, imagining that it was by reaſon of him that Spitritades had named her Perfidious.

Thus the malignant Joy which Phraartes had at the Misfortune of his Rival, laſted not long; but he endured all the Torments that Love and Jealouſy could inflict upon him. In the mean while, Cyrus, the King of Aſſyria, and Prince Artamas began to be exceedingly impatient that they received no intelligence from the Friends of Meneceus, nor from thoſe of Timocreon at Epheſus and Sardis: But afterwards their Expectations were anſwered; and thoſe they expected being returned, they underſtood that the ſetting forth of the Princeſſes was deferred for eight Days, preciſely nominating the Day and Hour they were to ſet out; naming alſo the Troops which were to guard them, and deſcribing every Circumſtance with ſuch Particularities, that if theſe Princes did but juſtly obſerve their true Meaſures, their Enterprize muſt needs take effect; yet there was ſome Diſpute did ariſe amongſt them concerning the Execution of the Buſineſs: For the Prince Artamas, who was very well acquainted with the Country, was of Opinion to divide their Troops, and place one part of them in a Wood, by which the Princeſſes were to paſs, and to hide the reſt behind a Hill, which was full of Trees, and which was upon the left hand of the Plain, which the High-way between Epheſus and Sardis doth croſs; to the end, that when the Coaches are juſt between the Wood and the Hill, and almoſt over againſt the Caſtle of Hermes, where alſo ſome Men ſhould be left, they might compaſs about the King of Pontus, by cutting off his Paſſages on all ſides, and might get the Princeſſes over the River, almoſt before their Enemies knew where they were. Cyrus underſtanding the ſcituation of the Place better than the King of Aſſyria, did concur with the Opinion of Artamas; but the King of Aſſyria was of a contrary Opinion, and thought that the dividing of their Troops was the way to be vanquiſhed one after the other, and therefore more expedient to keep in one Body, and give a ſudden and violent Aſſault, than to have any recourſe unto Stratagems. The Prince Artamas held conſtant to his Opinion, and Cyrus confirmed it with many Reaſons; but this violent Prince ſtill obſtinately oppoſing them, there was a very ſtrong conteſt among them. Ligdamis was called to the Council, as one that knew the Country beſt, and as one that was well known in Military Affairs; but as the Happineſs or Miſery of three great Princes did depend upon this Buſineſs, he was ſomewhat nice in giving his Opinion; ſo that not delivering himſelf abſolutely, though he inclined to the Opinion of Cyrus and Artamas, the King of Aſſyria grew more opinionative and hot than before; ſo that it was reſolved to ſend Chriſantes beyond the River, to take notice of the Advantages and Diſadvantages of the Places they were to poſſeſs; and when he had well obſerved them, to give his Advice upon the Matter.

But this Courſe was no ſooner reſolved upon, then the King of Aſſyria ſaid he would truſt no Eyes but his own, in a buſineſs whereupon the Liberty of Mandana depended; and therefore he would go himſelf with Chriſantes and Ligdamis, to ſee whether they were in the right or wrong. The King of Aſſyria had no ſooner ſaid ſo, but the great Soul of Cyrus not being able to endure that his Rival ſhould ever lay it in his Diſh, that he expoſed himſelf the moſt for the liberty of Mandana, did conteſt no more, tho he knew it was againſt the rules of Prudence, and to no purpoſe, yet he told the King of Aſſyria that he would go alſo; the Prince Artamas alſo would needs be one of the Party, and let them ſee how he thought of the Buſineſs. Their departure was reſolved upon to be that very ſame Night, in common Arms; and that they ſhould carry only two hundred Horſe with them, to leave them near the Caſtle of Hermes, and paſs over only with fifty to view the Place which Artamas maintained to be the moſt convenient for placing of Men.

This Courſe being reſolved upon, Cyrus ſent for the King of Phrygia, and committed the care of all things unto him, telling all the reſt of his Captains, that he was gone only to viſit ſeveral Quarters of the Army. Yet the Matter could not be ſo cloſely carried, but ſome ſuſpected ſome other Deſign, which they would not publiſh; ſo that Tygranes and Phraartes keeping continually about Cyrus, and not leaving him, he was conſtrained to impart the Buſineſs unto them, telling them, that if his Deſign had been to Fight, he would not have gone without them; but their Buſineſs being only to view a place to fight on, he would ſpare them the pains of a Journey, wherein no Honour was to be got: Yet notwithſtanding, they were ſo importunate with him, that he conſented. Aglatidas, Chriſantes, Aduſius, Feraulas, Ligdamis, Soſicles, Tegeus and Artabaſes went alſo; the Stranger, Anaxaris, hearing of an Expedition, asked leave to follow, and he could not refuſe him. As ſoon as Night was come, they ſet out; and made choice of that Time, to the end the Spies which Cræſus had in the Army, could not give any intelligence which way Cyrus went. Ligdamis and Soſicles only went firſt,to prepare his Father to give a paſſage over the River for fifty Men; and all the Princes did ſo order their March, that they arrived within four Furlongs of the Caſtle of Hermes, two hours before Day-break the next Morning; where they made an Halt, according to the agreement with Ligdamis, who came unto them within a quarter of an hour after, and told Cyrus, that all was in readineſs to receive him: But ſince there was a neceſſity of Day-light for that Buſineſs, they thought beſt to reſt in the Caſtle till Night was gone. Cyrus, and all the Princes which accompanied him, went then into the Caſtle of Hermes, where they were received without any Ceremony, leſt the Buſineſs ſhould be known unto the Souldiers, who were made believe that they were the Men of Cræſus diſguiſed, who came to view one of the Quarters of Cyrus, and would paſs over the River in that place; not but that the Souldiers were very affectionate unto that Governour, but becauſe they would not run any hazard: So that Cyrus ſtaid a long while in the Caſtle of Hermes, as one that was a Captain unto Cræſus.

As ſoon as the Sun was up, Cyrus took Horſe, followed by the King of Aſſyria, Prince Artamas, Tygranes, Phaartes, Aglatidas, Anaxaris, Feraulas, Artabaſes, Ligdamis, Chriſantes, Aduſius, Soſicles, Tegeus, and fifty Cavaliers for that Guard, who went to ſee the Place, where e're long they hoped to releaſe Mandana. The Prince Artamis, to let the King of Aſſyria ſee he was in the right, marched between Cyrus and him; and as ſoon as they were over the Bridg, ſhewed them, with his Hand, the Hill that was full of Trees on the one ſide of the Highway; the Wood which was on the right Hand, and the way from Epheſus, which went on the right Hand; ſhewing them ſo clearly, that what he had propoſed was moſt expedient, that if the King of Aſſyria did not approve of it, then it was more out of Obſtinacy than Reaſon.

Chriſantes, who was a Man expert in ſuch things, ſaid, to ſecond the Opinion of Artamas, That the Enterpriſe could not be executed any other way; becauſe if the firſt Troops which conveyed the Princeſſes ſhould ſpy ſuch a conſiderable Body of Men together, as theirs would be if they were all joined, then they would acquaint the King of Pontus with it in an inſtant, by paſſing the Word from Rank to Rank, until it reached him; and then, ſince his Deſign is not to gain a Victory, but only to preſerve the Princeſſes whom he loves, he will cauſe them to turn back, whilſt he himſelf is facing us with all his Troops. So that unleſs an Ambuſcado be placed in ſuch a manner as the Prince Artamas propoſed, there was little hopes of any good ſucceſs in the Enterpriſe. Yet notwithſtanding, the King of Aſſyria would not agree, but ſaid, that thoſe which came from Epheſus might eaſily diſcover the Souldiers which were behind the Hill: And though it was obſerved unto him, that the way from that ſide was all low Ground, and the Hill before them making a demiround, it was impoſſible to diſcover any Men behind it; yet needs would he go thither, and all the reſt followed him. After Artamas ſhewed him his Error, and had viewed the Hill, they went alſo into the Wood, and wandred far in it to know all the Paſſes and Advenues; Chriſantes telling them, that they muſt conſider, as well what to do in caſe they were vanquiſhed, as if they did vanquiſh; and they had not ſtaid ſo long in this Wood, had it not been for this Reaſon. But the Prince Artamas propounding it requiſite, that the Father of Ligdamis was to provide a Boat to ſtand in that place where the Wood reached to the River, to the end that in caſe the Enemies ſhould become Maſters of the Bridg, yet they might that way convey over the Princeſſes: This Propoſition ſeeming good, they went to ſeek out for a Boat which was a great diſtance from thence, becauſe the River in that place was ſerpentine, and turned and winded very much. Then ſaid the King of Aſſyria, There is a neceſſity of having Boats. To which Ligdamis replied, that ſince Crœſus reſolved upa War, there was none left upon the River, except one which the Governour kept.

But whilſt they were thus reaſoning upon an Enterpriſe, which would e're long be enterpriſed, and Cyrus was entertaining himſelf with the pleaſing thoughts of being e're long Mandana's Deliverer; the Governour of the Caſtle of Hermes, who for the ſafety of ſo many illuſtrious Perſons, had ſet a Sentinel upon the top of the Tower, was advertiſed that there appeared a great Body of Cavalry coming from towards Epheſus; he no ſooner heard of this, but he diſpatched one of his Men immediately into the Wood to acquaint the Princes with it giving orders unto the Meſſenger to tell Ligdamis h might carry them into the Thick of the Wood toward the River, where they might be in ſafety till theſe Forces were paſſed by, which as he thought were going unt the Banks of Pactolus, where Crœſus had appointed hi general Rendezvouz. This Meſſenger obeying his Maſte and making all haſte, went into the Wood to ſeek fo

Cyrus: But whether it was out of ſome Fears that he apprehended, or that he was unacquainted with the Wayes where in all probability he might find him; he ſo bewildred himſelf in the Wood, that Cyrus had no intelligence from him. So that this Prince, and all his Company, took into the Plain, intending to march over it towards the Caſtle of Hermes again. But he was exceedingly ſurpriſed to ſee a great Body of Horſe marching: And following the motions of his Couragious Soul, in lieu of ſtopping, he advanced before the reſt; and was no ſooner entred into the Plain, but he eſpied a ſquadron of Horſe ſome fifty paces from him, and likewiſe he ſaw Souldiers between him and the Caſtle of Hermes, and all the Champaign full of Cavalry and Infantry. His undaunted Soul ſtill did never tremble, nor was the leaſt moved at this inevitable Danger; but in lieu of any haſty retreat into the Wood, his firſt Action was to ſtay, his ſecond was to turn his Head about and ſee whether he was followed; and I know not whether his third Action would not have been to have ſought out a deſperate Death amongſt them, if the Prince Artamas, Tigranes, and Phaartes had not forced him to take into the Wood by a way which Ligdamis had ſhewed them. Yet could he not get far into it; for ſince the Lydian Troops had ſpied them, he who commanded in chief, after he had cauſed the Body which he commanded to make a Halt, he came himſelf, with a hundred Horſe, to know what they were, not conceiving them to be Enemies, becauſe he could not imagine how Cyrus ſhould paſs over the River. However, not to neglect any thing, he went forward; and was no ſooner twenty paces within the Wood, which was thin in that place, but he perfectly perceived they were no Lydians, and moreover obſerved they were no great Number; So that going after them, and giving Orders for thoſe in the Plain to follow, he was preſently ſo neer as to fall on, whilſt Cyrus marching laſt, as he that had leaſt deſire to fly, would never ſo much as turn his Head, or offer to take his Sword in hand, hoping by this couragious Action to make their Retreat more eaſy: But at laſt, Cyrus turning ſuddenly towards the Lydian Captain who marched in the Head of his Men, did run his Horſe ſo furiouſly againſt him, and fell upon him in ſo couragious a manner, that he forced him to retreat a little : All his Men made a ſudden ſtop ; and Cyrus ſeconding his firſt Blow with another which made a River of Blood to follow it, then endeavouring the Retreat of his Friends, he found himſelf compaſſed about with Enemies on all ſides, without any hopes of eſcaping : He killed one immediately ; but the Multitude had certainly ſmothered him, if Feraulas by good Fortune turning his Head, and ſeeing Cyrus in that Danger, had not called Chriſantes to his Relief, who, with the Prince Tigranes, Phaartes, Anaxaris, Aglatidas, Ligdamis, and many others went unto him ; as for the King of Aſſyria, who marched a long way before with the Prince Artamas, and the reſt, they were aſſaulted by another Body of Enemies, who were ſent to cut off their Paſſage.

Never was ſuch a thing heard of, as paſſed in this Wood ; for Cyrus knowing that the Liberty of Mandana did depend upon him and his Life, beſtirred himſelf like a Lion ; none who aſſaulted him eſcaped, and few who he fell upon could be ſo quick as to flye, or ſo ready as to guard themſelves, or ſo valiant as to reſiſt : So that there was very few of all them that were about him, which did not feel the Weight of his Arm : The Valour of Tygranes was very notable, as well as that of Phaartes ; the Stranger Anaxaris behaved himſelf ſo, that Cyrus ſaw he was the moſt valiant Man in the World ; Aglatidas, Ligdamis, Chiſantes, Feraulas, all of them did ſhew ſuch Teſtimonies of prodigious Courage to ſave the Life of their illuſtrious Maſter, that it is unexpreſſable. The more the Number of their Enemies encreaſed, the more did the Valour of Cyrus double ; he turned and winded amongſt the Trees, with ſuch admirable Dexterity, and his Horſe being ſo obedient unto his Hand, did ſo well ſecond his Intentions that he could divers times have ſaved himſelf, if he would have left his Friends engaged ; but his great Soul could not conſent unto ſuch a Thought, but he would ſtill fight it out, though there was no hopes of vanquiſhing.

It leſs than a quarter of an Hour, he made great heaps of dead Bodies, all the Bulks of Trees were bloody, the green Graſs was turned red, and the Ground was all Blood. All the Cavaliers which followed him, had periſhed at this Bout, and certainly he had done ſo himſelf, if the Gods had not by their ſupream Power preſerved him. After he had fought a long time, and ſeeing none about him but Tigranes, Phaartes, Aglatidas, Criſantes, Ligdamis, Anaxaris, and Feraulas, his Valour encreaſed; but the Number of his Enemies ſtill encreaſed, and one amongſt them intending to kill his Horſe, did thruſt his Sword through his Flank; ſo that this illuſtrious Prince could not poſſibly hold him, for this furious Animal finding himſelf wounded, he ran away with his Rider whether he would or no through the Thick of Trees and Enemies, ſome twenty Paces off, where falling down dead, Cyrus had much ado to recover himſelf from under him: but having at laſt diſengaged himſelf, he perceived that he had nothing in his Hand but the Stump of a Sword, for it was broken againſt the Bulk of a Tree, when his Horſe ran furiouſly away with him; then being in an Inſtant compaſſed about with a Multitude of Enemies, the Conquerour of many Nations muſt need be once conquered; yet did he offer to defend himſelf, but all in vain, for they tumultuouſly fell upon him, and took him Priſoner, he having not received one Wound. Tigranes, Phaartes, Chriſantes, Aglatidas, Anaxaris and Feraulas, ſeeing that Cyrus was taken, and that it was abſolutely impoſſible to think of releaſing him, they began to think of ſaving themſelves by Flight if they could, all but Feraulas, who ſuffered himſelf to be taken, that he might be a Partaker in his Maſter's Misfortune: But the reſt only defending themſelves, and retreating towards the Thick of the Wood, they fled away ſo happily, that they who followed them hearing a great Noiſe in the Place where the King of Aſſyria and the Prince Artamas were fighting, they made a Stop, fearing ſome Ambuſcado; during which, they got into the Thick of the Wood, and hid themſelves until Night, all but Anaxaris, who by the Stumbling of his Horſe was taken: However, the King of Aſſyria, the Prince Artamas, Artabaſes, Aduſius, Soſicles, Tegeus, and thoſe Cavaliers which were with him, and made ſuch a miraculous Reſiſtance, and had killed ſo very many Lydians, that their own Valour was their Ruin; for thoſe againſt whom they fought, ſeeing what kind of Men they had to deal withal, ſent for freſh Supplies: So that ſeeing on all ſides Enemies upon Enemies; and that the more they killed, the more they had to fight withal, they thought of ſelling their Lives at as dear a rate as they could, eſpecially Artamas: for beſides the general Intention which they all had not to be taken, he had a particular Reaſon not to fall into the Hands of Crœſus: Soſicles and Tegeus might have the ſame Apprehenſions, but yet they were not ſo deeply concerned as Artamas. However, that fatal Deſtiny could not be avoided; for after he had received a Wound in his right Arm, and in three other Places beſides, he was forced to yield himſelf. The King of Aſſyria alſo was ſurrounded with ſo many Men, that he was taken Priſoner; ſo likewiſe were Soſicles and Tegeus; Artabaſes and Aduſius only eſcaped this dangerous Adventure. Theſe two Combates then being thus ended, and all the Lydians which had fought met, and having put the Priſoners which they had taken together, Cyrus, Anaxaris, and Feraulas, were much ſurprized, when they ſaw the King of Aſſyria, Soſicles, Tegeus, and ſome other of their Cavaliers in the ſame Condition: As for the Prince Artamas, he was ſo wounded, that he could not be brought.

In the mean time, theſe two illuſtrious Rivals ſeeing the Equality of their Fortunes, were both of them both ſad and glad: Glad, becauſe a Rival was no happier than himſelf; ſad, becauſe Mandana was without a Protector, eſpecially ſince the Prince Artamas was both taken and wounded: They were alſo very much grieved to ſee that he was known by two Lydian Captains, who had a great Deſire to have ſaved him, but durſt not. Then they went to advertiſe him who commanded in chief, and to give him ſome Teſtimonies of their Victory, they carried with them the Priſoners which they had taken; that is to ſay, Cyrus, the King of Aſſyria, Anaxaris, Tegeus, Soſicles, Soſicles, Feraulas, and ſome Cavaliers. At their coming out of the Wood, Cyrus and the King of Aſſyria viewed all their Forces which were drawn up in the Plain: and as they went, theſe two Rivals obſerving by their manner of uſing them, that they did not know them, did agree together not to diſcover each other, in caſe they could find ways to eſcape; and finding an Opportunity to hint the ſame unto Feraulas, as he was witty, ſo he made it known unto the reſt of the Priſoners, hoping that not being known, they would be more negligent in guarding them, and ſo they might perhaps recover their Liberty.

Yet Cyrus did extreamly fear to be carried unto the King of Pontus; and when he remembred how oft he had conquered him, and how that Prince had been his Priſoner, the preſent Condition of his Fortune was moſt inſupportable unto him; yet he marched on, though he knew not whither they would conduct him. The King of Aſſyria asked the Queſtion of a Lydian Souldier, who anſwered, that they were to be carried unto Andramites, who in Abſence of the King of Pontus commanded in chief; and as he was enquiring more preciſely into things, an Officer came and broke off their Diſcourſe, imagining that the King of Aſſyria was ſuborning the Souldier to further his Eſcape. After this, they marched, and were not permitted to ſpeak ſo much as to one another, each of them contemplating upon his own Misfortune.

Cyrus was ſo generous, as not to upbraid the King of Aſſyria for being the cauſe of their Misfortune, ſince but for him they had not come unto that Place where they were taken: Mean while they marched on, and at laſt came unto the Place where Andramites was, who knew Tegeus and Soſicles as ſoon as he ſaw them; ſo that not looking much upon any others; I think my ſelf very unhappy (ſaid he unto them, for he was one of their Friends) that you ſhould fall into my Hands: but ſince you know what belongs unto Honour, I hope you will not think it ſtrange that I ſhould ſpeak unto you as Priſoners of War, and not as unto my Friends; therefore I pray tell me what you were doing in the Wood, what Number of Men you had, and what was Prince Artamas's Buſineſs, whom I know is wounded, and a Priſoner? We cannot tell you (anſwered Soſicles very prudently) what was the Deſign of Prince Artamas, for we only followed him, and never enquired further; but we can very well aſſure you his Deſign cannot be very dangerous, ſince he had only fifty Horſes with him: And I do verily believe his Deſigns were rather Intentions to promote Peace than War. But where paſſed you over the River? (asked Andramites.) Since I will not prejudice that Prince whom now I ſerve (anſwered Soſicles,) you muſt excuſe me, if I do not tell you where we paſſed over. But where is Cyrus? asked Andramites. I ſaw him in the Camp yeſterday, when we came away (anſwered Tegeus, ſeeing Soſicles not anſwer quickly.) After this, Andramites having beſtowed a civil Complement upon them, commanded an Epheſian Captain to guard them: Afterwards, looking upon the other Priſoners, he found ſomething ſo great in the Aſpect of Cyrus, the King of Aſſyria and Anaxaris, though their Arms and Habit was very mean, that he called Tegeus again, to ask him of what Quality theſe Priſoners were? And as he anſwered, that they were only common Cavaliers: If all the reſt in your Army were ſuch, ſaid he unto him, Cræſus will moſt infallibly loſe the firſt Battel he ſhall fight; for I muſt needs confeſs, he hath none ſuch.

After this, he commanded that the Chyrurgion belonging to the Army ſhould go unto Prince Artamas, and conſider which was the beſt way to carry him: For ſince he knew that Cræſus held the Governor of the Caſtle of Hermes in Suſpicion, therefore he durſt not go thither, leſt he ſhould render himſelf ſuſpected; ſo that reſolving he ſhould be carried unto ſome Place nearer Sardis; and underſtanding that his Danger was not great, he commanded the Troops to march. All the Troops then beginning to advance, and all the Priſoners yet ſtaying for want of Horſes, becauſe their own were either killed or taken by ſuch Souldiers as could not be found; they ſaw appear many Coaches, in which were many Women: This Sight made the Hearts of Cyrus and the King of Aſſyria to beat; and both of them advancing at once towards the way ſide, by which theſe Coaches were to paſs: But when they eſpied Mandana there, Oh Heavens! what were their Thoughts? their Souls were diſordered, their Hearts trembled, and were ſo tranſported, that they thought to diſcover themſelves; and if Shame to appear before Mandana in ſuch a Condition, had not reſtrained them, certainly they had ſtaid the Coach, and done ſome Act as bold, as their Loves were violent. But the thing which moſt of all diſordered their Reaſon was, that whilſt the Princeſs Palmis, next to whom Mandana did ſit, was ſpeaking unto Andramites on the one ſide of the Coach, Mandana did caſt her Eyes upon theſe Priſoners; ſo that knowing Cyrus and the King of Aſſyria, ſhe could not poſſibly chuſe but cry out; which reaching the Ears of theſe two Rivals, produced different Effects, though ſad in both: However, the Princeſs Palmis turning her ſelf at the Cry which Mandana made, and asking her what ſhe had ſeen which cauſed her ſo to do? that prudent Princeſs imagining, notwithſtanding the Diſorder of her Soul, that Cyrus was not known, conſidering the Condition wherein he was, did ask the Princeſs Palmis Pardon for it: But, ſaid ſhe unto her, I could not chuſe but be very much moved, when I ſaw a Man amongſt the Priſoners, who had ſerved the King my Father in a time when I thought my ſelf very happy: In the mean time, Mandana ſeeing their Coach went on ſtill, deſired the Princeſs Palmis, to obtain of Andramites the Liberty of this Cavalier, not daring then to tell the Truth unto the Princeſs, leſt ſhe ſhould be over-heard. Palmis deſiring nothing more than to oblige Mandana, deſired Andramites to let the Coach ſtay, and this Lieutenant General obeyed her: Then did ſhe entreat him to do her the Favour to give unto her one Cavalier which Mandana ſaw among the Priſoners, which he had taken. Madam, ſaid he unto her, you know I ought not to do it. I know very well, ſaid ſhe, that according to the exact and ſtrict Rules of War, you are bound to deny me; but withal, I know, that being as I am, you ought to grant me all that is not prejudicial to the King; And you know Andramites, that one ſimple Cavalier can neither win nor loſe a Battel. But be it as it will be, ſaid ſhe, I ask him of you; and I promiſe you the Prince Myrſiles ſhall recompence it, ſince I cannot (as the preſent Condition with me is) do it my ſelf. Whilſt this Princeſs was ſpeaking unto Andramites, Mandana looked out on the other ſide, towards the illuſtrious Cyrus, who advancing ſtill forward, did both ſee, and was ſeen by her.

In the mean while, the Princeſs Palmis was ſo urgent with Andramites for the Liberty of this Cavalier, that he began to conſent, and asked which it was: Then Mandana, both by her Words, and pointing her Hand, ſhewing him, and ſpeaking ſo prudently, that in the end Andramites not being able to deny the Daughter of his King ſo ſmall a Favour, was ready to reſolve upon it; yet remembring what prodigious Valour his Men reported to be in this Cavalier, he pawſed a while, and told the Princeſs Palmis, to excuſe himſelf, that the Courage of this Man was ſo great, that even Cyrus, of whom Fame did trumpet ſo many Miracles, could not do more.

But in Concluſion, apprehending that this Princeſs (if Crœſus ſhould dye, might be revenged on him) he reſolved to ſatisfy her Deſire: So that cauſing Cyrus to come near, without telling him why he brought him to that ſide where Mandana was, Valiant Man, ſaid Andramites unto him, render Thanks unto this Princeſs for the Liberty which ſhe hath obtained for you. Cyrus was ſo ſurprized at this Language from Andramites, that he never thought of an Anſwer; for being ſo near Mandana, and not daring to ſpeak his real Thoughts, nor hardly to look upon her, his Spirits were not ſo free as to behave himſelf as at other times: yet ſtriving with himſelf, he ſaluted the Princeſs with a moſt humble Congy, and according to the Counſel of Andramites, by way of Thanks, Madam, ſaid he unto her, I do not know what terms to uſe, which can ſufficiently ſpeak my Thanks; and if you judg of my Reſentments, by my Words, you have cauſe to think me ungrateful. You have ſo faithfully ſerved the King my Father, replied Mandana, that I have more Reaſon to acknowledg your Benefits than you mine: However (added ſhe extreamly deſiring he ſhould be gone, leſt he ſhould be known, and yet unwilling to loſe the Sight of him ſo ſoon) fail not as ſoon as you are returned to the Camp, to let the King my Father know, by the firſt Poſt which goes to Ecbatan, that I will be ever what I ought to be; and that I will never do any thing which ſhall be unworthy of the Honour to be his Daughter. I ſhall not fail, Madam, replied he; But ſince I fear I ſhall not be able to obey you any way, but by the Poſt which Cyrus ſends, therefore unleſs I have ſome Meſſage unto him, he has ſome Reaſon not to believe me. Tell him from me, ſaid ſhe unto him, that I am very ſorry he ſhould ſo often expoſe himſelf unto Dangers, as he does for my ſake; and I think (ſaid ſhe, and bluſhed) that Andramites will permit me to entreat that illuſtrious Prince to do ſo no more. I ſhould be glad, ſaid Andramites, and ſmiled, that this Cavalier could perſwade him unto it; but I think he will have a hard task to do it. But, Madam, it is time to march, unleſs you will put your ſelf unto the Inconveniency of Night. In the mean time, this Cavalier may paſs the River when and where he pleaſes, for I will give him a Horſe and a Paſport. The Princeſs thanking Andramites for his Civility, turned towards Cyrus, whoſe Mind was ſo troubled, that he hardly knew whether or no what he ſaw was true. But whilſt Andramites was talking unto one of his Men: Will you be pleaſed to command me any other Service, Madam? (ſaid he unto Mandana) I deſire you, ſaid ſhe unto him, that you make good uſe of that Liberty which I have obtained for you. Afterwards, Andramites came to them, and deſired the Princeſſes they would be pleaſed to march; and ſo they did, Mandana looking upon Cyrus as long as ſhe could, with Eyes ſwimming in Tears; and Cyrus looking after the Coach, as long as ever he could ſee it. All this while, the King of Aſſyria was in intollerable Torment to ſee Cyrus called unto the Coach, and not himſelf: he was above twenty times ready to have told his Name, and if Reſentment of Honour and Love had not reſtrained him, he had infallibly done it: He would needs come up to the Coach alſo, but his Guards ſtopt him, and Feraulas alſo did wittily diſſwade him. But when Cyrus came to him with the Horſe and Paſport which Andramites gave him, and told him that he was at Liberty, his Sorrow was ſo exceſſive, that he was ſpeechleſs. Is it the Princeſs Mandana (ſaid he very low unto him, after he was returned out of his amazed Slence) that hath obtained your Liberty? It was the Princeſs Palmis (replied Cyrus) who at her Requeſt, did move Andramites to give it unto me. O ye Gods, (cryed out the King of Aſſyria, and lifted his Eyes up to Heaven) is it by the way of Slavery you intend to keep your Promiſes with me, and make me happy? Cyrus, who did not underſtand the ſenſe of theſe words, becauſe he was ignorant of the Oracle which this Prince received at Babylon, turned himſelf towards Anaxaris, and told him, he was very ſorry that this firſt Adventure they were in together, ſhould prove ſo unfortunate; but he deſired him to be confident, that he would endeavour all imaginable ways to procure his Liberty.

Afterwards he addreſſed ſome Civilities to Soſicles and Tigeus; then drawing Feraulas aſide, he conjured him, in his Captivity, to make himſelt known unto Mandana, and to let her ſee him as oft as poſſible, to the end ſhe might the ofter think upon him. Feraulas promiſing not to fail, and they who guarded the Priſoners, ſaying they muſt depart, Cyrus came near the King of Aſſyria, and moſt generouſly told him, that he would endeavour his Liberty with as much earneſtneſs, as if he were one of his deareſt Friends, and that at the laſt he would moſt punctually keep his Word with him. But withal, ſaid he, be ſure you keep yours. Alas, what can a Man in Chains do? replied he. You are to be near Mandana, ſaid Cyrus unto him; and I know not whether it be more advantagious to be a Captive upon that Condition, or to be at Liberty, and be at a diſtance from her. After theſe words, theſe two illuſtrious Rivals parted, Cyrus taking his way towards the Caſtle of Hermes with his Paſs-port, as if he had ſtood in need of it; and the Priſoners going towards Sardis, upon ſuch Horſes as were given them. The King of Aſſyria, at parting from Cyrus, did apprehend ſuch Joy, as for a while kept his Mind in much ſerenity: for when he looked before him, he ſaw the Coach wherein Mandana was; and when he looked behind him, he ſaw his Rival going further from her, and to paſs over that River which would ſeparate them for a long while: So that though he was a Priſoner, he would rather chuſe that Quality in following Mandana, than Liberty with Cyrus at a great diſtance: yet theſe pleaſing Thoughts did not laſt long, but on the contrary, paſſing from one Extremity unto another, he looked upon himſelf as the moſt miſerable Man alive, and upon Cyrus as the moſt happy. Who did meet with an Adventure, ſaid he to himſelf, ſo cruel as mine is? for I have not only the Miſery of being a Priſoner, but alſo to ſee my Rival releaſed, and releaſed by one who makes his Liberty inſupportable unto me.

Does it not ſeem as if Fortune did make him a Captive only to receive the greater teſtimony of Mandana's Affection? and to let me receive the moſt horrible Sign of her Averſion, that poſſibly could be expreſſed? for moſt certainly, ſhe ſaw me as well as ſhe ſaw Cyrus. Was ever ſuch a piece of Inhumanity as this ſeen? She ſees me a Priſoner, and a Priſoner for her Cauſe; and yet in lieu of asking Liberty for both, ſhe hath releaſed my Rival only, and loaded me with Chains: Though ſhe would not conſider me out of any love to me, yet ſhe might well have done it out of love to himſelf, ſince my Valour is not altogether uſeleſs unto Cyrus for her deliverance. But, inhumane Woman that ſhe is, ſhe has forced me to believe, by this Act, that nothing can overcome her. And yet the God's have promiſed me that I ſhall make her Sigh and Mourn for all her Cruelty, and that I ſhall be at reſt: But which way is it poſſible to come to paſs?

Whilſt this tumultuous-minded Prince was in theſe Contemplations, Anaxaris endured his Misfortune with much conſtancy; telling Tegeus, after he had ſeen Mandana, that he did not now wonder that her Beauty ſhould cauſe ſo great and long a War. Feraulas, though he was much vexed that he had not yet got the ſight of Marteſia, becauſe ſhe did ſit on the other ſide of the Coach, yet began already to project how there might be Intelligence between Cyrus and himſelf. Tegeus, who had got ſight of Cyleniſa, and was known unto her, did think more of that pleaſing Object, than of any Danger he was in: But as for Soſicles, his Thoughts ran all upon Prince Artamas, whoſe pittiful Adventure he did not yet know of. In the mean time Mandana was no ſooner out of ſight of her unfortunate Cyrus, but turning towards the Princeſs Palmis: Dare I tell you, ſaid ſhe, in a low Voice, unto her, that you have given liberty unto that illuſtrious Prince, who only can make me either miſerable or happy? How, ſaid the Princeſs Palmis alſo, in a low Voice, was I ſo happy as to releaſe the invincible Cyrus? I wiſh to the God's that the Prince Artamas have no worſe Deſtiny than his. As ſoon as ſhe had ſaid theſe words, Andramites came unto the Princeſſes, who had been ſpeaking with a Man who came to tell him that the Prince Artamas could not be carried any ways but in a Coach; and he deſired theſe Princeſſes, that they would be pleaſed to let their Women preſs cloſe in one Coach, and permit a Priſoner of Quality, who was much wounded, to go in the other.

Andramities had no ſooner ſaid ſo, but the Princeſs Palmis began to change Colour, and asked him the Name of this Priſoner: but as he did not give her a direct Anſwer, as if he were unwilling to tell her, ſhe knew it was the Prince Artamas. So that looking out of the Coach, as it was entring into the Wood, ſhe ſaw the Prince Artamas lying at the Root of a Tree, his Head upon a Buckler, and his Scarf, which held up his right Arm, bloody in divers places; his Complexion, by reaſon of the loſs of Blood, was wondrous pale; and his Eyes then being ſhut, ſhe thought him Dead. Ah, Andramites, (ſaid ſhe aloud, making a ſign with her Hand to ſtay the Coach) how dare you look upon me, ſince your Men have killed one of the moſt illuſtrious Princes in the World? The Princeſs Palmis ſpoke theſe words ſo high, that Prince Artamas heard her Voice, and knew it at the firſt: Then he did not only open his Eyes, but lifted up his Head alſo; and leaning upon his left Arm, he offered to get up, looking moſt earneſtly upon her whoſe Voice he heard. But the Coach ſtaying, and Pal- mis going haſtily out, ſhe was with him almoſt as ſoon as he heard her Voice, or had opened his Eyes: But, alas, how ſad was this ſight? I as you Pardon, Madam, ſaid this wounded Prince (as ſoon as he ſaw her near him) that I am not able to render you thoſe Reſpects I owe; and for having ſo ill defended that Life, which might perhaps have been ſerviceable in procuring your Liberty. It is I who ought to ask Pardon, replied ſhe, for being the Cauſe of your Miſeries and Wounds, though I did moſt devoutly pray unto the Gods for your Preſervation; who though they would not make me miſerable in my own Perſon, yet do moſt ſeverely torture me in yours.

Your Expreſſions, Madam, replied he, make me moſt happy; and ſince you are pleaſed to be a ſharer in my Miſery, let all be converted into Joy, ſince moſt certainly I ſhall die without any Sorrow. I had rather you would think of living, replied ſhe, though it were only for my ſake who cannoe live without you. Palmis expreſſed theſe words with ſuch earneſtneſs of Affection, that they made her ſelf bluſh, and look about to ſee whether any heard her: So that ſeeing the Princeſs Mandana, and all the reſt of the Women behind her, did ask her Pardon for ſo rudely leaving her; and Artamas knowing by it that ſhe was the Princeſs Mandana, expreſſed ſuch a Complement unto that Princeſs, as it appeared he knew the Paſſion of Cyrus to be moſt violent: but ſince he was ignorant of that Princes Adventure, he began to ſpeak as if he were a Priſoner; until Palmis made a ſign he ſhould be ſilent, and interrupted him by asking, whether he could endure the jogging of a Coach?

In the mean while Andramites fretting, and fearing if his Indulgence ſhould come to the Ear of Crœſus, he would be angry, beſeeched the Princeſſes not to trouble Artamas any longer, but to lend him one of their Coaches, ſince it was fit he ſhould be in ſome place where he might reſt himſelf. Though the Princeſs knew he had ſome other reaſon for what he ſaid, than what he expreſſed, yet they were contented to ſatisfy him, and depart part from Artamas. I beſeech the God's, Madam, (ſaid he unto her) that either my Life or my Death, may conduce unto your Liberty. And I beſeech them (ſaid ſhe, and held her Hand out unto him) that I may rather ſpend all my Life in Tears for my own Misfortunes, than have any Cauſe to ſhed them for your Death: Live therefore, Artamas, if you would have me live; and neglect nothing that may conduce to your preſervation. Artamas then moſt reſpectively taking that fair and dear Hand which ſhe preſented unto him, and looking upon her in ſuch a manner as if he would ask leave to kiſs it, he ſaw ſhe bluſh'd, and gently pulling it back, ſhe ſilently told him, that he ſhould content himſelf with that Favour which ſhe had already done him. So that ſaluting her, with as much reverence as his Wounds would permit him, he ſaw her depart, with her Eyes full of Tears, which ſhe could no way hide but by pulling down her Hood. Yet would ſhe not have her Coach to move, until ſhe ſaw Prince Artamas in that which was to carry him unto the next Town, which was not above fifty Furlongs from thence; Adramites having no Mind to carry him unto the Caſtle of Hermes, becauſe of the Friendſhip that was between Ligdamis and that Prince.

After this, the Princeſs Mandana and the Princeſs Palmis began to deplore their Misfortunes, and to impart their moſt ſecret thoughts. In the mean while Ligdamis, who had carried Tigranes, Phaartes, and Chriſantes unto a corner of the Wood where they ſtaid with much impatience for Night, bethought himſelf of the beſt wayes to conduct them unto the Caſtle of Hermes, and there to adviſe upon the beſt courſe for Cyrus, whoſe impriſonment extreamly troubled them. Whilſt they were in this condition, heard a noiſe, and thought themſelves diſcovered: but as good Fortune was, it proved to be Artabaſes and Aduſias, who ſeeking to hide themſelves, did meet with them. Yet their joy to ſee one another was qualified, when both ſides made a Relation to each other of the Accidents which had happened: For Ligdamis telling Artabaſes that Cyrus was taken, he was almoſt deſperate: And Aduſius telling Tigranes that the King of Aſſyria was alſo taken; and Ligdamis, that the Prince Artamas was both taken and wounded, they did nothing but make a mixture of Sorrows among themſelves. But Night at laſt being come, and Ligdamis, who was well acquainted with all the turns of the Wood, being gone to ſee whether they might all come out in ſafety, found that all the Troops were gone, and the Coaſt very Clear; ſo that he preſently returned to his Friends, and brought them ſafe to the Caſtle of Hermes, where they had the comfort to find the illuſtrious Cyrus, who reſolved to ſtay there that Night; but they found him ſo ſad, as their Joys were much mitigated.

The ſight of Mandana, a Captive, did ſo diſorder his Heart, that he could take no delight in that liberty which was given him; but when he parted from his Rival, he envied him, becauſe he could not part from him but by going further from Mandana. And as ſoon as he came to the Caſtle of Hermes, conſidering his Adventure more exactly, the more he envied his Enemy: Yet ſometimes he could not well reconcile his own Reſentments; he no ſooner apprehended one thing, but he ſmothered another; yet he always concluded himſelf the moſt unfortunate Man alive, and much more unfortunate than his Rival, altho he was a Priſoner. What good has the gaining of ſo many Battels done me, ſaid he? ſo many Towns taken, ſo many Provinces reduced, ſo many Kings conquered? They have indeed got me a little noiſe in the World, but they have not all releaſed Mandana, for whom only I made the War. I do not find the Glory that I deſire; I do not meet with Mandana, but only for her to releaſe me, and not I her. Moſt miſerable Cyrus! (cryed he out) why doſt thou not die of ſhame to appear before thy Princeſs in ſuch a deſpicable condition as thou didſt? Haſt thou not good cauſe to fear that ſhe releaſed thee only, to remove out of her ſight an Object that was worthy of nothing but her Scorn? how canſt thou ſuffer her to releaſe thee, who aſpires unto the Glory of being her Deliverer? There is a neceſſity of Death upon thee; the exceſs of Love and Shame muſt make thee rather receive thy freedom from Death, than from Mandana.

But how can I die (ſaid he, and reprehended himſelf) when as I have ſeen her whom I ſo much deſired to ſee? and has ſeen her ſo admirably fair, and ſo infinitely generous? Hitherto I was a Debtor unto the illuſtrious Mandana, only for ſome good Intentions, and ſome favourable Words; but now, by this Adventure, ſhe has given me that which is the moſt precious thing in the World, my Liberty: She has ſo loaded me with Obligations, that a million of Services cannot repay my debt; no, though I ſhould die ten millions of Deaths: She has kept me from falling into the power of my Rival and my Enemy: She has put me into ſome hopes of breaking her Chains: what would I have more? ought I not to be fully ſatisfied with my Journey? It is true, many of my illuſtrious Friends are Priſoners; but to my comfort, ſo is my moſt terrible Rival alſo; and I ſhall be delivered from the ſight of a Prince, whom I ſhall be glad to ſee no more, until Mandana be out of Captivity, and then ſee him with a Sword in his Hands.

But why do I rejoice at that which ought to grieve me? ſince certainly it would be more advantagious to me to have the King of Aſſyria at liberty, and in my Army, than a Priſoner with Mandana; and it would be more tolerable unto me to ſee him continually, than to know that he is continually in the ſight of Mandana; for the King of Aſſyria will be known, as ſoon as he is at Sardis; and as ſoon as he is known, Crœſus will treat him as a Prince of his Quality ought to be, let the King of Pontus his Rival do what he can.

Thus will this happy Captive ſee the fair and illuſtrious Mandana; and whilſt I am turmoiling for the Liberty of them both, and loaded with Chains as he is, he will perhaps win the Heart of my Princeſs, and take from me the ſweet Fruits of all my Conqueſts: And if ſo, what good will all my Conqueſts do me? And though I ſhould overcome Crœſus, and take Sardis, and deliver only unconſtant Mandana, can I be at all happy? or if I ſhould fight with a loved Rival, can I ever have Force enough to overcome him? or ſo much as deſire a Victory, ſince I am certain to have no ſhare in Mandana's Affection? Yes, yes, I will yet deſire to conquer, though that cruel chance do happen; and I will not think my ſelf abſolutely miſerable, if I can but out-live my Enemy. But why (ſaid this grieved Prince) do I torment my ſelf with imaginary Miſeries, ſince I have ſo many real ones to complain of? Is it not enough that I have loſt my hopes of releaſing Mandana ſo ſoon as I thought, but I muſt further perſecute my ſelf? Yet would I gladly know whether Mandana, who could not chuſe but know the King of Aſſyria, did forbear asking his liberty for the love of me, or for the love of him; and gladly would I know, whether the reaſon why ſhe asked mine, was only to ſet me further from her. Yet methought her Words and her Looks were ſo obliging, as I need not doubt that ſhe is the ſame ſhe was at Sinope and Themiſcira. But yet her Beauty is the ſame, ſo that I have cauſe to fear her Heart is altered; for if it were true that ſhe did at all love me, ſhe could not poſſibly but be ſenſible of my Miſeries; and then it is impoſſible ſhe ſhould preſerve her Beauty ſo well, amidſt ſo many cauſes of Sorrow, if they were not ſweetned by ſome Conſolations which I underſtand not.

Then the Jealouſy of Cyrus changing Object, the rare Qualities of the King of Pontus began to trouble him, and preſently after the King of Aſſyria came into his Fancy: but however, his Mind did change Objects, his Sorrow ſtill continued conſtant, and he could not any ways comfort up himſelf, becauſe in lieu of his releaſing Mandana, ſhe had releaſed him. Cyrus paſt over all the reſt of the Night in ſuch turbulent Agitations of mind as theſe; and he could not underſtand how it ſhould come to paſs that the King of Pontus did not himſelf conduct theſe Princeſſes; or how the Friends of Meniceus and Timocreon had given them ſuch falſe intelligence concerning the ſetting out of the Princeſſes. But he underſtood from the Governor of the Caſtle, who had it from a Captain belonging to Cræſus, that their departure was publiſhed to be deferred on purpoſe to deceive any Spies which the Prince Artamas ſhould have about them. And that which kept the King of Pontus from being of the Convoy, was, becauſe he was gone with another Party of Souldiers to a Ferry and a Ford, and to guard that Place where in Probability their Enemies would paſs, and intended to meet them nearer Sardis; and ſince the place where they were to meet was above fifty Furlongs from the Caſtle of Hermes, he could not be there where the fight was.

Cyrus apprehending all theſe Circumſtances, was much more grieved than before: For he plainly perceived, that if he had received right intelligence, Mandana had moſt certainly been releaſed: Then did he renew his Complaints with more bitterneſs than before, which yet were interrupted by Artabaſes, who told him that one of the Cavaliers who had eſcaped from the Fight, had brought him a Table-book which as he ſaid he ſaw fall out of the King of Aſſyria's Pocket whilſt he was fighting, and which after the Fight was paſt he took up. He told him further, that finding ſomething written in it in a Language which he underſtood not, and conſidering how the Intereſts of the King of Aſſyria and his were linked together, he uſed his beſt Endeavours to get it out of the Hands of this Cavalier, and bring it unto him, ſince he knew that he underſtood the Language. Cyrus took the Table-book, and being full of Curioſity to ſee it (for it was Cedar, and very magnificently adorned) after he opened it, he read theſe Lines in the Aſſyrian Language.

The Oracle rendred at the Temple of JUPITER BELUS.

Well mayſt thou hope to make her Mourn,
For all her Cruelty and Scorn:
Becauſe hereafter in her Arms
Thou there ſhalt find ſuch pleaſing Charms,
As quite ſhall terminate thy pain,
And turn they Sorrows into gain.

Whilſt Cyrus was reading this Oracle, Chriſantes entred, and knew it preſently to be the ſame which Marteſia told him was rendred unto the King of Aſſyria at Babylon. So that looking upon Artabaſes in ſuch a manner as let him know he was very deſirous to know who gave this Table-book unto Cyrus, and Artabaſes telling him it was himſelf; Chriſantes murmured in ſuch a manner, that Cyrus underſtood what he ſaid, and turning towards him, Did you know of this Oracle, ſaid he unto him, and when it was delivered? Chriſantes ſomething ſurpriſed at this Queſtion, ſought out for a handſom Excuſe, but could not meet with one; ſo that he confeſſed the Truth, and told him, that Marteſia, Feraulus, and he were reſolved to conceal it from him, leſt it ſhould be an addition unto his Sorrow. Whilſt Chriſantes was excuſing himſelf to Cyrus, he was reading this Oracle over again: Afterwards when he had ended it, Is it poſſible, O ye juſt Gods! (cryed he out) that a Prince whom you have ſo long loaded with Misfortunes, ſhould be now ſo much favoured by you as to make Mandana ſigh and mourn for him; and that he ſhall find ſuch Charms in the Arms of my Princeſs, as ſhall terminate all his Sorrows? Why (if I may ask it without crime) did you let her hate him, and love me, if you thought him worthy of you Protection? or why did you ſuffer him to be thrown out of his Throne? And if I was thought worthy of your Favour, why was not he my Conqueror, or why did he not kill me at the firſt Battel?

Sir, ſaid Chriſantes, (and interrupted him) As it is not fit for Men to preſcribe rules unto the Gods, ſo it is not fit to dive too far into the Expoſition of their Words. I know it very well, Chriſantes, replied he; but this Oracle is ſo clear, that there needs no other Interpretation, but an expectance of the Event. For my part, replied Chriſantes, I do conceive it to be more obſcure than you think it, ſince I never heard that the Gods did ſpeak in this manner of future Events. Did you never hear of any Prince, replied he, ſo unfortunate as Cyrus? Do you not plainly ſee that Forture is favourable unto me, only to be the more inhumane, ſince ſhe does advance me only to throw me down a greater Precipice? And on the contrary, do you not perceive that ſhe has afflicted my Rival to no other end but to make him more ſenſible of his Happineſs, and dejected him purpoſely to advance him? Do you not indeed obſerve that all his Miſfortunes prove Advantages to him, and conduce unto his Happineſs ? and on the contrary, all my good Fortunes are moſt ſenſible Cauſes of my Miſery ? For does not his Impriſonment bring him nearer her he loves ? and does not my Liberty carry me further off her whom I adore ? It is ſo long ſince this Oracle was given, replied Chriſantes, and ſo little good Fortune hath happened unto this Prince ſince, that methinks he cannot build any great hopes upon ſuch a Foundation. Ah Chriſantes, ſaid Cyrus, you diſſemble your Thoughts to comfort me a little.

As he was ſaying ſo, Artabaſes was ſaid to be come from the King of Phrygia. Alas ſaid Cyrus, and ſighed, that Prince does not know that Miſery is contagious, nor that his illuſtrious Son is wounded and taken Priſoner. After this he commanded that Artabaſes ſhould enter ; and aſking him what Buſineſs he had, he told him that the King of Phrygia had ſent in all haſte to advertiſe him, that the Friends of Tegeus and Timocreon which were in Epheſus and Sardis, had ſent word how they were deceived, and that the departure of the Princeſſes would be ſooner than they had formerly writ ; ſo that the King of Phrygia deſires to know what courſe you intend to take. Why, I have no courſe to take but to die, replied Cyrus. He thought fit alſo, ſaid Artabaſes, to advertiſe you that they ſent him word from Sardis, how Cræſus depended much upon an Oracle which he had received from Delphos, ſo that he makes himſelf ſure of Victory. Have they ſent this Oracle unto Timocreon ? asked Cyrus. Yes, Sir, anſwered Artabaſes, and the King of Phrygia hath ſent it unto you. In ſaying ſo, he preſented it unto him, which he found to be in theſe Words.

The Oracle.

Cræſus, if to this War he go,
An Empire great ſhall overthrow.

Oh that it would pleaſe the Gods (ſaid Cyrus, after he heard the Oracle read) that I were only to loſe

Empires and Crowns! if that were all, I ſhould be glad. But alas, ſince the Gods do promiſe Mandana to the King of Aſſyria, and the Empire unto Cræſus, what can remain for me? I do not know whether they will leave me a Grave, or ſhew me ſo much favour as to let me die as glorioſly as I have lived: However, I am reſolved not to yield without reſiſtance; but if I muſt loſe Mandana, and be conquered by thoſe over whom I have been a Conqueror, it ſhall be after ſuch a manner as ſhall let all the Earth know I have not merited my Misfortune. But yet though it ſhould be ſo that the Heavens do hate me, yet what hath Ciaxares done, unto whom the Empire belongs? He, I ſay, who enjoys the Fruits of all my Victories? Was there ſuch Poyſon in my Conqueſts, that he muſt periſh, becauſe the Gods are pleaſed to ruin me? Or at the leaſt, would it be juſt to confound things ſo together, as in promiſing Cræſus that he ſhall overthrow a great Empire, that of Ciaxares muſt be ruined? Why then I muſt die (cryed he out,) but my Death ſhall coſt my Enemies and Rivals very dear. I have hitherto been ſomething weary of my Life in hopes of ſome Happineſs hereafter; but ſince there is nothing but Miſeries and Misfortunes to be expected, I will carry it after another manner, and in ruining my ſelf will ruin as many of my Enemies as I can for Company, to the end there may be fewer Rejoycers at my Death. But O my divine Mandana! what's become of all thoſe favourable Words you have beſtowed upon me, if the Words of the Gods be true? Can I think you did not ſpeak the truth, or muſt I think your Heart is changed?

In ſaying ſo, he caſt his Eyes caſually upon Madates and Ortalgues, who came with Artalan, and yet he did not ſee them; and they ſeeing the turbulency of his Spirit, durſt not preſent themſelves unto him. As ſoon as he ſaw them, I hope you bring me ſome Conſolation, ſaid he unto them, and can tell me that the King is well. He is in perfect health, replied Madates: But I left him ſomething troubled, becauſe he had received intelligence that Thomiris hath raiſed a puiſſant Army, and gives out ſhe intends to make as deep a progreſs into Media, as the Scythians did under the reign of the firſt Ciaxares; and to communicate this intelligence unto you, the King was pleaſed to ſend me hither. He had better have declared War againſt me (replied Cyrus moſt violently) than ſent to ask my Advice: For conſidering the ſtate of things, I do think that his only way to be happy, is to be my Perſecutor. But you Ortalques (ſaid he, and turned towards him) who hath been conſulting with that famous Woman who (as all that have ſeen her ſay) ſpeaks all Truth: Pray let me have her Anſwer; and tell me if you remember what I appointed you to ask her from me? Yes, Sir, replied he, and according to your Directions, I asked her when you might hope for any reſt? I alſo told her, you deſired her Anſwer under her Hand; ſo that ſhe giving me this Paper ſealed up (ſaid he, and preſented it unto him) I cannot tell you whether I have brought good or bad Fortune to you. However, you may tell me whether this Woman be as famous in her own Country (ſaid Cyrus whilſt he was opening the Paper) as ſhe is in others? Sir, ſaid Ortalques, this Heleſpontique Sybil is beyond all compariſon more famous than all that ever preceded her; and they ſay ſhe never yet told Lie unto any that ever came to conſult with her. Let us ſee then, ſaid Cyrus, what truth ſhe affords me; and then he began to read theſe Words;

The Anſwer of the HELLES-PONTIQUE-SYBIL.

Is is a loving Enemy,
Will rouſe her ſleeping hate, I ſee;
And plunge in Blood a Hero's Head,
No fate can keep from being Dead:
This is his Deſtiny at beſt,
In only this thou ſhalt have reſt.

As ſoon as Cyrus had done reading it, he was a while ſilent, and afterwards made a Sign with his Hand that every very one ſhould withdraw, except Chriſantes. Then he read over again what he read before, and cauſed Chriſantes to read it alſo, who no ſooner returned the Paper, which contained this diſmal Anſwer, but Cyrus looking upon him: Come Chriſantes, ſaid he unto him, how can you any ways interpret this which you have ſeen unto my advantage? Sir, replied he, I ſee it is not eaſy to give it a favourable Senſe, yet I do not ſee which way it is poſſible this Misfortune which threatens you, can come to paſs; for this loving Enemy cannot poſſibly be Mandana, it muſt certainly be Thomiris; ſo that as the ſtate of things ſtand, I cannot ſee it is poſſible you ſhould die by her Hand. Yet ſhe is raiſing a puiſſant Army, replied Cyrus; and they ſay Ciaxares had not ſent Madates unto me, but to interpret the Anſwer of that Sybil which Ortalques brought unto me.

I do not underſtand, replied Chriſantes, that you ſhould quit the War in Lydia, where Mandana is, to go and carry the War unto Maſſagetes Country where Thomiris is; or if you ſhould, that after you have conquered ſo many valiant Kings, you can ever be vanquiſhed by a Woman. Nor do I my ſelf underſtand it, anſwered he, but I underſtand plainly that my ruin is inevitable: For indeed Chriſantes, both the Gods of Greece, and the Gods of the Aſſyrians do all preſage nothing but diſmal Deſtinies. The Oracle of Babylon gives Mandana to the King of Aſſyria, the Delphique Oracle promiſes the Empire unto Cræſus, if he purſue the War; and the Helespontique Sybil does promiſe my Head unto the Queen of Maſſagetes. Yet this laſt menace is not the moſt terrible to me, for my Soul is much more troubled for the loſs of Mandana, than for the loſs of my Life: I have hitherto lived in ſuch a manner as well may afford me ſome hopes I ſhall die with Honour, and therefore I fear not the revenge of Thomiris. Let her hate me as long as ſhe pleaſes, let her arm both the Scythians againſt me if ſhe can, my Soul will not tremble at it: But that Mandana, the moſt fair, illuſtrious, divine Mandana ſhould leave loving me, after ſhe hath given me ſome hopes of an inviolable Fidelity; this is moſt intollerable: All my Conſtancy, and all my Reaſon, cannot keep me from Expreſſions of my weakneſs. Were

I but aſſured of Mandana's Heart, I would not care one Pin for all other Misfortunes that can be threatned againſt me : The loſs of ſo many Crowns, as in all Appearances are to fall upon my Head, ſhall not coſt me half a Tear ; though the implacable Thomiris were ready to take off my Head, yet I ſhould rejoyce in the hopes of one Tear from the fair Eyes of my adored Princeſs. But alas, how can I hope for one moment of reſt, conſidering all that hath hapned in one day unto me ? For it is ſo very apparent by the multitude of diſaſterous Adventures which have befallen me in this Journey, that the Gods will overwhelm me with Miſeries, and it were extream folly to retain the leaſt beam of any hope. I come (out of the fantaſtical humour of my Rival) to view the place where I hope to releaſe my illuſtrious Mandana, and in lieu of that I am taken Priſoner my ſelf ; alſo the Prince Artamas, who was my only Supporter in the War, he is alſo taken and wounded : Alſo it is my fortune to ſee the divine Mandana ; but though ſhe releaſed me, yet ſhe keeps my Rival. I had no ſooner got into a place of Safety, but the Oracle of Babylon was brought me, which tells me the Gods intend to make my Rival happy ; immediately after that, I received another from Delphos, which precipitates me from the higheſt top of Glory, into an abyſs of Miſery ; after this, I had hardly breathed, but Madates accoſts me with a freſh diſaſter ; and I had no ſooner heard his Tale, but Ortalques brings me a ſentence of Death pronounced by the famous Heleſpontique Sybil : Judge, Chriſantes, if after all theſe, it is poſſible I ſhould apprehend the leaſt glimpſe of Hope : However Chriſantes, I muſt not merit my Misfortunes, I muſt fight for the liberty of Mandana with as much Courage and Zeal, as if the Gods had not promiſed her unto my Rival. I muſt fight againſt Cræſus with as much Magnanimity, as if the Oracle had not promiſed him the Empire : I muſt alſo carry my ſelf with as much ſerenity of Soul, as if I were not to be the Victim of Thomiris. See Chriſantes (ſaid this grieved Prince) what I ought to do, and what I will do : but I do not know whether I can or no. My Soul is queſtionleſs above all Ambition, and alſo above any fear of Death ; but Love is ſo infinitely predomidominate over my Soul, that I know not whether I can endure the loſs of Mandana, if it ſhould happen unto me: But proud Thomiris, unto whom the Gods have promiſed my Head; though Mandana do prove perfidious; yet you ſhall never triumph over me: For I am ſo aſſured, that my Sorrows for Mandana's inconſtancy will be my Death, that I never need fear the fury of your Hand. After this, Cyrus deſired to put in practiſe thoſe courageous Reſolutions which he had ſet unto himſelf: and therefore commanded Chriſantes not to tell the Anſwer which Ortalques brought unto any, leſt the Souldiers ſhould be diſmaid, and loſe that Confidence which does ſuch Wonders in War. After this, he went unto Tigranes, Phaartes, and the Governor of the Caſtle, with whom he conferred about many things which related unto the War, and to the Prince Artamas: Then taking Horſe the ſame hour with thoſe two Princes, Chriſantes, Soſicles, Artabaſes, Aduſius, Madates, Ortalques and Ligdamis, who would not leave him, he took thoſe hundred and fifty Horſe which he had left near the Caſtle of Hermes, and returned unto the Camp, with a Soul ſo ſunk with Sorrows, that he could not poſſibly all the way he went, rid himſelf one minute from the multitude of theſe diſaſterous Events: So that Mandana a Captive, Mandana perfidious, and the King of Aſſyria happy, were the only Thoughts that took up the Soul of Cyrus, all the way between the Caſtle of Hermes and his own Tent.

THE AUTHOR TO THE READER.

Reader,

I Am now in the midſt of a long Labyrinth of Ten Volumes, which this Book (according to the Model I have framed) is to contain.

This which I here preſent unto you, is the Fifth.

The favourable eye which hath been caſt upon the other four Parts of Grand Cyrus, makes me hope for the ſame Aſpect upon theſe which are to follow. And ſince I have ſpared no pains to ſet them out in ſuch a Dreſs as may pleaſe you, therefore I have ſome reaſon to believe that they will anſwer all my labour.

If any one be not ſo well verſed in Hiſtory, as to be acquainted with the Ring of Giges, which I make uſe of in my Book, let him know, That it is Zenophon, Diodorus Siculus, and others, who mention it in their Writings; and that it is Arioſto who borrowed this precious Jewel from them.

Let them alſo know, that it is too much obſerved in their Books to be omitted in mine; and alſo ſince Cicero in his Offices hath attributed ſuch tranſcendent Excellencies unto it.

This is all, Reader, that I have to ſay, only this; that the reſt of the Parts will ſhortly follow.

Cyrus the Great.

PART V. BOOK I.

CYrus was no ſooner come to the Camp, but he bethought himſelf how to comfort up the King of Phrygia, with all imaginable conſolations, after the impriſonment of the Prince Artamas; and to that end, without any ſtay at his own Tent, he went immediately unto that of the ſad Father, to acquaint him with all the particulars of the bad ſucceſs in his Enterprize, and to aſſure him, that he would neglect no poſſible opportunities which might regain the liberty of his Son. Sir, (ſaid that generous Prince, and interrupted him in his talk) had he loſt his liberty in releaſing the Princeſs Mandana, the miſfortune had not ſo much moved me: But I do confeſs, that ſince I ſee his endeavours conduce not to your ſervice, I ſtand in need of ſome conſolation; it grieves me to ſee him in a condition ſo far from being able to pay that debt of ſervices which he owes you, that he is like to periſh, unleſs you become his Liberator: I cannot imagine (replied Cyrus) that our Armies are ſo inconſiderable in the King of Lydia's eſteem, as that he dare offer any violence unto any Prince who is ingaged in our quarrel, to a Prince unto whom he is a debtor for many Victories; he cannot be ignorant, that Kings are obliged by the Laws of gratitude, as well as other men; and that by how much their degree is elevated above the Sphere of Subjects, by ſo much is the ſin of ingratitude more horrid in them; therefore let not any fears of any violence from Crœſſus unto the Prince Artamas diſturb the ſerenity of your Soul. Moreover, without all doubt, the King of Suſiana, and the King of Pontus will be his Mediators and Protectors; for they being men of Generoſity, will moſt certainly oblige Crœſſus to be no more rigorous unto the Priſoners which he hath taken, than I am unto the Queen Panthea, and the Princeſs Araminta. However, ſince there is no diſcretion in truſting too much unto the generoſity of Enemies, I will to morrow diſpatch an Envoy unto Crœſſus, to let him know what intereſt I have in the perſon of the Prince your Son: I will alſo move the two Princeſſes, which I named before, to write ſome Letters in his favour; and my earneſt endeavours ſhall tell you how much I eſteem his perſon, and how dear his intereſts are unto me. The King of Phrygia expreſſed abundance of thanks unto Cyrus for his indulgency towards him, and took the ſad diſaſter with a magnanimous conſtancy. Cyrus thought it no diſcretion to tell him that the Prince Artamas was much wounded: as well becauſe he would not oppreſs him with too great a load of ſorrows at one time, as becauſe he was in hopes to hear ſome happy news of his recovery. After this, he retired into his Tent, where common Civility obliged him to ſpend an hour or two with the Commanders of his Army who came to ſee him; and after that, he allowed another hour in diſpenſing requiſite Orders in his Martial matters: after which, retiring himſelf in private, with none but Chriſantes, he ſpent the reſt of the night in contemplation of his great misfortunes, and the multitude of his miſeries: And though the conſideration of them did moſt ſenſibly grieve him, yet did they not at all blunt his courage; but on the contrary, the more miſerable he perceived himſelf, the more did he rouze up his Soul to oppoſe the malignity of his Fate; and although he had a heart which was moſt tender and ſenſible, yet was it ever firm and unſhaken. This advantage he had, that he was ſenſible of no miſeries, but ſuch only as Love brought upon him; as for any others, his Soul was ſeated ſo infinitely above them all, or any thing that could hap, that they never reached him, or if they did, it was but weakly. He had been a Priſoner, and fallen from the top of happineſs into an abyſs of miſery; but ſince he was not guilty of any crime, he ſtood not in need of all his Vertues to ſupport him: Death it ſelf, how terrible ſoever, could never ſtagger his Soul, though he had a hundred and hundred times been ſo near it, that he had reaſon to believe himſelf ſwallowed up by it: But as his Soul was as conſtant as any Rock againſt the rigorous ſurges of Fortune, ſo was it alſo moſt tender, and ſo ſenſible, that it could not endure without unconceivable ſorrow, all thoſe torments which Love brought upon him. This Prince, who queſtionleſs could loſe Crowns and Scepters without any alteration of countenance, could not think upon the loſs of Mandana without ſuch trembling of heart, as all his Reaſon could not maſter. He ſpent a great part of the night in talk with Chriſantes, but at laſt, being more deſirous to allow ſome reſt unto a man whom he loved, than to take any unto himſelf, he diſmiſſed him, and lamented his misfortunes unto himſelf, until very wearineſs did inſenſibly againſt his will caſt him aſleep, and gave ſome reſpite unto his reſtleſs thoughts. 'Tis true, this Truce laſted not long, for he awaked by break of day; he forgot not the leaſt circumſtance of his promiſe unto the King of Phrygia; ſo that caſting his thoughts upon Aglatidas for an Envoy to Crœſſus, he cauſed him to be ſent for unto him; and appointing him a Herald to conduct him unto Sardis, he commanded him to follow after him unto the place where the Queen of Suſiana and the Princeſs Araminta lodged, to the end, that when he had obtained his deſires from them, he might there give him his laſt Inſtructions. He took horſe then immediately, and a very ſmall Train followed him, becauſe he deſired it ſhould be ſo: He arrived at the Queen of Suſiana's Lodging, whom Araſpes ſaid was ready, and might be ſeen: Indeed that Princeſs was then newly returned from the Temple, which every morning ſhe frequented, becauſe her reſtleſs thoughts would not give her leave to ſleep much. When ſhe knew what had happened unto Cyrus, ſhe was extremely ſorry for him, and for her ſelf alſo; For truly, Sir, (ſaid ſhe unto him) If the Gods would have permitted you to have releaſed Mandana, moſt certainly you would have kept your promiſe, and all Wars being at an end, I ſhould have been in hopes to have ſeen my dear Abradates, and have ſeen him your friend, ſince being ſo generous as he is, I am very certain, that when he knew how you have treated me, it would have moſt ſenſibly wrought upon him. However, Madam, (replied Cyrus) It is in your power to do me a very good office, until it ſhall pleaſe Fate to be weary of perſecuting me. Alas, Sir, (replied Panthea) Is it poſſible, conſidering my condition, that I ſhould be able to do any thing which can teſtifie my reſentments of all your favours to me? Doubtleſs you are, anſwered he, if you will be pleaſed to take ſo much pains as to write a word unto the valiant Abradates, and deſire him to move Crœſſus not to treat the Prince Artamas too hardly, and to uſe all the other Priſoners, which he took in this ſad Adventure, very well; for I make no queſtion but he will conſent unto whatever you ſhall deſire: I do not tell you, Madam, that according as he ſhall do unto them, you ſhall be better or worſe treated; but on the contrary, to induce you unto a more obliging Letter, that though he ſhall deny what I deſire, yet I will never fail in thoſe Duties which I owe unto your Quality and Vertue, and that by my conſent you ſhall never receive the leaſt diſtaſte. Your expreſſions are ſo full of Generoſity (replied ſhe) that I were moſt unworthy of your Protection, if I did not uſe the utmoſt of my power for your ſatisfaction, eſpecially ſince your demands are only ſuch as equity it ſelf ought to inforce from me. After that Cyrus had returned ſome thankful Language, he told her, that he would leave her at liberty to write, and go to addreſs the ſame deſires unto the Princeſs Araminta to the King her Brother. He found her no leſs diſpoſed to grant him a Letter unto the King of Pontus, than Panthea unto the King of Suſiana : She thought her ſelf ſomething intereſted in it, for the perſon of Anaxaris was now very precious in her thoughts; ſince ſhe underſtood he had ſaved the life of Spitridates, inſomuch as ſhe told Cyrus, that he was not at all beholding unto her for writing in favour of thoſe Priſoners, ſince there was one amongſt them unto whom ſhe was ſo much obliged. When Cyrus had ſtayed as long with her as he thought Panthea might be in writing her Letters, he left Araminta, to give her the ſame liberty, and returned to the Queen of Suſiana's Chamber, who would needs ſhew him the Letter which ſhe had writ unto her Husband. He did a long time refuſe to ſee it, teſtifying a compleat confidence in her : But ſince ſhe would needs have him underſtand it, ſhe began to read aloud what ſhe had writ : Theſe were the words.

Panthea unto her dear Abradates.

SIR,

WHen I ſhall relate unto you all the miſeries of my Captivity, I have nothing to ſay that troubles me, but the deprivation of your ſelf : Queſtionleſs, it troubles you to be an Enemy unto ſuch a Prince, as knows ſo well how to uſe a Victory, and who renders me as much reſpect in his own Camp, as I was wont to receive at Suſa when I was there : Wonder not then, if I intreat you to become a Mediator and a Patron unto all the Priſoners which Crœſſus hath, or ſhall hereafter take, eſpecially unto the Prince Artamas, who is infinitely dear unto the illuſtrious Cyrus. I do not intimate, that you may do him moſt acceptable offices in the Perſon of the Princeſs Mandana ; for you may judge by thoſe which he doth unto me, how he will reſent thoſe which you do unto him : I ſay thoſe good offices which you do unto him, becauſe I queſtion not but you will repay

repay that debt which I owe unto this generous Conquerour. However, let me aſſure you, that notwithſtanding all his favours and goodneſs to me, I muſt needs think my ſelf the moſt unfortunate woman in the world, as long as I am ſeparated from my dear Abradates.

PANTHEA.

This Princeſs had no ſooner done reading this Letter, but Cyrus rendred her a million of thanks; and as he was ready to take his leave, the Princeſs Araminta comes in, and brings hers, which was no leſs obliging than the other; needs would ſhe have him ſee it before ſhe ſealed it; ſo that after he asked the Queen of Suſiana's leave, he read theſe words.

The Princeſs Araminta unto the King of Pontus.

Since I know what thoughts you entertain of the invincible Cyrus, I know you will be very glad to underſtand, that you may moſt ſenſibly oblige him in behalf of the Prince Artamas, whom I beſeech you to patronize and protect; for I doubt not, but that in all things which relates not unto your Love, you will be ready to do him all poſſible good offices. I thought it my duty to give you this advice, and to conjure you for my own ſake, to take eſpecial care of one Priſoner, whoſe name is Anaxaris, unto whom I am a debtor for the life of the Prince Spitridates. I thought it alſo convenient to tell you, that ſince our laſt meeting, when I could not obtain my deſires of you, the Illuſtrious Cyrus hath not altered his courſe of treating me moſt civilly, and that the bad ſucceſs of my negotiation has not made him more rigorous: Be therefore, I beſeech you, a prevalent Defender of all the Priſoners which the King of Lydia took, eſpecially thoſe whom I named, if my prayers have any prevalency with you, or if you value the friendſhip of unfortunate

ARAMINTA.

I wiſh unto the Gods (ſaid Cyrus after the reading of the Letter) that it were permitted me to reſtore unto you your abſolute Liberty, thereby to teſtifie my acknowledgments unto you both, but I hope I ſhall not die without that ſatisfaction. In the mean time, ſince I muſt loſe no time, I beſeech you give me leave to go and diſpatch Aglatidas; and then, after that theſe Princeſſes had returned anſwers unto his Civilities, he went out, but without taking any leave, becauſe he intended to dine there: Then did he give full Inſtructions unto Aglatidas, as well what to do in behalf of the Priſoners, as to enquire concerning the Princeſs Mandana: He did alſo hint unto him to have a moſt tender care of Feraulas; then going unto the Chamber of Araſpes, who ſeemed always to be extremely melancholy; he writ unto Crœſſus in theſe words.

Cyrus unto the King of Lydia.

Though I doubt not of your Generoſity, in uſing thoſe Priſoners well, whom the Fate of War has brought into your hands; yet I muſt needs write unto you in behalf of thoſe Priſoners which one of your Lieutenant Generals did take near the River of Hermes, eſpecially for the Prince Artamas. Conſider, I pray you, that he ought not to be treated as a Priſoner of State, but only as a Priſoner of War, with whom you ought to deal according to the Laws of Generoſity and Juſtice, both in treating him moſt kindly and civilly; his quality, his vertue, and the ſervices which he hath done you, oblige you unto it. If this be not ſufficient to induce you thereunto, let me add further, That I have not hitherto been ſo unfortunate, but that I have a good ground of hope before the War be ended, to retaliate civility for civility; tranſact then the matter more juſtly for my friends, than you have equitably for the Princeſs Mandana; you may put an end unto the War, whenſoever you ſhall pleaſe to reſtore her unto the King her Father, and be aſſured, that when you do ſo, I ſhall as zealouſly fight then for your Intereſt, as now I do for hers.

As ſoon as Cyrus had writ this Letter, he gave it unto Aglatidas: he enjoyned him alſo to inquire whether the King of Aſſyria had ſeen Mandana, and to negotiate in his behalf, as well as for the other Priſoners: Not but that it is a piece of difficulty, ſaid he, to be ſo officious for a Rival: yet ſince my word is ingaged, and generoſity exacts it, I muſt needs do it. He put him in mind alſo of the ſtranger Anaxaris, of Soſicles, and of Tegeus, and he was juſt ready to diſmiſs him, when Ligdamis, who followed Cyrus, to the end he might have a ſight of his dear Cleonice, came unto him, and told him, that ſince he underſtood Aglatidas was preparing for Sardis, he thought it his duty to acquaint him with ſome things there, which happily might be advantageous to him. Cyrus both thanked and embraced him, and told him, that it appertained unto ſuch a man only as was deep in Love, to have compaſſion of another Lover. Then conjuring him to be as good as his word, to the end Aglatidas might more eaſily meet with exact intelligence, concerning Mandana, Ligdamis in order thereunto, gave him a Letter to be delivered unto a friend of his in this Lydian Court, unto whom he might ſafely intruſt himſelf, eſpecially ſince the tranſaction was a good office to the intereſts of the Lydian King. Then after Cyrus had ſeen the Letter which Aglatidas was to carry, and had once again repeated the moſt important matters which he was to negotiate, bidding him endeavour to ſee the Prince Artamas, he diſmiſſed him, and ſtayed ſtill in the Chamber of Araſpes, without any other company than Ligdamis, whoſe converſation did infinitely pleaſe him, although there be a vaſt difference between a happy Lover, and an unfortunate: Yet Ligdamis had a Soul ſo tender and complaiſant, and did ſo ſcrew himſelf into the opinion of Cyrus, that his company was a great comfort unto him. This Prince did principally intend to ſpend part of that day in this Caſtle, becauſe it was full of ſuch perſons as were poſſeſſed with the ſame paſſions that took up his own heart. He knew Panthea loved Abradates, that Araminta loved Spitridates, and that Ligdamis mis and Cleonice loved moſt extremely: So that finding ſome ſweetneſs in condoling with thoſe that ſympathized with him in the ſame miſeries, he reſolved not only to dine there, but to ſpend the reſt of the day there alſo. Mean while, becauſe he would not loſe any time, he ſent Chriſantes with divers Orders to the Army, to viſit the Works which he was there making in a Quarter, not above fifty furlongs from thence. As ſoon as Cyrus heard that the Princeſſes were ready, he went to ſee them: for his part, he had dined in private at the Chamber of Araſpes, without any other company but Ligdamis, whom he carried along with him in this Viſit: So that the Converſation conſiſted of the Queen of Suſiana, the Princeſs Araminta; of Cleonice, Iſmenia, of Cyrus, Ligdamis and Araſpes. As ſoon as each one had placed themſelves, Cyrus turning towards the Queen of Suſiana, beſeeched her to pardon him for coming thither, to ſeek for ſome comforts in his miſeries. Sir, anſwered that diſcreet Princeſs, if my miſeries can afford you any eaſe in yours, I ſhall endure them with much more patience than I have done. No, Madam, ſaid he, I came not to ſee you to that end, but becauſe I thought you all goodneſs, and full of pity: Moſt men I meet with do think, that becauſe I am not unfortunate in matters of War, I cannot be unfortunate in any thing elſe: Indeed they think Love to be but an imaginary Paſſion, a Chimera, which reigns only in the Fancy, and never diſturbs the rational parts: Whatſoever I ſay, they believe that the loſs of one Battel does trouble me more than the loſs of my divine Mandana; though moſt certainly, the loſs of a hundred Battels, and as many Crowns to boot, does not comparably trouble me ſo much as one hours ſeparation from that Angelique Princeſs: Imagine then, I beſeech you, Madam, what a vexatious life it is, to be perpetually amongſt a company of men who are ignorant of my ſenſibilities; and judge alſo how pleaſant it is to me to be amongſt ſuch as are compoſed all of tenderneſs and compaſſion: yet muſt I needs except Araſpes from the number of ſuch, becauſe his Soul ſeem'd always moſt inſenſible; but ſince Ligdamis became a Convert, I will not deſpair of him, but on the contrary, knowing the tenderneſs of his affection towards my ſelf, I am perſwaded it is no impoſſibility, but hereafter he may fall in Love with ſome excellent Beauty or other. Araſpes bluſht at this diſcourſe: but Cyrus taking no great notice of the alteration in his face, the diſcourſe went on; and the Princeſs Araminta, addreſſing her ſelf to Cyrus, For my part, ſaid ſhe, I am of your opinion; but as for the Queen, if ſhe do not contradict you, certainly it is out of her complaiſance; for ſhe has ſeveral times told me, that ſhe never found any great comfort either in pitying or being pitied; and indeed, ſhe does ſo cloſely lock up her ſorrows in her own heart, that ſhe never ſpeaks the firſt: But, I who am nothing of her humour, have related all my misfortunes unto her; and not a day paſſeth but I am diſcourſing of them. It is very true, replied Panthea, I do not much care for talking of any thing which concerns my ſelf; I never think of things paſt; the future is it which engroſſeth all my Soul: methinks I have ſo little enjoyed my ſelf in any thing which hath happened unto me this three or four year, that it is much better for me to think only of what is to come. Things future are ſo full of obſcurity (replied the Princeſs Araminta) that I am ſo far from thinking of them, that I baniſh them my thoughts, leſt I ſhould forge ſuch miſeries unto my ſelf, as Fortune perhaps never thought on. Gladly would I do as you ſay, replied Cyrus, but I find it impoſſible. For my part, ſaid Panthea, ſince fear and hope are two paſſions which divide all my Soul between them, and that I find nothing either to hope for or fear in things already paſt, I cannot reſt my mind upon them. Yet is it much better, replied Cyrus, to have a heart divided between hopes and fears; for I do know ſome who ſtand in fear of every thing, and hope for nothing. Since the Vertue is ſo great, and the Gods ſo juſt, replied Panthea, it would be an injury unto them to deſpair of your good Fortune. Since you are no happy, replyed Cyrus, and ſince the Princeſs Araminta is unfortunate, it were preſumption to be over confident of that little virtue which I own: We ſee, Madam, there are ſome things which ſeem juſt in the eyes of Men, which are not ſo in the ſight of the Gods: for truly, it muſt needs be acknowledged, that the King of Aſſyria, the King of Pontus, and the Prince Mazares, who died near Sinope, were three Princes who could be taxed with no Crime, but that of over-loving Mandana, yet we ſee how that Princeſs, who is virtue in the abſtract, hath cauſed all the miſeries of their lives and mine: Mazares loſt his Life, the King of Pontus his Throne and Liberty, the King of Aſſyria his Crown and Liberty alſo: After all this, Madam, what ſhould we think of the future? muſt it not needs be concluded, that whoſoever never thinks of it, is certainly moſt wiſe? But yet I muſt confeſs to my ſhame, that I cannot chuſe but foreſee the miſeries which ought to befall me. It is much better therefore, replyed the Princeſs Araminta, to apply ones ſelf to the memory of things paſt. If they be delighting, replyed Panthea, to think that they are not ſtill enjoyed, is vexatious. If they be diſaſterous and irkſome, replyed Araminta, the thoughts of them now are pleaſing, becauſe they are paſt: For my part, when I remember the condition I was in when I was at Cabira, and when the Coward Artanus kept me there, methinks, that ſince I am come out of his rude Captivity, I may well hope to come out of one more pleaſant: And for my part, ſaid Panthea, when I remember how happy I was at Suſa, after I had overcome all thoſe obſtacles which oppoſed my happineſs, I do not think it poſſible ever to be in the ſame condition; and therefore I ſtrive as much as I can to forget thoſe things, the memory of which does but the more trouble me: However, you have promiſed me, replyed Araminta, to acquaint me with all the Joyes and Miſeries of your Life, as I have acquainted you with mine. Indeed I did conſent (anſwered ſhe) that Pherenice ſhould acquaint you, and therefore your curioſity ſhall be ſatisfied without reviving ſuch things in my memory, as I wiſh I could quite eradicate: Why then (ſaid Cyrus, and addreſſed himſelf to the Princeſs Araminta) do you not urge the promiſe? Sir, replyed ſhe, till now, I have not had the opportunity, for it was but this Morning at our return from the Temple, that the Queen did make this promiſe: Then it is fit I ſhould abſent my ſelf, replyed Cyrus, leſt I ſhould hinder you from what you deſire, for indeed I dare not preſume to ask the favour, not but that I have a great deſire to hear the paſſion of the illuſtrious Abradates diſcourſed of, that I might compare his with my own; but I know the duty which I owe unto a great Princeſs, and therefore will not be too preſſing, to know her ſecrets. Truly, Sir, (replyed Panthea with a modeſt ſmile) I am not very free in imparting them, yet I am moſt willing you ſhould know the whole ſtory of my life; and it does in ſome ſort concern me, that you be acquainted with that innocent paſſion which yet poſſeſſeth the heart of Abradates and my own; therefore when you have any hours of leiſure, Sir, ſhe who was appointed to ſatisfie the curioſity of the Princeſs Araminta, ſhall ſatisfie yours alſo. Methinks, Madam, replyed that Princeſs, that without the expence of any more time in talk of things indifferent, it could not be better imployed than in ſatisfying the deſires of the illuſtrious Cyrus and my ſelf. Since it is my reſolution to do any thing which ſhall pleaſe you (anſwered Panthea) you may imploy the time as you pleaſe, provided I be not preſent. Then the Princeſs Araminta riſing up, ſaid, that ſhe would carry Cyrus into her Chamber, who without any further oppoſition, preſented his hand to conduct her thither. Panthea did bluſh as much at their ſalutes, as if ſome crime which ſhe had committed were going to be related: But conſidering ſeriouſly, it would be advantageous unto her, that Cyrus were better acquainted with the virtue of Abradates, ſhe ſent her Woman, who was to relate the ſtory of her Life, with the Princeſs Araminta; ſhe was one of good Quality and Wit, and who had always been a Confident of her ſecrets. In the mean while, Cleonice and Iſmeni ſtayed with Panthea, unto whom Araſpes and Ligdamis, after they had accompanied Cyrus to the chamber of Araminta, returned. Araminta being conducted by this Prince, and followed by Pherenice and Heſionida, ſhe was no ſooner in her chamber, but deſiring Cyrus to ſit down, and placing Pherenice over againſt her, ſhe deſired her to begin the ſtory, and not to conceal from them the leaſt thought of Panthea and Abradates : After Pherenice had in a complement deſired pardon unto her deficiency, to make ſuch a relation, ſhe began thus.

The Hiſtory of Abradates and of Panthea.

THe honour which I have had to be educated with the Queen of Suſiana, and the happineſs which I have had to be ever loved of her, enables me without any difficulty to let you know all the particulars of her life, the beginning of which was much freer from diſaſterous adventures than was the ſequel. I ſhall not need, Madam, to ſpeak of her high Birth, for you know, that the Prince of Claſomena her Father was of an Extraction ſo Illuſtrious, that the blood of Crœſſus was not more: The Princeſs her Mother was alſo deſcended from a great Houſe, but ſhe loſt her ſo young, that ſhe cannot remember ſhe ever ſaw her ; 'tis true, that this Princeſs was educated by one that was Siſter unto the Prince her Father, and lived with him, under whom ſhe was as well educated as ſhe could hope to be under the Princeſs her Mother. Baſelina (for ſo was the Siſter unto the Prince of Claſomena called) was a Lady of a high Spirit, and great virtue, who, ſince ſhe had loſt her Husband when ſhe was very young, would never marry again: She had been Fair and Courtly; and though ſhe was as compleat in all Virtue as any Lady of her quality was capable of, yet was ſhe not of the too too auſtere Sect: She would ſay, that one muſt be young once in their life, and it was much better to be of a young diſpoſition at fifteen than at fifty ; ſo that the Prince her Brother wholly referring the Education of his Daughter unto her, ſhe allowed her an honeſt freedom, dom, without any rigid hand of ſeverity over her; which courſe did produce in her a more early and riper Wit than others of her Age were accuſtomed to have; ſo that at twelve years of Age the Princeſs of Claſomena did behave her ſelf with as much diſcretion and judgment, as if ſhe had been compleatly twenty: As for her Beauty, I need not enter into any Elogies of it, ſince you may very well conclude what it was by what it is; yet let me ſay thus much, that her Beauty did at the very firſt appear, and ſhe was moſt admirably fair from her very Cradle; her diſpoſition, though ſomething ſerious, yet was ever complaiſant and ſweet; ſo that joyning a perfect goodneſs unto one of the pureſt Wits upon Earth, and unto one of the greateſt Beauties of all Lidia; it may eaſily be imagined that the Princeſs of Claſomena did attract the admiration of all the World. Some glimpſe of her Beauty and Wit did ſparkle throughout all the Town; for in her paſſage from Infancy to the age of Reaſon, indulgent cares to pleaſe her made all the Women amiable and the Men compleat: Being both handſome and free, ſhe was adored by all that came near her, and all thoſe alſo who heard of thoſe rare qualities wherewith ſhe was adorned; ſo that the fame of this Princeſs did in a very ſhort time ſpread over all thoſe Provinces which bordered upon that over which her Father was Soveraign. Cleonice, whom you ſee here may eaſily induce you to imagine, that ſhe was not amiable only in Claſomena; for the truth is, all Strangers ſtayed there with abundance of delight, and did confeſs, there was not ſo much Wit and Politeneſs to be found in any Town of all Aſia as in that. Reſidence in Claſomena became more delightful a little while after Cleonice went to dwell at Epheſus, becauſe then many Strangers of great quality came thither, and ſtay'd a long while; amongſt which, ſome were moſt compleat Men, who made Society moſt dilectable, and took away from Claſomena that defect which was found in all the Provinces and petty Courts there, which was, that every day none but the ſame faces were to be ſeen. One thing did ſometimes much perplex the Princeſs Baſelina, which was, that there was not one Man in all the Principality of her Brother who was a fit match for her Niece; ſo that all thoſe who ſaw her, were ſuch as durſt only admire her, or at the leaſt durſt not expreſs any other thoughts. Amongſt all the compleat Gallants in Claſomena, there was one, whoſe name was Perinthus, being older than Panthea ſome five or ſix years, who devoted himſelf unto the Prince, and who did ſo much obtain his likeing, that he would never be without him; his Father ſpent all his days in the Princes houſe, and alſo died in the ſervice of his Maſter. It muſt needs be confeſſed, that Perinthus ſtood not in need of any commendums, for his Perſon was very handſom, and his Wit charming, ſo that it was impoſſible to deny him favour, to be a very compleat Man as he was; he had one odd quality, which was, that he never contracted any intimate friendſhip with any one in particular; he held fair with every one, but he opened not his heart unto any; he would ſometimes ſay, when he was chid for ſo doing, that he gloried in hiding his moſt ſecret thoughts, even from his beſt Friends: However, he was very well beloved; thoſe who were frequently with him, would truſt him with their buſineſs of greateſt importance, as well becauſe he had great abilities to give good advice, as becauſe he was a Man of exact Honeſty, and incorruptible Fidelity: Thus without diſcovering his own heart unto any, he ſaw into the hearts of many Men: Per'inthus was handſome, and of a good behaviour, of a pleaſant converſation, and without being either too ſerious or too free, did equally ſort with all manner of humours, and people of what quality ſoever; and indeed, as the Prince of Claſomena loved him moſt dearly, ſo the Princeſs Baſelina loved him no leſs. Panthea alſo eſteemed him as much as his deſires could wiſh, all my Companions did moſt tenderly affect him; all the Ladies of the Town did the dom, without any rigid hand of ſeverity over her, which courſe did produce in her a more early and riper Wit than others of her Age were accuſtomed to have; ſo that at twelve years of Age the Princeſs of Claſomena did behave her ſelf with as much diſcretion and judgment, as if ſhe had been compleatly twenty: As for her Beauty, I need not enter into any Elogies of it, ſince you may very well conclude what it was by what it is; yet let me ſay thus much, that her Beauty did at the very firſt appear, and ſhe was moſt admirably fair from her very Cradle; her diſpoſition, though ſomething ſerious, yet was ever complaiſant and ſweet; ſo that joyning a perfect goodneſs unto one of the pureſt Wits upon Earth, and unto one of the greateſt Beauties of all Lidia; it may eaſily be imagined that the Princeſs of Claſomena did attract the admiration of all the World. Some glimpſe of her Beauty and Wit did ſparkle throughout all the Town; for in her paſſage from Infancy to the age of Reaſon, indulgent cares to pleaſe her made all the Women amiable, and the Men compleat: Being both handſome and free, ſhe was adored by all that came near her, and all thoſe alſo who heard of thoſe rare qualities wherewith ſhe was adorned; ſo that the fame of this Princeſs did in a very ſhort time ſpread over all thoſe Provinces which bordered upon that over which her Father was Soveraign. Cleonice, whom you ſee here may eaſily induce you to imagine, that ſhe was not amiable only in Claſomena; for the truth is, all Strangers ſtayed there with abundance of delight, and did confeſs, there was not ſo much Wit and Politeneſs to be found in any Town of all Aſia, as in that. Reſidence in Claſomena became more delightful a little while after Cleonice went to dwell at Epheſus, becauſe then many Strangers of great quality came thither, and ſtay'd a long while; amongſt which, ſome were moſt compleat Men, who made Society moſt dilectable, and took away from Claſomena that defect which was found in all the Provinces and petty Courts there, which was, that every ry day none but the ſame faces were to be ſeen. One thing did ſometimes much perplex the Princeſs Baſelina, which was, that there was not one Man in all the Principality of her Brother who was a fit match for her Niece; ſo that all thoſe who ſaw her, were ſuch as durſt only admire her, or at the leaſt durſt not expreſs any other thoughts. Amongſt all the compleat Gallants in Claſomena, there was one, whoſe name was Perinthus, being older than Panthea ſome five or ſix years, who devoted himſelf unto the Prince, and who did ſo much obtain his likeing, that he would never be without him; his Father ſpent all his days in the Princes houſe, and alſo died in the ſervice of his Maſter. It muſt needs be confeſſed, that Perinthus ſtood not in need of any commendums, for his Perſon was very handſom, and his Wit charming, ſo that it was impoſſible to deny him favour, to be a very compleat Man as he was; he had one odd quality, which was, that he never contracted any intimate friendſhip with any one in particular; he held fair with every one, but he opened not his heart unto any; he would ſometimes ſay, when he was chid for ſo doing, that he gloried in hiding his moſt ſecret thoughts, even from his beſt Friends: However, he was very well beloved; thoſe who were frequently with him, would truſt him with their buſineſs of greateſt importance, as well becauſe he had great abilities to give good advice, as becauſe he was a Man of exact Honeſty, and incorruptible Fidelity: Thus without diſcovering his own heart unto any, he ſaw into the hearts of many Men: Per'inthus was handſome, and of a good behaviour, of a pleaſant converſation, and without being either too ſerious or too free, did equally ſort with all manner of humours, and people of what quality ſoever; and indeed, as the Prince of Claſomena loved him moſt dearly, ſo the Princeſs Baſelina loved him no leſs. Panthea alſo eſteemed him as much as his deſires could wiſh, all my Companions did moſt tenderly affect him; all the Ladies of the Town did the ſame: And indeed Perinthus had been the moſt happy Man alive of his quality, had he not entertained a ſecret Enemy in his heart, which troubled all his joys, and rendred him as unfortunate as he ſeemed happy unto all thoſe that knew him. For, Madam, to the better underſtanding the ſequel of this Hiſtory, be pleas'd to know, that Perinthus did fix his love upon the Princeſs of Claſomena, above the capacity of his heart; but yet his love was ſo reſpective, ſo prudent, and ſo violent altogether, that he was never heard to utter one ſyllable of any ſuch paſſion: He has told me ſince (when by the conſequence of things which ſince fell out, he was forced to confeſs the truth) that as ſoon as he perceived this predominate paſſion, which he could not maſter, to be in his Soul, and from which he could never hope for the leaſt ſatisfaction, he reſolutely determined to contract no intimate friendſhip, neither with any Man, nor any Lady, leſt it ſhould ſo fall out, that through weakneſs, he ſhould diſcover unto all the World that which he deſired to keep a ſecret. He has alſo told me, that he was ſo perfectly acquainted with the folly of loving, ſo diſproportionable to his own quality, that he durſt never ſo much as think of letting her know he loved her: For ſince the virtue of Panthea began to appear in luſtre, and to dazle his eyes, he has ſworn a hundred times unto me, that after many years of Service and Love, he never enjoyed one minute of any hope; however, he ſtruggled with his paſſion, yet not knowing why, or to what end he ſhould either oppoſe or cheriſh it: Still he loved the Princeſs, but in ſuch a ſecret manner, and with ſo much reverence, that there was not one in all Claſomena as long as we were there, no not the Princeſs herſelf, which could have the leaſt ſuſpicion of it; and truly, to ſpeak the very truth, although Perinthus was deſcended of a very Noble Family, yet there was ſuch a vaſt difference between him and her, that it is no wonder that none ſhould ſuſpect any ſuch thing; all humble reſpects were but his luty by Birth, and it was an eaſie matter to umbrage his real thoughts under that, when he every lay did render her a thouſand agreeable ſervices: However, conſidering with himſelf, that he could never pretend unto any of her affection, no, nor ſo much as acquaint her with his; he limited his deſires to obtain her eſteem: And being deſirous to purchaſe ſome glory in the Wars, he went thither where the illuſtrious Cleander, now Prince Artamas, was in Myſia, where he performed ſuch admirable acts, that if there were not a ſecret Load-ſtone which drew his heart unto Claſomena, he might well have raiſed himſelf unto a great Fortune, under this generous Favourite. In the end, he returned loaded with Honours unto the Prince his Maſter, who made him extream welcome at his return. The Princeſs alſo received him very well, and queſtionleſs Perinthus had this conſolation amidſt his miſeries, that he was arriv'd unto ſuch a point as he deſir'd to e. This, Madam, is the deſcription of Perinthus, o wit, the moſt diſcreet, but the moſt unhappy over in the World; and this was the ſtate of his paſſion, when the Prince of Claſomena took his reſolution to go and dwell at Sardis, and to carry thither with him the Princeſs his Daughter, with intentions not to return until he had beſtowed her in Marriage. As he was a Tributary unto Crœſſus, and had been at a Treaty, by which the Princes of Clamena were obliged to live the half year at Sardis; fter a long abſence from thence, under ſeveral preences and excuſes, he reſolved to go thither, and iſcharge the duty; and the rather, becauſe he ſaw nto what a heighth the valour of Cleander had raiſd the Authority Royal; therefore he yielded obedince by fair means, rather than to draw a War upn his Country, and be compelled unto it by force. ardis being at that time in her higheſt luſtre, the hole Train of the Prince and Princeſs were very lad of the journey, except Perinthus, who fretted at t in ſecret, by reaſon of ſome reſentments proceeding from his love. Hitherto he had this advantage, that he ſaw none make any attempts of ſervice u on Panthea, becauſe, as I told you before, the was not one Man in all the Principality of Claſomen who could pretend Marriage: But when he con

when I obſerved, notwithſtanding all his diſgu

Gallants in that place unto which we are going w

this diſcourſe we parted, and every one prepar

this journey, for ſhe had ſome Controverſies, a

with the Prince her Father. I ſhall not relate unto you, Madam, how ſhe was received by Crœſſus, by the Prince Atis, by the Prince Myrſilles, by the Princeſs Palmis, by Antaleon, by Mexaris, by Arteſilas, and by the illuſtrious Cleander: But I ſhall employ the time better in relating things more neceſſary to the Story. Let it ſuffice that I tell you only in general, that they rendred unto the Prince and Princeſs all the honours that was due unto their Quality and Merit: The Princeſs Palmis, and the Princeſs of Claſomena did at the firſt contract a great league of amity, and though they were both of them fair enough to beget envy in the hearts of each other, yet the leaſt ſpark of it did not appear: Their Souls were certainly of a far higher and more noble temper than to be capable of any thoughts ſo baſe: But love they did, and that with all ſincerity, though to ſpeak the very truth of things, they did never enter into any ſuch deep confidence of each other as to impart the ſecrets of their lives, not but that they had ſufficient eſteem of each other for it; but ſince Celeniſa had engroſſed all the confidence of the Princeſs Palmis, I alſo had the happineſs to enjoy that of the Princeſs Panthea. The truth is, her ſecrets at that time were of ſmall importance, however, I was much obliged to her for her imparting her real thoughts of things unto me, which ſhe never did before the reſt of my Companions. I make no queſtion, Madam, but you are acquainted with that contrariety of humours that is between the King of Lydia and his Brothers, and therefore I need but hint unto your memory that the Prince Antaleon was moſt violently ambitious, one that would ruine all ſo he could but Reign; and that Mexaris was as covetous as Crœſſus was liberal, though Mexaris in riches was not inferiour to him: And certainly this vice did never appear ſo ſtrange in any as in this Prince, as you will ſee by the ſequel of this Diſcourſe: However, he was capable of one paſſion, one of whoſe noble effects was to produce Liberality. I am verily perſwaded, Mexaris thought that in matter of Love, it was enough to give his heart, and that's the reaſon he never offered to ſtifle th paſſion which the Beauty of Panthea did inſpire in his Soul: But his only thoughts were to obtain th affection of the Princeſs, without any conditions charge unto himſelf, and therefore he never offer to hinder his growing paſſion, but loved her as mu as his Soul was capable of loving. This fire for a whi was cloſely ſmothered up in ſecreſie, and in the interi

the Princeſs was viſited and courted by all the gre and illuſtrious Gallants of Sardis. Amongſt the nu ber of thoſe who came to ſee her, there was one, who name was Doraliſa, of good quality, who did infinit
ly pleaſe her; and the truth was, ſhe was no ordina perſon, for beſides her charming Beauty, ſhe had pleaſing and merry Wit, but ſo full of Reaſon, th
ſhe brought all the World unto her own ſenſe of thin
She had a ſubtil and witty way of jeſting, again which there was no defending ones ſelf, when ſhe w in the humour of it, and that which was moſt rare be found in one of that humour, ſhe was full of goo neſs and ſweetneſs alſo; ſhe did in many occaſio more delight thoſe which heard her, than hurt tho whom ſhe did play upon, but yet ſhe made many ſta in awe of her when we came to Sardis: But yet f my part, I muſt confeſs, I ever loved her without a fear, and endeavoured to confirm the Princeſs in th advantageous opinion which ſhe entertained of he and truly I found no difficulty in doing ſo, for her ow natural inclination did byaſs that way ſo ſtrongly, th ſhe loved her moſt tenderly. Doraliſa alſo made ſuch re ſpectful and obliging returns unto the goodneſs of th Princeſs, that within a few days the Princeſs of Claſi mena was as affable and familiar with her, as if the had been acquainted from the Cradle. She underſtoo from ſeveral reports, and afterwards from her ſelf, th though ſhe had living neither Father nor Mother, bu lived with an Aunt, who had no compulſive power o ver her, and though ſhe was yet very young, yet ha ſhe already refuſed above twenty offers of Marriage; for when we came to Sardis, ſhe was not above eighteen years of age, not that ſhe appeared of any rigid or ſavage diſpoſition, for rather on the contrary, ſhe was of a free and jocund Spirit; ſhe was a Lover of company and divertiſements, and there was not any Gallantry in all the Court wherein ſhe had not her ſhare, inſomuch as there ſeemed no inclination in her to become one of the vailed Nuns of Epheſus, and therefore they would ſometimes deſire her reaſons why ſhe refuſed ſo many Gallants and compleat men which proffered themſelves in way of Marriage: But ſhe would alwayes anſwer with a ſmile, that it was, becauſe ſhe had not yet met with ſuch a man as ſhe ſought for, and whom ſhe phancied as a good fortune unto her ſelf. Thus turning the matter always into a kind of Rallary, and leaving every one to gueſs at her meaning, they imagined that ſhe had an averſion towards Marriage, and that ſhe had no other reaſon for carrying the matter as ſhe did. The Princeſs then knowing thus much, upon a time when ſhe was not very well, and had ſent for Doraliſa to divert her, ſhe told her, that ſhe had a great deſire to know who that man was, whom ſhe ſaid ſhe ſought for, and could not find. Since it is your deſire, Madam, ſaid ſhe, and ſmiled, be pleaſed to know that I have a phancy never to marry any man, but ſuch a one as I am ſure loves me, and ſuch a one as I do love. The firſt of theſe, replied the Princeſs, methinks is eaſily found: It is not ſo eaſie, replied ſhe, but in truth the ſecond is as difficult, or to expreſs my ſelf a little better, impoſſible. Methinks, ſaid the Princeſs, you offer a great affront unto the Town and Court of Sardis, to think that there is not one man in it ſufficiently accompliſhed to win you by his ſervices to accept of his affection. Madam, ſaid ſhe unto her, there is a thouſand accompliſhed Gallants in Sardis, but amongſt them all, there is not one who has not already loved ſome or other, and that's my reaſon why I can affect none of them; For truly, if I could ſuffer my ſelf to be loved, and could reſolve to love, I would chuſe one whom Nature only has dreſſed up a compleat man, without the adulterate helps of Love, one who ſhould offer me a freſh new heart, which never had received any impreſſion but my own, nor burned in any flames, but ſuch only as kindled at my eyes. But Madam, where is it poſſible to find ſuch a modelled man as I ſeek after? at the leaſt I am ſure, that amongſt a hundred thouſand which I have ſeen, there is not ſuch a one to be met withal. Nature alone (added ſhe) does ſometimes make them handſom and fair, but they are never of a good behaviour, if they have never been once in love with any; and a man can never have a pleaſing ſpirit, unleſs once in his life he have made it his buſineſs to pleaſe ſome or other. The Princeſs began to laugh at the diſcourſe of Doraliſa, but afterwards ſaid unto her, Love does never infuſe ſpirit into thoſe who have none of their own. I do aſſure you, Madam, replied Doraliſa, that though it do not infuſe ſpirit into thoſe who have none, yet it does marvellouſly augment and poliſh it in thoſe who have any of their own. I do believe, ſaid ſhe, that ſuch a compleat man as is deſcribed by one of the wiſe men of Greece, who is ſo much ſpoke of in the world, may be found without any ſparks of Love in him; for thoſe men require no more, but that they know how to manage the buſineſs well which they have in hand, and that a man know honeſty, and courage, and vertue: But ſuch a compleat man as I would have, ought to have (beſides theſe things ſo abſolutely neceſſary) ſome things in him which are dilectable, and complacential, and theſe are abſolutely impoſſible to be found in a man that never was in Love. In ſum, Madam, call into your memory all the young men whom you have ſeen enter into the world, and tell me the reaſon why there is ſo many of them, whoſe converſation are Peſantique and groſs; you will find the only reaſon to be, becauſe they want that reſpective and convenient boldneſs, and that ſprightly and gallant civility which Love only can infuſe. Their diſcourſe and actions do not pleaſe; and for my part, I like the converſation of thoſe old men, who were ſprightly Gallants in their youth, much better than thoſe young Simpliciars, who think more upon the Ribbands which they wear, than the Ladies whom they talk with. 'Tis very true, ſaid the Princeſs and ſmiled, I muſt confeſs, that I have obſerved many ſuch as you ſpeak of, but I do not attribute it unto the ſame cauſe; for I do think that their want of experience in the world, is the true reaſon why their diſcourſe and demeanour is not more dilectable. To demonſtrate unto you, ſaid Doraliſa, that it is not ſo, I beſeech you do but obſerve thoſe who never were in Love, and yet have ſufficient experience in the world, you ſhall find them ſo rude, and of ſuch a ſavage ſpirit, that there is no complacency to be found in them; you ſhall find that ſuch Men are ſteel-hearted, and Men of Blood, whoſe lives are ſpent in Wars, or elſe ſuch hunting diſpoſitions as affect only Forreſts, or ſuch dumpiſh pieces of ſolitarineſs, as are always cloyſtered up in their Studies with a company of books, or ſuch as entertain themſelves in Grots and Caves in the Country; So that I muſt ingenuouſly confeſs, that it is Love only which compleats a Man to be ſuch a one as I am in queſt of. However, ſaid the Princeſs unto her, ſince Love is of ſuch an efficacy as you ſpeak of, do but ſuffer your ſelf to be loved, and thoſe Men who are not ſuch as you deſire, will in time become ſo. Ah, Madam, cryed ſhe out, if I do not eſteem him whom I am to marry the very firſt minute that I ſhall ſee him, I ſhall never love him; and therefore I muſt find him a moſt accompliſhed Man, and not make him one. Make choice then (ſaid ſhe unto her) of one of thoſe who have compleated themſelves by loving ſome other, and has made a retreat, and now loves none. I have already told you, Madam, replied Doraliſa, that I would have a freſh new Maiden heart, newly kindled with pure and lively flames, and not one of thoſe hardened ones, as have burned whole years together. The truth is, as Men uſe to offer unto a Divinity ſuch offerings only as were never upon the Altar of another; ſo would I have ſuch an affection as was never dedicated to any but my ſelf: So, ſince I cannot love any man who has loved another; and ſince it is not poſſible to find out a compleat man, unleſs he have been in Love, I am reſolved, and truly very willingly, to love none at all. This your rule is not ſo general, replied the Princeſs, but it will admit of ſome exceptions; for Perinthus you know is a moſt accompliſhed man, yet he never was in Love. Ah, Madam, cryed ſhe out, it is impoſſible, Perinthus either is infallibly in Love, or at the leaſt hath been; it is impoſſible to be as he is, unleſs he were. The Princeſs then called me, Is it not true, Pherenice, ſaid ſhe, that Perinthus was never in Love? It is moſt true, Madam, ſaid I unto her, that I never knew he was, nor ever knew him to be ſuſpected by any. Then certainly he is moſt ſubtil and wiſe, replied Doraliſa, for let me tell you once again, that Perinthus cannot be what he is, unleſs he had been in Love. As ſhe was ſaying ſo, he entred: So that the Princeſs beginning the diſcourſe, and being ignorant of that paſſion which was in his Soul, ſhe told him, that ſhe was very glad to ſee him, becauſe he would help her to convince Doraliſa of an errour, wherein ſhe perſiſted: But, ſaid the Princeſs, and addreſſed her ſelf unto Doraliſa, I would have you ask him the queſtion, to the end you ſhall not think he dare not tell me the truth. I do confeſs, Madam, anſwered Doraliſa, that I am ſo full of curioſity in the buſineſs, as tho' it be ſomething againſt the Rules of Handſomneſs, yet I will immediately obey you; therefore Perinthus, ſaid ſhe, and turned towards him, I pray tell me whether you did not leave one in Claſſomena whom you wiſh were at Sardis. Perinthus was ſo ſurprized with this queſtion, that he bluſht, and knew not how to anſwer; So that Doraliſa turning towards the Princeſs, Very well, Madam, ſaid ſhe, I am much deceived if you be not miſtaken, and if the bluſh of Perinthus doth not ſufficiently argue that I am in the right. But you do not give Perinthus time to anſwer, ſaid Panthea, and you will condemn me before you underſtand him: I pray Perinthus convince Doraliſa, that it is poſſible to find ſuch a compleat man as your ſelf, who neither is, nor ever was in Love; and therefore tell her whether you left any beauty in Claſomena, whom you think upon at Sardis. Since I am obliged to anſwer directly (replied Perinthus, after he had a little recollected himſelf) I do ſeriouſly proteſt unto you, without out any lye, that ſince I came to Sardis, I never ſo much as thought of Claſomena, or any in it: Perhaps the reaſon is (ſaid Doraliſa to the Princeſs) becauſe Perinthus is in Love with ſome of your Women, and by conſequence left none there to love. Perinthus bluſht the ſecond time at the diſcourſe of Doraliſa, which the Princeſs obſerving, and imagining that the alteration in his countenance proceeded from no other cauſe, but becauſe he was aſhamed to confeſs he loved not any. Truly Perinthus (ſaid ſhe unto him) you are a ſtrange man, in being aſhamed to confeſs that thing whereof you ought to glory; for I do conceive it Honourable, never to be vanquiſhed. There are ſome Conquerours ſo illuſtrious (replied he very coldly) that a defeat by them may be confeſſed without any diſhonour. But whether are you in Love, or not in Love, ſaid Doraliſa, for that is it which we would know? If I be in Love, replied he, you may think it concerns me not to diſcover it, ſince none knows it: And if I be not in Love, it concerns me not to acknowledge it alſo, ſince it is to be thought (as I collect by the diſcourſe of the Princeſs) that one cannot be any ways a compleat man, unleſs amorous; and I muſt not poſſeſs you with an opinion which will be to my own diſadvantage. However it be (ſaid Doraliſa) though you will not explain your ſelf, yet within a while, I ſhall find out the truth; for if you be in Claſomena, there your diſquiet and melancholy will ſufficiently diſcover you; and if you be at Sardis, then I ſhall more infallibly find it out. But what if he be not in Love at all, ſaid the Princeſs, as I do verily believe he is not, then Perinthus wants none of thoſe qualities which you deſire to be in a man: Yes, he wants one thing, replied ſhe, and that's as neceſſary as all the reſt, which is, that he love me as well as he can love. But I conjure you, Madam, never move him unto that, ſince I am moſt certain he can never love me; and if I were as ſure that he is in Love with none elſe, I ſhould look upon him as an abſolute Miracle. As Perinthus was going to reply, a meſſenger from the Princeſs ceſs Palmis interrupted the converſation, for he came upon a viſit, to ſee how the Princeſs did, and to know whether ſhe was in ſuch a condition of health as to meet her in the morning at a Hunting which they had appointed ſome few days ſince; or whether it was her pleaſure to defer that ſport until another time. The Princeſs, who was not very ill, but hoped to be perfectly well the day following, returned this anſwer, That ſhe was ſo far from any deſires of deferring any delights which ſhe ſhould receive, as that in the morning ſhe would aſſume the honour to wait upon her at the Chaſe. Immediately after the Prince Mexaris entred, ſo that the diſcourſe between Perinthus and Doraliſa was put off till the next day. In the mean while, the poor Perinthus was in a pitiful condition, to underſtand from the Princeſſes own mouth, that ſhe did not think him to be in Love, and his ſorrows were extreme to hear thoſe cruel words pronounced by her whom he only loved, or ever could love, and unto whom he never durſt diſcover his paſſion; and though he did, as he thought, limit his deſires to be only eſteemed by the Princeſs; yet many a minute in a day had he further wiſhes, which immediately he would ſtifle: However, ſince he was fit for any imployment, the Princeſs ſent him to ſee whether the ſervants of the Prince her Father had prepared all things neceſſary for this Hunting, and whether the Horſe which ſhe was to ride upon was ready, and well conditioned. Perinthus, who was raviſhed in rendring any ſervice unto the Princeſs, were it never ſo trivial, did ſo punctually obey her, that the next morning the Princeſs Palmis herſelf was not better accoutred than ſhe: And really I cannot think, that a more gallant and glorious ſight could be ſeen than this Hunting diverſion. All the Ladies were dreſt, as they uſe to picture Diana, unleſs in that they had a little more care of their Beauties than that Goddeſs, who deſpiſed her own: She had about her head a Chaplet of ſuch lively coloured Feathers, as vied with the Sun for Beauty, and preſerved her from its heat, under which ſhe wore a Veil waving at the pleaſure of the wind, wherewith ſhe could umbrage her fair face when ſhe pleaſed: Their Horſes were all trapped and trim'd with lovely coloured Ribbands in their Mains; each had a rich Scarff, in which hung a Bow and Quiver of Arrows; in one hand they held their Bridles, which were all ſtudded with boſſes of Gold, and in the other hand they held light Javelins of Ivory and Ebony, all enamelled with the richeſt work of the Goldſmith, their Saddle-cloaths were embroidered with Pearl and Jewels: So that a ſight more magnificent and fuller of delight could not be ſeen; for all their dreſſes being in ſeveral colours, and the trimmings of their Horſes ſo alſo, it made the moſt beautiful object in the World amongſt the Woods and Launs of the Park: Every Lady had a Huntſman to conduct her, who always rode before her, and two Footmen, on each ſide one: Each of the Princeſſes had two Women dreſt in the ſame garb following them; ſo that the Princeſs deſired Doraliſa to be one of hers, and did me the honour to make choice of me amongſt all the reſt for the other. It was ſo ordered by the Princeſs, that Perinthus ſhould be Doraliſa's Huntſman, and the Prince Mexaris was hers: The Prince Atis was Huntſman unto a Lady, whoſe name was Anaxila, with whom he was in Love; and the Prince Arteſilas was Huntſman unto the Princeſs Palmis. But ſince to tell all the paſſages of this Hunting, is nothing pertinent unto my diſcourſe, I ſhall only ſay thus much, that all the men were no leſs glorious and magnificent than the Ladies: A world of people came in Chariots to the banks of the Lake of Giges, where all the equipage of Hunting, and all the Horſes did rendezvous and wait: Doraliſa and my ſelf were in the Princeſs's Chariot, becauſe we were appointed to wait upon her; and it was the office of the Prince Mexaris, who was Huntſman unto the Princeſs, to help her out of her Chariot; ſo he was very obſequious in it, but he no ſooner appeared, than Doraliſa obſerved, that in lieu of a habit made purpoſely for this jolly recreation, as the Prince Atis, the Prince Myrſiles, Arteſilas, Cleander, and all the reſt, even Perinthus had: It was a ſuit, as I was told, which he wore at a Horſe-race, ſome two years ſince; So that not being able to hold from laughing, Really (ſaid ſhe to me, ſo loud as the Princeſs might hear) I ſee that all which hath been told me concerning the Prince Mexaris is not true: What have they told you (ſaid I unto her) They have confidently told me (replied ſhe) that he was in Love with the Princeſs, but ſince he is yet ſo covetous, I cannot believe him to be in Love. Mexaris was then ſo near the Chariot, that neither the Princeſs nor I could ſay any thing to Doraliſa, and truly it was very well we could forbear laughing, not but that Mexaris was of a good port, and well made: But ſince his gold did look but dim in compariſon of that freſh luſtre which is upon any thing that is new, it was impoſſible to hold from laughing at the words of Doraliſa. Alſo ſome daies are ſo devoted to jollity, that the leaſt thing will incline the mind into a pleaſant rallary and mirth. Cleander, who was the only he that day, and who becauſe he could not be Huntſman unto the Princeſs Palmis, though he was then her Lover, as afterwards we knew, he would not be one unto any. Colouring the matter with this pretence, that he would give orders unto all the reſt; ſo that he would go ſometimes to one, and ſometimes to another. This Hunting was in a great Park, which well deſerved the name of a little Forreſt, for its large extent: A great common rode doth croſs through it, otherwiſe ſuch as would go unto Sardis would be forced to go much about; ſo that at either end of the Park there are two Gates to let paſſengers in and out. I will not ſtay you, Madam, with a long deſcription of this days Hunting, nor tell you how the Hounds hunted, or the Hart ſtood, nor how the winding of Horns made a very merry noiſe; or whether all the Hunters followed cloſe the chaſe, and a thouſand ſuch pleaſant paſſages: For, beſides my want of expreſſion in fit terms, it is not the mark I aim at. And to tell you truly, the Ladies which were aſſembled together in that place, I believe came thither as much to ſhew their Beauties, as to run Harts to death: Hunting is too violent an exerciſe for them, and therefore they pleaſed themſelves in croſſing gently into ſuch places as their Huntſmen imagined in probability the Hart might paſs, and that way was eaſie enough for Ladies. At the beginning the

Princeſſes and their Hunters kept cloſe together, but this glorious Troop did afterwards inſenſibly ſeparate into ſeveral companies, ſome taking one way, ſome another; ſo that without any intendment, the Princeſs was in the midſt of a thick Wood, without any company but the Prince Mexaris, Doraliſa, Perinthus his two ſervants, and my ſelf. But ſhe no ſooner perceived it, than we underſtood by the ſhrill noiſe of horns and voices, that the Chaſe drew near us; and indeed the Hart did paſs by ſo near us, as at that inſtant we enjoyed the moſt pleaſure: However, as there is nothing more againſt the mind of him who affects Hunting, than not to follow when he ſees the Game running before him, the Prince Mexaris, as much in Love as he was with the Princeſs, asked leave to follow, and told her he would preſently return; ſo he rid through the thick of the Wood, which tickled Doraliſa into a laughing ſpleen ſo loud, that ſhe eaſily imparted her mirth unto Perinthus and my ſelf, ſo ſhe rid to the Princeſs: I profeſs (ſaid this jocund Lady) it muſt needs be confeſſed, that though this Prince be not very liberal, yet he is very prudent in taking ſo handſome an opportunity, to hide his paſſion to the Princeſs, and his old Imbrodery alſo, by getting himſelf ſo far off us as he doth. Perinthus, who, being prompted by ſome jealous thoughts, was even raviſhed at the bitterneſs of Doraliſa againſt him, did handſomly ſecond her: The Princeſs ſeemed as if ſhe would not underſtand us, for being very diſcreet, ſhe would not be ſeen to jeer at the Prince Mexaris; but ſince we perceived ſhe could not chuſe but ſmile a little, we could not chuſe but laugh it on. In the mean time; ſince the Princeſs was reſolved not to ſtay for Mexaris in that place, ſhe asked Perinthus which way he thought ſhe might go to meet the Princeſs Palmis: But ſince he could not directly tell that, he intended, as he told me afterwards, to carry her as far from Mexaris as he could; and therefore he took a quite contrary way to that which the Chaſe had taken. As we rid on, and leſs and leſs hearing the Cry of the dogs, and the voices of the Huntſmen, the Princeſs turned towards Perinthus, and moſt ſweetly ſaid unto him, That ſhe was very ſorry to hinder him from the pleaſure of the Chaſe. Perinthus replyed unto this ſurprizing language in ſuch a manner, as let the Princeſs ſee, that he thought himſelf much more happy in being where he was, than at the death of the Hart. Then the Princeſs calling to Doraliſa, Crafty Wench (ſaid ſhe unto her) who knows that the Prince Mexaris is not in Love with me, becauſe he had rather follow the Chaſe than ſtay with us: May you not as well ſay upon the ſame reaſon, that ſince Perinthus does voluntarily ſtay with us, therefore he is in Love with you? Not at all, Madam (anſwered ſhe;) if he be, I will make him confeſs it preſently; and indeed ſhe had opened her mouth to ſpeak unto him: When, being come into the great road which croſſeth the Park, we diſcovered upon the left hand five or ſix Horſemen riding towards us, we thought them at the firſt to be ſome of our company which belonged to the Chaſe, but coming nearer them, we did not know them: He who rid firſt was a young man extremely handſom, and of an excellent garb, whoſe ſuit, though in the Country, was very rich, and ſeemed freſh and new. As ſoon as Doraliſa ſaw him, ſhe began her Rallary: This ſtranger (ſaid ſhe to the Princeſs) whoſoever he is, is doubtleſs more liberal than Mexaris; for ſince he is ſo rich and neat in his travel, what would he be at ſuch a meeting as this? His deportment does eaſily perſwade (replied the Princeſs) that he is one of Heroique virtue, and much takes my opinion of him. However, ſince the luſtre of the Princeſs's Beauty did ſhine no leſs in his eyes, than his behaviour was high in hers; and ſince the dreſs wherein ſhe was that day did contribute much unto her Beauty, ſo he ſeemed to be much ſurprized, and imagined, that perhaps ſhe might be the Princeſs of Lydia: Yet ſince he was not certain, he ſtood a while unreſolved what to do: but at laſt, fearing to run into an error, in making himſelf known unto one, whom he knew not who ſhe was; and on the other ſide, being loath to fail in thoſe reſpects which were due unto a Princeſs, whoſe beauty, ayre, and habit ſpoke to be of a moſt high Quality: He went out of the way, and ſtayed to let her paſs, and bowed with a moſt low reverence: As long as ſhe was within reach of his eyes, he ſtood ſtill and gazed after: The Princeſs alſo turned her ſelf to look upon him, but meeting with each others eyes, ſhe looked no longer. As ſoon as this ſtranger had loſt the ſight of her, he rid a few paces towards Sardis. Afterwards, his curioſity, to know who this Beauty was, encreaſing; and having obſerved that we left the great road, and took ſtreight forward, he took ſuch a way as poſſibly he might meet with us again, and to have the delight of ſeeing the Princeſs once more; his project did hit, and better than he looked for. Be pleaſed to know, Madam, that the Princeſs being come unto a place of the Wood where ſtood a Fountain, ſhe ſtayed there, becauſe ſhe found it much cooler than any where elſe, ſhe had a deſire to reſt her ſelf there for a while; So that both ſhe and we alighting from our horſes, ſhe ſat down upon the graſs which grew by the ſide of the Fountain: But ſhe was no ſooner ſet, than ſhe perceived ſhe had loſt a Picture which the Princeſs Palmis had given her, and which was in a Caſe of Diamonds moſt rich, yet that was not it which moſt troubled her; but it grieved her very much that the Princeſs Palmis might ſo juſtly chide her for loſing ſo negligently that thing which ſhe had given her as an eſpecial teſtimony of her affection; ſo that exceedingly vexing her ſelf for the loſs, ſhe commanded the two ſervants that waited to tye their horſes unto Trees, and go the ſame way they came, to try if happily they could find this Picture, not that ſhe had any great hopes of finding it, after ſo many turnings and windings in a great thick Wood: But ſince ſhe had a confuſed kind of memory that ſhe had it when ſhe met this handſom ſtranger; and ſince it is the quality of every one that loſe any thing to look for it as well in places where it cannot be, as where it is, therefore ſhe ſent theſe two ſervants unto the place where ſhe met this ſtranger: Perinthus did envy their imployment, and would have gone thither himſelf, imagining that he could find any thing which the

Princeſs loſt better than another, but it was her pleaſure to have him ſtay with her. Mean while, ſince theſe two ſervants had never been in the Park before, they miſtook the way, and took another, ſo that all their labour was in vain; yet they were diligent in ſearch, and that ſo long, that the Princeſs deſpaired of ever finding it, ſeeing they returned no ſooner: But preſently this handſom ſtranger appeared, who being more fortunate than they, had found this Picture; So that ſeeking for an occaſion to ſpeak unto the Princeſs, and making no queſtion but this Picture was hers, ſince he found it in that place where ſhe paſſed; and addreſſing himſelf unto her in a handſom garb, and with much reverence; Madam, ſaid he in the Lydian language, and preſenting the Picture which ſhe ſo much lamented, It is my happy fortune to find that which you have loſt, and my honor to reſtore unto your fair hands that thing, which queſtionleſs muſt needs be very valuable in your eſteem: The Princeſs riſing up as ſoon as ſhe ſaw the ſtranger addreſs himſelf towards her, ſhe knew the Caſe as ſoon as ſhe ſaw it, and taking it with much joy; Generous ſtranger (ſaid ſhe unto him) had not this which you reſtore been given me by the Princeſs of Lydia, I ſhould at leaſt have offered you the Caſe, and received only the Picture: But ſince I dare not be too liberal of ſo great a Princeſſes favours, eſpecially unto a man of that ayre which your countenance promiſeth, I beſeech you accept of my thankful acknowledgments, until I meet with an opportunity to ſerve you in ſome as important way as this which you reſtore unto me is acceptable. Madam, anſwered he, I do think the ſervice in reſtoring that which you do value, to be a moſt ample recompence. Whilſt the Princeſs and this ſtranger were in diſcourſe, Perinthus went unto one of his men, and inquired who he was. The man told him, that he was ſecond Son to the King of Suſiana, named Abradates, and Son alſo unto a Siſter of Crœſſus, who was going into Sardis: So that Perinthus telling the ſame unto me, I acquainted the Princeſs in a low voice, during which time, the ſervant of Abradates inquired who the Princeſs was, and acquainted his Maſter, whil'ſt I was informing the Princeſs concerning him: So that both knowing who each other was, there appeared much joy in both their eyes: Abradates doubled his reſpects, and the Princeſs her civilities. I do eſteem my ſelf moſt happy, ſaid he unto her, that one minute of my life hath been ſpent in the ſervice of ſo fair a Princeſs. And truly I think my ſelf very happy, replyed ſhe, in being thus obliged all the reſt of my Life unto ſo great a Prince, of whom Fame ſpeaks ſo loud in his commendations. As they were thus in diſcourſe, a great noiſe of Horſes was heard, and immediately after, the Princeſſes Palmis, Anaxilea, the Prince Atis, Arteſilas, Mexaris, Myrſiles, and Cleander appeared, who without any minding of Abradates, alighted from their Horſes, and began to chide the Princeſs, for preferring ſolitude before the Chaſe, and for not being at the death of the Hart. The Chaſe which I have had, replyed ſhe, and ſmiled, hath been more happy than yours; and I am confident you will confeſs it (ſaid ſhe, and preſented Abradates unto the Prince Atis, and the Princeſs Palmis) when you know that I have had the company of the Prince of Suſiana, of whom you have heard ſuch Noble Reports. At the ſame time, a ſervant unto the Prince Atis, who had been at Suſa, came to his Maſter, and confirmed the truth: Then did every one receive Abradates with extream joy, and afterwards with a thouſand welcomes and civilities. I do confeſs (ſaid the Princeſs Palmis to Panthea, that your Chaſe hath been more happy than ours, and that you merit all the honour. The greateſt advantage is mine, replyed Abradates, ſince I have been preſented unto you by ſo fair and illuſtrious a hand. You do not ſtand in need of any ſuch advantageous helps, replyed the Princeſs Palmis, to render you conſiderable. For my part, ſaid Panthea, I have ſtood in need of his help, for without it, I ſhould have ſuſtained a lamentable loſs; and then ſhe related the adventure of the Princeſs of Palmis her Picture. Since the place where they were was very pleaſant, they ſtayed there almoſt an hour; but afterwards Cleander told them it was time to go and refreſh themſelves at a Caſtle, on the furtheſt end of the Park, cloſe by the Lake of Gyges, over againſt the Tomb of Alliattes, and ſo the Princes and Princeſſes all together went to this Caſtle, where a magnificent Banquet and admirable Muſick waited for them: In going thither, Mexaris rid cloſe by Panthea, but he had not the freedom of diſcourſe with her, becauſe the Prince Abradates did alſo ride cloſe by her: In the mean time, the poor Perinthus followed after all, fretted to the heart, to ſee how the beauty of Panthea made every one Adorers that looked upon her: Yet, as he ſince told me, he had this poor comfort in his thoughts; that perſons of her Quality are ſeldom married unto ſuch Princes as love them, or as they love; and therefore his hope was, that if ever any enjoyed her, it would be ſome Prince, who married her perhaps more out of ſome reaſon of State, than any affection. But whil'ſt he was thus entertaining his own thoughts, Doraliſa and I obſerved how Abradates did continually eye Panthea, with extraordinary attention, not only in the way to the Caſtle, but during all the time of the Banquet and Muſick; one would have thought that ſhe only of all the company was fair; not that he was at all uncivil, or neglected any reſpects due unto the Princeſs of Lydia: But for all that, it was an eaſie matter to diſcover by his looks, that the Princeſs of Claſomena's beauty did penetrate deeper into his heart, than any others. Mexaris perceived it as well as we, and Perinthus much more; and I am perſwaded that Panthea her ſelf from this very firſt day did begin to underſtand the prodigious effects that her Beauty did produce in the heart of Abradates. For be pleaſed to know, Madam, that (as he hath told me ſince) he was ſo deſperatly in Love this very firſt ſight, that his paſſion would not admit of any augmentation ever ſince. In the mean time, after all the Ladies had moſt pleaſantly paſſed away this day, they returned to Sardis in their Chariots; every Prince did ride next them who did moſt attract their inclinations, to wit, Arteſilas and Cleander cloſe by the Chariet of the Princeſs Palmis, the Prince Atis next that of Anaxila, Mexaris, Abradates, and Perinthus, next the Princeſs of Claſomena. When we were come unto Sardis, all the Princes did lead their Ladies unto the Chamber of the Princeſs Palmis; after which, the Prince Atis carried Abradates unto the Chamber of Crœſſus, and preſented him unto him, who received him with many teſtimonies of affection and joy: For ſince he alwayes loved the Queen of Suſiana his Siſter very well, from whom he had received a Letter which did intimate the voyage of this Prince, he was much raviſhed to ſee him in his Court, and to find him of ſo fine behaviour and ſpirit. The Princeſs his Mother was ſo careful in inſtructing him in the Lydian language, that he ſpoke it ſo exactly, and without any accent of a ſtranger, that every one admired him. We underſtood within a few days after, that Abradates was to ſtay a long time in this Court, becauſe he ſtood not upon good terms with the King his Father, for driving on the Intereſts of the Queen his Mother with too much zeal, againſt an Elder Brother of his, who, though he had not ſo much virtue as he, yet was to ſucceed in the Kingdom: So that the King of Suſiana having with much injuſtice threatned to impriſon him; the Queen his Mother deſired protection from the King of Lydia her Brother for this her Darling Son, who had not loſt his Fathers favour, but only for the love of her. The cauſe of Abradates his exile being well accepted of by Crœſſus, he bad him exceedingly welcome, aud after his example, ſo did all the Court; and truly it was but a juſt due unto his merit, for certainly a more accompliſhed Prince was never ſeen than the Prince Abradates. Alſo, when Panthea was returned home from the Hunting to her own lodging, ſhe continually ſpoke of him all that night, which was not at all pleaſant unto Perinthus, who was preſent when ſhe related all the pleaſant adventure unto the Prince her Father. The next morning Abradates performed a ceremonious viſit unto the Princeſs Palmis, where the Princeſs of Claſomena, and all the Court were preſent; and the ſame day towards night he went unto to Panthea as ſoon as he heard ſhe was returned from the Kings Palace. Some days paſſed, before any diſcovered the affection of Abradates, unleſs it were Mexaris, Perinthus, Doraliſa, and my ſelf: But afterwards it was as apparant as the Sun, for his diſcourſe was all upon her Beauty and Wit, and he never neglected the leaſt occaſion of ſeeing her. Since the Love of Mexaris was not yet divulged, Abradates gave no check unto his growing paſſion; and was ignorant how that Prince had any intereſt in the Princeſs Panthea; ſo that clearly ſubmitting himſelf unto the charms of this admirable beauty, he made no ſecret of his paſſion. In the mean while Mexaris, whoſe Love had took as deep root in his heart, as any thing that was not gold could in the heart of a covetous man, began to publiſh it, but truly it was after a manner much different from his Rivals, ſo that it might rightly be ſaid, that never were two Princes more unlike in all things than theſe two: For, Madam, as the ſtate of Abradates his fortunes then ſtood, it was very like that he would be compelled to live all his life an exile, without any other eſtate or fortune than his own virtue, nor any ſubſiſtence, but either what the Queen his Mother did ſecretly convey unto him, or what Crœſſus would pleaſe to give him. As for Mexaris, the caſe was otherwiſe with him, for he was not inferiour in riches unto the King his Brother: And as there was a great diſparity in their fortunes, ſo there was a greater in their diſpoſitions, for Avarice was the rule of all Mexaris his actions, and Liberality was the predominate virtue of Abradates: Indeed, I think this Prince was as liberal as valiant, and as valiant as man could be: Mexaris, on the contrary, was hide-bound in all things; if he built any thing, he would always have ſome ſparing trick or other, which waſted and ſpoiled all the reſt of the expences which he had been at: If at any time he gave any thing, it would be always too late and little, and commonly with a melancholy grudging complement: His attendance was big enough, but ſhabbed and ill accoutred: His Table was little, and naught for ſo great a Prince as he was; and diſguiſing his covetouſneſs under ſome weak pretence; he commonly wore very mean cloaths; ſaying, it was much folly to purchaſe any eſteem unto ones ſelf by ſuch expences: If at any time he played at any game, he played for avarice, not recreation; and conſidering how he would chafe when he loſt, it was palpable, that it was rather a Trade than a ſport unto him: The truth is, it appeared by all his actions, and ſometimes by his very words, that the limits of all the magnificence which was in his narrow heart, extended only to himſelf, and no further; this baſe diſpoſition was the reaſon that none loved him: But on the contrary, Abradates, though an exile, was ſo free and liberal, that all the World adored him, and wiſhed him all the treaſures of the other: The manner of his Preſents was ſuch, as how ſmall ſoever they were in themſelves, yet they were eſteemed as great: He conferred his gifts not only ſpeedily, but with alacrity and joy, and one could not any way more ſenſibly oblige him, than to accept his favours; his Retinue was magnificent and handſome, his Table was open and good, he always wore rich and good cloaths; if at any time he loſt at Play, it was without turbulency or anger; he ſought for occaſions to give, as Mexaris ſhunned them: He carried it ſo, that he not only had the glory of all the good deeds which he really did, but alſo of thoſe which he did not, but would have done if he had been rich: And certain there had not been any man of parts in a wanting condition in all the Court of Lydia, if Abradates had been as rich as Mexaris. After this, Madam, you may eaſily judge that Love produced very contrary effects in the ſouls of theſe two Princes, their deſigns alſo had contrary ſucceſs, yet did they act alike in all things: For Mexaris was in all things, which would put him to no expence, no leſs obſequious and complaiſant than Abradates: And knowing how Panthea affected Doraliſa, and eſteemed Perinthus, he would comply, and ſeem to love them alſo, inſomuch as this ſecret Lover of the Princeſs was extreamly vexed to receive a thouſand civilities from his Rivals, which he was obliged to return;

turn; yet was it ſome conſolation for him to ſee, that in all likelyhood Panthea would never love Mexaris, by reaſon of his baſe diſpoſition, and that ſhe would never marry Abradates by reaſon of his low fortunes; ſo that ſtraining himſelf, he rendred unto both theſe Princes all due reſpects, but ſpoke as little as poſſible he could: And ſince he was too wiſe to ſpeak openly all the ill he thought of Mexaris, and too amorous to commend Abradates, he accorded both as much as he could: So that carrying fair, both with the Princeſs and both his Rivals, his life was a mixture of ſweet and bitter hours. In the mean time, theſe two Princes, as amorous as they were, had neither of them ſo much confidence as to diſcover their paſſions, when Adraſtus, Brother unto the King of Phrygia, came into this Court, to be purged of that crime which he had innocently committed: The Ceremony of which being performed in the Temple of Jupiter the Expiator, it chanced that Abradates was not well that morning, and could not be there; and coming after Dinner unto the Princeſs, and finding her alone, ſhe asked him the reaſon why he was not at the Ceremony? Madam, the reaſon is, replied he, becauſe I do not much deſire to know how it is done, ſince to tell you truly, if I have committed any crime, it is not Jupiter that muſt pardon me: Yet he is the greateſt of the Gods, replied ſhe: Moſt true, ſaid he, but it is his pleaſure to leave it unto other Divinities, of whom he is Supreme, to remit thoſe crimes which are committed againſt them. For my part, ſaid Panthea, I do not think you have offended any, or that you came unto this Court upon the ſame reaſon that Adraſtus did: 'Tis very true, Madam, replied Abradates, his Deſtiny and mine are different, for he came in a criminal, and I ſhall go out one: If ſo, ſaid ſhe, you may be juſtified as he is: Then, Madam (ſaid he unto her) it is you who muſt pardon my boldneſs, in preſuming to love you above all the world. Panthea being extremely ſurprized at this diſcourſe, though ſhe was not ignorant of his paſſion, yet ſhe looked upon him and bluſh'd, and being to ſpeak, with more ſeverity in her eyes: I know very well, ſaid ſhe unto him, that it is the common cuſtom of the World to take ſuch language as this only as bare civility, and to let it paſs as a piece of Gallantry ſpoken without any further deſign: But I am perſwaded there are ſome, who perhaps could wiſh ſuch words twice ſpoken, becauſe they give no credit to the firſt: Yet ſince I have been obliged unto you from the very firſt minute of our acquaintance, and does infinitely eſteem you; therefore I muſt with all ſincerity tell you, that whether you ſpoke thoſe words in earneſt, or in jeſt, the boldneſs does much diſpleaſe me. And let me further tell you, ſince I would be loth to rank you in the Catalogue of Indifferency, that it will be more advantageous to you, to uſe ſuch language no more, and not to fail in that reſpect which is due unto one (I do not ſay of my Quality) but of that virtue which I profeſs. Can it be, Madam, replied he, that the leſs I ſpeak of my paſſion, the more violent you will believe it? I do not ſay ſo, anſwered ſhe, and ſmiled, whether ſhe would or no: But I tell you (ſaid ſhe, and aſſumed a more ſerious countenance) that if you ſpeak any more of it, I ſhall as long as I live think that you do not eſteem me, and by conſequence I ſhall be leſs beholding to you. How, Madam (cryed he out) is it a teſtimony of diſeſteem to tell you, that I adore you? If ſo, Madam, I ſhall ſay no more. But I beſeech you, Madam, interpret my ſilence always as it ought to be, and remember as often as you ſee me alone with you, and ſpeak not a word, that then my heart ſays you are the faireſt upon earth, and that I reverence you with an unparallel'd devotion, and ſhall love you as long as I ſhall live. As Panthea was ready to anſwer, Mexaris and Doraliſa came into the Chamber, but her looks gave ſuch a ſharp anſwer unto the poor Abradates, that if he could have ſuffered his Rival to have been alone with Panthea, he would have immediately quitted the Chamber; But having not ſo much power over himſelf he ſtayed, and was pleaſing enough in his converſation all the day, much company coming in within a quarter of an hour after. At firſt the diſcourſe was only of the Ceremony in the morning, unto which the Princeſs Panthea added not a word, becauſe it had given a ſubject unto Abradates to diſcover his Love; but deſiring to turn it into ſomething elſe, ſhe began to talk unto Doraliſa upon ſome affair of matters. But paſſing inſenſibly from one diſcourſe into another, every one began to chide Doraliſa, for wiſhing Nature to work a miracle in favour of her ſelf, and make up an accompliſhed man without the helps of Love, every one asked if ſhe had changed her mind: Since Mexaris had formerly loved another beſides the Princeſs, he began to argue againſt Doraliſa, and maintain his own caſe; and ſince Abradates had never been in Love, he ſeconded her reaſons, for ſaying, that ſhe would never accept of any heart that had been ſcorched in any other flames beſides her own. Perinthus gave a liſtning ear unto what his Rivals ſaid, and endeavoured to gueſs at the thoughts of the Princeſs: Tell me, Doraliſa (ſaid Mexaris to her) What reaſons can you give for ſcorning all compleat men, only becauſe they have been in Love with ſome other before your ſelf? The number of them is ſo large (replied ſhe) that I cannot tell which I ſhall give you firſt, and truly that is the greateſt difficulty of my anſwer. I cannot believe it ſo eaſie a matter (replied Mexaris) to maintain your errour with all the wit you have; for what does that which is paſt concern you, as long as you know it not? By what is paſt (replied ſhe) I can judge at the future; for whoſoever can quit another for me, gives me ſome cauſe of fear that he can quit me for another whom yet he knows not, but may perhaps hereafter know her: But have you any better ſecurity for the fidelity of that man who never loved any but your ſelf? (replied Mexaris.) Such a one, replied Abradates, did never give ſo bad an example, and there is greater grounds of hope that his firſt paſſion will be conſtant, than there is to believe that one who has loved many, will ever become conſtant: It cannot be doubted, replied Doraliſa: But the worſt of it is, I could never meet with a man of my Quality who is ſuch a one as I wiſh, one that will love me, and never was in Love before: As for ſuch as wear ſo many ſeveral fetters, as ſuits of cloaths, and offer two or three Sacrifices with one and the ſame Victime, in offering the ſelf-ſame heart unto two or three Ladies one immediately after another, I cannot endure them, but ſhould uſe them ſcurvily as long as I lived: I may perhaps meet with ſuch compleat men as will ſerve to make friends of, but I'le have none ſuch to be my Lovers, for I can never believe that any who can quit a black Beauty for a fair, or a fair for a brown, can never have any conſtancy of heart. Admit (ſaid Mexaris unto her) that one ſhould meet with a heart of flint, which nothing can mollifie; were it not wiſdom to cure the miſery by a diſcreet retreat; and if ſuch a one do afterwards love another, why ſhould he be taxed with inconſtancy, when as he would not have changed, if he had been more favourably entertained? Though I ſhould not tax ſuch a one with inconſtancy, replied Doraliſa, yet is he ſuch a one as I ſhould never favour, ſince he is but the refuſe of another. Admit her rigour proceeded from a phantaſtical and extravagant diſpoſition, replied Mexaris, Why would you treat ſuch an unfortunate Lover with rigour? Becauſe ſuch a man as would ever love ſuch a phantaſtical and extravagant Woman as you ſpeak of, replied Doraliſa, would never honour me by aſſuming my Chains. The truth is, whether he loved a mild or ſevere diſpoſition, whether he have been well or ill treated, whether he did reject, or was rejected, all's one to me, I ſhould never love him that ever loved any beſides my ſelf: If he have been ſeverely uſed, he knows by example how to be ſevere; if he have been favourably treated, I will think, that ſince the favours of another could not keep him, mine cannot neither; If he betrayed his Miſtreſs, there is no truſting of him; If it was ſhe who forſook him, it is to be conceived that he has made himſelf unworthy by ſome ſecret crime or other which we know not of, or at leaſt it is to be feared, he was either phantaſtical or jealous. Moreover, if ſhe whom he loved be fair, there is no ſecurity of his loving me, ſince he hath quitted her; if ſhe be not fair, it is to be thought that he reliſhed her ſo ill, that he will quit me for one that is fairer. Therefore if ever I permit any to love me, it muſt be an entire heart, and none of thoſe that has been pierced with a thouſand Arrows; it ſhall be a heart, I ſay, which is ſenſible of the leaſt touch, and not one that is hardned with the rigour of another; freſhneſs and newneſs in Love, as in other things, is a grace: And whoſoever will ever hope to be acceptable, in my eſteem, he muſt perſwade me that I am, and ever ſhall be, his firſt and laſt Love. I do profeſs, ſaid Abradates, that I think the opinion of Doraliſa to be very juſt; and ſo much the more, replied Panthea, becauſe by taking up that reſolution, doubtleſs one reſolves never to love any, becauſe it is to deſire an impoſſibility: I muſt needs concur with you in that opinion, replied Abradates: So do not I, replied Doraliſa; For I do not hold it a thing impoſſible, that one ſhould love but one only in all their life. The great difficulty of all is to find out a compleat man, who never loved any but me. The Princeſs would perſwade me, Sir (ſaid ſhe, and addreſſed her ſpeech unto Abradates) that Perinthus was never in Love; and truly, though I have much ado to believe it, yet I ſee that I cannot win much upon his heart, therefore I will give over all thoughts of any Conqueſts. The Conqueſt of me (replied Perinthus, a little ſurprized) would add ſo little honour unto you, Madam, that queſtionleſs you are not ſorry for it: Really, Perinthus, ſaid the Princeſs, you are too much in good earneſt, and Doraliſa will perſwade me that you are in Love indeed; for if you did not fear that ſhe whom perhaps you love, ſhould know what anſwer you give unto Doraliſa, doubtleſs you would have returned her a more civil anſwer. You may think what you pleaſe, Madam, replied he, but I do not think what I ſaid to be any incivility, but that rather it deſerves the name of Reſpect. There is a kind of reſpect ſo hollow and indifferent, replied Doraliſa, as does not at all oblige one: But however, Perinthus, I am more indulgent than you think I am, for I do not complain againſt you? yet notwithſtanding to find out the cauſe of that incivility which the Princeſs doth tax you with, I ſhall keep an obſervant eye over you, to the end I may more plainly diſcover, whether ſuch an accompliſhed man as you are can be, and not be in Love. And ſince my own eye cannot be always over you, I will entreat both all your friends and mine to obſerve you, as well as I will, and to give me an account of your viſits, of your addreſſes, of your words, of your ſtudies, of your melancholies, and if it be poſſible, of your very dreams. For my part, ſaid the Princeſs, I will be the firſt that promiſeth to tell you all I know concerning him. You ſhall when you pleaſe, Madam, replied he, know all that I my ſelf know: No, no, ſaid ſhe, It is not by any verbal relations, but by a hundred paſſages which you never think upon, that I will know how to aſſure Doraliſa you love none. Perinthus is very happy, ſaid Mexaris, in that you will honour him ſo far, as to obſerve his actions. For my part, I ſhould limit my ambition to aſpire no higher than ſuch a favour: What I do for Perinthus, replied the Princeſs, I would not do unto all the world; for truly I do deſire to dive into his heart, becauſe I think there are no ſecrets in it, or at leaſt, none ſuch as I can have any intereſt in. Are you more inquiſitive, Madam, replyed Abradates, after ſuch things as does not concern you, than after ſuch as do? Yes, in ſome things, replyed ſhe, but however, in order to the ſatisfaction of Doraliſa, (added the Princeſs, deſiring to turn the diſcourſe) I do entreat every one here to aid her in the diſcovery of that truth which ſhe deſires to know, and to obſerve Perinthus moſt vigilantly upon all occaſions: Truly, Madam, replyed Perinthus, if there be no paſſion in my Soul, then you put all theſe illuſtrious perſons unto an unprofitable trouble; and if there be any in my Soul, then you expoſe him who has eternally devoted himſelf unto your ſervice, to a moſt ſevere puniſhment: However it be, Perinthus, (replied ſhe) it muſt be ſo: Then did ſhe cauſe every one that was there to promiſe her in particular, to acquaint Doraliſa with all they knew concerning Perinthus: So that Mexaris and Abradates, as well as all the reſt, did promiſe her they would, and thus the poor Perinthus had the misfortune to ſee his Rivals made his Spies; yet could they not find what they ſought after, for their aims were never levelled at that mark which this unfortunate Lover looked at. Thus, Madam, was the firſt day ſpent, in which Abradates diſcovered his paſſion unto the Princeſs Panthea, who ſince that day did prevent all opportunities to talk with him in private, not but that ſhe did highly eſteem him, and perhaps alſo had a good inclination to him: But conſidering the ſtate of his Fortunes, ſhe thought him no convenient match, and therefore ſhe would add no fuel to thoſe flames which ſhe ſaw began to kindle in him, but lived with him after a more reſerved manner than ordinary; yet ſince it was always with much civility, this reſervedneſs was rather a pair of Bellows to blow that fire in his heart, than a means to extinguiſh it: So that the more reſerved Panthea was, the more earneſt was Abradates to ſee her, and follow her in all places; his addreſſes and Courtſhips were not only to her ſelf, but unto her Father alſo, and alſo to get the love of Perinthus, Doraliſa, my ſelf, and all the Servants, even of the meaneſt; and to ſpeak the truth, he obtained his deſires; for except Perinthus, (who could not love him, becauſe he loved the Princeſs) all the World was his: Some he gained by Preſents, others by obliging Language, all by a free, open, and lovely aſpect, which none could reſiſt. Moreover, ſince all his own Servants did ever adore him, they were continually preſenting Elogies in commendation of their Maſter, unto the Servants and Women of the Princeſs. On the other ſide, all the Servants of Mexaris were continually complaining of their Maſters nigerality, and of the little that was to be gotten in his ſervice, ſo that nothing was to be heard in Panthea's Houſe but Commendums of Abradates, and Satyrs againſt his Rival. In the mean time, ſince Mexaris thought the Souls of others to be like his own, he conceived that as a means to move the heart of the Princeſs, and to induce her to receive the firſt proteſtations of his love more favourably, it were firſt expedient to ſhew her the magnificence of all his Treaſures, which, as I have already told you, were almoſt equal to the riches of Crœſſus. Then did he invent how he might get her unto his houſe, under ſome handſome colour, which might not put him unto over much expences: And after he had well thought upon it, he reſolved to invite her to hear the King's Muſick, which would coſt him nothing, in a great vaulted Room, which was very fit for the ſound of Inſtruments; ſo that the propoſition being made by the Princeſs Palmis, whom he deſired to do him that office, it took effect within a few days after. When Doraliſa and I heard that the Prince Mexaris did invite the Princeſs unto this Muſick at his own houſe, then did we believe his Love would break out in good earneſt; and that we ſhould ſee he was not grown unto ſuch an ill habit, but this paſſion might correct him. Then did we long for this day, with as much impatience as was in Abradates and Perinthus; for the firſt of theſe began now to perceive that his Unkle was his Rival, and the other perceived it from the very firſt. In the mean time, ſince the Love of Abradates could not be perſwaded by any reaſon, he prepared himſelf to ſuffer the worſt that could come: Mexaris for his part, made no queſtion but the very ſight of ſuch a vaſt Treaſure would work as much for him as againſt Abradates, when Panthea ſhould ſee it; ſo that he longed for the day and hour when that Aſſembly ſhould be at his Houſe; and he gave ſuch orders, that there ſhould not be one Room in all his Houſe wherein there ſhould not be ſome ſigns of the Riches and Magnificence belonging to the late King of Lydia his Father, who, ſince Mexaris was his Darling, gave him half of all his Treaſures: Nothing could be imagined more magnificent and ſumptuous than all this that was ſhewed unto the Princeſs in this Houſe; for not only all the ground Rooms, all the Chambers and Galleries were moſt richly furniſhed, but alſo there was one Gallery, and three Cloſets full of moſt rare, rich, and precious things, not only Statues and Pictures, but abundance of prodigious Cabinets, Veſſels of Gold and Silver, ſet with precious Stones of an ineſtimable value. There was alſo great Figures of Gold, and Diſhes of Agath, and Oriental Alabaſter, inriched with Diamonds: It may rightly be ſaid, that all the chief works of the Sun and Nature were to be ſeen in that place; Pearls, Emeralds, Diamonds, Rubies, and all manner of precious Stones. After a ſight of all theſe, Mexaris let the Princeſs Panthea ſee one thing more admirable than all theſe; and the principal reaſon why he ſhewed it unto her, I believe, was, becauſe it ſhould give him an occaſion to ſpeak of his Love. I make no queſtion, Madam, but you have heard tell of that famous Ring of Gyges, who, as you know very well, did uſurp the Crown from Heraclides, and who was the firſt King of Lydia, of the Race of Crœſſus: you are not ignorant, I ſay, how it was by means of this Ring that he got upon the Throne, and afterwards, by the miraculous virtue thereof he made himſelf inviſible unto the King Candalus, whoſe life he took away. Alliatte loving Mexaris better than he did Crœſſus, amongſt the reſt of his Treaſuries did leave him this. After this Prince had ſhewed all theſe unto the Princeſs Panthea, he called her unto a Table of pure Gold, ſet with Stones, upon which ſtood a little Cabinet of Agatte, he took out this rare Ring: Madam, ſaid he unto her, after an offer of all theſe things which I have ſhewed you, in offering you the heart of him that owns them, I dare not put this Ring into your hands, leſt, as a puniſhment for my boldneſs, you ſhould deprive me of her ſight who is the faireſt upon Earth; therefore it is requiſite you ſee the experiment of it by the means of ſome other. Though the Princeſs had often heard of the wonderful quality of this Jewel, yet ſhe was much taken with it; when Mexaris called one of his Servants who knew how to hold it, and cauſed him to ſhew its virtue: She obſerved, that when he turned the Stone towards himſelf, he abſolutely vaniſhed out of the ſight of all the Company; ſo that ſhe gave no other anſwer unto the Prince Mexaris but this, that it was impoſſible this could be without Inchantment. All the Company were no leſs amazed than her ſelf; and to ſay truly, the thing is ſo full of wonder, that though one had ſeen it before an hundred times, yet one ſhall be ſtill admiring at it; for as long as any one held this Stone, which is called the Heliotropus, and is found in Ethiopia, one ſhall be abſolutely inviſible.

Is it poſſible, ſaid the Princeſs Araminta, and interrupted her, that it ſhould have ſuch a quality as you ſpeak of? It is moſt certainly true, Madam, replied Pherenice: For my part, ſaid Cyrus, I have long ſince inquired of ſeveral perſons, whether there was any truth in thoſe reports of the virtue in the Heliotropus; and if I may ſpeak it without any incivility unto Pherenice, though a hundred ſeveral perſons have aſſured me that it is very true, yet I muſt confeſs, I had much ado to believe it; tho' when one conſiders the marvellous quality of the Adamant, which attracts Steel with ſo much violence, that it ſeems to aſſume life, and follows it, it muſt be confeſſed, nothing is more to be admired: So the ſight, being of all the ſenſes moſt eaſie to be deluded, it is not impoſſible, but that there may come out of this Stone a certain kind of brightneſs which may dazle the eyes of beholders, or which may beget a kind of Miſt that may cloud the perſon which carries it from the eyes of thoſe that are ſtanders-by. Moreover, there is another Stone called the Amianthus, which every one knows, upon which the fire makes no impreſſion, nor can conſume; this, if well conſidered, is no leſs admirable than the Heliotropus: The brightneſs of a Stone may as well take away the ſight, or at leaſt, ſuſpend the uſe of it, as the Baſilisk can kill with a look. Araminta being convinced by the diſcourſe of Cyrus, concurred with him in opinion, and Pherenice proceeded in her ſtory.

When every one had admired this miracle of Nature, the cauſe whereof was ſo ſecret a myſtery, the Princeſs Panthea would needs take this Ring, though Mexaris was exceedingly againſt it, telling her he could not indure ſhe ſhould be inviſible to him, who of all men in the world took greateſt delight in ſeeing her, yet he could not prevent it, but muſt be contented. After this Ring had wrought its effect in her hands, Doralisa took it, and when ſhe had it, ſhe went and told the Princeſs, ſhe deſired that Mexaris might alwayes wear it. For my part (anſwered Panthea in a low voice) I would not wiſh that for your ſake, for then he might often underſtand all the ill you uſe to ſay of him. In the mean time, Mexaris imagined it to be a ſhort minute of pleaſure to take away the ſight of his Rival from Panthea, and therefore told Doraliſa, that perhaps Abradates would be glad to make the experiment upon himſelf as well as ſhe: Then this Prince taking the Ring, and going to the Princeſs, he told her in ſo low a voice as none could hear, that if Mexaris did not make uſe of this very often in coming to tell her of his paſſion, he was as ſimple as covetous. As the Princeſs could not chuſe but laugh at what Abradates told her, Mexaris knew thereby, that this inviſible man made uſe of his Ring otherwiſe than he wiſhed: So that being vexed that his deſign took no better effect, he could not hold from venting ſome expreſſion of diſpleaſure. But Abradates was ſo pleaſed with vexing his Rival, and ſince Panthea began to laugh, he told her many other things very low, which made her laugh ſo heartily at the chafing of Mexaris, that ſhe could return him no anſwers; yet notwithſtanding ſhe excuſed the matter, and ſaid it was impoſſible not to laugh when ſhe heard one cloſe by her, and could not ſee him. But at length, fearing leſt this Rallary ſhould produce ſome ſad conſequence, ſhe deſired Abradates to reſtore her the Ring, which he did; after which, ſhe gave it to Perinthus, and Perinthus to another, ſo that there was not one in all the company which had not the experiment: But at laſt they reſtored it unto Mexaris, who locked it up very carefully: After which the Muſick began, which was ſeconded with a ſhort collation, ſuitable to the avarice of him that gave it, and very unworthy of the company to whom it was preſented, yet was it ſerved up in 24 Baſons which were the goodlieſt in the world, but his ſlovenly ſervants were ſo thrifty for their maſter, that the leaſt Baſon was worth a hundred of ſuch collations. I leave you to imagine, Madam, whether this was not ſport unto Abradates, Perinthus, and Doraliſa. Methinks (ſaid Doraliſa to me) Mexaris ſhould not have left off his Ring till after this Banquet, but by it have concealed his ſhame to ſee it ſo poor. His beſt courſe had been, ſaid Perinthus, to have made it and himſelf both inviſible: The Princeſs did eaſily gueſs what we talked on, when ſhe turned towards us, and much feared leſt Mexaris ſhould perceive it; ſo that to prevent exceptions, ſhe did fall to a very bad repaſt out of her complaiſance, and told him confidently, that it was an admirable good one: One might eaſily ſee, he hardly believed her, and yet he thought it good enough, becauſe it coſt him but a little; and thus the reſt of the day paſſed on. Mexaris making no queſtion, but that after a ſight of ſo much wealth and fine things, he ſhould find Panthea very gracious unto him, the firſt time he ſpoke of his paſſion unto her. In the mean while, Abradates did emulate his Rival, for having the ſtart of him in entertaining Panthea, and began to think which way he might obtain the like happineſs. For the furtherance of his intention, he found out that there was a great number of Phrygian Muſitians then in Sardis, and you know the Lydian and Phrygian Muſick is conceived to be the rareſt, not only of all Aſia, but all the world, yet thoſe who had heard them both were of various opinions, according unto the conformity of their ſeveral humours to thoſe various harmonies: Thoſe who were of melancholy inclinations, or had paſſionate ſouls, preferred the Lydians; and thoſe whoſe temper were more ſprightly, and pleaſant, gave the prize unto the Phrygian; But all ſides did agree, that both did merit much commendations. Abradates then makeing uſe of this controverſie to bring about his deſign,

did ſo foment the conteſt, that the next day after the entertainment of Mexaris, nothing elſe was diſcourſed upon at the Princeſs of Claſomena's lodging, who, without declaring her ſelf either for the one or the other, only ſaid, That before any exact judgment could be given, it were requiſite to hear them both on the ſame day, with a premeditated intention to obſerve them very well; and that thoſe who were competent Judges in ſuch matters ſhould have knowledg in the art of Muſique, and be impartial perſons. It were requiſite alſo, ſaid Abradates, that to put the Muſicians equally into a good humour, a prize ſhould be propounded unto that ſide which ſhould excel, to the end they might both of them ſtrive to do their beſt. After this, it was thought upon, in what place was the moſt convenient to hear them; and one of the King's houſes, which was about thirty furlongs from the Town, was nam'd moſt convenient. Now ſince all the company did think this only a Propoſition, which would never be put in execution, each one began to order the buſineſs, only to drive on diſcourſe. In the mean while Abradates, who had not ſo lamely contrived the buſineſs as to leave it imperfect, did ſay, that the greateſt defect would be the want of a fit perſon to be a Judg. I do conceive (ſaid Mexaris, who was then with the Princeſs) that there is no great difficulty in that, but where will you find one that will give the Prize unto thoſe who are judged beſt, and be at the charges of the Feaſt? when the perſon who is fit to be a Judge is named, (replyed Abradates, and ſmiled) it will be no great piece of difficulty to find the other; for I think it a much more eaſie matter to find Gold and Jewels, than to find one that is accompliſhed with all requiſite qualities to pronounce Judgment equally in ſuch a nice, and rare buſineſs as this. Yet, Madam, (ſaid he, and looked upon the Princeſs) if you will be pleaſed to take the pains, I am moſt certain it would then be done without injuſtice, for you both know Muſique, and love it, and moſt undoubtedly would be equitable. Mexaris, did approve of this Propoſition, and ſo likewiſe did every one, ſaying, that Abradates ſpoke all reaſon. The Princeſs did deny to take it upon her very reſolutely, and would have perſiſted in that denial, if the Princeſs Palmis had not come in, who hearing of her refuſal, did extreamly condemn her modeſty, and told her, that if ſhe her ſelf did underſtand Muſique as well as ſhe did, ſhe would not deny the deſire. In concluſion, Madam, ſhe conſented, and it was a thing reſolved upon, that three daies hence they ſhould go unto the Caſtle which I told you of before, and that he who made the Propoſition, ſhould provide the Muſique, not imagining there would be any other proviſion. In the mean time, Madam, this generous minded Lover, who was compoſed of Liberality, did not carry it like unto Mexaris; for never was Feaſt more magnificent and gallant. To have a little more time for preparation, Abradates procured the Muſitians to ask five daies more to be added to the other three, that they might better conſort their Muſique: So that as if it was no motion proceeding from Abradates, it was deferred untill then, at which time every one reſorted to the place appointed. I will not give you, Madam, a Catalogue of all that were there, only ſay that the whole Court was preſent; nor will I make any exact deſcription of the magnificence, for the truth is, it was ſuch that I cannot. Let me tell you the entertainment was moſt admirable, both for the neatneſs of the order, and the abundance of every thing rare and delicate that the place and ſeaſon did afford: He alſo prepared a great number of Golden Meddals for that Princeſs, on which her Picture was engraved with a facetious deviſe, that ſhe might give them unto thoſe Muſitians whom ſhe thought moſt worthy. Moreover, as Preſents for the Ladies, he had provided abundance of ſeveral ſorts of moſt curious and delightful Toys, as Perfumes, Sweet Waters, Eſſences, Powders, and ſuch like, which ſhe was to preſent unto thoſe who kept ſilence during the Muſique, or unto thoſe who moſt commended the Muſitians, or unto whom ſhe pleaſed; and ſo under ſeveral pretences of Gallantry and Wit, there was not a Lady, nor any of any Quality, which carried not away ſome ingenuous remembrance of the Feaſt. The Princeſs her ſelf, as well as the reſt, did participate of Abradates his Liberality: And the Muſick, in favour of whom Panthea did not declare her ſelf, alſo received very bountiful Preſents. The Princeſs knowing it, did ask him what difference there was between the Conquerors and the conquered: But his anſwer was, that the Gold which carried her Image, and paſſed through her fair hands, was of a far higher rate than that which paſſed only through his, and which had not the repreſentation of her Beauty: And truly, Madam, it is ſo great a misfortune to want your judicious approbation, that thoſe who had not the honours to obtain it, did ſtand in need of ſome Cordials to comfort them. All this while Mexaris was deſperate to ſee himſelf out-done by the magnificence of Abradates, and to hear all the Ladies commend him. Perinthus alſo at the root of his Heart, was no leſs troubled; for having bounded his deſires that Panthea would love no body, he was exceedingly grieved to ſee Abradates ſo amiable, courtly, and indulgent to move affection: So that for all his forceings of himſelf, he was ſo very melancholly all that day, as Doraliſa took notice of him, and cauſed the Princeſs to obſerve him alſo, who beginning to chide him, did put him to the neceſſity of an anſwer for himſelf: And to colour the matter, he told her, that Muſick ever uſed to have that operation in him, and he could give her no other reaſon. For my part, ſaid Doraliſa, this ſeems to me a certain ſign that you are not the ſame you ſeem to be, for Men of hard and flinty Souls are never ſenſible of Muſick; but without all queſtion, you either are in love, or have been, ſince Harmony has ſuch a power upon your Spirits, that it makes you melancholly. It may be the reaſon is, ſaid the Princeſs, becauſe Perinthus is ſo far from loving, that he hates the Muſick, and is weary of waiting upon it ſo long. Oh, Madam, (cried he out) I had rather Doraliſa ſhould think me ſuch a Man as ſhe looks for, and that they ſhould ſuſpect me to be in love, than to think I am ſo ſtupid, as not to love Muſick: And ſince, Madam, you do love it, and think I hate it, I am afraid you entertain an ill opinion of me. Not at all, replied ſhe, for do you not meet with many very rational Men, who neither love it, nor can endure to hear it. 'Tis true, replied Perinthus, but certainly, ſuch Men, in my apprehenſion, are Men of dull, ſordid Souls, and it ought to be blamed as a great fault. Do you think it a greater fault (ſaid the Prince Atis, who was preſent at this entertainment) to have ears, and not love Muſick, than to have eyes, and not love Beauty, as you have? Perinthus bluſhed at this queſtion, and had been extreamly puzled for an anſwer, if Doraliſa, as good luck was, had not ſaid, No, no, Sir, do not deceive your ſelf, I cannot believe Perinthus to be inſenſible, I did never in my life ſee ſuch a Man as he that was ſo; certainly he does love, let him ſay or do what he will. For my part, ſaid Abradates, (to ſhew his obedience unto the Princeſs, in obſerving Perinthus) I begin to be of Doraliſa's opinion, for I have ſeen him all this day ſo reſerved and retired, that I do not think any paſſion except Love can ſo much alter his humour. Mexaris added, that he had ſeen him pronounce ſome words in a low voice to himſelf alone: Another ſaid, he would often fix his eyes, and muſe, without regard unto any paſſage. And indeed there was not one in all the company which had not ſomething or other, true or falſe, to bring in againſt him, which moved every one to think him in Love, and his Rivals employed all their wits to perſwade the Princeſs of it; yet was all this ſo far from being any addition of happineſs, that on the contrary, it procured him much miſery, inſomuch, as he hath told me ſince, that he was amazed he did not diſcover ſome evident ſymptoms of that paſſion which poſſeſſed his Soul: Yet notwithſtanding all this, he did cunningly diſguiſe it; and thus was the reſt of this day ſpent. But at our return to Sardis, theſe three Adorers of Panthea had thoughts much differing one from another: For Abradates was much joyed that the Princeſs ceſs ſeemed to be pleaſed with his entertainment: Mexaris was vexed to the heart at the liberality of Abradates, and it grieved his ſoul that he had come off in his Courtſhips better than himſelf: But as for the poor Perinthus his ſorrows were unconceiveable, to ſee Abradates ſo compleat a Gallant: yet he would ſometimes comfort himſelf, in hopes that the ſtate of his Fortunes would keep the Prince of Claſomena from beſtowing his Daughter upon him. But alas, ſaid he unto himſelf, the Princeſs may for all that beſtow her heart upon him; yet (would he ſay) ſince her heart muſt never be mine, and ſince I ſhall never dare to ask it, what does it concern me, if Abradates have it? Is it not my duty to wiſh Panthea happy in every thing? And ought I not to deſire, that if ever ſhe marry, it may be unto ſuch a Prince as loves her, and ſhe can love? Yes doubtleſs I ought, if I do conſider my ſelf as a ſervant unto the Prince her Father, who infinitely honors me: But if I conſider my ſelf as Perinthus, who hath loved her from my Cradle, and ſhall do to my Coffin, I cannot chuſe but wiſh that ſhe would never love any; therefore what ſhould I do but oppoſe Abradates in all his deſigns, and favour all the projects of Mexaris, whom I know ſhe can never Love: I will imploy all the credit that I have with the Prince her Father to that end, and I will omit nothing that may ſupplant my Rival that is moſt dangerous out of the heart of Panthea. But do I know well what I ſay? (would he ſuggeſt to himſelf) No, no, I do not; There is ſuch variety of differing apprehenſions in my Soul, that I cannot diſtinguiſh between the ſuggeſtions of my paſſion, and the counſels of my reaſon: Alas (would he ſay, for he hath ſince told me every tittle of his thoughts) can I think that I have any reaſon at all? I, who cannot baniſh from my heart the moſt raſh and ſtubborn paſſion that ever was? but who hath been ſo far from oppoſing it, that I have cheriſhed it as much as poſſibly I could? and yet all this without the leaſt hope, or knowing at what mark I aimed. I ever knew, that I was not loved, and I confeſs my hopes were, that none elſe ever ſhould be; but I ſee Abradates, ſo lovely, that I am afraid he will be loved again, and that I muſt die with deſpair. Theſe Madam were the thoughts of Panthea's three Lovers, who for her part did think much upon Abradates; for beſides her own inclination, both Doraliſa and my ſelf did nothing elſe for three daies together, but harp upon the liberality of Abradates, and the avarice of Mexaris: For my part (ſaid Doraliſa unto the Princeſs, one afternoon when none was with her) I am confident that if this Prince were not in Love, he would not be ſo liberal: But for all that (ſaid I unto her) as much as you attribute unto Love, it muſt be confeſſed, that this paſſion does not produce ſuch good effects in the Prince Mexaris; and by conſequence it muſt be concluded, that Love does not create all vertues in men: 'Tis true, ſaid Doraliſa, yet I conceive that Love does in the hearts of men, as the Sun doth in all places where it ſhines, for the Sun does not plant Roſes, but it ripens and blows them; So Love, it does not give the firſt root and inclinations of virtues, but it makes them grow and flouriſh; and queſtionleſs if Mexaris were not in Love, he would yet be more covetous than he is, he is grown to that height, replyed the Princeſs, that if I ſhould judg of his Love by his liberality, I ſhould not think it very great; yet if the trouble in doing things do ſet a greater prize upon them, replyed Doraliſa, and laughed, you are much more obliged unto Mexaris than Abradates; for certainly that little which he hath done for you, hath ſtuck more upon his ſtomack, than all that his Rival hath done, did upon his: There is no doubt of it, replyed the Princeſs, but his trouble proceeds from the baſeneſs of his Soul: For all that, I conceive it eaſie to maintain (ſaid Doraliſa, who infinitely eſteemed Abradates) that he who gives a little trifle againſt the hair of his diſpoſition, doth more oblige, then he who gives much, and in that gift doth follow his own inclination: You are very witty Doraliſa (replyed the Princeſs) but yet it is no ſuch eaſie matter to defend the humours of a covetous man; and if there were any to judg the matter betwixt us, I dare undertake to maintain againſt you, that avarice is ſo far from ſeting any value upon any act whatſoever it be, that it entirely takes away all that ſuch a one hath done, who is poſſeſſed with that baſe paſſion. If you will be pleaſed to admit of Perinthus for a judg (ſaid Doraliſa, when ſhe ſaw him come into the Chamber) I dare undertake the controverſie, and once in my life diſpute againſt you: I am contented, replyed Panthea, upon condition Perinthus will without any impartial complacence ſpeak his thoughts. That will be ſomething difficult, (replied Perinthus, not yet knowing what they deſired, becauſe he underſtood only their laſt words) but after Doraliſa had acquainted him with the ſubject of their conteſt, he apprehended that the liberality of Abradates, and the avarice of Mexaris, had cauſed the diſpute; ſo that he did refuſe to be Judg in a difference wherein himſelf had a hidden intereſt, though he durſt not reveal it; yet notwithſtanding, the Princeſs did require and exact obedience from him, and he was forced to promiſe that he would judg the matter without any partiality or complacency; and certainly he was as good as his word, as hereafter you ſhall know. After theſe conditions, the Princeſs told Doraliſa that it was her part to declare her reaſon firſt; That I ſhall very eaſily, replyed ſhe, I ſhall only alledg ſome of the ſtrongeſt Arguments, unto which you may reply, and interrupt me when you pleaſe, for I think it a good help unto one that cannot ſpeak very readily, to be often interrupted. Although there is no need of ſuch helps, replyed Perinthus, yet you may chance to have interruption enough, for methinks I ſee the Prince Mexaris coming, and if I be not deceived, Abradates alſo, and indeed they entred one after another preſently after. Though the Princeſs made ſigns unto Doraliſa to turn the diſcourſe another way, yet this crafty Lady ſeeming to miſunderſtand her, continued on: So that Mexaris and Abradates were no ſooner entred, but Doraliſa, in her uſual jocundry began to complain, that they had hindred her of the glory in overcoming the Princeſs, and I wonder Perinthus does not murmur, becauſe you have deprived him of the greateſt honour he ever had in his life. I was ſo unworthy of it; replyed he, and ſhould have ſo ill diſcharged the office, that I am not ſorry it is taken from me. As great an inclination as I have to advance your glory (replied Abradates, unto whom Doraliſa addreſſed her ſpeech) I muſt confeſs I am not ſorry that I have hindred you from overcoming the Princeſs, who, in my opinion, deſerves always to conquer; yet I muſt withal acknowledge my ſelf very ſorry that I have taken any advantage from Perinthus, therefore I beſeech you, acquaint us with the buſineſs: For my particular, ſaid Mexaris, my deſires do ſecond Abradates, to the end, that knowing the injury I have done, I may endeavour a remedy. Since the Princeſs imagined that Doraliſa would out with all, ſhe thought it better to make no ſecret of it; ſo that telling them the matter in controverſie, but not the cauſe upon which it did firſt ariſe, both Princes did ſay, they ſhould have been extreamly ſorry, if they had interrupted ſuch pleaſing diſcourſe; though Mexaris expreſſed himſelf in a much more forced manner than Abradates did; and though he did not think himſelf to be a covetous man, yet I believe, he knew he was far from prodigal. In the mean while, Perinthus, who had ſo many ſecret reſentments in his mind, that he was very ſorry he was preſent, did uſe the beſt endeavours to prevent the giving his opinion upon ſo nice a matter: But Doraliſa, ſeeing the Princeſs permitted her to ſpeak, began thus to argue: Muſt it not be confeſſed, Madam, (ſaid ſhe unto her) that when our friends do no more for us, than what they do every day out of common courſe, we cannot count it the greateſt ſervice they can do us; and on the contrary, when we move them to do ſuch things for us as go againſt the grain of their diſpoſitions, we are more obliged unto them for doing things againſt their wills, than for doing things which is a Pleaſure to them in doing. This being thus, it muſt needs be confeſſed, that a covetous man who gives little, does more oblige one, than a liberal man who gives much, ſince the one hath much grief, the other much pleaſure in giving. Truly Doraliſa, ſaid the Princeſs, ſince you allowed me to interrupt you, I cannot forbear; for I cannot allow, that becauſe my friend is guilty of a moſt abominable vice, therefore I ſhould be at all obliged unto him for that little which he beſtows, more than unto him who is owner of an Heroick virtue: No, no, Doraliſa, do not deceive your ſelf, for there is no Juſtice or equity in it. Yet, Madam, (replied Doraliſa) is there no recompence due unto this poor covetous man, for all the pain he puts himſelf unto in beſtowing his little: I do not ſay, that he who gives againſt his mind deſerves more commendations than the other, I am not ſo far out of my wits, but I do affirm, that he who loves that which he gives, and grieves for the parting from it, and cannot give it, unleſs it grate his heart, ſuch a one, I ſay, does give greater teſtimony of his affection, than he who out of his generoſity only can beſtow great Preſents upon his very enemies: I do concur with you, ſaid the Princeſs, that what you alledge, may upon ſome certain occaſions hold true, and that it is not impoſſible to find ſome covetous man, who in giving little, may love better than another that gives much; but though I grant this, yet I muſt maintain, that he who gives with a grudge, does take away all the heart of his Preſent, and deſerves no thanks: I know very well, Madam, (ſaid crafty Doraliſa) that in caſes of Love, he who has not a heart to give all he poſſeſſeth, does Love but imperfectly; but in caſe of ordinary friends, it is but juſt to thank a covetous perſon, for the trouble he puts himſelf unto in being at any expences for us: No, no, replied the Princeſs, never ſeparate Love and friendſhip in this caſe, for he who is a miſerable Lover, will never make a liberal friend. Then Mexaris not being able to contain any longer, I pray tell me, ſaid he, if it be a fault in a Lover not to be liberal, is it commendable in a Lady to love gifts: By no means, replied the Princeſs, I equally condemn them both, yet of the two, the Lady more than the Lover: I am of the Princeſs's mind in that, replied Doraliſa: However (ſaid Abradates) He who is a Lover, muſt have a ſoul able to beſtow all: If ſo (replied Mexaris) what difference between it and prodigality? The difference is in this (replied Abradates) that the Prodigal does give without either choice or judgment, which he who gives all unto her whom he thinks worthy of his affection, doth not; for he who gives his heart, may eaſily give all the reſt which is not ſo precious. This is not our queſtion, ſaid Doraliſa, my Argument in favour of this poor covetous man is this, that his ſufferings when he gives any thing, ſupplies the ſmallneſs of his gift: Though I ſhould grant this, replied the Princeſs Panthea, and acknowledge, that ſome acknowledgments were due unto ſuch a one for all the pain which he endures, yet I could not chuſe but at the ſame time have an extream averſion towards him: How is it poſſible, Madam, replied Doraliſa, that gratitude and averſion ſhould be in the ſame heart at the ſame time? It is not at all impoſſible, anſwered Panthea, for one may acknowledge a benefit, and ſcorn the benefactor. Theſe two are ſo conjunct, replied ſhe, that I do not underſtand how they can be ſeparated: However it is not juſt, that he who loves his treaſures above his life, ſhould beſtow them upon an ungrateful perſon: It would be as unjuſt in me, to be friendly unto him that ſhall prefer in his heart ſuch things as are unworthy of paſſionate Love before me; and to ſpeak rationally, all thoſe ſufferings and troubles which you mention in a covetous man, are ſtrong inducements and reaſons not to value his gifts; but on the other ſide, to conſider them as ſome bargain or exchange which he expects I ſhould return in lieu thereof, and look upon him as a man that has ſecret ends, and would not give but to receive again: I beſeech you, Madam, ſaid Doraliſa, do not dive too deep into the heart of a covetous man, for there is nothing to be found that is good: But grant me only this, that his regret in giving, is a ſtronger argument of his Love and affection, than the freeneſs and facility of a liberal man can be in him. I can by no means grant ſo far, replied the Princeſs, for I am fully perſwaded that a covetous man loves nothing but his coyn and riches, and therefore, I can never be obliged unto him: Pronounce judgment then (ſaid Doraliſa to Perinthus) for I am ſo weary of maintaining a bad cauſe, that I had rather loſe it, than precious time in giving bad reaſons for it: Since by your own words it appears you are of the ſame opinion with the Princeſs (anſwered Perinthus) there needs no judgment to be given: However pronounce it, replied Panthea, for I had rather get the better of the cauſe by the equity of my Judge, than the weakneſs of my Adverſary: Since you command it (ſaid Perinthus in favour of Mexaris) I ſhall condemn you both: Doraliſa, for defending a good cauſe ſo ill, and you, Madam, becauſe you would have a man, who does all he can, loſe the merit of that little which he gives, and which coſt him more than that which the liberal beſtows: I pronounce then, that ſometimes one may put a favourable conſtruction upon the great affection that may be in a little gift; and ſometimes it is not requiſite to proportion gratitude according to the richneſs of the gift, ſince, if he from whom we receive it, did confer it only for his own glory, we are not ſo much obliged unto him, as unto one who does not give but only for the Love of us, and who contends and ſtrives with himſelf to pleaſure us. Indeed, Perinthus (ſaid the Princeſs, after he had done ſpeaking) I did not think you would have given ſentence againſt me. If I had not received your commands (replied he) to lay aſide all partiality and complacence, I had not then done ſo, but ſhould have pronounced as you pleaſed: Rather ſay (replied ſhe) that it argues more ability and wit to maintain a bad cauſe, and in taking an ill ſide than a good one. However, ſince I am perſwaded you do not think as you ſay, I will pardon you. Pray, Madam, ſaid Mexaris, are you as great a hater of Prodigality as Avarice? I know very well, anſwered ſhe, that the one is a Vice as well as the other; but I muſt ingenuouſly ly confeſs, that I am not ſo averſe to a prodigal man as to a covetous; and the ſame temper which prompts one to give, and to eſteem thoſe which give, does prompt one to hate to be a receiver. All this argues, ſaid Doraliſa, that it is moſt convenient for a covetous Lover to have a liberal Miſtreſs. I am confident, replied Mexaris, that though it be better being the Miſtreſs of a Prodigal than a miſerable man, yet it is better being the Wife of a miſerable than a prodigal man: and I am confident (replied Abradates) that a profuſe prodigal in the very concluſion of his Riot, is not ſo poor as a covetous rich wretch; for to what end does he hoard up all his Treaſures, when as he dares not ſo much as touch them? It is ample ſatisfaction, replied Mexaris, to know that he poſſeſſeth them; or rather (replied Doraliſa,) that they Poſſeſs him. I perceive (replied Mexaris, having a deſire to divert this diſcourſe) that if this compleat Gallant which Doraliſa looks for be not liberal, though he never was in Love, yet he ſhall never move her heart: There is no queſtion of it (replied ſhe) for certainly that virtue is rarely found in one of thoſe that never were in Love; but Love infuſeth more liberality in one quarter of an hour, than all the ſtudy of Philoſophy can in ten years. I do not wonder (ſaid Abradates) that you who have an opinion that Love inſpires all virtues, ſhould think the ſame which you ſpeak: But I would entreat you to tell me, why there are ſo many rare accompliſhed Ladies who never were in Love, and why it is more requiſite for men to be accompliſhed? The reaſon is, Sir, replied ſhe, becauſe their cares to pleaſe doth refine and poliſh the wits of men, and this care does not ſuit with the Sex of Ladies, whom Nature hath made amiable without other helps. If there want nothing to make up a compleat man (replied this Prince) but to endeavour to pleaſe, I know one that would be more exact than ever any was. Abradates, in ſaying ſo, look'd upon Panthea, who meeting her eyes with his, could not chuſe but bluſh, and did thereby let him know, that ſhe applied his words unto the ſame end that he deſired. The alteration in her countenance was not only obſerved by Abradates, but by Mexaris, and Perinthus: The firſt of theſe was red with anger, th other pale with ſorrow; and this trivial paſſage o almoſt no conſideration, did ſo take up the minds o theſe four perſons, that the converſation was qui ſpoiled. Panthea was vexed to the Soul that ſhe ſhou bluſh, becauſe ſhe ſaw Abradates obſerved it: Th Prince made a conſtruction of this bluſh in favo to himſelf. Mexaris on the other ſide did interpre it unto his advantage: Perinthus, without any queſtion how to expound the meaning of it, did ſo certainly conclude, that Panthea had an inclination towards Abradates, that he became more miſerab than he was before: For though redneſs be ſom times a ſign of anger as well as Love, yet the eyes o a Lover are too ſubtil to be deceived: Alſo Perinthus did ſo narrowly obſerve how the redneſs o Panthea did only adorn her, and not ruffle her coutenance as an effect of choler; for there is a gre difference between ſuch a redneſs, and that whi proceeds only from modeſty, or elſe from ſuch a kin of weakneſs as I dare not name, ſince thoſe who a capable of it, do not call it ſo. In the mean ti the company parted, every one carried that ev which tormented him in his own heart, only Dorliſa excepted, whoſe pleaſant humours would n ſuffer her to forge Mountain miſeries out of moleh matters; and therefore ſhe went as merry home, a Mexaris and Perinthus did melancholy; yet Mexar did verily believe, that if he would demand Panth in Marriage from the Prince of Claſomena, he ſhou eaſily obtain her; but he believed that Crœſſus out o ſome politick reaſons of State did not deſire th match, fearing leſt the Principality of Claſomena bei in the hands of the richeſt Prince in all Lydia, ſhou after his death raiſe Civil War; ſo that Mexaris apprehended this as ſome obſtacle, and therefor would not publiſh his deſign, until he had broug it ſo forwards, that he might execute it, whethe

Crœſus would or no. And in order to this, there was a neceſſity of gaining the heart of Panthea, and the conſent of the Prince her Father, that he might have a place of retreat when need ſhould be, and therefore he courted all occaſions to obtain it. Abradates, who knew that Crœſus would never conſent Mexaris ſhould marry Panthea, drew from thence ſome hopes for himſelf, though he fear'd the Prince of Claſomena would not be againſt it; but his fears were higher, leſt Panthea ſhould be gracious to him: He knew by a hundred circumſtances, that ſhe eſteemed him more than ſhe did Mexaris; but he found ſo much reſervedneſs in her humour, and ſuch ſeverity in her carriage towards him, ſince that day he diſcovered his paſſion unto her, that he was a tormented Lover, though leſs than Perinthus, who which way ſoever he looked, ſaw nothing but misfortunes, and ſad thoughts had ſo dulled his Soul, that he became extremely melancholy, and ſo deeply, that Doraliſa by a hundred circumſtances, which would be too long to relate, knew that he was in Love; and being raviſhed with joy, that ſhe was now able to maintain there never was a compleat man known, and not amorous, that ſhe did not only tell the Princeſs, but all the World, and indeed ſo far, that it was grown to a general belief Perinthus was in Love, but the difficulty was to know with whom. The Princeſs thought it to be with ſome Beauty in Claſomen, and that the melancholy which hung ſo heavy upon his Soul, had no other cauſe but abſence. But Doraliſa, who for her ſport had obſerved him moſt narrowly, ſhe affirmed it was not at Claſomena, and that ſhe was certian of it: For the Prince of Claſomena deſired to employ him upon ſome buſineſs of conſequence thither; and we know that he was very earneſt to beg excuſe, and was importunate until he obtained it; ſo that this is an undeniable argument his Love leans towards Sardis. The greateſt matter of wonder to the Princeſs was, that he could never be diſcovered to make any applications of Courtſhip unto any one: 'Tis true, he ſaw Doraliſa very often; but though he did much reſpect her, yet ſhe never ſaw any ſigns of paſſion. However Perinthus loſt th opinion of inſenſibility, though there was not a who could ſuſpect the true cauſe of his Love. Abo this time, the Prince Atis married Anaxilea, wi whom I think I told you he was in Love; ſo that th Court was full of Feaſts, and all manner of Deligh and Gallantry; yet notwithſtanding, though Mexa received the knowledge from the mouth of the Pri ceſs whom he loved, that ſhe had a ſtrong averſio towards all covetous men, yet was he not one jot th more magnificent; yet ſomething he had which w a little more than ordinary, but it was ſo very littl that it was hardly ſeen. The Prince Atis, Arteſila Adraſtus, Cleander, and Abradates, did all of them i gallant emulation vie who ſhould excel in bravery

But Mexaris was very willing to be excelled in poi of magnificence, and always ſubmitted to the lowe of his Rivals in matters of charge: For if he an time did keep the Ball, the company expected dir Rooms, cold Collations, and mean Muſick; for ſin the liberality of him that was to pay them, did n incite them, their Harmony was ſo negligent, th time in Dances could hardly be kept at his houſe. O the other ſide, when Abradates gave any entertai ment to the Court, or rather to the Princeſs Panthe the very ſame Muſick which marred Dancing at th houſe of Mexaris, played with life, and admirable c dency at the houſe of Abradates; a ſprightly Harmo ny did inſpire the heart when he kept the Ball
The Ladies ſeemed more fair, as well becauſe the were always more curious and gay in their dreſſe as becauſe the room was more lightſom and nea and indeed every thing was ordered incomparab better at his houſe, than at the houſe of Mexari or any where elſe; for Abradates had an Ayr a a Genius ſo fit for all the Ceremonies and Honou of an Aſſembly, that his very preſence only did i ſpire with joy and delight. You may eaſily concei Madam, that the Princeſs being of an excellent Sp rit and ingenuity, could not poſſibly deny her e ſteem unto Abradates; and in all places where h

had the freedom of diſcourſe with her, though but a moment, though ſhe ſhunned it, yet was he prudent enough to hit upon convenient opportunities in expreſſing ſome marks of his affection, without any failing in thoſe reſpects which were due. Beſides the Hunting, whereof we ſpoke before, and beſides the Muſick entertainment, and beſides ſeveral Balls which he kept: He had one more, and it was Races with Chariots, which was one of the moſt magnificent Sports in the World, and the moſt delighting to behold. For be pleaſed to imagine, that you ſaw in a Front before you, a hundred little Chariots of Triumph, gliſtering like the Rays of the Sun; imagine theſe Chariots drawn by the fineſt Horſes eye e're beheld, and in every one of them a man moſt glorioully habited, who in one hand holds the Reins of the Horſes, which were made of tiſſue of gold, and in the other hand a long Javeline adorned with many precious Stones, who exaſperating the Horſes by the courage of his voice, they make the Ayr eccho as loud as a thouſand Inſtruments of War: At the end of the Race were Scaffolds erected unto ſtately Tents for the Ladies, and where the Garland of Victory is given unto thoſe that triumph by the hands of her who is choſen to beſtow it, by him who makes the entertainment. This, Madam, is the manner of Chariot Races at Sardis. One day there chanced an accident which was very pleaſant unto all the company, for on that day Abradates and Cleander did both of them equally win the Garland: And the Chariot of poor Mexaris, which doubtleſs was only an old one newly burniſhed up, chanced to break in the middle of the Race. This chance made miſerable Perinthus more melancholy, who ſince he was not one of them that did run, he did ſtand in the Scaffold of the Princeſs, and obſerved her joy at the diſgrace of Mexaris, and at the Victory of Abradates; ſo that now he made no queſtion but this Prince had ſome ſhare in her heart, and ſo that in the midſt of all this publick joy, Perinthus was moſt ſadly

melancholy: Not long after all theſe univerſal jo were turned into ſorrows for the fatal death of t
Prince Atis, which grieved all the Court, eſpecial Abradates, for he did not only lament the loſs of Prince who had moſt excellent qualities, and fro whom he expected his protection; but alſo by his dea he looked upon Mexaris as one ſtep nearer the Thro which by conſeqence might reflect upon t heart of Panthea, and become a great obſtacle his deſign, not but that the Prince Antaleon was y alive; yet for all that, he eſteemed it a great a vantage unto his Rival to be a ſtep nearer a Cro than he was before; and I believe this conſidera tion was a Cordial unto Mexaris to comfort him f the loſs of his Nephew: A while after, a ne misfortune chanced unto Abradates, which w that Crœſſus reſolving to beſiege Epheſus, would n nominate either Antaleon, or Mexaris, or Arteſil his Lieutenants Generals, but made choice Cleander for it, telling Abradates, he would have o fered him this employment, if the Queen of Suſ na had not ſent him word, that ſhe was in hopes making his peace very ſhortly: So Abradates bei without any pretence of diſcontent, as Mexaris ha
he was forced to go unto the Wars, at a ti when his Rival was to ſtay behind with Panthea: P rinthus alſo grieved to be ſo far off the only o
he loved; but though Mexaris was left with h yet ſince Abradates was to be abſent as well as hi ſelf, his heart was more at eaſe. In the me while Abradates not being able to depart before did more preciſely know upon what terms ſtood in the heart of Panthea, he ſought all o portunities to talk in private with her; yet ſince did carefully avoid it, and Perinthus for his own in reſt did as much prevent it as he could, he found it ry difficult: For, Madam, be pleaſed to know, t this ſecret adorer of the Princeſs had found out an ad
rable device, that ſhe ſhould never be alone, when Ab dates came to ſee her; and thus he contrived it. Firſt told three or four Ladies of Quality whom the Princ

did really eſteem, and told them in great ſecret, that ſhe loved them with abundance of tenderneſs, and that they would infinitely pleaſe the Princeſs in viſiting her very often: Afterwards he promiſed them to be ſo officious as to acquaint them, when ſhe was moſt at leaſure to entertain them, and had leaſt company with her; and indeed he ſent ſo often to ſome one or other of them, that the Love-ſick Abradates could never meet with a fit opportunity to ſpeak with her in private, yet he did not ſo much accuſe his miſery as his misfortune, but knew not that it was cauſed by a Rival as miſerable as himſelf: But at laſt finding Panthea walking in the Gardens of the Kings Palace, ſhe could not avoid his company: As good luck for him was, Mexaris was not there, and as ill luck for Perinthus was, he met him here, and he led Doraliſa by the hand, who was walking with the Princeſs; yet notwithſtanding he could not in civility moleſt the converſation of two perſons of ſuch a Quality: Doraliſa told me ſince, that when Abradates preſented his hand unto the Princeſs, Perinthus did for a while let go his, yet preſently after recollecting himſelf, he took her hand again; but he was ſo much tranſported when they two talked together, that he knew not what he either ſaid or did: Sometimes when his imagination told him, that Abradates was ſpeaking of his Love to the Princeſs, he would gripe the hand of Doraliſa ſo hard for very ſpite and anger, that he would extreamly hurt her. Since Doraliſa was one of an excellent wit, and had ever found Perinthus a moſt wiſe and prudent man, and the moſt orderly civil in the world, ſhe was now much ſurprized at this paſſage: And he looking upon Doraliſa, did find that his paſſion was too ſtrong for him, and that he had diſcovered ſome ſignes of it; ſo that not knowing how to diſſemble the matter, he took the firſt pretence that came into his mind. It is very unfortunate (ſaid he unto her) that Abradates ſhould at this time come to diſturb that pleaſure which I took in theſe walks, for I cannot look upon him, but I muſt needs remen ber, that when we parted the laſt time, I then rece ved ſome Orders from the Prince Claſomena concer ing a buſineſs of great conſequence, which now force me much againſt my will to leave you very uncivilly

I conceive, ſaid Doraliſa, that in lieu of complaini againſt Abradates, you ſhould be glad of his comin to put you in memory of what you had otherwiſe fo gotten: But I conceive (ſaid he, and parted from he at the end of the Walk) that I have cauſe to accu him, ſince he is the cauſe that I muſt part from yo about that which does not half pleaſe me: All th Perinthus ſaid unto Doraliſa, was not at all ſatisfacto to her, yet notwithſtanding, there was ſo little rea ſon to think, that thoſe turbulencies which ſhe ſaw i his mind, ſhould have their original from any paſſio which the Princeſs ſhould cauſe, that ſhe would no yet believe it, but reſolved to enquire whether Pe
rinthus, after he parted from her, had really bee about any ſuch important buſineſs as he pretended During this paſſage, Abradates, not to loſe a minute o his precious time, was no ſooner with the Princeſs but beginning to ſpeak; Madam, ſaid he unto her, I have one favour to ask you, which I hope you wil not deny. Since I make no queſtion but what you de-ſire of me is juſt, replied the Princeſs, I think yo need not fear denials: Indeed I cannot chuſe but fea (ſaid he to her) though upon examination of my thoughts I apprehend no leſs fears that you will gran my requeſt, than that you will deny me: If you fea to obtain that which you would ask, replied Panthea your beſt courſe is not to ask it: That would not be juſt, replied he; For truly, Madam, being upon the point of departure, my deſires are ſo violent to know upon what terms I ſtand in your opinion, that I cannot take my leave of you, unleſs you do me the favour to inform me: But withal being conſcious of my own unworthineſs, I am afraid, and that with much reaſon, that if you do not grant my deſires you will force me into ſuch deſpair, as I dare not ſo much as look upon you, leſt I ſhould find the though of your heart in your fair eyes. However, Madam, (ſaid he, not giving her leiſure to interrupt him) give me leave to let you know before you ſpeak, that whatſoever you either will, or can ſpeak unto me, I ſhall for ever adore you, with a moſt unequall'd paſſion; and that as I have loved you from the very firſt inſtant I ſaw you, ſo I ſhall love you to the laſt minute of my life: Therefore, never think, I beſeech you, that by being rigorous, you can chaſe out of my heart that paſſion which the faireſt eyes upon Earth have created in it: No, no, Madam, it is impoſſible, all your power is not able to reach ſo far; doubtleſs you may make me the moſt happy or miſerable man alive, but you cannot hinder me from being eternally yours, and more yours than my own: Tell me then, I beſeech you, Madam, how I ſtand in your thoughts, and whether it be permitted me to hope I am in a better condition than Mexaris? Mexaris, replied ſhe, is a great Prince, whom I reverence with all reſpect due unto his Quality: But as for Abradates, he is not well adviſed to eradicate that himſelf which his own merit had planted in my heart, and which, if he had not, I ſhould have infinitely eſteemed him; but in the humour that now I am in, he hath put a great obſtacle unto that friendſhip which I reſerved for him, by ſpeaking to me as he hath done. Is it poſſible, Madam, (ſaid Abradates) that I ſhould have been higher in your eſteem, if I had not given you any teſtimonies of my Love? If ſo, certainly I am the moſt happy Man alive, and I have no more to ask: Deceive not your ſelf, Abradates, replied the Princeſs, for I am fully perſwaded, that ſince you have took ſo much boldneſs as to ſpeak what you have done, you do not eſteem me enough: I know not whether I have told you before, but I ſee that though I ſhould tell it a hundred times, yet all would be over little to perſwade you, that though I do infinitely eſteem thoſe excellent Qualities which are in you, yet ſince you do not eſteem me ſo much as I deſire to be, I cannot think my ſelf at all obliged unto you for that affection which you tell is in you. Alas, Madam, replied

Plyed Abradates, what higher teſtimony of a gre eſteem can be given unto any, than to give on entire heart, to make you abſolute Miſtreſs of my d ſtiny, and who would neither live nor die, but accor
ing to your Dictates and Decrees: In theſe reſolutio
I appear proſtrate before you, Madam; and can you f
I do not enough eſteem you? You know very we Madam, that your eyes did never afford me one f vourable look; what would you have me do now I a ready to depart, and leave ſuch a Prince as Mexa is at Sardis. However, Madam, though you will n be pleaſed to let me know how I am in your though yet I beſeech you let me know at the leaſt what pla my Rival holds there; for if he be but upon wo conditions than my ſelf, I proteſt I ſhall depart wit out any murmur, and without asking any further f vour. If there want nothing but that ingenuous D claration to ſatisfie you, replyed the Princeſs, a ſmiled, I pray leave me at reſt, and keep your ſelf alſo. In the mean time, know Abradates, (ſaid ſh and aſſumed a more ſerious look) that perſons of Quality and Virtue never uſe to diſpoſe of themſelv but to ſuit themſelves and minds unto their Fo tunes: therefore though I had a diſpoſition to you love me, yet I would never permit it, until were in a condition that I might do it innocently, a without impudence. After this, I have no more ſay, unleſs this, that you will much oblige me, if y will not force me to fly your company. As Abrad was ready to reply, the Princeſs Palmis came in, a broke off the diſcourſe: And as we were then in a gr walk of Cypreſs Trees, planted ſo cloſe to one a ther, that they made a very thick hedge: It chan as I caſt my eyes upon a place where I ſaw the Bou to ſhake, I perceived Perinthus lurking and look through: I no ſooner ſpied him, but I ſhewed h Doraliſa, which did much amaze her, that he ſho be ſo earneſt to leave her to that end: Perin alſo was at an extream nonplus, and told her, t as he was going out of the Garden, he met w him whom he had intended to go unto about

buſineſs, which being done, he returned into the Garden again, and taking into another walk before he was aware, he had a mind to ſee whether any had come in to ſupply his place ſince he went out, before he entered again. I underſtood you very well Perinthus (ſaid ſhe unto him) you think to make me conceal your incivility by this excuſe, but truly you muſt invent a better before you prevail. Perinthus being in a terrible fear that Doraliſa ſhould go and acquaint the Princeſs and others with the diſorder which ſhe diſcovered in his Spirit, beſeeched her that ſhe would honour him with her hand again; then putting the Boughs of the Cypreſs cloſe again, he began to conjure Doraliſa in a low voice, not to ſpeak unto any of the diſorder which ſhe diſcovered in his ſoul: I promiſe you that I will not, replyed ſhe, upon condition that you will acquaint me with the true cauſe, or to ſay better, confeſs it unto me, for to tell you truly, I am confident you are in Love with the Princeſs. Ah Doraliſa (cryed he out) I muſt truſt my ſelf unto your diſcretion, but I do conjure you Doraliſa, in the name of the Gods, that you do not diſcover it: I promiſe you I will not, ſaid ſhe unto him, upon condition you will be ingenuous and ſincere: Know then purſued Perinthus, that the Prince of Claſomena underſtanding that Mexaris and Abradates were both in Love with Panthea, he apprehended much joy for the firſt of theſe, and much ſorrow for the ſecond; and therefore he abſolutely commanded me to diſcover if I could, the true apprehenſions of the Princeſs his Daughter, and if it were poſſible, to prevent Abradates from having any private diſcourſe with her; yet I can ſafely ſwear unto you, that yet I have not told the leaſt circumſtance of any thing unto the Prince her Father: For ſince I am one who admires, and infinitely honour her, I could not become her Spy; yet I muſt ingenuouſly confeſs, that ſince he is here, I cannot chuſe but be angry, and ſince I could not remedy it, I thought it my beſt to retreat, leſt if the Prince ſhould chance to come, he ſhould think me ſo far from being his informer, I was a concealer of things from him, and that was my reaſon why I woul not be in the ſame walk where they were. But Perinthus, ſaid Doraliſa, ſince you have no deſign to pre judice the Princeſs, what was your reaſon for hidin your ſelf ſo cloſely amongſt the Cypreſs Trees, an to obſerve her actions ſo preciſely and cloſely? I di endeavour to inform my ſelf of the truth (replye

he) to the end I might better know how to behav my ſelf between Mexaris and Abradates. Their me rits are ſo different (replyed Doraliſa) that you migh very well gueſs her thoughts of them, without takin ſuch pains as to obſerve her actions: It is very tru replyed Perinthus, and ſo I do, yet ſince the preſe condition of their two Fortunes is ſo different, I ca not chuſe but be byaſſed in my wiſhes; and methin the fair Doraliſa, for her own intereſt, ſhould deſi that the Princeſs ſhould rather remain in the Lydi Court, than go ſo far off as Suſa. In the mean time
I conjure you not to diſcover me, and to believe tha
I will never either ſay or do any thing, which ſha be againſt thoſe reſpects which I owe unto the Pri ceſs. Doraliſa lent an ear unto all this long diſcour of Perinthus, but knew not whether ſhe ſhould belie him or no; for when ſhe remembred the perplexi which ſhe diſcovered in his mind when Abradates fir came, ſhe could not doubt but that he was in Lov with Panthea: But when ſhe conſidered the little pro bability that ſuch a man as he ſhould dare to nouri ſuch thoughts as thoſe in his heart, ſhe gave cred unto his words, yet her faith in them was not ſtrong, but ſhe was often apt to alter her opinio However, ſhe reſolved not to ſpeak of any of the paſſages: for ſaid ſhe, if Perinthus do love Panth
he is ſo unfortunate in it, that I need not loaden hi with more miſery, by inconſiderately telling the Pri ceſs of that which perhaps he will never tell h himſelf: And if it be as he tells me, I will not ſpe of it neither, ſince thereby I ſhall prejudice Ab dates, whom I infinitely eſteem. Perinthus for his p was well pleaſed with the handſom lye which he h

invented, which truly upon ſuch a ſuddain was very ingenious; for if Doraliſa was faithful, and did not ſpeak of it, he was ſafe and at quiet, or if ſhe did tattle any thing to the Princeſs, his hope was, that ſince ſhe would believe the Prince her Father did diſapprove of the Love of Abradates, ſhe would happily and cunningly reject it. And thus the walk continued without much diſcontent, for to ſay the truth, the Princeſs was not ſorry at her hearr that Abradates was in Love with her: This Prince, for his part, thought the favour he obtained to be very high, in that he heard Panthea her ſelf pronounce him happier than his Rival Mexaris was: Perinthus alſo thought he had eſcaped a great danger, ſince he had put a handſom gloſs upon the imprudent diſcovery of his paſſion, ſo that there was none but Doraliſa who was not reaſonably well ſatisfied, and ſhe was a little perplexed, that ſhe could not tell well what to believe of Perinthus. After this, Abradates could not have any more private diſcourſe with Panthea, and he muſt content himſelf to bid her adieu before much company, ſo that he durſt not make half his ſorrows appear in his eyes when he parted. As for Perinthus, ſince he was one of the houſe, he enjoyed the ſight of his Princeſs with as much freedom as he could wiſh, but it was ſuch a freedom as did him no good, ſince he durſt not make uſe of it to expreſs the paſſion of his ſoul unto her, but was forced to hide it with all poſſible care; yet in ſpite of all his cares, his melancholly would appear moſt viſible, but ſince friendſhip might produce it as well as Love, the Princeſs would not interpret that to be the cauſe, which would have been extreamly offenſive to her, if ſhe had known the cauſe. Doraliſa was not preſent when he took his leave, and it was happy for him ſhe was not; for ſince ſhe had already ſome ſuſpition of the truth, doubtleſs ſhe would have palpably perceived, that his ſorrows proceeded from a more tender cauſe than matter of friendſhip: When he was gone out of the Princeſs's Chamber, ſhe called him back, and enjoyned him to write (as often as any opportunities would permit him) all the news from the Army; and in return, ſaid ſhe unto him, I will oblige Doraliſa to anſwer you, though I ſhall not, and to ſend you the news of Sardis. At the firſt, Perinthus was much raviſhed with theſe commands; but when he began to conſider that this favour had never been conferred upon him, but to take all ſuſpicions away that ſhe was ſo dear unto him as ſhe was, his joyes were leſs; yet on the other ſide, when he conſidered it to be a favour, which all his Rivals, as great Princes as they were, could never obtain, he cheared up himſelf, and was leſs grieved. Moreover, ſince that Rival which he moſt feared ſhould be abſent as well as himſelf, it troubled him the leſs: Alſo he went to bid adieu unto Doraliſa, with a mind that was free and jocund enough for a zealous Lover that was to depart: 'Tis true, he was as careful as poſſible he could to diſſemble his thoughts at this time, when indeed he ſtood in need of all his art: For Doraliſa, upon premeditated thoughts, told him a hundred paſſages, which would have extreamly troubled one to anſwer that was leſs ſubtil than himſelf: But he replyed unto every thing with ſuch Spirit, that ſhe found nothing but what did increaſe her doubts. In the mean while, as the Princeſs of Claſſomenia was a little melancholy for the departure of Abradates, ſo Mexaris was as joyſul as poſſible could be, yet he found no better entertainment from Panthea; but on the other ſide, ſhe did as far as civility would permit, expreſs more coldneſs to him in the abſence of Abradates than ſhe did before; and ſhe treated him with ſuch hollow indifferency, as almoſt ſhewed him the way to deſpair, and which moved him unto many things that troubled Panthea; for when he found that the more obſequious he was, the leſs gracious he found her, he reſolved to tranſact ſecretly with the Prince her Father; but yet notwithſtanding, he viſited and waited upon her with all aſſiduity, though Doraliſa, by order from the Princeſs, did bolt out a hundred crafty paſſages, which ſurely were nothing pleaſing unto him, continually ſaying, That Sardis now was no more than a Deſart, ſince the Camp had exhauſted it, and that it was better being in the Country by a hundred degrees, than there where there is none conſiderable in the Court: But let her ſay what ſhe could, he would not be baniſhed, but did continually torment us with his company, yet had he wit and Spirit enough; but yet this baſe diſpoſition which raigned ſo tyrannically in his heart, and which made him think all loſt that he gave or ſpent, made every one not eſteem him. Moreover, the affection which every one bore Abradates did augment their averſion to Mexaris, ſo that it is no wonder the Princeſs ſhould not love that Prince whom no body loved: And on the other ſide, it had been a miracle if ſhe had either hated or forgotten Abradates, whom all the world did ſpeak of with a high eſteem, and whom ſhe knew did love her with a moſt violent paſſion; and you may aſſure your ſelf he was neither hated nor forgotten during all the Epheſian War, no nor the Myſian and Phrygian War: Fame did Trumpet his valour ſo highly in his commendation during his abſence, that it may be ſaid he was no leſs obliged unto his own courage and valour, than unto the Princeſs for this favour toward him. As long as the War laſted, Perinthus failed not to write unto the Princeſs: But ſince he was a man of a moſt generous ſoul, you may imagine him a little troubled to pay that obedience; for how could he relate all the paſſages of the Army, and not mention all the glorious acts of Abradates, who as well as Cleander, did raiſe himſelf unto a high pitch of eminency? And how could he find a Genius to commend a Rival, and help him to conquer the heart of Panthea? His way was commonly to ſpeak of things in general, without particularizing the actions of any one, contenting himſelf to ſay only, that the Enemy was beaten, and to declare only the advantages of the Army, as preſuppoſing that the Princeſs deſired news to no other end, but as things related to the intereſt and good of the State:

that in all the relations which Perinthus made unto the Princeſs, the name of Abradates was never uſed but only once, and that too againſt his will, which chanced thus: Two or three days after the taking of Epheſus, Perinthus having almoſt finiſhed his Letter to the Princeſs, Abradates came into his Chamber, and preſently after him Cleander entred alſo, who knowing that it was he who ſent all the news of the Army unto the Princeſs, told him, that the meſſenger who was to carry the Packet unto Sardis, would depart within this two hours: Perinthus anſwered, that he had not above two words to write; and ſince it was known to all the world that he had a moſt admirable faculty in writing, Abradates who never had ſeen any of his Letters, and did not ſuſpect him to be his Rival, told him, that if there were nothing in his Letter but only a relation of the Siege, he ſhould be extreamly glad to ſee it, not doubting but he was as good at writing, as he was at acting his part in Military affairs. Cleander did ſecond the deſire: At firſt Perinthus did modeſtly refuſe, but ſeeing Cleander was importunate that he ſhould ſhew what he had writ, he was afraid that if he did not ſhew it, perhaps it might be conceived, that he had writ ſomething diſadvantageous of them, ſo that ſubmitting unto the deſires of Cleander, Abradates took his Letter which was not finiſhed, and read theſe words:

Perinthus to the Princeſs of Claſomena.

Though Victory were in your power, Madam, yet your deſires of it could not be more happily accompliſhed: It waits upon the Kings Armies in all places, and nothing can withſtand them: The taking of the Town of Epheſus does well deſerve, that the moſt illuſtrious Princeſs of the World ſhould render thanks unto the Gods for one of the moſt glorious Conqueſts that ever was obtained:

tained : I believe there ought as much to be attributed unto the prevalency of your prayers, Madam, as unto the valour of our Troops : The Enemy reſiſted ſo far, as conduced unto the glory of the Conquerours, but not ſo much as could keep themſelves from being conquered : It is the will of Fate, that the Laurel wherewith Victory crowns the heads of Conquerours is not ſprinkled with much blood, ſince there is not one of any eminent quality died in this laſt aſſault. I do not tell you

I intended to add (ſaid Perinthus after Abradates had read the Letter) the particular actions of Cleander; and many others, when I broke off : You do very well, replied Abradates, and they cannot be better commended than by your ſelf, who knows ſo well how to do it : But ſince your modeſty doubtleſs will not permit you to relate your own actions unto the Princeſs (ſaid he unto him in a ſubtil manner of obligation to ſpeak well of him) and ſince I dare not preſume to write a Letter from my ſelf unto her, having no Commiſſion for it as you have, I beſeech you let me add ſomething to your Letter; and then not ſtaying for the anſwer of Perinthus, who oppoſed him as much as in civility he could, he writ theſe words.

The excellent relation of Perinthus would be imperfect, if ſome part of thoſe praiſes which he deſerves were not included; therefore for your ſatisfaction, for his glory and my own, I beſeech you give me leave to be his Hiſtorian, and to tell you, that he hath made himſelf moſt highly eminent in all occaſions which preſented themſelves, and that, except the illuſtrious Cleander, he deſerves all that glory which he attributes unto others : This, Madam, I thought to be the duty of a man, who pretends unto no higher ambition than to be thought the moſt humble Adorer of the faireſt Princeſs upon earth.

After Abradates had poſtſcripted theſe words, and that Cleander had read it aloud, the heart of Perinthus was much divided ; for he thought it a very advantageous piece of Honour to be commended unto the Princeſs ſo highly by ſuch a Prince as he : But that he himſelf ſhould ſend the Letter of his moſt feared Rival unto his loved and adored Princeſs, was a thing not to be endured : So that to prevent it if poſſible he could, he ſaid, that he was aſhamed to be a ſender of his own praiſes, and that it would purchaſe him more ſhame than glory. Moreover, he feared, that the Princeſs ſhould think very ſtrange he ſhould take upon him the boldneſs to ſend her any Letters from ſuch a Prince as Abradates, For (ſaid he very ſubtilly) though ſhe be pleaſed to honour me with her Commands to write unto her my ſelf, yet that is no conſequence that another ſhould do ſo alſo: Nor is it my own intereſt only which I conſider ; But I am afraid (ſaid he, and turned towards Abradates) that you intend a good office in my behalf unto the Princeſs by it, yet it may make you worſe in her opinion. Since I am certain ſhe eſteems you very much (replied this Prince, who exceedingly deſired that his Letter ſhould come into the hands of his Princeſs) I do not fear ſhe will be offended at me for preſenting a truth unto her in your advantage. No, no, ſaid Cleander, I warrant you the Princeſs will never be offended at ſuch a piece of Gallantry as this; for though ſhe be ſomething ſevere, yet ſhe is rational, and knows how to take things as they ought to be : But it would be well, added he, that Perinthus make an end of his Letter, and preſent your Encomium alſo. Abradates out of modeſty did forbid him, and Perinthus had a deſire to ſay, that he was not able to commend two ſuch illuſtrious perſons ſufficiently in ſo ſhort a time: But Cleander told him, he would diſpenſe with him for half that trouble, and conjured him not to mention him, but forced him to end his Letter in commendation of Abradates, of whoſe paſſion he was not ignorant : So that Perinthus was forced to finiſh it in this manner, though it was not his firſt intention.

I will not tell you, Madam, how the Prince Abradates hath got abundance of glory by a thouſand gallant actions; for after what he hath ſaid in my behalf, that would be ſuſpected of flattery. I can alſo aſſure you, I am very ſorry that his civilities have forced me to alter the end of my Letter, and to relate things after another manner than I intended. Nor will I tell you what Miracles the Illuſtrious Cleander hath wrought, for Fame will do that office for me: But give me leave to tell you without any affected modeſty, that I was never in all my life ſo loth unto any thing, as to this in ſending you my own commendation, although it was writ by the hand of a great Prince, and ſeems to be an infinite honour unto me, that it ſhould be read by the moſt excellent Princeſs of all the World.

PERINTHUS.

When Perinthus had finiſhed, he hoped that happily they would go away, and that afterwards he might procure the meſſenger who was to carry this Letter, to ſay he had loſt it: Yet he had no ſooner ended and ſealed, but Cleander's Envoy came in to receive his laſt Orders, ſo that poor Perinthus was forced to deliver it before them, and away went the meſſenger. Perinthus was almoſt mad at this accident: What a moſt miſerable Fate is this (ſaid he unto himſelf, as he has told me ſince) that I ſhould be the means Abradates ſhould write unto that Princeſs whom I adore? Perhaps ſhe will imagine I did voluntarily do him this office, and that I am the confident of his paſſion? In the names of all the Gods, Oh my adored Panthea (ſaid he, as if ſhe had underſtood him) be not ſo unjuſt as to think I did this Prince any ſervice to you: It is too much you muſt not know I love you, without thinking that I would have you love another. But Perinthus, (ſaid he preſently to himſelf) Art thou not reſolved to content thy ſelf with the eſteem of thy Princeſs? Haſt thou not determined with thy ſelf never to diſcover thy

Love unto her? And doſt thou not know, thou canſt never have any ſhare in her affection? Why then art thou not ſatisfied with that commendation which Abradates hath ſent in thy behalf, ſince it may augment the eſteem which ſhe hath of thee? If the praiſes of an Enemy be glorious, why ſhould not thoſe of a great Prince? But alas, alas, this great Prince is my Rival, and ſuch a Rival as in all likelyhood will obtain the Love of my Princeſs: It is no wonder then that thou ſhouldeſt be troubled, to be thus forced to commend him, and to receive any commendations from him. Afterwards, when he conſidered with himſelf that the Princeſs would anſwer in her Letter unto what Abradates had writ, and that he ſhould be conſtrained to let his Rival ſee the Civilities of Panthea, he reſolved, that if the Letter was over obliging unto Abradates, to ſmother it: Therefore he expected this anſwer with as much longing impatience, as if he had ſent a Declaration of his Love unto Panthea, though his curioſity was only to ſee what the Princeſs would ſay concerning Abradates, who on his ſide exepected this anſwer with the ſame impatience, though not with the ſame fears; ſince it was only three days journey between Epheſus and Sardis, the Letter of Perinthus came thither in two days, and becauſe he who carried intelligence of the taking of Epheſus went Poſt, and made great haſte. Doraliſa, who never was abſent from Panthea, was preſent as well as my ſelf, when the Princeſs received this Letter, which at the firſt ſhe began to read aloud, for knowing that Perinthus never uſed to intimate any thing but matter of news, ſhe expected no other. But when ſhe came to the place which Abradates had writ, and ſaw it in another hand different from that of Perinthus, ſhe read it in a low voice, and bluſhed, whileſt Doraliſa and my ſelf had ſeveral apprehenſions of it: For Doraliſa having ſome ſuſpitions of his paſſion, imagined that perhaps he had took heart, and writ unto the Princeſs concerning it: But I, who had no ſuch conceits, only thought it ſomething which ſhe would not have us know: Yet after the Princeſs had done reading, and that the diſorder which the name of Abradates cauſed in her ſoul, was appeaſed, ſhe gave the Letter unto Doraliſa, and my ſelf to read; and being deſirous to colour the tenderneſs of heart which ſhe expreſſed, ſhe told us, That when ſhe ſaw the alteration of hands, and the name of Abradates, ſhe was afraid leſt he had intimated ſomething, which would have given her cauſe of complaint, both againſt Abradates and Perinthus: However Doraliſa (ſaid ſhe after the Letter was read) you ſee that Perinthus, though not in Love, yet he can be valiant; and that to be brave and gallant, it is ſufficient that one be only in Love with glory; for though I ſeemed to believe as others did, that Perinthus was in Love, yet I aſſure you, I never did really believe it at all: And I aſſure you, Madam, replied Doraliſa, I am not of your opinion; doubtleſs one may be valiant and not amorous, but I do confidently maintain, that if a Gallant man was never in Love, he ſhall be brave and valiant, but bruitiſh withal: And ſince Perinthus, though valiant, is not bruitiſh, therefore I muſt conclude him to be in Love. However (ſaid the Princeſs) as friendly as I am to Perinthus, and as joyful as I am to ſee his praiſes writ by the hand of ſo illuſtrious a Prince, yet believe me, I am almoſt angry with him, becauſe I am forced to anſwer ſomething unto Abradates. Truly Madam (ſaid Doraliſa to her) I ſhould conceive the difficulty not great to anſwer any thing in that Letter: It is true (ſaid ſhe, and bluſhed,) the difficulty is not in anſwering any thing to that Letter, but to ſomething which he ſaid unto me at parting; and then the Princeſs was pleaſed to acquaint us with the conference ſhe had with him; yet notwithſtanding, after ſhe had well conſidered upon it, ſhe reſolved to write, as I ſhall preſently relate unto you. In the mean while, Abradates and Perinthus, who waited impatiently for an anſwer from the Princeſs, were ſo exact to inquire the day when the Meſſenger would return, that they knew to an hour when he would come to give an account unto Cleander: But as ill luck to Perinthus was, Cleander, who loved Abradates, and was not ignorant of his paſſion to the Princeſs of Claſomena; alſo longing to know what ſhe anſwered, went immediately unto Abradates, who was then in the Garden of the houſe where he lodged, and Perinthus with him, who in his preſence received the anſwer from the Princeſs: You may imagine what the thoughts of Perinthus were, in opening this Letter from Panthea, ſuſpecting it to be too gallant and obliging unto Abradates; and this Prince perceiving ſome diſorder in the face of Perinthus, he imagined only that it proceeded from his fears of the Princeſs anger, for ſending his Letter; ſo that he beſtowed a complement or two upon Perinthus, unto which he replied as well as he could, but thought it not advantagious for himſelf to open the Letter ſo ſoon, yet Abradates and Cleander ſo preſſed him unto it, that he was forced to open it, and read aloud theſe words,

Panthea unto Perinthus

It appears ſufficiently, both by what you have related concerning the Prince Abradates, and the illuſtrous Cleander, and by Fame alſo, that victory is much rather the conſequent of their courage, than my prayers; yet I will never ceaſe them for the augmentation of their glory, which can never be ſo high as I deſire them. As for your Perinthus, I find it arrived at ſo high a pitch, that I think it impoſſible to wiſh it greater: For to be commended by ſuch a Prince as merits all praiſes himſelf, is an honour ſo great, that the heighth of your ambition ought to be compleatly ſatisfied; yet ſince your modeſty would have debarred you from telling it, I am obliged unto Abradates for it, though otherwiſe I am ſorry for putting himſelf to that trouble: Aſſure him that as he hath much augmented the eſteem which I had of you, ſo you have moſt ſtrongly confirmed me in my thoughts of him. After this, expect not that I ſhould return intelligence for intelligence, unleſs to acquaint you, that Doraliſa doth ſtill accuſe you, and is abſolutely perſwaded, that all thoſe glorious acts which you have done, are rather effects of that ſecret paſſion which lies cloſe in your heart, than of your courage; For my part I am ſtill juſt, and take your part as well as I can, adieu: Aſſure Abradates and Cleander, that Victory ſhall always follow them, if Fortune follow my deſires:

Perinthus read the Letter ſo badly, eſpecially towards the latter end, that Abradates did civilly deſire to read it himſelf again, that he might underſtand it, telling him with a ſmile, He wondred that a man who could write ſo well, ſhould read ſo ill: But oh Heavens, in what a pitiful caſe was the poor Perinthus, when he perceived the joys of Abradates in reading this Letter, for all it contained nothing but common civility, yet he was extreamly pleaſed with it. The delight only to ſee his name written by the hand of Panthea, tranſported him into a rapture of joy: After he had read it aloud, he read it over again from one end to the other in a low voice, and when he hod done, he would not upon any terms render it back unto Perinthus, whoſe perplexities were more exceſſive than the joys of Abradates were great: he was not only vexed that the Princeſs ſhould return ſuch a civil anſwer unto Abradates, but he was afraid leſt Doraliſa ſhould fall into her old jealouſies, and in the end dicover ſomething; yet he was fully perſwaded ſhe had not yet opened any thing to Panthea, for if ſhe had, Panthea would not have written unto him. Thus having a Soul ſwelled with a thouſand ſeveral conceits, and not one agreeable to his deſires, he ſeemed very reſtleſs; all thoſe obliging words which the Princeſs had writ relating to himſelf, did not at all ſatisfie him, becauſe h thought the commendations ſhe gave Abradates, t be a bitter potion after all thoſe ſweet civilities ſhe beſtowed upon him. In the mean time, Cleander deſiring to oblige Abradates, and never ſuſpecting tha Perinthus was in Love with Panthea, he deſired Perinthus to let Abradates keep the Princeſs's Letter and indeed Perinthus, ſaid he unto him, the Lette does belong unto him as much as unto you. Dear Perinthus (ſaid this amorous Prince, and imbraced him) I heartily beſeech you grant me this favour which Cleander in my behalf hath asked, and which indeed I durſt not. Sir, replied Perinthus, much amazed and troubled, Since you ſay your ſelf durſt not ask what you deſire, it may be imagined you know I ought not to conſent unto it: And truly what would the Princeſs ſay, if I ſhould part with it: For, Sir, the more worthy you are to keep this Letter, the more do I fear to offend the Princeſs in ſuffering it: If it had been her pleaſure that you ſhould have a Letter from her, ſhe would have writ it particularly to you; but this being not ſo, I beſeech you take it not, if I deny it unto you, ſince I would not have her take it ill from me: But the Princeſs need never know it (ſaid Cleander to him) and by conſequence it cannot prejudice you. However, ſince I know it my ſelf, replied he, it will be a perpetual trouble to my mind that I ſhould do any thing againſt my duty: But Perinthus (ſaid Abradates unto him) you will do a thing againſt the Laws of friendſhip, if you refuſe me this Letter; and therefore I pray permit me to keep it for a few days, upon promiſe to reſtore it back. In good earneſt, ſaid Cleander, (and looked upon Perinthus) you are too preciſe, if not too rigid; for be your reſpects of the Princeſs never ſo great, I cannot ſee you would do her any great injury, in truſting a Letter into the hands of a Prince) who doubtleſs would preſerve it with more care than you can have. However it be (ſaid Perinthus with a troubled viſage) I have a great deſire to do what I ought: I am fully reſolved, ſaid Abradates,

Abradates, not to reſtore it, unleſs I have a copy of it at the leaſt. Really Perinthus, (ſaid Cleander, and would not give him time to anſwer) you muſt do this, if you have any diſpoſition to oblige at once, both the Princeſs, and Abradates, and my ſelf. I am moſt unfortunate (replied Perinthus) to meet with ſuch a croſs conjuncture. The truth is Perinthus (ſaid Cleander) you muſt obey your friends; and to ſet your mind at reſt, I will undertake to tell the Princeſs, if ſhe chance to know it, that you denied it with as much zeal, as if you had been in Love with her, and as if one of your Rivals had asked a Copy of a Letter from your Miſtreſs. After this, Cleander not ſtaying for any anſwer from Perinthus, commanded one of his ſervants to fetch him ink and paper: Perinthus was a long while obſtinate, but at laſt, fearing leſt his obſtinacy ſhould argue the true cauſe of it ſelf, and both Abradates and Cleander divine his paſſion by it, he conſented Abradates ſhould have a copy, ſo that Abradates going into an Arbor, amidſt which was a Table of Jaſper, he ſet himſelf to write: Mean while Cleander addreſſed himſelf unto Perinthus, and perſwaded him to do Abradates all the good offices he could unto the Prince of Claſomena, and the Princeſs his Daughter; but Perinthus was ſo netled and unquiet, that he had much ado to return any anſwer: He was tranſported with ſuch violent raptures at this diſcourſe, that he was a hundred and a hundred times ready to ſnatch the Letter out of the hands of Abradates, and to draw his Sword; yet the preſence of Cleander, and ſeveral others which were in the Garden prevented him, and the firſt apprehenſions being over, reaſon did reaſſume her ſeat in his ſoul, and he diſſembled the matter as well as he could; and to calm the diſorders of his mind, he began to think that this Letter was only a Letter of civility, and therefore he ought not to vex ſo exceſſively at it: So that in anſwer to the deſires of Cleander, in behalf of Abradates, he told him, That it was very true, he had the honour to be much in the Prince of Claſomena's favour, and a little with the Princeſs; but yet it was his maxime, ceſs, ſhe did ſo handſomly turn the talk, that Mexaris fell inſenſibly to ſpeak of prodigality, and by little and little ſhe ſcrewed him up to that point, as he maintained prodigality to be the greateſt of vices. For my part, ſaid ſhe unto him, I am not of your opinion, ſince I cannot poſſibly believe, that Vice which reſembles one of the moſt Heroick Vertues, ſhould be worſe than Avarice. How, ſaid Mexaris, do you prefer Liberality in the Soul of a Prince before Valour and Prudence? And had you rather have him liberal, than wiſe and couragious? I know not, ſaid ſhe, whether I had rather have him liberal, than valiant and prudent; but I am ſure I would not have a Prince to be covetous. There are ſome, ſaid Mexaris then, who love liberality in another, only becauſe they have mercenary Souls of their own: 'Tis true, ſaid the Princeſs, ſome ſuch there are, but not always, for I am certain Doraliſa is none of them, but of a generous diſpoſition: Liberality and Generoſity, replied he, are not the ſame: I grant it, ſaid Doraliſa, for I am not ignorant how there are ſome men liberal, who are not generous in all other actions of their life: But yet I will maintain, that he who is not liberal, is not generous, and that Prince who does not poſſeſs that vertue, cannot poſſeſs any: For can it be goodneſs to ſee an hundred men of excellent merit, who are out of favour with Fortune, and not to aſſiſt them? Is there any prudence in getting hatred in lieu of a thouſand honours by benefits? Is there any policy in procuring enemies in lieu of benefits? Is it glorious to dote unmeaſurably upon that which ſo many wiſe men have ſcorned? Is there any friendſhip to be expected from him that denies every thing that is asked him? Can he ever be a good Maſter who never doth recompenſe thoſe who ſerve him? Is there any Gallantry in having ſucha hide-bound Soul as is never ready to give? Or can he be a rare Prince that is covetous? And hath not ſuch vertues as raiſeth them above other men, for indeed I know no other vertue but liberality which ſets them above others: Valour is a vertue as Heroick in the ſoul of a ſimple

Souldier, as in the greateſt King: Goodneſs is common to all men, and commonly more to Subjects tha Soveraigns : Prudence is not peculiarly theirs, othe may be as wiſe, and put their wiſdom in practice a well as they ; but as for liberality, the glory of i is peculiar only unto great ones : It is in vain for tho who have nothing to give, to have that vertue, ſinc they cannot make it appear and ſhine in its glory : A ſo it is in vain, that great ones ſhould have the powe to give, if they have not the will to do it. Yet I ca hardly believe, replied Mexaris, That it is the inte tion of the Gods , that thoſe men whom they ho noured with riches above others, ſhould laviſhly thro them away as they pleaſe : And yet it appears a clearly, replied Doraliſa, to be the pleaſure of th Gods , that thoſe things which they give, ſhould b converted into publick good , and not hoarded u to ſatisfie the avaritious humour of a private ma We have a thouſand glorious examples of that, ſai the Princeſs, The Sun affords his rayes and light to a the World, the Sea gives of his waters unto the Rivers and Fountains : And Kings alſo, unto whom th Gods have given authority , are obliged to contribute it , and all their cares for the good of thei Dominions, and defence of their Subjects. Ha, a for matter of cares (ſaid Doraliſa, and ſmiled) I know ſome who are not very covetous of them, tho otherwiſe I am ſure they are not over liberal. I wonder, ſaid Mexaris, ſince liberality is ſo commendable we never heard of the liberality of Doraliſa : I have already told you, Sir, replied ſhe, That the practice o that vertue belongs only to Princes, yet I have give more perhaps than you imagine : As for the matter o cares and circumſpection (ſaid he, intending to ſpea of the good offices ſhe had done Abradates) I know you have not been very niggardly, for you are very diligent to ſerve your abſent friends. Why, Sir, (ſaid the Princeſs to him, deſiring to turn the diſcourſe) Do you chide Doraliſa for that, as if it were a crime? I conceive it to be an excellent quality, no to forget ones friends. I perceive, Madam, (replied he, tranſported with anger and Love together) That Doraliſa inſpires you with all theſe inclinations, and that ſhe has made you ſo liberal, that you will not only give your own heart, but will alſo refuſe the heart of all others, except——— Mexaris ſtopt at theſe words, perhaps as being angry that he had ſpoken more than he wiſhed he had; but the ayr wherewith he pronounced thoſe words, did ſo offend the Princeſs, that ſhe could not forbear ſome expreſſions of diſpleaſure. 'Tis true, replied Panthea unto the inſolent language of Mexaris, that there are very few hearts which I will accept of, though they ſhould be offered me; and yet more true, that if ever I give mine, it ſhall be unto a perſon ſo illuſtrious, that this my liberality ſhall not make me paſs for a Prodigal. How, Madam (replied Mexaris, deſiring to mend the matter) Can I hope that your heart is not yet given? This word Hope, ſaid ſhe unto him, is not in its due place, for whether my heart be given, or not given, thoſe who wrong me, ought never to pretend unto any part of it: I do not know any that wrongs you, replied he, unleſs it be ſuch as love you, who are unworthy: I grant it, ſaid ſhe unto him, for ſuch I mean: Yet we do not well underſtand one another, replied he, for you mean Mexaris, and I mean Abradates, who, though but an Exile, yet preſumes to look ſo high as your ſelf. Abradates has the honour to be ſo near allied unto your ſelf, replied ſhe, that you cannot be offended at him, unleſs you are ſo at your ſelf, therefore I do not defend him. However, Sir, I beſeech you do not take it ill if I tell you freely, that if I could diſpoſe of my ſelf as I would, I ſhould receive no more viſits from you: I am contented, ſaid he in riſing up, but in exchange I will addreſs my ſelf to the Prince your Father, which perhaps will be more advantageous to me: After this, Mexaris went out from the Princeſs, who was more moved with anger againſt him, than I am able to expreſs; and I believe he did a very good office unto Abradates, for methought ever ſince that day, there appeared more eſteem of him in the diſcourſe of Panthea. In the mean time, Mex went one day to the Prince of Claſomena, and af much common diſcourſe, he told him, that he co give him ſome advice which might be advantage to him: After which, he told him, that honour him as he did, he thought it expedient to tell hi how he thought it a piece of prudence to take ſ order, that the Prince Abradates at his return Court ſhould be deſired by the Princeſs his Daugh not to carry himſelf any longer as her Lover, that knew it was an Alliance which Crœſſus would not a prove on: That moreover, it would not be advan geous unto Panthea to marry an exiled Prince, w had nothing to ſubſiſt upon but the benevolence the King as long as his Mother lived. Afterwards told him, that if he would tranſact the matter a this manner, ſhe would not loſe the opinion of Prince, who might place her in a more conſidera rank than that of Abradates. The Prince of Claſom gave Mexaris thanks for the advice which he g him; and ſince he was not ignorant of the affect which he bore unto his Daughter, and ſince the de of the Prince Atis, he wiſhed rather ſhe would m ry him than Abradates, he promiſed him to take counſel, inſomuch as Mexaris driving the nail m home, did diſcover his Love unto his Daughter, and ved him to make up the match before the King turned: But for all the good language which he g unto the Father of his Princeſs, he could not m him unto his deſires, nor to give Crœſſus any ſ cauſe of complaint as perhaps might ſtart a Civil W So that contenting himſelf with a promiſe that would prevent the deſires of Abradates as much as could, and that he would favour his, he refuſed marry his Daughter unto him without the Kings c ſent, or at leaſt until he had refuſed. However M ris thought he had played his game very well, had obtained very much, in that he was promiſed Rival ſhould not thrive: And indeed that very ſ night, the Prince of Claſomena ſpoke unto his Da ter, and told her, that ſhe would highly diſpleaſe him, if at the return of Abradates ſhe did not reject all his offers of ſervice to her; and on the contrary, if ſhe did not with much civility receive the viſits of Mexaris. The Princeſs was much ſurprized, and vexed at this diſcourſe, yet anſwered with much wiſdom and generoſity both; for after ſhe had aſſured her Father, that ſhe would be moſt obedient unto him as long as life was hers, ſhe beſeeched him not to injoyn her any thing unworthy of her ſelf and him: As for Abradates, ſaid ſhe unto him, though I do very much honour him, yet I can moſt eaſily obey you; but as for Mexaris, who hath moſt manifeſtly wronged me, and againſt whom I have an unalterable averſion, I moſt humbly beſeech you, do not command me to behave my ſelf ſo unto him, as if I eſteemed him, or as if I were any thing obliged to him; for beſides the injuſtice in it, I am afraid I cannot obey you in my heart. Then the Prince of Claſomena would know the cauſe of her exceptions againſt him; but though ſhe did aggravate the matter in relating of it, yet he did not take it as ſhe deſired he ſhould, but on the contrary told her, that all his miſdemeanours were only effects of his extreme paſſion towards her, and therefore he did exact peremptory obedience from her: Until now, Madam, it is moſt certain that Panthea never thought of Abradates, but only in the degree of eſteem, and ſhe thought it no difficulty at all unto her to treat him more coldly than uſual at his return: But yet for all that, ſhe reſolved to look a little better upon Mexaris, by caſting ſome frowns upon Abradates: But her drift was, that if ſhe concurred with her Father in half of his deſires, ſhe thought ſhe might the better refuſe him the other half; ſo that to treat Mexaris the worſe, ſhe reſolved to uſe Abradates ſomething ſeverely: But, Madam, the illuſtrious Cleander returning in triumph unto Sardis after ſo many glorious Victories; the Princeſs began to perceive, that there was more difficulty in acting her reſolutions, than ever ſhe imagined: For ſince every one ſpoke of nothing but the valour of

joy, that ſhe ſaw ſhe was not an abſolute Miſtreſs

Abradates might ſee him near Panthea, and do what ſhe could he would not be ſhaken off. I ſhall not relate unto you, Madam, the magnificence and glory of this Triumph, becauſe time would be but frivolouſly ſpent. But give me leave to tell you, the Priſoners, the Colours, and all the plunder of the Field, taken from the Enemies, were paſſed by, we ſaw at the laſt (after above ten thouſand Horſemen) the King appear, and after him Abradates and Cleander, as thoſe who had merited all the glory of the Triumph. For my part, I did moſt circumſpectly obſerve all paſſages: I obſerved, that as ſoon as Abradates appeared, he knew the Princeſs, and ſaw Mexaris next her, for his eyes pay'd their devotion only up to that window where ſhe was. This Prince was that day of ſo becoming a garb, and his accoutrements all ſo magnificent, that I never ſaw him ſo glorious and amiable in my life. Mexaris no ſooner ſpied him, but he looked whether the Princeſs ſaw him, and indeed he was ſo happy, or to ſay more truly, ſo unhappy, that he was an eye witneſs of the firſt thought which the ſight of Abradates did raiſe in her; for although ſhe had before this firſt ſight prepared her ſelf againſt it, yet as ſoon as ſhe ſaw him, ſhe bluſhed, and bluſhed ſo, as Mexaris obſerved the joy in her eyes; what ſorrow ſoever his ſoul ſuffered, yet he ſtayed ſtill in his place: But whatſoever he ſpoke unto the Princeſs, with intention of moving her to ſpeak unto him, when Abradates paſſed under the Window, could not make her anſwer him one ſingle ſillable. Doraliſa obſerving it, Sir, ſaid ſhe unto him, you need not wonder why the Princeſs is ſo ſilent, for it is impoſſible ſhe ſhould look, and hear, and ſpeak all at once: Nor would I have her, replyed he; for I wiſh ſhe would not look ſo long upon Abradates, but that ſhe would hearken unto me, and afterwards anſwer me. In the mean while, the King, and by conſequence, Abradates drawing nearer, Mexaris was more ſad to obſerve how this Prince ſaluted her with ſuch love and devotion, and in ſuch a becoming manner, that all the Ladies about Panthea did extremely commend him. But to compleat his miſery, the Princeſs who did intend only to ſalute him with a common cold civility, could not keep within that compaſs, but moſt obligingly leaned out of the Window, and ſuch a free, ſprightly and pleaſing ayr appeared in her face, as ſhe made it plainly appear ſhe was raviſhed with joy, ſo that her looks did cure Abradates of more then half his ſorrows to ſee his Rival ſo near her: In exchange, Mexaris was ſo extreamly vexed, that not being able to abide this any longer, he retired from the Window, and walked up and down the Chamber, whil'ſt the Princeſs was looking upon Abradates, who looked ſtill that way, until turning into a ſtreet upon the left hand, he could look no longer. The poor Perinthus, who being prompted by the paſſion of his Soul, was very deſirous to ſee this firſt enterview of Panthea and Abradates, followed this Prince very cloſe, and had obſerved how the Princeſs ſaluted him moſt obligingly, he ſtayed a little behind him, pretending to ſpeak with ſome body, in hopes the Princeſs would caſt her eyes upon him; but the mind of Panthea being very buſie, he ſaluted her three or four times, and ſhe perceived him not, though her eyes were turned that way, and I think he had made all his complements to no purpoſe, if Mexaris leaving his walk, had not come unto the Window, and perceived him, and cauſed the Princeſs to perceive him alſo: Madam, ſaid he unto her, I think it may be ſaid, and not improperly, that you ſee, and you ſee not, you do not ſee that which you look upon, otherwiſe I believe Perinthus to be ſo compleat a man, that he deſerves ſome return unto his long ſalute. The Princeſs was much ſurprized at the diſcourſe of Mexaris, unto which ſhe would return no anſwer, but ſpied Perinthus under her Window, unto whom ſhe made a hundred obliging ſigns, by way of excuſe, for not ſeeing him ſooner; ſhe called unto Doraliſa, and ſhewed him unto her. Thus did Mexaris much againſt his mind make his Rival receive a hundred obliging favours: Is true, Perinthus was not a jot more happy for all theſe, as well by reaſon of his cruel thought that the Princeſs was not friends with him, as becauſe ſhe was ignorant of the paſſion in his ſoul. In the mean while, ſince there was a neceſſity of Mexaris his going unto the King's houſe, and ſince the Princeſs told him ſhe would paſs the reſt of the day in the houſe wherein ſhe was, he was conſtrained to leave her: Within a quarter of an hour after he was gone, Perinthus came in, unto whom the Princeſs expreſſed a hundred teſtimonies of friendſhip towards him. Doraliſa, according to her old cuſtom, fell upon the ſecret paſſion whereof ſhe was wont to accuſe him, and did ſtrive with as much diligence to clear all her ſuſpitions, as if ſhe had ſome particular intereſt in him, and ſhe uſed all poſſible endeavours to diſcover whether his heart were already captivated, as ſhe had often ſuſpected; and therefore ſhe never ſaw him, but ſhe put a hundred odd queſtions unto him, which did exceedingly puzzle him. After much diſcourſe upon the happy ſucceſs of this War, the Princeſs asked Perinthus whether he had not contracted a great knot of friendſhip with Abradates during this War? For I conceive it very fit, ſaid ſhe, that you two were intimate friends: Friendſhip, Madam, replied he, is not like unto Love, which very commonly grows between two unequal perſons; but on the contrary, to compleat a friendſhip, there is a neceſſity that it be between two perſons of a ſuitable age, humour and quality: So that ſince I am very ſhort of Abradates in almoſt all things, it were raſh preſumption in me to pretend unto the humour of his friendſhip: For my part, ſaid the Princeſs, If I did not think that what you ſay were out of modeſty only, I ſhould wonder your opinion ſhould be ſo contrary unto mine, for I am fully perſwaded, that Love ought always to be between perſons of equal condition and quality, but in matters of friendſhip it is not abſolutely neceſſary; and I ſhould think the fate of Princes to be of all men moſt miſerable, if they ſhould never have any friends but of their own condition, who are not always the beſt accompliſhed men, and who however are but a very ſmall number. Since your reaſon, Madam, replied Perinthus, is much more clear than mine, perhaps I am miſtaken; but I have ever thought that Princes can have only creatures and ſervants, but few friends: Yet on the contrary, I have thought that the power of Love was never confined into ſuch narrow limits as you preſcribe: Ah, Perinthus, ſaid the Princeſs, I conceive there is an abſolute neceſſity in it, yet I do not hold it impoſſible, that one of high quality ſhould and may ſtoop ſo low as to love an inferiour: But I ſay that diſproportion in Love, is one of the moſt extravagant things in the World. But, Madam (ſaid Doraliſa, and ſmiled, and having a deſire to make Perinthus ſpeak) You do not conſider how this paſſion was in the hearts of men, before ever force put a difference between them, or had made ſome Soveraigns, and ſome Subjects: So that according to the firſt intention of the Gods, the neceſſary equality to make Love reaſonable, is equality of merit, and equality of perſon, and not of condition and quality, which are ſtrange things, and which ſerve oft-times to render thoſe that poſſeſs them in the higheſt degree, the more contemptible and ſcorned, when they are not found to be perſons of Merit. I conceive, Madam, replied Perinthus, that Doraliſa ſpeaks much reaſon. I conceive rather, replied the Princeſs, that ſhe ſpeaks much wit: But for all that I muſt maintain, that there is a certain kind of univerſal diſcretion, which cuſtom hath eſtabliſhed, and ought to be taken as Reaſon and Law, that the quality of perſons who are to Love, ſhould not be diſproportionable: If Love, replied Perinthus, were a thing voluntary, I ſhould then think ſome equity in what you ſay, but ſince it is not, I conceive it to be moſt unjuſt. By this diſcourſe of Perinthus, ſaid Doraliſa, one may conclude, that if he love, he loves above himſelf, or below himſelf: Perinthus, ſaid the Princeſs, ſpeaks this only in general, and makes no particular application; And to tell you truly, I do love Perinthus better than to ſuſpect him of any ſuch thing, for I think him ſo wiſe, as that he will aim at no impoſſibilities, and ſo full of honour, as that he will not love below his Quality. Perinthus was now exceedingly at a non-plus, for his Love would not permit him to confeſs the Princeſs was in the right; and to ſay ſhe was in the wrong, were either to diſcover his ſecret, or to be ſuſpected of a paſſion unworthy of himſelf: So that returning a witty enigmatical anſwer, neither the Princeſs nor Doraliſa could thereby make any certain concluſions. In the mean time, ſaid the Princeſs, we do the greateſt injury in the World unto ſo many illuſtrious Heroes, who have hazarded their lives for our ſafeties, and have not been ſparing of their bloods, to the end they ſhould be talked on; for in lieu of diſcourſing upon thoſe glorious acts which they have done in the Wars, we are talking upon matters of Love, which is full of extravagancies and folly. After this, ſince now it grew late, ſhe roſe up, and went home, where Abradates was already come to viſit the Prince her Father, who received him very coldly. But aſſoon as he ſpied the Princeſs out of a Balconey, he preſently left the Father, and as his devotion called him, went unto his Princeſs the Daughter. Panthea received him with much civility, but with ſomewhat leſs freedom than he ſaw in her eyes when he paſſed by her; but his joyes to be near her was ſo great, that at the firſt he made no great reflection upon it; and the leſs, becauſe he being alone with her, ſhe did it purpoſely to prevent his boldneſs in talking of his Love; yet he would not loſe ſuch a favourable opportunity, for aſſoon as the firſt complements of common civility were performed, and when he had expreſſed his ſorrows for being ſo long abſent from her, alſo his joyes now to ſee her, and to ſee her fairer than ever. If it had pleaſed the ſame Gods who give you that luſtre, Madam, ſaid he unto her, to have alſo rendred you a little more affable, I ſhould be the moſt happy man upon the earth, I ſhould forget all the ſorrows I have ſuffered, and ſhould think upon nothing but adoring you with delight and reverence. The Princeſs hearing Abradates ſay ſo, and knowing very well by the ayr wherewith he ſpoke, that the ſame paſſion was in his heart which he expreſſed in his words, her mind was much divided. On the other ſide, ſhe was not ſorry Abradates loved her; and on the other ſide, conſidering her Fathers charge, ſhe thought it not permittable to entertain his paſſion. In the mean time, not being able to fix her reſolutions, ſhe took the middle way, and without either too much affability, or incivility, ſhe ordered her converſation ſo, as Abradates did neither preſume, nor deſpair; yet queſtionleſs he obſerved, how her Spirits were not ſo free and genuine as they were accuſtomed, but he could not penetrate into the cauſe. At his departure from her, he went unto Doraliſa, whom he highly eſteemed, and looked upon her, as one whom the Princeſs loved, to the end he might throughly inform himſelf by his diſcourſe with her, whether Mexaris had reaped any benefit by his abſence. Doraliſa was ingenuouſly free to diſcover what he had deſired to know, and told him, that Mexaris was worſe in the opinion of Panthea then ever. Moreover (ſaid ſhe unto him) I believe that Prince is not more in Love than he was when you departed, for I am ſure he is not more liberal: Alſo I have uſed my beſt arguments to perſwade the Princeſs, that he ſtayed here behind you, rather to keep and preſerve his Treaſures, than either for any Love to her, or any reaſon of State, as he would make her believe he did. Ah Doraliſa, ſaid Abradates, you do ſo fully ſatisfie my wiſhes in telling me what I deſire to know, that I am afraid you only invent it to pleaſe me: You cannot chuſe but confeſs, replied Doraliſa, and laughed, that in probability the Prince Abradates is much more eſteemed than Mexaris: I know not whether it be probable or no, replied he, but I wiſh with all my ſoul it were true: If that be all which wants to make you happy, replyed ſhe, then be ſo, ſince I do not think, there is any one in all the Court who does not eſteem you above Mexaris, without any exception of himſelf, for indeed you are ſo terrible unto him, that he fears you. Since it is your goodneſs to anſwer me ſo favourably in all things, ſaid he unto her, I am almoſt imboldned to ask you other queſtions, which rather than my life I deſire to know. Since perhaps I do not know the ſtate of thoſe things which you would inquire of, replyed ſhe, ſo well as I did thoſe unto which I have already anſwered, my replies unto them will neither be ſo pleaſing, nor ſo certain. Ha, Doraliſa, ſaid he, you do moſt preciſely know upon what terms I ſtand in the opinion of that Princeſs whom I infinitely adore: Have I not already told you, replyed ſhe, that ſhe eſteems you more than ſhe doth Mexaris? Yes, replyed he: But after a more ſerious examination of that diſcourſe, which at firſt did much joy me, I find that to be eſteemed a little more than that Prince whom ſhe eſteems not at all, is no very great favour; Therefore Doraliſa, ſince you have already ingaged me ſo far, as to tell me thus much, and ſince the violence of my Love forces me to ſpeak of that which takes up all my thoughts, I moſt earneſtly beſeech you, be ſo generous as to tell me, whether I muſt die in deſpair, or live in any hope? Sir, ſaid ſhe unto him, you ask me more than I know, and by conſequence more than I can tell you: If I ſhould judge according to your merit, and by the mind of the Princeſs which is able to diſcern a compleat man, I ſhould believe that her choice would be of you; but if I judge according to the capritiouſneſs of Fortune, who makes them that moſt merit to be happy, moſt miſerable, there is cauſe to fear that many things will croſs your deſires. Fortune, replyed he, may doubtleſs ſo frown upon me, that I may never enjoy Panthea: But this Fortune ought not to make any alteration in her heart and thoughts, which is the thing I deſire to know. Since I did never preciſely ask her, what ſhe thought of you, (replyed Doraliſa) I can tell you nothing of certainty: All I can ſay, is, that knowing Panthea ſo judicious as ſhe is, I think, if you do not proſper in your deſires, it will be rather through the fantaſticalneſs of another, than through any averſion ſhe hath towards you.

Abradates perceived that Doraliſa would not any further explain her ſelf, but he conceived that ſhe knew he ſhould be croſſed in his love. Doraliſa, the next morning, went betimes unto the Princeſs, and told her all that the Prince had ſaid, and deſired to know from her what anſwers ſhe ſhould hereafter return him, for ſhe imagined that further diſcourſe might be upon the ſame Subject. You ſhall always tell him, replyed the Princeſs, that you are not acquainted with my thoughts, and that you will not undertake to bring any meſſage from him to me. But, Madam, replyed Doraliſa, I hope you will permit me to tell him (what you deſire I ſhould) in ſuch a manner of ayr, as I may a little better explain your meaning. As for the tone of your voice, replyed Panthea, and laughed, I will not regulate you, ſince I do not think there is any in the world who has a better art to tell things angrily without any harſh words than you, nor who can expreſs any thing more ſweetly without any groſs flattery. It is not your pleaſure, Madam, replyed Doraliſa, that in telling Abradates I do not know your thoughts, I ſhould tell it in ſuch a manner, as if I knew you had an averſion towards him; and it would be an irreparable injury in him to love you with a moſt reſpective paſſion. No, replyed the Princeſs, nor on the other ſide, would I have you to tell it in ſuch a manner as may let him think that if you do not tell him my thoughts, it is becauſe they are very advantageous for him: What then, would you preciſely have me make him think? (ſaid Doraliſa.) I would have him think (anſwered Panthea) that without any ſuſpition of ſubtilty in your words, you dare not ſpeak unto me of him, and that you do not at all know the ſecrets of my heart concerning him, and without any perſwaſions of him that I am any thing averſe, to make him think there is much difficulty in the enterpriſe; and in ſum, that without either making him hate me, or accuſe me of his misfortune, or ſuſpecting me of any weakneſs, I may ſtill have his eſteem, and live in quiet. Ha, Madam, (ſaid Doraliſa) if all theſe muſt be interpreted by the ſound of a voice only, I had need to ſend for all the Phrygian and Lydian Muſick about Abradates, to help me in the expreſſion of all theſe paſſions, without any words: For ſeriouſly, Madam, I cannot do all this, but I muſt either create hopes or fears in Abradates: Then infuſe fears (ſaid the Princeſs, and ſighed.) Doraliſa, who thitherto did but jeſt with the Princeſs, according to that uſual freedom the Princeſs gave her, perceiving that the Princeſs ſighed, aſſumed a more ſerious look; and Panthea acquainting her with all that the Prince her Father had ſaid unto her, then ſhe conſidered that great circumſpection which was to be uſed in ſpeaking unto Abradates, for ſhe conceived it not convenient to let him know that Mexaris was the Man who thwarted his deſign, leſt ſome bad conſequences might thereupon ariſe, and ſhe knew alſo, that the Princeſs would not have him think ſhe ſlighted him: So that Doraliſa undertaking the tranſaction of this negotiation, ſhe did manage it with much diſcretion, and for ſome days did ſo ſuſpend the ſpirit of Abradates, that he knew not what to think. In the mean while, Perinthus, who heard it from the mouth of the Princeſs, that nothing was more extravagant than Love between perſons of unequal Quality, was ſo exceſſively ſad, that many days could not diſſipate the melancholy which theſe words (ſpoken without any deſign) had infuſed into his ſoul; his ſorrows were ſo exceſſive, that all the World took notice of the alteration in his humour: The Princeſs her ſelf perceived it, and as he was one Morning with he and Doraliſa there alſo, Panthea asked her, if in th opinion which ſhe held, that Love only makes com pleat Men, ſhe thought, that when they ceaſe to love they ceaſe to have any amiable quality left in them For if ſo, ſaid the Princeſs, it muſt be concluded that Perinthus of late hath ceaſed to love, ſin his converſation is not as it was wont to be. No, m Madam, ſaid Doraliſa, it is not ſo; for he who w once made compleat by virtue of love, remains all his life. True it is yet, that this paſſion whic adds a hundred excellent qualities, may ſometim become too too violent, and cauſe him in whom reigns to be leſs pleaſant in his converſation, an even transform him from what he is. But, Madam I am ſo far from thinking Perinthus leſs ſociable, b cauſe he hath ceaſed to love, that on the contrary I am perſwaded he is more in love than ever, o perhaps, he is leſs loved than ever; for commonl where one is poſſeſſed with this paſſion, it is rathe from the thoughts of another than from his own that he becomes unhappy. But yet, Doraliſa, ſai the Princeſs, you have not yet made that diſcover which you vaunted to do ſo eaſily: It is true, Ma- dam, replied ſhe, that I am not yet ſatisfied whe- ther or no ſome ſuſpicions I have be well grounded I pray, ſaid the Princeſs, acquaint me with thoſ ſuſpicions. Ah, Doraliſa, (cryed Perinthus, who feare ſhe would tell Panthea the paſſages which were befor the Siege of Epheſus) th[illegible] are ſome things which ar not to be jeſted with, and I hope you are ſo good, a you will not ſo cruelly diſoblige me, as to impart tha for certainty which you take up on bare ſurmiſe, with- out any appearances. This extraordinary care whic you take to prevent my ſpeaking of it, ſaid Doraliſa, ma be an argument I am not deceived: But however, ſai ſhe, I will impoſe ſilence upon my ſelf. The Princeſ then began to preſs Doraliſa to tell her what ſhe ſuſ- pected, but notwithſtanding all her importunity, ſhe could not prevail: However, ſhe raiſed a thouſand ap- prehenſions of fear in Perinthus, but yet without cauſe, for the principal reaſon which kept Doraliſa from telling the Princeſs what ſhe thought, was, leſt the Princeſs ſhould take it ill ſhe ſhould ever imagine that ſuch a Man as Perinthus ſhould dare to look upon the Princeſs in that way of Love. Whilſt this converſation paſſed on in this manner, Doraliſa obſerved ſo much agitation in the eyes of Perinthus, that whilſt one came into the Room upon ſome buſineſs to the Princeſs, ſhe addreſſed her ſelf unto him, and told him, that he had much confirmed her in her ſuſpitions: Why Doraliſa, ſaid he, would you have me ſuffer you to tell ſuch a thing as this unto the moſt ſevere Princeſs upon earth? Really you made my heart tremble as much as if you were ready to put me out of the favour of her whom you ſay I Love: Perinthus very ſubtilly ſpoke this with as much freedom of Spirit in appearance, that he much amazed Doraliſa, and perſwaded her ſhe was miſtaken. Thus, Madam, did things ſtand at this preſent; Abradates was fuller of fears than hopes, Mexaris on the contrary hoped all, and feared nothing, Perinthus having neither hopes nor fears, concluded himſelf the moſt unfortunate man alive. As for the Princeſs, ſhe had a ſtrong averſion to Mexaris, as ſhe had an inclination to Abradates, and was as friendly to Perinthus, as ſhe was either to Doraliſa or my ſelf. But whil'ſt Mexaris was taking thought which way he might obtain the Kings leave to marry Panthea, and whil'ſt Abradates thought to ſtrengthen himſelf by the friendſhip of Cleander, the conſpiracy of Antaleon was diſcovered, which made ſo great a noiſe, that I believe you are not ignorant of it, for it was the whole diſcourſe of all the Court for a long time: But, Madam, to ſee the difference which was between the ſouls of Mexaris and Abradates. The firſt of theſe did ſecretly endeavour to make Crœſſus believe that this Prince had a hand in the conſpiracy, but do what miſchief he could, the King would never entertain the leaſt ſuſpition of it: But as for Abradates, his ſoul was of a more Noble temper; for there chanced to be two men who had been ſervants to Mexaris, and had received no wages from him; theſe men ſeeing the liberality of Abradates, and knowing him to be a Rival unto their Maſter, addreſſed themſelves unto him, and told him, that if he pleaſed, they could accuſe their Maſter of ſuch a crime as would ſet him far enough from Court: Theſe two men, whoſe ſouls were as vile as Mexaris was covetous, made this Propoſition unto him: Abradates heard them with horrour, and did contemptuouſly reject them, and their offer: And afterwards, ſince I believe (ſaid he unto them) that you were not induced to ſo vile an act, but becauſe the avarice of your Maſter hath made you poor, I will put you into a condition wherein you may chance find out a better than he was, and not be forced to commit crimes for a ſubſiſtence; and then he cauſed greater rewards to be given unto them than they ever could have hoped for, if though he had employed them in the buſineſs which they propoſed unto him: They were ſo ſurpriſed with this generoſity, and ſo aſhamed of their own perfidie, that they could hardly reſolve to accept of this offer, yet at laſt they did; but how magnanimous ſoever this action was, it had never been known, had not theſe two Fellows quarelled about dividing this Largeſs, and the one killed the other in going from the houſe of Abradates; ſo that the Murtherer being apprehended, and brought into the hands of Juſtice, where preſſed by the remorſe of his own Conſcience, he confeſſed the true cauſe of his crime; ſo that by this accident, the Heroick action of Abradates came to be divulged to all the World, and particularly, to Mexaris, who gave him but a cold complement for it. As for the Princeſs, her joy at it was ſo great, that ſhe could not chuſe, but tell Abradates of it, and commend his generoſity: Madam, ſaid he unto her, I know no reaſon you have to commend me ſo highly, for it is no ſuch exceſſive virtue to prevent the doing of a bad action; yet if the act be conſidered in another reſpect, which is matter of Rivalſhip, in that I ſhould not conſent to have him ſet out of my way, it may be thought a little virtue in me, if I had not a more noble way to rid my ſelf of my Enemies when they urge me unto it. Ah, Abradates, ſaid ſhe unto him, you will urge me to chide you, in lieu of giving you any commendations: I beſeech you then, Madam, replyed he, give me ſome aſſurance that the joyes which you expreſs is not becauſe I would not give way that the Prince Mexaris ſhould be ſent further from you: I will moſt certainly aſſure you, anſwered ſhe, upon condition you will promiſe me to avoid all manner of quarrels with that Prince, as much as poſſible you can: Before I make ſuch a promiſe, replyed he, the Princeſs of Claſomena muſt give me ſome aſſurance, that ſhe will look with a favourable eye upon me, otherwiſe I muſt confeſs, my deſpair may provoke me to take revenge upon my Rival, for all the rigours of my Miſtreſs: That would be a piece of high injuſtice, replyed ſhe, to puniſh him who is not in the fault; and therefore it were better, ſaid ſhe, and bluſh'd, to caſt off her that is ſo ſevere: Yes, Madam, ſaid Abradates, ſo I would, if I could, and not caſt off my life with her: But, Madam, I love you not ſo little, as that I can deſire to love you leſs; but on the contrary, though I love you as much as for my ſoul I can, yet methinks I love you not enough: Yet truly I ſhould think my ſelf much obliged unto you, replyed ſhe, if you would look upon me with more indifference than you do: Believe me, Madam, replyed he, you would never thank me for giving you that ſatisfaction: But inhumane Lady, is it poſſible that the pureſt and moſt adoring paſſion that ever was, can offend you? If it does not offend me, replyed ſhe, yet it muſt be plainly confeſſed, that at the leaſt, it diſquiets me and therefore, I ſhould be very glad you would only eſteem me: You may as well add, anſwered he, that you wiſh I had neither eyes nor reaſon, for otherwiſe you deſire impoſſibilities; for as long as I have my ſight, I ſhall find you the faireſt of your Sex, and as long as I have my reaſon free, I ſhall admire you as the wonder of Nature and the World, and were I without either eyes or reaſon, certainly I ſhould ſtill adore you: Yes, Madam, my heart is totally yours, and my Love of you, and none but you, is grown to ſuch an ingrafted Cuſtome, that though my tears ſhould blind me, and my ſorrows ſink me out of my wits, yet my very pace would conduct me to you: Judge then, Madam, I beſeech you, whether it be poſſible I ſhould only eſteem you: No, no, Madam, there is no poſſibility in it, I never had ſtrength enough to reſiſt the All-commanding power of your Charms, ſince I firſt had the honour to ſee you in the Wood, and by the Fountain: Take it not ill therefore I moſt humbly conjure you, that I perſevere in loving you as long as I have life: If your goodneſs and pity could reſolve to afford any Teſtimonies of a particular Affection, I will promiſe to lay open my heart and ſoul unto you, and never to think upon any deſigns but ſuch as you are pleaſed to infuſe, nor ever to meddle with the Prince Mexaris but according unto your Dictates; but if on the contrary, you perſevere in that ſeverity which of late you have uſed towards me, it ſhall go hard (notwithſtanding the reſpects I owe unto the Brother of Crœſſus, or the Queen of Suſiana) if I do not find out ways of revenge upon him whom I think to be the cauſe of my misfortune. It ſeems (ſaid the Princeſs then) that my aſſurance of you, that the Prince Mexaris is not in any favour with me will take away from you all cauſe of quarrel with him: It ſeems Madam (replyed he) that ſince in conſideration of him, the Prince your Father does treat me worſe than heretofore, there needs no other reaſon to induce me to ruine him: Yet if I have any power with you, ſaid Panthea, you ſhall attempt nothing againſt him. Since it is your command, Madam, that for the Love of you I muſt reſpect my Rival, I beſeech you for the Love of me, give me ſome obliging comfort. Provided you will punctually obey me (anſwered Panthea, and ſmiled) I will pardon all which you have ſaid this day: I ſhall obey you, Madam (anſwered he) upon this condition, that you will pleaſe to permit me often to take new commands from your own mouth, for otherwiſe I am afraid I ſhall ſail in my promiſe. As Panthea was ready to reply, Cleander entred, and cauſed the Princeſs to change the diſcourſe, who ſince that day did by little and little accuſtom her ſelf to hear Abradates complain unto her of thoſe miſeries which ſhe her ſelf had cauſed: It was her will alſo, that Doraliſa and my ſelf ſhould ſweeten thoſe bitter thoughts which he had of the Prince Mexaris; for though the Princeſs had confeſſed unto him, that ſhe eſteemed him more than any in the world, yet ſhe always conſtantly told him, that ſhe could not reſolve to diſobey her Father; and therefore all that ſhe could do for him, was to promiſe, that ſhe would deny him as far as decency would permit. Some hopes he had alſo that Mexaris would not proſper in his deſign, becauſe Cleander aſſured him, that Cræſſus would certainly oppoſe that Alliance out of ſome reaſons of State, and promiſed him that he would confirm him in that opinion ſo effectually, as Mexaris ſhould never bring his hopes to paſs. Theſe promiſes and aſſurances did much leſſen the fears of Abradates: Since he knew Perinthus to be a Favourite of the Prince of Claſomena, he Courted him very much with a hundred complements: The Princeſs alſo was very glad that Perinthus had the Love of Abradates. and often bad him ſpeak as much as he could in his favour: But the more teſtimonies of eſteem ſhe expreſſed unto this Prince, the more violent deſigns did he forge in his heart to ruine him: But for all this, as he was a man of a generous Spirit, he was ſometimes aſhamed of his own weakneſs, and of the injuſtice of his thoughts; yet Love being too ſtrong a Maſter, he could not chuſe but grieve more at the paſſion of Abradates, than at that of Mexaris. In the mean time, ſince there was a good correſpondency between Panthea and Abradates, it was her deſire he ſhould be more reſerved in his Viſits, to the end ſhe might better perſwade the Prince her Father that ſhe was obedient as concerning Abradates; and that ſhe might have more reaſon to reſiſt him, in caſe he would needs force her to marry Mexaris; yet did he ſee her every day, either at the Prince of Lydia's lodging, or at Doraliſa's.
